Kenya's population of 6,450,000 consists of 6,170,000 Africans, 169,900 Asians, 66,400 Europeans and 37,100 Arabs.

Nonracial Approach Urged

Mrs. Dorothy Hughes, who went to Kenya as a child and is a member of the New Kenya Group, stressed the need for a "nonracial approach." She said:

"I cannot see that any Constitution can work unless it is firmly based not only on the people's understandable aspirations and hopes but also on friendship and harmony. Nor can it be achieved by any superficial political formula or safeguards."

She appealed to the British Government to finance the expansion of educational and welfare projects to bridge "the great gaps between our peoples as quickly as possible."

The effort to find an acceptable formula for advancing Kenya's independence through constitutional reforms will now go into committee rooms, where the delegates will be less tempted to speak for public consumption.

Iain Macleod, the Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs, will sum up the week's debate Monday. He might indicate then the policy he will recommend to the Government.

KENYANS CONCEDE AFRICANS' RIGHTS

Few at London Meetings Uphold Die-Hard View of 'White Settlers'

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, Jan. 27—Of the seventeen white Britons attending the Kenya constitutional conference as delegates, only a handful can be described as die-hard "white settler" types.

They are, for the most part, the four members of the United party, which stands firm for colonial rule and against self-government and independence for Kenya in the foreseeable future.

"But, in spite of what certain of our detractors may say," the United party leader told the conference at the outset, "we are very far from supporting European interests to the exclusion of just rights and aspirations of other races."

The dozen or so other "Europeans," as the white Britons are called, have come to accept both the justice and inevitability of an evolutionary progress that will convert a colony ruled by white foreigners to a free nation governed by Africans.

As the conference gets down to specific proposals, there is wide disagreement between the moderate "Europeans" and the African nationalists over the "when" and "how" of independence, but not over the proposition that more of Kenya's 95 per cent African population must have a voice in the government.

All around Kenya, the process of independence is well-advanced. Its immediate neighbors are African-governed, and Tom Mboya, the leading African nationalist here, has told the conference that Kenya cannot remain an island.

The acceptance by the majority of responsible whites of the principle that Kenya should govern itself is an advance from the days when British settlers saw the country as an ever-loving child of the Empire—an opportunity for British enterprise, an outlet for British resources and a beach-head for romantics and adventurers.

The Britons now helping to plan Kenya's future in the meetings at Lancaster House represent both first and second-generation Kenyans. They are mainly farmers, which also means great landholders, because the country's major industry is agriculture.

But they are also "old soldiers," civil servants, social workers, tradesmen and technicians. Three of the four United party members here, including its leader, Group Capt. Llewellyn R. Briggs, were professional military men who chose civilian life in Kenya.

The British settlement in Kenya resulted from a number of diplomatic and colonial moves in the late nineteenth century that broadened Britain's "sphere of influence" in East Africa and gave impetus to her talent for empire-building.

But the most tangible incentive for settlement was the decision to build a railroad from Mombasa on the coast to Lake Victoria that would also give access to the headwaters of the Nile.

The first application for land was filed in 1902, and in the twelve months following, hundreds of pioneer settlers began to arrive.

It was a frontier for many types. Some early settlers arrived with a blanket roll and a few shillings, their legacy from the aftermath of the South African War. Others appeared on the steaming shores of East Africa with immaculate lady's maid and butler from England.

Now there are 64,700 white settlers, virtually all British, who are going to have to adjust not to the rigors of cutting an empire out of the wilderness but to the contraction of their property and privileges.

Apart from the voting qualifications and other colonial regulations that have enabled the white settlers to govern the colony as they and London wished—probably in the long run to the advantage of both—they have lived privately and exclusively in the "white highlands."

Out of Kenya's 225,000 square miles, the most equable and arable 12,000 have been the reserve of the white settlers. Holdings range from coffee plantations and pig farms of a few hundred acres to 30,000-acre ranches.

This land will one day either be in African hands, or, at the very least, will no longer be exclusively white. There is now before the Kenya Legislative Council a document known as "Land Tenure and Control Outside the Native Lands."

With his land privacy, the settler will lose the voting privileges that enabled him to dominate the Kenya government.

Marshall Barred By Kenya Police

KAIMBU, Kenya — (ANP) — Atty. Thurgood Marshall here in the role of special advisor to Kenya Africans for the forthcoming London constitutional conference, opening on Jan. 18, ran into a police blockade Sunday when he sought to enter a private political meeting.

Marshall, accompanied by Tom Mboya, African nationalist leader and Kenya legislative council member, was told he could not enter the meeting because a license granted for the meeting — did not include their attendance. This comes under government law which controls political meetings, and license conditions are strictly enforced.

Many White People Pull Out Of Kenya

BY ROBERT C. RUARK

Special to Scripps-Howard Newspapers

NAIROBI, Kenya—The final results on the rigged London conference on a new voting apparatus for Kenya are clouded by British journalism, so I will not attempt to explain what it means except in simple terms.

Harry Selby, father of two, is selling his farms. Five farmers I know from Kitale have left for Australia, leaving their choice properties up for grabs. A man who runs 35,000 head of prime cattle on a 60,000-acre ranch outside Maralal is out here from England to see if he can get rid of it, at a loss if necessary.

I personally have just been offered a coffee property with a fine view of Mount Kilimanjaro in Tanganyika for something around $28,000. The last time the place was bartered it was for $126,000.

The streets of Nairobi today are crowded with Somali come in from the north because the movement for a greater Somalia is a hot item at the moment. Old Mau Mau faces now throng the corners since the recent mass release of detained murderers. Heavy thievery has started again. Wheels are missing from autos, houses are broken into, and if I know anything about this operation the theft of guns will start again soon.

* * *

THERE IS A DEFINITE border traffic in arms from Ethiopia to Kenya at the moment—that I have from the highest authority in Ethiopia. There is an acute shortage of work in Kenya for the recently released Mau Mau, as well as other fringe natives who have swum to the cities on the wave of "independence" with the result that farm labor is more easily come by than in a long time.

As for the Kenya "representative" government plan, I make it that out of the 65 votes in the legislative council, 37 will be African and 14 will be Asian and Arab minorities. Against this total of 51 black and brown votes, the white settlers will have only 14 votes.

As the news of the agreement was leaked last week, and then announced, the whites' fury was wild. Their despair was painfully evident and white determination to fight back was equally as evident as a determination to leave.

And oddly enough, the triumph in London for Nationalist Leader Tom MBoya's one-vote-one-man program, which is supposed to take place in from 14 to 18 months, seems somewhat less than popular with a great many Africans.

* * *

WHEN THE WHITE MAN goes, the feeling among the more sophisticated tribes is that there won't be much work. "They will starve us, Bwana," one old fellow told me. "All Mboya does is ask for money. The unions will run everything."

But there won't be much to run. Tribal warfare seems inevitable, since the fighting tribes are the rich nomads with great herds which are sure to be tempting to the tax collectors serving a deficiency government.

Possibly the greatest complaint on the street today is that the triumph of Mboya & Co. endorses Mau Mau and made an honored councilor out of the exiled Peter Koinange, the nationalist leader held partly responsible for the Mau Mau terror.

Kenya Offer Is Accepted By Africans

Reuters

LONDON, Feb. 15—The African delegation at a multiracial conference here on the future of Kenya today announced acceptance of a British Government plan reported to give Africans more say in the government of the East African colony.

African leader Ronald Ngala said Colonial Minister Iain Macleod's proposals were acceptable for a transitional government, pending the establishment of a 1-man-1-vote system.

The proposals also were said to be acceptable, "with some reservations," to the multiracial new Kenya Party delegation led by Michael Blundell.

Mcleod's plan has not been disclosed officially. But it is believed to call for the establishment of a 65-seat legislative council.

Kenyans filling certain property qualifications could vote for candidates to 53 of the seats, 10 of which would be reserved for the white minority, 8 for Asians and 2 for Arabs.

The remaining 12 seats would be filled by 12 "national members," 4 African, 4 white and 4 Asian, elected by the rest of the legislative council.

The British Governor of the colony would nominate 4 official government ministers and 8 ministers from among the elected members. The Governor would retain the power to veto legislation.

British Group Asks Free Kenya by '65

The Miami Herald

The New York Times Service

LONDON — An organization of young Conservatives has called upon the British government to fix 1970 as the beginning of independence for Kenya.

Mon. 1-4-60

The proposal was made by the Bow Group, an independent research and pamphleteering society of younger Conservative Party members — some of whom are members of Parliament — that generally tries to guide the party toward progressive policies.

"The time has come when the force of African nationalism, which like nature may be rough or smooth, can be met in Kenya only by announcing dates for responsible government and independence within the commonwealth," a Bow Group pamphlet states.

"It is suggested that 1965 be the date for responsible government and 1970 for independence."

The legislative side of the Kenya government until 1965 should be multi-racial, in the proportion of two African members for one European and one Asian, the pamphlet suggested.

Britain was also urged to spend an additional $14,000,000 over a five-year period to speed up the development of African secondary education.

The publication said that equal rights under the law must be secured for all races now if minorities — that is Europeans and Asians—were to have any hope of keeping those rights during and after the transfer of power.

Thurgood Marshall to Aid African Group on London Constitutional Parley

New York

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 10J Thurgood Marshall, New York Negro attorney and chief counsel of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, arrived here today. He has been retained by the African elected members of the Kenya Legislative Council as their special adviser at a constitutional conference scheduled to start in London Jan. 18.

Mon. 1-11-60

Mr. Marshall, who has been on a tour of Africa, was met here by Tom Mboya, an African nationalist and labor leader, and Doctor Gikonyo Kiano. Both the Kenyans are Legislative Council members.

The 51-year-old American attorney said he would be in Nairobi for a few days and would then accompany the Kenya African delegation to London for the conference, which is expected to result in major alterations in the colony's Constitution. The conference was demanded by African leaders soon after they had rejected a Constitution offered by Britain in 1957.

The Africans' demand for democratic reforms is based on the principle of universal adult suffrage. Asked on his arrival whether he considered universal suffrage the answer to Kenya's political problems, Mr. Marshall replied:

"I cannot give you a direct answer to that one because I am not sure. I have got to have a look around."

Marshall Will Meet Asians

During his stay here, Mr. Marshall will meet leaders of Nairobi's Asian community. A campaign of African agitation against Asians that began here just before Christmas and has included mob attacks on Asians and their shops.

This afternoon Mr. Marshall was prevented from attending a meeting of delegates of African district political associations from all parts of the colony at Kiambu, about fifteen miles from Nairobi. As he tried to enter the building with Mr. Mboya and Dr. Kiano, a European district officer turned him away.

Mr. Marshall was told that all political meetings were licensed and that the names of those permitted to attend appeared on the license. Mr. Marshall's name was not listed. He then decided to go sightseeing.

The African members of the Legislative Counsel were attending the meeting to receive instructions from district associations concerning the principles to follow at the conference in London.

After the session, Mr. Mboya said the African delegates would demand full independence for Kenya this year.

A Fighter for Civil Rights

As chief counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Mr. Marshall has been in the forefront of that organization's fight to win full civil rights for American Negroes.

He has appeared twenty-five times before the United States Supreme Court, winning twenty-three cases and losing two.

Mr. Marshall was in charge of the N. A. A. C. P.'s campaign to outlaw segregation and discrimination in the public schools. This campaign culminated in the decision of May 17, 1954 in which the Supreme Court ruled against the principle of separate but equal educational facilities for Negroes.

Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the N. A. A. C. P., said yesterday that the invitation from the Kenyans was the first of its kind to be received by Mr. Marshall. Mr. Wilkins added that Mr. Marshall would be acting in an advisory capacity only, with the initiative and decisions on objectives remaining entirely in the hands of the Kenyans.

"The association is very interested in the progress of African states toward independence, but has no working relationship with any organized body over there," Mr. Wilkins said. "We will do everything we can to help them within the bounds of international protocol."

Kenyatta may lead freedom movement forming in Kenya

The Afro-American

Baltimore, Md.

(Special to the AFRO)

LONDON, Eng. (ANP) — News from Kenya is that a new freedom movement has been launched and will be led by Jomo Kenyatta, when he is released.

Jan 23 1960 P 8

Considerable mystery shrouds the movement, which London papers say was launched by supporters of the People's Convention Party of which Tom Mboya is a leader.

The BBC Radio said it was a new movement.

The newly formed party is reported to have declared that the African elected leaders now in London have betrayed their brethren by accepting the Macleod plan as a basis for further negotiations.

KENYATTA WILL have none of this: one man, one vote and equal rights for all, irrespective of race, color or creed is what he and most Africans demand.

As that has been conceded to Ghana, Nigeria and the Belgian Congo it seems illogical to refuse it to Kenya.

The extremist white settlers are talking again of "defending their rights" by arms if necessary.

Moderate - minded whites want a charter of Human Rights in which minorities in Kenya wll be secured when Africans dominate the Government.

Extremist Africans object to that: "If they don't trust us to govern let them get out" is the Africans' reply.

Colonial Secretary Ian Macleod new to the job, has had to get his advice from the permanent staff at the Colonial Office and, of course, his orders from the Cabinet who take their orders from the arty, which, in turn, takes its orders from the arty bosses, who are the City and the Establishment.

Jomo Kenyatta is still boss of Kenya and whether the Tory Government in Britain and the white and Asian settlers of Kenya like it or not Africans will dominate Kenya unless something bigger and better is offered to them.

Kenya Talks Leave Major Issues Open

Final Session Hears African Arguments

By Richard C. Wald

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

The last two items on the agenda, on which a measure of agreement had been hoped, were apparently left for the Colonial Secretary to set to rights. These were a draft of the outlines of a bill of rights and some guaranties against expropriation of land.

The final communique made no mention of the last two points. It said simply that "all groups except the United party . . . accepted that the proposals on the Executive and the Legislature should be implemented as the next stage in Kenya's constitutional advance" and that the Governor of Kenya, Sir Patrick Renison, in anticipation of this constitution, will "bring some further African members into his Council of Ministers."

Success for Colonial Chief

By and large, the conference has been a resounding success for Colonial Secretary Iain MacLeod. He himself was pessimistic at its beginning and few thought it could achieve much agreement.

However, the moderate, multiracial New Kenya party and the African Elected Members Group headed by Tom Mboya and Ronald Ngala managed to reconcile a great number of their differences and to agree, although reluctantly, to a constitution on the middle ground offered by Mr. MacLeod.

This was made clear last Monday when the outlines of the new constitution, giving the Africans much more power in running their country, were made public. All that remained then were the bill of rights and the land guaranties. These were thought to be easy of settlement and the Right-wing United party, which had refused to accept the main outlines, stayed behind to talk about these last points.

Concern Over Land

But they proved impossible to settle. The whites of Kenya want guaranties written into the constitution that their land will not be expropriated by a future African government. They are particularly anxious about the status of the "White Highlands," some of the best farming in the country, which is held exclusively by white owners.

The African members said they could not agree to give away the right of expropriation which every other government has and could not bind future governments at the insistence of the white settlers now.

Where the two major parties had previously been able to come together in private sessions, they were unable to do so in the last week. The conference was expected to end on Wednesday, but it dragged on until today.

The result, in lieu of any other announcement, is that Mr. MacLeod will have to impose these parts of the constitution.

KENYATTA BLAMED IN TERROR REPORT

Kenya's Survey of Mau Mau Revolt Issued as Africans Press for His Release

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, May 31—Jomo Kenyatta, who is seeking a political comeback, was described in detail in a long report published here today as having been the organized of Kenya's Mau Mau rebellion.

The Mau Mau uprising led to the declaration of a state of emergency in Kenya from October, 1952, to January of this year. More than 13,000 Africans and ninety-five white persons lost their lives in what amounted to a civil war.

The author, Frank D. Corfield, former Goevrnor of Khartoum Province in what used to be the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, concludes that the basic responsibility of governments faced with the demands of African nationalism is to maintain law and order. His report, prepared at the request of the Kenya Government, says:

"It was the failure of the Government of Kenya * * * to appreciate the importance of this very foundation of good government * * * which was the basic cause of the outbreak of violence."

Report Took Two Years

The 321-page Corfield report, entitled "The Origins and Growth of the Mau Mau—An Historical Survey," has been in preparation two years. Its publication comes at a time when heavy pressure is being exerted by African nationalists for the release of the aging Mr. Kenyatta, whose confinement to Kenya's northern frontier district prevents his active participation in politics.

Mr. Kenyatta was convicted in 1953 of having been the "manager" of the Mau Mau rebellion. He was elected president a few weeks ago of a new African political party, the Kenya African National Union.

Mr. Corfield traces Mr. Kenyatta's political activity over the last forty years—his visits to Britain and the Soviet Union and his rise in the late Nineteen Forties as a virtual dictator of the Kikuyu tribe, the largest in Kenya.

Associated Press

DENOUNCED: Jomo Kenyatta, imprisoned Mau Mau leader in Kenya. His record is examined in detail in a report on the history of the Mau Mau movement.

Stresses Are Noted

Describing the development of Mau Mau as "African nationalism run riot," Mr. Corfield says it was "the culmination of a long period of political unrest among the Kikuyu people." This unrest, he said, arose from stresses and strains felt by tribal Africans brought suddenly into contact with highly organized civilization. The report says:

" * * * without freedom afforded them by a liberal Government, Jomo Kenyatta and his associates would have been unable to preach their calculated hymn of hate."

Mr. Corfield warns that uncritical support of African nationalist movements may encourage those who seek their political ends violently.

Comemnting on the grant of independence to Ghana and the Sudan and to other African territories in the future, he says:

"The grant of independence in these countires, as elsewhere, has given a great and enthusiastic impetus to all government and social activities and, provided la wand order is maintained, there is little doubt that perhaps not unreasonable African governments will evolve, although they are likely to bear little inner semblance to a democracy as we know it for some time to come.

"But the ferment of freedom has been let loose and this will no doubt insure that eventually the forms of government to be evolved in these countries will have to take a reasonable account of individual liberty."

Kenya Students Airlifted To U.S.

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP)—Negro students began flying to America Sunday in an airlift whose financing was surrounded by political controversy in the United States.

The first planeloads of 144 students left from Nairobi Airport Sunday. Some of the remaining 130 students will leave Monday and the rest next week. All will study in U.S. universities under scholarships.

The $100,000 for the airlift was provided by the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Foundation, named after the brother of the U.S. Democratic presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kennedy. Republicans charged the senator agreed to underwrite the airlift as a political gesture. Kennedy said he had agreed on the condition that he receive no publicity and only after the U.S. State Department has refused the money.

Africans Won't Take Any More, Thurgood Says

Pittsburgh Pa.

LONDON—"To sum it up, these people have had it, and they are not going to take any more," Thurgood Marshall wrote his wife from London where he is working with the African delegation from Kenya.

Marshall, chief counsel for the NAACP, was in Britain's East African colony to prepare for the job he is now doing in London.

He is said to be the "welcome" half of a team of sepcial advisers to the African delegation to the Kenya constitutional conference.

The conference has been stymied because the other adviser, Peter Mbiyu Koinange, is not acceptable to the British Government, and the Kenya African delegation refuses to take part until both advisers can join the conference.

MARSHALL, WHO has argued for the rights of United States Negroes for a quarter of a century, is now testing his talents on the Negro's rights in Africa.

However, he believes that the foreign policy of the United States is another and less satisfactory matter. He intimated that the United States' attitude toward Africa and Africans was graphically illustrated by what had happened in the United States Embassy in Liberia.

Marshall said that before the Eisenhower Administration came to power, the embassy in Monrovia had a bi-racial staff divided equally between Negro and white. Today, he continued, it is "pure white," except for one Negro member of the United States Information Agency, who is somewhere in the hinterland.

DESPITE WHAT might seem to Africans to be deficiencies in United States' foreign policy, Marshall does not believe Africans will turn to the Soviet Union for help or friendship.

Marshall gave three reasons for taking the unpaid job with the Kenya Africans:

(1) There has been a growing awareness of African problems in the United States over the last five years or so.

(2) Africa is providing opportunities for expansion and international contacts for Negro businessmen.

(3) Marshall had never been to Africa before.

"I had always meant to go," he said, "but never got around to it."

Finally the 51-year-old lawyer said that any African country engaged in the struggle for freedom need go no further for help than her African neighbors.

AFRICAN CONTROL OF KENYA IS SEEN

Long-Range British Plans Worry Whites at Talk

New York

By WALTER H. WAGGONER

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, Feb. 1—Iain Macleod, Secretary of State for the Colonies, proposed today that Kenya be brought to independence under a parliamentary system that, "as time goes on," would guarantee the majority Africans the predominant voice.

The Colonial Secretary outlined his views as the Kenya constitutional reform conference entered its third week, and after a week in which forty-six delegates had spoken at length on or around the issue of the East African Colony's future.

The exact nature of Mr. Macleod's proposals was not made known. He asked that they be regarded as confidential and delegation leaders in the main tried to respect his request.

But from their reactions, it was apparent that the Colonial Secretary went further in his recommendations for Kenya's ultimate self-government and independence than either of the leading white representatives would have liked.

"I think shocked would be a better term," he replied. "And I am speaking for the whole group."

Maj. B. P. Roberts, One of the four members of the Briggs group, declined to comment on the Colonial Secretary's remarks because, he said, "I might blow up."

A far more temperate response came from Michael Blundell, the Yorkshire-born leader of the multiracial New Kenya Group. At a news conference, Mr. Blundell described Mr. Macleod's speech as "a masterpiece of skating on thin ice."

Slower Pace Is Favored

At another point, he said the Colonial Secretary's proposals were "subject to a variety of interpretations."

His final word, however, was that what Mr. Macleod had had to say appeared less disturbing on a second reading than it did on the first. Mr. Blundell left no doubt, however, that he and the majority of his party proposed a slower route toward a self-governing independent Kenya than that demanded by the African nationalists here.

Mr. Blundell, who represents the moderate white as well as the Asian and Arab elements that are likely to go farthest in meeting the majority African demands, emphasized that ultimate freedom for Kenya was not in dispute.

He made it clear at the same time that the New Kenya Group opposed any voting formula such as the "common roll" of one man, one vote proposed by the Africans.

Westminster System Cited

The part of the Colonial Secretary's speech that was made public, before he offered his own proposals, dealt with Kenya's future in terms that could have disturbed only the most extreme white or African elements.

"I want first of all to make two points quite clear," he said. "When I speak of parliamentary institutions [for Kenya] I am thinking of the Westminster model, the system which was born here nearly 700 years ago and has been molded and nurtured here ever since. It is that system that I hope to see flourish in Kenya.

"As time goes on, Africans, and I use the word in the commonly accepted sense, will be in the majority position and their voice will be the predominant voice," he continued. With developments in the franchise, African influence will necessarily and significantly increase.

"Africans will attain their position not just because they are Africans, but because the majority of those who will come to play a part in the government of their country will be be Africans."

At Mr. Macleod's suggestion, the conference now goes into committee. He will preside over discussion of the key issue: "The size and composition of, and the franchise arrangements for a legislature approprate to the next stage of constitutional advance in Kenya."

Another committee will consider the size and composition of the Council of Ministers, which almost all agree should be made smaller, and a third will deal with "methods of safeguarding human rights as Kenya's constitution develops."

the third committee will be a "Bill of Rights" prepared by Thurgood Marshall, American Negro attorney who is an adviser to the African delegation.

'Friendly' Session Outside Africans and Moderates Hold of Formal Conference

New York

By WALTER H. WAGGONER

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, Feb. 4—The leaders of the African and moderate multiracial delegations to the Kenya constitutional conference met privately today. Their talks were understood to have been fruitful.

With no general conference sessions scheduled, the various delegations conferred among themselves and separately with Iain Macleod, Secretary of State for the Colonies. Tonight, a Colonial Office spokesman declared:

"This is the most encouraging day we have had in the conference so far."

Some Colonial Office authorities, as recently as yesterday, had not given the conference much better than a fifty-fifty chance of success. The parley is to recommend a plan for making Kenya self-governing and independent.

Talks Called Friendly

The most significant meeting appeared to be that between Tom Mboya, Ronald Ngala and Masinde Muliro of the African group and Michael Blundell, Wilfred Havelock and C. B. Madan, an Indian of the multiracial New Kenya Group.

A statement issued after the meeting said only that "friendly discussions took place and agreement was reached to meet again."

Mr. Blundell, leader of the New Kenya Group, added that the two delegations had discussed "the constitution, the franchise and the fears and worries of each race."

Llewellyn R. Briggs, the United party leader, did not reveal the character of the talks, but he announced that his party group was to meet tomorrow with the African delegation.

Little was expected to come of the meeting, however, because the United party's white settlers and the Africans take opposite positions on Kenya's future.

African Demand Circulated

A memorandum signed by Mr. Ngala was circulated among all delegates today. It repeated the African demand for a government responsible to the majority of the people and a franchise based on universal adult suffrage and the common roll of "one man, one vote." It stated:

"In the year 1960 a white man has no better claim to a seat in the Legislature of Kenya solely because of his race than an African has a right to a seat in the British Parliament solely because of his race."

Other documents being studied include a document on a future franchise and legislature prepared by Prof. W. J. M. Mackenzie, constitutional adviser to the conference; a Colonial Office proposal for revision of the executive, and a Bill of Rights drawn up for the African delegation by Thurgood Marshall, the United States Negro attorney.

KENYA'S AFRICANS IN KEY TALK TODAY

Whites Anxious Over Parley to Form Political Group Throughout Colony

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, March 26—The white community of 66,000 is anxiously awaiting the outcome of a meeting of African leaders to be held tomorrow at Kiambu, in Kikuyuland.

The object of the meeting is to form a colony-wide political organization embracing all the African political parties that have sprung up since the state of emergency's end earlier this year.

The conference is thought likely to become the scene of a struggle for power between Tom Mboya and a powerful group of Kikuyu disciples of the sequestered Jomo Kenyatta. The group is led by a former Mau Mau member, James Gichuru.

Ten of the fourteen African members of the colony's Legislative Council gave a pointer on the outcome yesterday when they and other political leaders signed a statement announcing a new party. The four African elected members, including Mr. Mboya, were not invited to sign.

One signatory, C. M. G. Arwings-Kodhek, president of the Nairobi African Congress, said one reason why Mr. Mboya had not been invited to sign was that other African elected members resented recent trips he had made to their constituencies. They suspect him of attempting to form local political organizations whose officers would be authorized to attend tomorrow's meeting and vote him to power.

Mboya Will Attend

Mr. Mboya has said he will attend the meeting and make his position clear. He will also hold a public meeting in Kiambu as soon as the poltical leaders' meeting has ended.

Observers see developments of the last few days as indicating a return to power of the Kikuyu leaders detained throughout the Mau Mau emergency and released under the act of grace that was one of the first actions of the new Governor, Sir Patrick Renison.

Europeans fear that in the inevitable struggle among the African leaders the most vocal and extremist elements will emerge triumphant before Kenya's elections early next year for the colony's first African-dominated government.

A Government statement yesterday said that after discussions with the Governor the African elected members had agreed to hold three ministries and appoint one assistant minister in a caretaker government to operate until the new Constiution could be implemented.

It is understood Mr. Mboya was offered a ministry but did not accept. Other possible ministers are Dr. Gikonyo Kiano, a Kikuyu; Ronald Ngala, a coastal tribesman, who led African delegates to recent London talks on the colony's future; T. Towet, member for the Kipsigis, and J. N. Muimi, a Kamba.

An official statement on the portfolios is expected tomorrow.

Mau Mau Force Oath on Survivors

NAIROBI, Kenya, June 4 (AP)—The son and daughter of a murdered Kikuyu headman told police they were forced to take the Mau Mau oath by killers who daubed their faces with their father's blood.

William Wambugu, a staunch loyalist during the 1950 Mau Mau emergency in this British colony and headman of the Chinga location of the Nyeri District, was slain earlier this week.

His son and teen-age daughter said that after the killing a seven-man gang made them take the oath.

A dusk-to-dawn curfew has been imposed on the area and extra police moved in.

KENYANS SOLVING A RACIAL PROBLEM

Europeans and Africans Put Differences Aside to Help Improve Agriculture

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

NYERI, Kenya, June 7—An important development for the future of Kenya is taking place in this area. Europeans and African farmers are cultivating the land successfully side by side.

Although this British colony in East Africa is still troubled by political difficulties and faces many problems on the way to self-government and independence, solid foundations for its basically agricultural economy are being built in areas such as those around Nyeri, 100 miles north of Nairobi, capital of Kenya.

Two men who have overcome the racial feelings that have hindered Kenya's progress are Nathaniel Mitini, a 45-year-old member of the Kikuyu tribe, and Peter Marrian, 43, a graduate of Oxford, who came to Kenya to farm when he was discharged from the British Army after World War II.

Agriculture Department Helps

Mr. Mitini's eleven-acre farm is much smaller than most of those owned by Europeans. He runs it without help, except from his two wives and four children. British experts from the Kenya Department of Agriculture have advised him on how best to develop his farm and he has a warm relationship with Paul Langrish, the district agricultural officer, who comes from Cheshire, England.

The Mitini farm is eighteen miles outside Nyeri on a dusty road that winds through the foothills of the Aberdare Mountains. At an altitude of more than 6,000 feet the air is crisp and clean and the green fields are proof of the abundant rainfall.

In common with the hundreds of other African farmers in the area, Mr. Mitini raises coffee and potatoes as cash crops and maize for food. The highest quality coffee in Kenya is grown by African farmers who have benefited from the help of British agricultural experts. Mr. Mitini's crops yield him a cash profit of about $560 a year.

He has benefited, too, from the Kenya land consolidation program. In exchange for fragments of land two or three miles apart that he once held under the Kikuyu tribal system, he now has eleven acres in one unit. The complicated consolidation program is being advanced with tribal approval.

Pleased With Change

Mr. Mitini said he was "very pleased" with the change. "Before the land consolidation was done I had twenty-four small pieces of land scattered all over," he said. "Now I can work in one place and earn more."

On the edge of the Kikuyu reserve Peter Marrian raises coffee and cattle on 2,300 acres with the aid of 250 African employes. Unlike many Europeans who scoff at African farmers, Mr. Marrian, who is president of the Kenya National Farmers Union, said he knew many able African farmers.

With his American wife, the former Susan Vogel of Chicago, and their three young sons, Mr. Marrian lives in a rambling tree-shaded house amid broad green lawns.

"Every month we have a party of twenty or so African farmers here to see what's done," he said. "After all, the battle of Africa will be fought on the individual level."

Would Open Land

Mr. Marrian and his wife feel strongly that the future of Kenya and of Africa depends on all races working together. Their farm is part of the so-called White Highlands, an area of many thousands of fertile acres that has been reserved for European farmers. Unlike many of their neighbors, the Marrians believe the White Highlands should be opened to African farmers who have proved on farms of their own that they could make good use of the land.

"I have three hills on my place that I'd like to make available to African farmers and help them to cultivate them," Mr. Marrian said. "We've got to break this White Highlands barrier. It never made sense and only aggravated feelings."

A proposal to end the legal prohibition of African land ownership in the White Highlands is pending in the Kenya Legislative Council, but conservative Europeans are fiercely opposed to it.

SCHOOLS IN KENYA FACE INTEGRATION

Steps Toward African Rule Spur Plans for Gradual Mingling of 3 Races

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, June 19—Preparations for racially integrated schools are being made in Kenya, where only four years ago integration was bitterly opposed.

Initially African, Asian and white students are to study together in secondary schools. Plans for introducing integrated classes at this level in the next year are being worked out by the Department of Education.

Leaders in all three racial communities are campaigning throughout this British colony for integration. They hope that children of all races may be attending school together at the intermediate level before long.

The strongest opposition to integration has come from the 65,000 whites in Kenya, which has more than 6,000,000 Afri Asians. A private elementary school in Nairobi known as the Hospital Hill School was the target of criticism in 1956 after it had accepted white, African and Asian pupils for integrated classes.

Now that Kenya is well on the path toward an African-controlled Government, the realization has dawned that if there is to be harmony in the future the racist attitudes of the past must be dropped. One supporter of integration is Reginald S. Alexander, who represents Nairobi in the Kenya Legislative Council. He said:

"We have heard it said often that we want other races to attain our [European] standards and learn to behave as we do before they can to given responsibility. Yet when opportunities come forward these same people say 'we want you to attain our standards but do not come near us to learn them. We cannot have it both ways, and if we try we are in danger of being classified as hypocrites."

Africans Want Integration

One of the main arguments against integration by whites has been that the standards of education would suffer. Accordingly, W. A. C. Matheson, Minister of Education, has agreed to empower boards of governors of schools now restricted to whites to admit students of other races who meet established qualifications.

Mr. Matheson said some white leaders, such as Mr. Alexander, were "actively promoting" integration.

"They are going around the community telling the Europeans that this is what you've got to do voluntarily, or worse will be done to you," he said.

Africans and Asians are strongly in favor of full integration in all schools, which, incidentally, is the offical policy in the neighboring British-administered trust territory of Tanganyika. The African attitude was summarized recently by Masinde Muliro, a schoolmaster, who represents the northern Nyanza Province in the Kenya Legislative Council.

"Children must be brought up together," he said. "They cannot meet at the university level; they have formed their ideas about race by that time. If they could grow up together that is the best guarantee of the best society."

He added that African children should probably receive their early education in the tribal tongues they learn at home and join children of other races after a few years.

Integration is receiving support from the British Governor of Kenya, Sir Patrick Renison. He recently arranged a Government grant of $40,000 and additional land for the expansion of the Hospital Hill School.

At present education is compulsory in Kenya only for white children and for Asian boys between the ages of 7 and 15.

About 96 per cent of the African boys and 45 per cent of African girls of primary school age get four years of primary schooling. Last year only 28 per cent of those who completed the primary course went on to intermediate schools and only 13 per cent of those completing the four-year intermediate course continued on to secondary schools.

Money and teachers are short in Kenya, which has an annual budget of about $90,000,000 for all Government purposes. About 17 per cent of this goes for education. It is estimated that $60,000,000 more would be needed to provide eight years of schooling for all children.

KENYANS SEEKING TO EASE TENSION

The N.Y. Times

Whites and Africans Join Effort to Promote Calm Before February Voting

New York, N.Y.

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 3—Strenuous efforts are being made to reduce political tensions in this British colony.

African leaders have joined the Governor, Sir Patrick Renison, in trying to promote a calmer atmosphere. This led to an unusual event in the last week when, for the first time in the memory of many persons here an African was invited to address a meeting of white settlers.

Meanwhile, African, white and Asian leaders have been appealing for an intelligent and calm approach to the political changes that are coming in Kenya as they are elsewhere in Africa.

The changes here stem from a decision, taken early this year at a conference in London on Kenya's Constitution, that Africans would have a majority in the Legislative Council as a first step toward self-government and eventual independence for the colony.

Since then there have been many emotional outbursts and tension has mounted as preparations have been made for a general election next February. Now an effort is under way to insure that the election is held in the calmest atmosphere possible.

Mboya at White Club

Typical of the attempts to produce better understanding between Africans and whites was the appearance a few days ago of Tom Mboya, general secretary of the Kenya African National Union, the largest of Kenya's African political organizations, at the North Kinangop Club deep in the rich farming area known as "the white highlands." It was the first time an African had entered the place as a guest.

Mr. Mboya ranged in his talk over many of the problems that are worrying Kenya's white minority as the day of African-controlled government draws near. He tried to reassure his audience about such things as land titles, the concern of African leaders over the flight of capital from Kenya and understanding by Africans of their responsibilities as "freedom" approaches.

At the end of Mr. Mboya's speech, Robert Wilson, chairman of the North Kinangop District Association, commented: "It was a very good idea to invite Mr. Mboya, and although he did not provide specific answers to the farmers' problems, he did clear the air a certain amount."

Another statement that has helped calm fears was made by James Gichuru, president of the Kenya African National Union, when he returned early this week from talks in London with Iain Macleod, Britain's Colonial Secretary.

"We discussed most of our problems and I feel that solutions are not impossible and that possibly next year most of our tensions will be lowered," Mr. Gichuru said.

"I hope the Europeans will be sensible and not elect people who will antagonize the Africans" he added.

In a talk yesterday, Governor Renison spoke optimistically about the forthcoming changes.

"I myself am facing these changes with greater sureness," he declared, "now that responsible leaders are showing that they realize and can teach their followers two facts about minorities in Kenya: that it is not the way of the world that minorities should seek to perpetuate domination when others are ready to take responsibility, and that it is equally important to a country's stability and reputation and progress that minorities should not be dominated or put in fear."

SLUMP HITS KENYA AS CAPITAL FLEES

The N.Y. Times

Uncertainty Over Approach of African Rule Drives Money From Country

New York, N.Y.

Sun. 11-13-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 12—The flight of capital from this British East African colony in the last seven months has placed a great strain on Kenya's economy.

The amount of money transferred elsewhere since March is estimated at about £10,000,000 ($28,000,000).

Political uncertainties are blamed for the situation in Kenya. A similar economic slump has occurred in Uganda in the last eighteen months. Tanganyika, which is politically more stable than its two East African neighbors, also has experienced a loss of capital and wariness on the part of new investors.

Observers in Kenya believe that the colony's economic health will not be restored until responsible African government is attained and stability is maintained.

"The people must see for themselves that African leaders would not seize property and place strict controls on funds," one observer remarked.

London Talks Stir Slump

The present recession in Kenya started after the constitutional conference in London in March that set Kenya on the road to government by the African majority within the next few years.

Money flowed out of Kenya to such places as Britain, India, Pakistan and Switzerland. Many of those who transferred their funds were small investors, to whom the loss of £1,000 ($2,800) would be a large amount.

Larger sums were withdrawn by white settler farmers who elected to send their money elsewhere rather than reinvest it in improvements to their farms as they had done in the past.

As a result funds available for loans have been sharply curtailed. Business on credit has been strictly limited by both wholesalers and retailers.

On instructions from their home offices in London, banks in Kenya have imposed heavy restrictions on overdrafts in contrast to the latitude previously permitted to depositors who overdrew their accounts.

Some Exploiting Soil

Some businesses and individuals have run short of cash as funds have been sent out of the country and several small traders have been forced into bankruptcy.

Some white settler farmers, preparing to leave Kenya, have started "mining" their farms by switching from such long-term crops as coffee, tea and sisal to such quick cash crops as pyrethrum and cereal grains. They thus get every possible shilling out of the land while putting nothing back. Some sharply curtail or abandon their use of costly fertilizers.

Many farmers, however, have indicated that they intend to stay in Kenya if given guarantees safeguarding their land titles. Legislation to establish such safeguards is being prepared by the Kenya Government.

Economic analysts say that for the long range Kenya's economy is basically sound. They point out that it is broadly based on diversified agriculture. Production is increasing and economists are confident that once political uncertainties are overcome investment capital will flow back.

Masai Tribe Attacks During Political Rally of Rival African Nationalists

New York, N.Y.

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 5—The supporters of rival African political parties clashed here today. One man was killed by a spear thrust and five persons were badly injured.

The fight occurred at the village of Ngong, about three miles from the Nairobi city limits. Warriors of the Masai tribe attacked about 3,000 Africans attending an open-air political meeting of the Kenya African National Union. The Masai are supporters of the Kenya African Democratic Union, a rival group.

On hand to address the meeting were James Gichuru, chairman of the national union; Tom Mboya, General Secretary, and other party officials. They fled when the fighting broke out.

Youth Wing Retaliates

In retaliation, members of the youth wing later raided the Nairobi offices of the democratic union, damaging desks and other equipment before a police riot squad restrained them.

The incidents pointed up the tribal differences that have divided Kenya's 6,000,000 Africans into two political camps as the country approaches the general election in February. The Kenya African National Union, led by Mr. Gichuru and Mr. Mboya, draws its main support from 2,500,000 members of the Kikuyu and Luo tribes. The Kenya African Democratic Union, organized by Ronald Ngala, Kenya's Minister of Labor, is backed by smaller tribes such as the Masai, Giriama, Nandi and Kipsigis.

The dead man and those injured in the fighting were Kikuyu.

The supporters of the National Union gathered on a broad plain in the sun. Their meeting place was inside the area set aside as a reserve for the Masai.

The Masai are a nomadic tribe of herdsmen who subsist largely on a diet of milk and blood from their cattle. They are tall, fierce warriors and jealous of their land.

Masai Run for Arms

More than 200 Masai stood silently on the outskirts of the meeting. They were unarmed. The Masai became enraged when one of the speakers said the Masai were backward people and were delaying freedom for Kenya's Africans.

The fighting started and some Masai ran a few hundred yards to a hollow where they had hidden their spears and other weapons. The police fired tear gas and charged with batons to break up the battle.

Mr. Mboya and other officials of the National Union complained later that the police did not act quickly enough. Mr. Mboya asserted that the National Union would organize its own protection force to prevent violence and interruption of future meetings.

"We are not prepared to turn the other cheek to the Kenya African Democratic Union," he said.

Meanwhile, another National Union meeting scheduled to be held tomorrow in the Nairobi area was canceled by the police, who feared more tribal clashes.

The meeting at Ngong was held to mark the opening of the National Union's campaign to win a majority of the seats in the Kenya Legislative Council in the February election.

Dr. Arenia C. She represents her church group, and will visit Ghana, Cape Palmas and other places while there. She will return to her desk in Lexington, Miss., early in February.

Liberian college honors 6 Americans

By REGINALD TOWNSEND

MONROVIA, Liberia (ANP) —Honorary degrees of doctors of law and humanities were conferred upon five colored and one white man — all Americans — by the University of Liberia recently.

The honorees were: Drs. Benjamin Mays, president, Morehouse college; Ralph J. Bunche, UN undersecretary; Martin Jenkins, president, Morgan State college, and John W. Davis, former U.S. country director; Atty. Thurgood Marshall, NAACP legal counsel; and Raymond C. Firestone, president, Firestone Tire and Rubber company.

Principal address given at the ceremonies held in the university auditorium was delivered by Dr. Mays. His chief point of emphasis was on the "Trend of education," which he said was "first, to glorification of God and secondly service to mankind."

President William V. S. Tubman, recently inaugurated for his fourth term of office, was among those present at the ceremonies.

Tubman Inaugurated To Fourth Term As President Of Liberia

Mr. Tubman was first elected for an eight - year term on May 4, 1943, and reelected to four - year terms in May, 1951, and May 3, 1955. He has been in politics for most of his adult life.

During his Administration he has worked hard to develop the economy of the country and its natural resources of rubber and iron ore. Iron ore from the Bomi Hills is rated as highest now mined (68. 8 per cent pure). Production, now more than 1,000,000 tons yearly is exported chiefly to the United States. Liberia provides 10 per cent of United States rubber imports.

He began his professional life as a lawyer and has grown rich in his 63 years. He owns a large amount of real estate in Monrovia, as well as a rubber plantation and a cocoa estate.

TRUE WHIG MEMBER

Mr. Tubman belongs to the True Whig party, which dominates Liberian politics. It has never lost an election, having elected every Liberian President for more than 75 years, with little or no opposition.

Mr. Tubman is a man of medium height, somewhat on the heavy side. He dresses well and is fond of good living

At his 1956 inauguration, Mr. Tubman and his entourage, dressed in the most formal clothes-cutaway coats, striped pants, top hats, gray vests and cravats — were dismayed when members of a Soviet delegation showed up in business suits.

Mr. Tubman founded the exclusive Saturday Afternoon Club in Monrovia. It is limited to 30 members. When the President is present, which is nearly every evening, lights on the roof are turned on.

The Presidency has furnished Mr. Tubman with many of the luxuries of life, such as a yacht, fine cars and one of the few air-conditioned homes in Liberia.

TRAVELS EXTENSIVELY

Mr. Tubman was the first President of Liberia to travel extensively in his country's privitive interior. He has held frequent councils with tribal chieftains.

During his Administration he has obtained the assistance of the United States in building roads, communications, airports, and a harbor at Monrovia.

Mr. Tubman is a lay preacher of the Methodist Church. Before he became President, he served in the Liberian Senate and as an Associate Justice of the Liberian Supreme Court.

He has been married three times and has five children. One of his sons attended Harvard.

Tubman lauds Zion strides in Liberia

(Special to AFRO)

MONROVIA, Liberia (Delayed) — President Vincent S. Tubman views the elevation of S. Dorme Lartey to the bishopric by the AMEZ Church as "a new sun with rays of hope" in advancing spiritual leadership in Africa.

The President expressed this view at a recent banquet attended by high government officials in the honor of Bishop Lartey, recently elevated by the 1960 AMEZ General Conference.

President Tubman pointed out that the honor given the Rt. Rev. Mr. Lartey by the AMEZ Church is a laudation not shared by any other Liberian, and should serve to inspire young people to reach new heights in spiritual leadership.

Bishop Lartey was hailed by the president as a "man possessing all qualities required by the Bible. . .to ascend to this high and holy position."

He expressed the need for more leaders as the new bishop and spiritual progress — "for man's spiritual progress has not always kept pace with his material adjustment."

Great Future in Africa-Symington

Meeting—Senator Stuart Symington meets with President William V. S. Tubman of Liberia and is accorded a hearty handshake in the African country. Left to right: Fowler Hamilton, New York lawyer, who accompanied the Senator; Senator Symington and President Tubman.

Arrival—Sen. Stuart Symington arrives at the airport in Conakry, Guinea, and receives an enthusiastic welcome. Left to right: Fode Cisse, Guinean Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; U. S. Ambassador John Morrow, Senator Symington and Keuroko Sokoma of the Guinean Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

WASHINGTON, D. C. — Senator Stuart Symington (D., Mo.) has termed Africa "the continent of the future. The years ahead will see great change and a great chance.

"The great change is going on right now; the great chance lies in closer ties between America and the newly emerging, developing nations of Africa."

The Missouri Senator, who returned from a a year-end visit to a number of African nations, gave a more detailed report on his trip at an interview recently.

"NEW independent nations are appearing every year. The leaders of these new nations are very impressive. They understand the needs of their people and have the integrity and vision to put through programs which will benefit their nation and the world.

"The people of these nations want the same things we do: a peaceful world with freedom and justice for all peoples and races."

Senator Symington met with the leaders of two newly independent nations, President Sekou Toure of the Republic of Guinea and Premier Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana.

HE ALSO talked at length with President William V. Tubman of Liberia, one of the first African nations to gain independence, as well as many government officials in the Ivory Coast and Nigeria.

"We must also remember," Symington added, "that the progress we make in assuring that there are no second-class citizens in our own country is carefully watched by these newly emergent nations. Our ability to make a democracy a reality for all our people is a measure of our standing in the eyes of all Africans.

"The recent visit of President Sekou Toure of Guinea to our own country was an example of the need for more exchanges between the peoples of Africa and the United States. Such exchanges will increase mutual understanding and friendship. President Toure spoke to me of his gratitude at the reception he received here, and gave me a message of thanks to the American people."

Louisvillian Guarded Liberia's President

The Courier-Journal
Louisville, Ky.

Lieutenant Ends Two-Year Job

Wed. 2-3-60.

By PHIL HARSHAM

A Louisville policeman has returned from an assignment that required him to swap traditional uniforms for morning coats, tails, and dinner jackets.

"They call Monrovia the most formal city in the world," said Lt. A. Wilson Edwards. "And I suppose it is."

It was from Monrovia, capital of the tiny West Africa Republic of Liberia, that Edwards returned Friday.

Had 100-Man Force

For the past two years there he's been looking after the personal safety of Liberian President William Vacanarat Shadrack Tubman, a man Edwards fondly characterizes as "the elder statesman of Africa," and setting up and training an F.B.I.-like security force known as Special Services.

It was just a month ago that his elite 100-man force got its toughest workout.

That was during Tubman's fourth inauguraion as President, when diplomatic representatives from 63 nations converged upon Monrovia to take part in the pomp and circumstance.

Entertains Lavishly

The gregarious Tubman entertains lavishly during inauguration week, visiting dignitaries entertain lavishly, and the festival atmosphere provides an almost-perfect setup for the work of enemy agents.

It became part of the burly Edwards' job to don his morning coat, tails, or dinner jacket —depending upon the ocacsion —and keep an eye on the visiting social set.

"We kept complete surveillance on the 25-member Russian delegation," Edwards said yesterday. "And, of course, we always assigned a 24-hour guard to the President's Mansion."

Guests in the mansion, Edwards said, were Crown Prince Salah Selassie of Ethiopia and President Sekou Toure of Guinea.

Got Smuggling Suspects

Other official guests—the United States was represented by Henry Cabot Lodge, ambassador to the United Nations —were assigned suites either at their countries' consultates or in hotels.

Early in 1959, prior to the Liberian presidential election, Edwards' men got wind of an explosives-smuggling move taking place in the back country.

Fearing a re-enactment of a 1955 scandal, during which political enemies tried to take Tubman's life, Edwards rounded up and jailed some 30 smuggling suspects.

"But the President freed them all right after the election,' he said.

Enthusiastic On Progress

Edwards, called the South's first Negro police lieutenant when he was commissioned in 1949, came to the attention of Liberia's Vice-President W. R. Tolbert in 1957 when he served with a specially picked police squad at President Eisenhower's inauguration.

President Tubman, through his Vice-President, offered Edwards a contract under which he was to spend two years organizing and training the plain-clothes secret-service corps.

Edwards spoke with enthusiasm of the economic progress being made in the first Negro Republic.

For years Liberia has been almost totally dependent on the production and sale of rubber. Now, Edwards said, the "richest iron ore in the world" is being mined in Liberia's Nimba Mountains and a giant firm formed by Swedish, American, and Liberian interests is shipping it out, to the country's advantage.

To Resume Job Here

The firm, LAMCO, is building a new seaport, running a new railroad from the mining area to it, and establishing whole new towns along the railroad's route.

At the same time, the lieutenant said, President Tubman is initiating economic reforms designed to build up a middle class in Liberia. And school attendance has been made compulsory for both girls and boys.

"In many ways I was sorry that my contract expired," Edwards said.

Hopes Glimmer For U.S. of Africa

The Christian Science Monitor

Aug. 5-1960

By Arnold Beichman

Special Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Monrovia, Liberia

Businessmen from 14 African countries have opened a four-day meeting here for discussion of independent black Africa's economic future.

The immediate purpose of the conclave, endorsed by the different governments, is to undertake the planning for a continentwide conference next year looking toward the economic and financial integration of the free African countries, excluding the Rhodesias and the Union of South Africa. The ultimate hope is the eventual emergence of an African community comparable roughly to the existing European Common Market.

Purpose Outlined

The delegates attending the session ending Aug. 4 will return with specialized assignments for further study. For example, the United Arab Republic will examine the proposal of setting up an African shipping company. Nigeria will study merging of the various national airlines into one African airline; Sudan, ground transportation; Ghana, postal and telecommunications' standardization. and Liberia establishment of an African development bank.

The moving spirit behind the conference is Romeo Horton, president of the Bank of Liberia. He is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania Wharton School. In an interview he outlined the purpose of the African bank as financing essential continental projects such as a West African highway from Lagos, Nigeria, to Rabat, Morocco, by the sale of securities on the world market.

Continental Trade

The immediate program is to undertake surveys of Africa's human and natural resources, and what can be done with them by the governments and private enterprise to expand the African economy.

Establishment of graduate schools for advanced studies and training, for example, in law, public administration, and insurance is envisioned. Each country is to have one specialized school to avoid duplication.

Mr. Horton stressed that the major object is the expansion of internal continental trade among African countries, avoidance of the export of raw materials at low prices and import of finished products at high prices.

United States Embassy officials and United Nations experts are attending as observers. The conference is regarded as a significant step in African economic development, although achievement of stated objectives such as a common African currency and a swift upbuilding of the African consumer market may not be realizable in the near future.

Tubman of Liberia Discounts U.S. of Africa Bids

By Arnold Beichman

Special Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Monrovia, Liberia

A United States of Africa, as envisioned by some leaders of newly independent African states, is "not a practical proposition," in the opinion of President Tubman of Liberia.

"The immensity of Africa's territory as a continent," he said in an interview at the Executive Mansion, "its vastly varied tribes, cultures, languages, and history make the concept impractical. I can see no particular benefit, especially political, to be derived from such a get-together of nations. For one thing, I believe that the power of African states would be adversely affected because a United States of Africa would have one vote in the United Nations and other agencies.

"Therefore I hold to the view that a community of African states, associated and held together by treaties or commerce, alliances, cultural exchanges woud be the best and the more practical."

Strong Rule

Mr. Tubman—he made it clear that the use of the title "Doctor" as is normally customary in the local press is not of his doing—has been President of this 113-year-old independent African state since his election in 1943. He is the country's strong man and his rule has been described as a form of benevolent authoritarianism.

He pointed out that colonial powers in Africa had kept Africans apart so that today "we are total strangers to each other with different systems of government, training, outlook, ideas. If we came together in a United States of Africa, it could only be a mistake and produce a terrible situation."

The President has taken this inflexible position in the face of a campaign by Kwame Nkrumah, Ghana's President, to seek a union of African states comparable to the United States.

Union Position Hit

Another position which Liberia's chief of state takes in opposition to Mr. Nkrumah is his attitude to the Ghana-inspired All-African Trade Union Federation, which would bar African labor organizations from affiliation to any non-African labor international.

"I cannot understand," he said, "why there should be an All-African labor federation.

President Tubman

Community setup favored.

Nations have a right to their own systems of government and shouldn't try to project them on other states. The people should be allowed to decide their own destiny, whether labor or capital. What may be suitable for one section of Africa may not be suitable for others."

One of the two Liberian labor organizations last June affiliated itself to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, to which most labor groups throughout the free world belong.

Liberia's Government is strongly anti-Communist but alongside its borders is independent Guinea, which is known to give Liberian officials growing concern. Guinea seems more and more to be drifting into the Sino-Soviet orbit, economically and politically, a fact which Liberia is fully aware of. What did Mr. Tubman think of developments in Guinea?

He thought for several seconds. Behind him was a large painting of Abraham Lincoln, on his desk a vase of white roses. He was tieless and wearing an open-collared gray-blue silk sport shirt. Finally, he answered, speaking slowly, measuredly:

"It is my candid opinion that President Sekou Touré [of Guinea] is not a Communist. I believe he is trying to develop a purely African state in every respect and in doing that he is adapting and pursuing policies and methods which he thinks will most speedily develop his country and make it what he most desires it to be."

Congo Pondered

An attempt to get some further elaboration on this question was smilingly rebuffed by Mr. Tubman. However, when asked about the work of the United Nations in Africa, he spoke with words of great praise, particularly for UN policies in the Congo.

"The UN has done a remarkable job in the Congo," he said. "We in Liberia can appreciate it because our country many years ago faced a similar situation when we decided to become independent and we were attacked militarily. There was no UN then to help us. They are doing wonderfully in the Congo. As far as the Katanga Province is concerned, secession is not justified and it should not be permitted to secede. We do not intend to recognize an independent Katanga."

Liberia does not intend "at this time," said Ma. Tubman, to undertake a boycott of the Union of South Africa as recomended last June.

Opposition Proscribed

"If it becomes necessary," he said, "Liberia will implement that resolution but this is not the appropriate time to do it especially since the UN opposes apartheid and the Secretary-General [Dag Hammarskjold] is on his way to South Africa. I have decided there will be no action until we know the results of the Secretary-General's visit."

The last question dealt with the character of the Liberian Government and I asked the President how he would describe it. "There is no opposition party in Liberia or opposition press, both having been proscribed in July, 1955. All members of both houses of Congress are members of Mr. Tubman's True Whig Party.

"Under our laws and Constitution," he said, "any 300 citizens may form a political party at will and register and there can be no objections. The people of Liberia, when they desired it, formed opposition parties and contested the True Whig Party. But when the people have been satisfied, they have not done so.

Never Campaigned

"Personally, I have announced again and again that I would welcome an opposition party. I wouldn't form one"—he laughed heartily—"but if an opposition party or parties were formed they would be assured of the same privileges, rights, and benefits under the law as the True Whig Party.

"I personally would resign the office of President and would not have stood for election if I didn't believe that I had at least 95 per cent of the people behind me with great enthusiasm. I have never campaigned because the office of the President of Liberia is too important and sacred.

"I have tried to retire since my first term which was then for eight years. But the people said amend it and make it for four years because I did'nt want another eight years. As soon as I was elected and the day after my inauguration, they were moving resolutions for another term. Now they want me for a fifth term. I have tried to discourage this because I couldn't stand another term. After 27 years, in public life I need some time for myself. I want to return to private life."

TUBMAN AND LIBERIA

TO THE EDITOR:

In the article "Ten Top Leaders of the New Africa" (July 24), Milton Bracker omitted one of the continent's foremost leaders. I refer to President William V. S. Tubman of Liberia. Liberia has the one government in Africa which is modeled after ours and which is working in peace and harmony. The country has progressed greatly under the guidance of President Tubman and is now enjoying a new era of prosperity.

WILLARD J. WHITE.

New York.

[Although President Tubman is one of Africa's notable figures, Mr. Bracker was concerned with the leaders of the "new" Africa, those such as Nkrumah of Ghana and Mboya of Kenya who have shaped the drive for nationalism that is now sweeping Africa. Mr. Tubman has had a remarkable career in Liberia. First elected President for an eight-year term in 1943, he has since been re-elected to three four-year terms.—Editor.]

Liberia Accuses U. S. In UN Flare-up

The Afro-American
Baltimore, Md.
Aug 13 1960

By CHARLES HOWARD SR.
United Nations Correspondent

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y. — With a dead-lock threatened for the Securtiy Council, Liberia accuses the United States of opposing its election to the Council.

The charge was made after the General Assembly cast seven ballots Friday in a vain effort to elect four new members necessary to bring the dead-lock threatened for the United Nations top peace-enforcing agency, Council membership to its full complement of 11.

Prior to the dead-lock, the Assembly voted three nations to Security Council membership.

Elected were for two-year terms were the United Arab Republic and Chile, to succeed Tunisia and Argentina.

* * *

TURKEY WAS elected to a one-year term, succeeding Poland.

The nominees for the fourth seat were Portugal, backed by the United States, and Liberia.

On the first ballot Portugal received 50 votes and Liberia 32.

For the six following ballots, Portugal's total continued to decrease and Liberia's to increase until the count on the final ballot was Liberia 55 and Portugal 38.

* * *

AFTER THE Assembly adjourned, a spokesman for Liberia issued this statement, asking to be quoted:

"The United States is opposing Liberia. If Liberia is not elected, it will be because of opposition of the United States."

If the dead-lock is not broken before the Assembly adjourns, the Security Council will be forced to operate with only 10 members, a number which would make the agency subject to tie votes.

* * *

THE FAILURE to elect a fourth member was due to the action of the African-Asian bloc, designed to upset the co-called London gentlemen's agreement of 1946 on geographic distribution of the Council's non-permanent seats (four).

The African and Asian delegates delegates are demanding more representation on the Council in view of their increased United Nations membership.

Also, the action is seen as a by-product of the Afro-Asian resentment of the United Nation's role in the Congo.

* * *

DEEP CONCERN is felt for future of United Nations. The Security Council has met in "urgent session" ofr fourth times in last five months. First session commenced July 13, second began July 20, third began August 8, and now fourth session.

These are some questions and statements heard most frequently in connection with Congo crisis:

What makes United Nations so "helpless" in Congo?

"Why must Secretary - General Dag Hammarskjold take such a beating from both the Soviet Union and United Sates?

Kasavubu's soldiers, under command of Col. Mobutu, attacked and killed United Nations soldiers who were sent to help Congolese people.

Why did the United States spokesman in the United Nations pass over matter so lightly in support of Kasavubu?

It is being pointed out that

If the Presidency of Congo as represented by Kasavubu and the Parliament are only two remaining political structures, why does United Sates support Kasavubu's closing down of the parliament beyond limitations of "fundamental law.

Why does Kasavubu get away with arresting other members of legislature, besides the presidents of two bodies, and holding them without trial?

Why does Kasavubu refuse to permit conciliation commission, a body created by the United Nations, to visit the Congo, and why does the United Sates support him in this refusal?

Why does Col. Mobutu refuse to let representatives of United Nations and the Red Cross see Lumumba, though it is charged that he has been severely beaten and is in need of medical care?

Why does United States support Mobutu against United Nations?

* * *

WHY DOES Belgium refuse to channel "aid to the Congo" through United Nations, as is demanded of all other countries and why does United States support her in this refusal?

Who is paying salary of Congolese army and Colonel Mobutu?

Did Security Council mean it when it said, when it solemnly voted (twice) "to support independence and territorial integrity" of Republic of Congo?

Why did United States change its foreign policy from support of United Nations and demanding withdrawal of The Belgians from Congo to "full scale support of the Belgians against United Nations?

Statements are made here by informal sources that the sum of $50,000,000 is banked in Switzerland by Premier Tshombe of Katanga.

In this session of Security Council, thus far in the debate, all of the Asian and African countries, except Cameroun and Congo have been in full support of the demand that Lumumba and the parliamentarians be released and parliament restored so that elected representatives of Congo people may be heard on who they want to run their government.

The West appears caught in its own game.

- Afro-Asian delegates to United Nations support Liberia for seat on Security Council. U.S. backs Portugal.
- Delegates determined to upset "Gentlemen's agrement" which limits African and Asian nations on Council.
- Embarrassing questions mount as U.S. countinues to support Belgium which seeks to continue its rule in Congo Republic.

Dr. Mays talks on Liberia

The Afro-Am 18a Baltimore, Md 2/13/60

ATLANTA, Ga. — In two appearances in the Morehouse College chapel recently, Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, president of the college, talked to Morehouse students and faculty about his travel impressions in Liberia and Ghana.

Dr. Mays was a guest of the Liberian Government, which invited him to attend the inauguration of W. V. S. Tubman for his fourth term of office as president of the oldest of African republics, Liberia.

Dr. Mays was particularly self-determination on the part impressed by the splendor and pomp of the colorful inaugural ceremonies, and he reported that President Tubman's inaugural address showed that he has a complete grasp on the considers the achievement of present world situation.

President Tubman said, according to Dr. Mays, that he of African peoples one of the most important movements in the world today, declaring that all Africans are determined to be free from all outside domination. . ..

Dr. Mays stated that all the other official social functions, such as the inaugural ball and the official garden party, were no less colorful and interesting than the inauguration ceremonies. There were also African tribal dances staged for the celebration, as well as special entertainment activities for the tribal chiefs.

Dr. Mays declared that Tubman has brought more progress to Liberia in the last 16 years than had been achieved in the previous 50 years. At a special convocation of the University of Monrovia, Dr. Mays was the speaker and had his tenth honorary degree conferred on him by the University.

Maritime Lawyers Defend Britain

Liberia, Panama Seek Rights

The Pittsburgh Courier Pittsburgh, Pa. 2-6-60 18a

HAGUE, Netherlands—Even in the International Court of Justice, the old British pattern of assessing a black people for "as much as the traffic will bear" while denying the same nation her rightful place in the determining councils is still being defended by maritime lawyers of Britain.

The Governments of Liberia and Panama have advanced strong arguments before the International Court of Justice in the Hague to support their claim that they should have membership in the United Nations maritime agency.

While Britain leads the opposition to their claim, the United States is urging the court to find the present membership on the governing committee illegally organized. Liberia, with the support of several other nations, contends that the only appropriate way to judge which nations qualify as members of the committee is the quantity of tonnage that is shown on the national register of any member nation.

UNDER THIS guide, Liberia, which had 1,073 vessels of 11,074,559 tons gross on Dec. 21, 1959, ranked third in the world in shipping. Panama, under this rule, ranked eighth.

But the safety committee of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization which was organized in London a year ago, controled at present by the maritime nations of Europe, has kept both Liberia and Panama off the committee by refusing to recognize them as ship-owning nations, except for purposes of assessment.

Because the committees enforces the highest standards in maritime safety, which must be financed by all natons engaged in shipping. Liberia is now forced to bear 6.8 per cent of the committee budget.

THIS IS 50 times greater than the small nation of Liberia makes in contributions to any other international organization.

Using another gauge, according to the Liberian spokesmen . . . if the 514 ships which are not Liberian government-owned but are registered in the name of Liberian nationals, were discounted . . . Liberia would still rank fifth in world tonnage.

This amounts to "imposing on certain members second class rights with first class obligations," according to the Liberian statement.

Nikita Accepts Bid of Liberia

The Times 2-22

MOSCOW (AP)—Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev has accepted an invitation to visit Liberia, Tass news agency announced Thursday night. It would be the widely traveled Khrushchev's first venture into Africa.

Liberia is a Negro republic set up in mid-19th century with the aid of American philanthropists as a refuge for freed American slaves. It has maintained close friendship with the United States. Ford Motor Co. and Firestone Rubber interests have been deeply involved in the Liberian economy—mostly in rubber production.

Khrushchev now is en route home to Moscow after a South Asian tour made in part while President Eisenhower was visiting South America.

Tass said Khrushchev has accepted an invitation from President William V. S. Tubman, but the date for the trip has not been set.

"At the same time," Tass said, "Khrushchev invited Tubman to visit the Soviet Union as a guest of the Soviet government. The President of Liberia also accepted the invitation.

"The dates of the visits will be agreed through diplomatic channels."

Liberia Is Seeking Investors From U. S.

The Pittsburgh Courier Pittsburgh, Pa. 2-6-60

WASHINGTON — If there are any Americans with money to burn who want to make a fair return on their money, Liberia is out to do business with them immediately.

In competition with other emerging African nations, Liberia is making the first move for a "hard sell" of American prospective investors.

This was disclosed Thursday night at a "private" dinner given by the Liberian Ambassador, George A. Padmore, for representatives of business interests in Liberia, and for a few others with money jingling in their pockets.

MR. PADMORE no longer talks about vague possibilities in Liberia. He discusses the record of what has been done. Backing him up was Landell K. Christie, head of the Liberian Mining Corporation, who has found Liberian ore the road to fame and fortune.

Two figures serve to illustrate what has happened in Liberia because of President Tubman's cooperative attitude toward foreign investment. In 1943, the government income was less than one million dollars. In 1959, it was more than 20 million dollars.

An idea of what Liberia is up to may be discovered in a rundown of the personalities who shared stuffed lobsters and filet mignons with the ambassador. Among those present were:

James K. Penfield, deputy assistant secretary of state; Charles D. Sherman, secretary of the treasury of Liberia; Joseph W. Garber, attorney general of Liberia; Judge Otto Schoenrich of the Liberia Mining Company; Congressman Charles C. Diggs; Arthur Sherman. director of the bureau of Surveys and natural resources of Liberia; Emmett Harmon, executive secretary, joint Liberian-United States Commission for Economic Development.

Great Future For Liberia Is Predicted

The Atlanta Constitution Atlanta, Ga. 2-8-60

By CLAUDE GEORGE SR.

Liberia offers golden opportunities to America's young college graduate, the Rev. J. B. Felker, superintendent of the Baptist Mission School of Africa, said here recently.

The Rev. Felker, a native Georgian, is currently touring the United States on behalf of Liberia. While in Atlanta he addressed the Atlanta Baptist Ministers Union.

He told the Atlanta ministers that Liberia is in need of more agricultural and industrial development. He said that a number of American investors, many of them white, are establishing new plants in Liberia.

"If you want to avoid racial discrimination," the Rev. Felker told the ministers, "then come to Liberia. Our president is a black man, our secretary of state is a black man, our attorney general is a black man, our supreme court is made up of black men and our mayors and chiefs of police are black men."

GREATLY INCREASED WEALTH

See Great Population Increase

New Wealth To Be Used To Wipe Out Nation's Illiteracy

MONROVIA, Liberia, Apr. 4.—This was once the most squalid spot on the African coast. Today, Monrovia is the booming capital of a booming country, with paved streets, traffic lights, taxis, buses and civilized comforts. Garbage is collected; the streets no longer smell like a zoo.

The city is dominated by a new hotel that Israel contractors are building on a low, rocky hill at Mamba Point. The hotel dwarfs the squat, ugly capitol at the other end of the town. Between them lies most of Monrovia, as straggling and steamy as a county seat in Mississippi, without, however the consoling grace of a converted antebellum home or a tea room.

Monrovia is not pretty. Most houses in the older district are constructed mainly of tin and resemble a litter of rusting cans. Niagaras of rain on the tin roofs make conversation difficult during the rainy season (April through October). The rains are supposed to encourage thievery, since prowlers cannot be heard above the din.

Population of 50,000

This is Liberia's only city and, although no census has ever been taken, the population is said to exceed 50,000. President William V. S. Tubman predicts the population will double in 10 years. Telephone service is still unpredictable; business men say their phones are out of order four days out of five. But the city has adequate power and water.

American business men—even some bankers—are unrestrained in their enthusiasm over Liberia's future. They say the country has vast potential in iron and rubber. Moreover, so long as Mr. Tubman's leadership remains unchallenged, they are certain that a favorable investment climate will prevail.

This was illustrated at a luncheon of the Hungry Club—a business men's organization so called because its members are "hungry for information" (the motto of the Hungry Club is "Man does not live by bread alone"). The guest speaker was George A. Blowers, a director of the Export-Import Bank of Washington. No domestic booster could have been more fervent.

Export Rise Predicted

"I predict," he said, "that in 10 years Liberia's exports will rise in value from $42,000,000 a year to $200,000,000 or $250,000,000 a year—a sixfold increase.

"Government revenue will increase at least fourfold, reaching $100,000,000. Iron will replace rubber as the chief export."

He said Liberia's iron deposits might be surpassed only by Canada's in Labrador and Newfoundland.

Meanwhile, he said, rubber production is increasing and new roads have helped increase exports of coffee and palm kernels.

The Liberian scene will be completely altered by the exploitation of vast deposits of high-grade iron ore in the Nimba Mountains. The Liberia - American - Swedish Minerals Company (LAMCD) is building a railroad, port and a model mining town at a cost of $200,000,000. It hopes to start exporting ore by the end of 1962.

The Nimba deposits were discovered in 1957. LAMCO has a 100-square-mile concession for seventy years.

Mount Nimba—4,900 feet high and said to be almost solid iron ore—and near-by uplands contain proved reserves of 200,000,000 tons according to the company's president, Johnston Avery.

"There is only about a foot of topsoil covering the ore," Mr. Avery said. "You can almost get at it with a lawnmower."

LAMCO owns 75 per cent of the operation and Bethlehem Steel 25 per cent. The Liberian Government will get half the dividends.

President Tubman plans to spend the bulk of the new revenue on raising the education and health levels of the people. "Our aim," he said in his inaugural address, "is to wipe away forever the blight of ignorance and illiteracy from the children of this land."

The President, whose word is , has been in power sixteen years. In the 1959 election, he polled 530,556 votes to his opponent's 55.

"Dr. Tubman is a warm friend of the United States and, let's face it, there aren't very many of them left," said one obsrever. "So long as he is around, Liberia will remain Western-oriented."

members of the American government and business community invited to attend the dinner were:

United States Attorney General William P. Rogers; United States Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart; John H. Johnson, publisher of Johnson Publishing Company; Alfred Friendly, managing editor of tte Washington Post and Times Herald;

Assistant Secretary For African Affairs Joseph C. Satterthwaite of the U.S. State Department; C. Vaughn Ferguson Jr., director of the U.S. State Department's Office of Middle and Southern African Affairs; White House Administrative Officer E. Frederic Morrow; Val J. Washington of the Republican National Committee.

Attending the dinner as a special guest was Ambassador Telli Boubacar Diallo of Guinea. President William V. S. Tubman of Liberia is currently on a 12-day State Visit to Guinea.

African people 'tired of being poor'—Padmore

WASHINGTON

"One thing is certain: the people of Africa will follow the leadership which they have chosen or are choosing today, so long as that leadership remains firm in its insistence on political freedom and is unswerving in its pursuit of economic advancement."

So declared Liberian Ambassador to the U.S. George A. Padmore at an Embassy dinner held Wednesday to honor a segment of American investors in Liberia.

"Africans all over the continent are tired of being in economic slavery.

"They are tired of being poor. There is no need to look far beyond those two simple facts of life to be able to forecast the shape of things to come."

The AKA's are back home from Liberia where, for two days, they were guests of Eta Beta Omega Chapter, chartered in Monrovia in 1958. The event was the first International Regional Conference of Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority.

Attendance at the "birthday" event topped off an extensive tour of Europe and Africa for 38 sorors from 20 of America's 50 states. In addition to the business sessions, the American were guests at a round-of sightseeing aand socializing climaxed by a reception at the Executive Pavilion in their honor and a ball given by the Monrovian Alphas.

A pleasant surprise for the visitors came at the worship service at the First Methodist Church of Liberia. By chance, guest minister was Dr. James H. Robinson, pastor of the Church of the Master in New York. He was in the country to evaluate the "Crossroads Africa" project.

Liberian Views Hailed

The New York Times

Pleas for Africa's Adherence to U. N. Principles on Equality Noted

New York, N.Y.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

So many angry voices have been raised at the present session of the United Nations—we have even seen the practices of heckling and table-thumping introduced for the first time—that some wise and constructive speeches made by delegates of the smaller nations have passed almost unnoticed. P. 40

It is a pity that these displays of moderation, good sense and good-will seldom make the headlines. They deserve to be applauded for what they are—courageous attempts to inch the violent passions of our time a little way over in the direction of sanity.

A case in point was the speech made late on Sept. 29 by the Liberian Secretary of State, His Excellency J. Rudolph Grimes, representative of a country which owed its foundations to American sense of justice and is one of the oldest and stanchest friends we have in any continent. I wish that we had not fallen into the habit of taking this friendship for granted.

It took courage, in the turbulent context of the debate, for the Liberian spokesman to quote these words of "an eminent African statesman" (his own President, Dr. W. U. S. Tubman):

"In the hour of our triumph we Africans must remember that what we seek is justice and not revenge. There is no time for us to brood over the grievances and the sufferings of the past. We look to the future—a future which we hope to see cleansed of the racial hatred which brought such misfortune upon our own people. We must extend to the white man the hand of forgiveness and fellowship. We must invite him to join us in burying misunderstandings and in working for a better and happier world."

In further pursuit in his appeal for understanding the Liberian Secretary of State said:

"The Liberian delegation regrets the state of affairs in the Congo, but is unable to endorse the suggestion of a purely African command over the United Nations forces in the Congo. This suggestion, in our opinion, appears to violate the fundamental principles of the United Nations, which should operate without regard to race, color or creed. Moreover, it would establish a precedent which might undermine future effectiveness of the United Nations."

The spirit embodies in these two excerpts seems to me to offer the opportunity we seek for a peaceful solution to the many problems that still exist on this troubled continent.

Liberian health officer held in $208,000 fund shortage

The Afro-American Baltimore, Md.
Sat. 3-26-60

MONROVIA, Liberia — Dr. Joseph Nagbe Togba, former director general of the National Public Health Service, has been arrested on two charges of embezzling government funds. A total of $209,000 is involved.

The arrest followed a Justice Department investigation which revealed alleged padding of payrolls. It was alleged that for a number of years payrolls for the Kpain World Health Organization Malaria Project carried the names of non-existent persons and names of deceased or dismissed workers.

Dr. Togba, a one-time president of the Seventh World Health Assembly of the World Health Organization, was being held in jail as he was unable to post the required bond on the most recent charge.

The first arrest which involved $124,895, was made early last month. Dr. Togba was released after posting $188 288 cash bail which he had at the time of his arrest.

The second charge involved $48,866. Dr. Togba failed to post bond and was remanded to South Beach Prison.

The Department of Justice said its investigation disclosed fictitious payrolls, carrying names of persons who exist or were not employed by the National Health Service, also the names of persons who had been dropped from the rolls several months or years ago.

The probe showed that the government was providing funds for the maintenance of a fully-staffed out-of-town clinic that never exisited.

The investigators said checks were issued for the mythical staff of this ghost clinic. They charge that Dr. Togba and his accomplices divided proceeds from these checks.

Tubman Inaugurated To Fourth Term As President Of Liberia

Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta Ga.

Mr. Tubman was first elected for an eight - year term on May 4, 1943, and reelected to four - year terms in May, 1951, and May 3, 1955. He has been in politics for most of his adult life.

During his Administration he has worked hard to develop the economy of the country and its natural resources of rubber and iron ore. Iron ore from the Bomi Hills is rated as highest now mined (68. 8 per cent pure). Production, now more than 1,000,000 tons yearly is exported chiefly to the United States. Liberia provides 10 per cent of United States rubber imports.

He began his professional life as a lawyer and has grown rich in his 63 years. He owns a large amount of real estate in Monrovia, as well as a rubber plantation and a cocoa estate.

TRUE WHIG MEMBER

Mr. Tubman belongs to the True Whig party, which dominates Liberian politics. It has never lost an election, having elected every Liberian President for more than 75 years, with little or no opposition.

Mr. Tubman is a man of medium height, somewhat on the heavy side. He dresses well and is fond of good living.

At his 1956 inauguration, Mr. Tubman and his entourage, dressed in the most formal clothes-cutaway coats, striped pants, top hats, gray vests and cravats — were dismayed when members of a Soviet delegation showed up in business suits.

Mr. Tubman founded the exclusive Saturday Afternoon Club in Monrovia. It is limited to 30 members. When the President is present, which is nearly every evening, lights on the roof are turned on.

The Presidency has furnished Mr. Tubman with many of the luxuries of life, such as a yacht, fine cars and one of the few air-conditioned homes in Liberia.

TRAVELS EXTENSIVELY

Mr. Tubman was the first President of Liberia to travel extensively in his country's privitive interior. He has held frequent councils with tribal chieftains.

During his Administration he has obtained the assistance of the United States in building roads, communications, airports, and a harbor at Monrovia.

Mr. Tubman is a lay preacher of the Methodist Church. Before he became President, he served in the Liberian Senate and as an Associate Justice of the Liberian Supreme Court.

He has been married three times and has five children. One of his sons attended Harvard.

ATTENDING INAUGURAL — Dr. Ralph Bunche, under secretary general of the U. N., is shown at New York International Airport before boarding an American World Airways Clipper Jan. 1 for Africa, where he will attend the re-inauguration of William V. S. Tubman as president of Liberia, Jan. 4. Dr. Bunche will also visit India and Italy before returning to the United States later this month.

Tubman Urges Liberian Growth

MONROVIA, Liberia, Jan. 4 (Reuters) — President William V. S. Tubman outlined today plans for the further economic development of Liberia through the establishment of a national development bank.

Liberians will be called upon to invest their savings and the Government will invest part of its iron-ore royalties.

In his inaugural address after being sworn in for a fourth term of four years as head of the 112-year-old African republic, he called on African governments to form regional bodies for economic cooperation as well as education.

Negro Diplomats in Negro Lands

A surprising story has come out of Liberia to the effect that there are better relations between the United States and that black republic than in the past because most of the American diplomats now there are white instead of black as in the past.

It is said that the Liberian Government prefers it to be that way and has by no means resented the change.

This story may not be true but such a view is not confined to Liberia by any means because a similar attitude is assumed by other non-white countries such as Ghana, Ethiopia, Haiti, the Sudan, etc., and especially with regard to ambassadors and ministers.

There is a feeling in such countries that Negro appointments made in top diplomatic brackets are political pay-offs and that generally the people named are not qualified.

No American diplomat is acceptable to the country to which accredited if it does not say he is, and none of the non-white countries have asked for black diplomats, no matter how great their professed liking for U. S. colored people.

Liberia Looks to Future with Rose Colored Glasses

Chicago Sunday Tribune

MONROVIA, Liberia, April 2 UPI — The Cinderella of West Africa—Liberia—is getting ready for the ball. It should be quite a coming out party.

Star, 4-3-60.

Ever since its establishment, Liberia has been one of the saddest corners of Africa. Founded on hope, it soon slipped into a seedy rut of disease, poverty and corruption.

P.13.

Freed Slaves Found It

Founded as a home for freed American slaves, it became a classic case of putting the political cart before the economic horse. The first Negro settlers—mechanics, laborers, cooks, seamstresses, nurses, and washerwomen—arrived in 1822.

They were simple, God fearing folk, who had long since lost their ties with Africa.

Their settlement was not so much a return home as an act of colonization, with black instead of white colonists. They fought colonial wars with hostile tribesmen and extended an uneasy sway over 43,000 square miles of territory.

Cite Love of Liberty

When the settlers formed their independent republic in 1847 they took as their motto: "The love of liberty brought us here."

The name Liberia was coined by a white American missionary, the Rev. Robert Gurley. Colonization of the country was sponsored by the American Colonization society, which helped freed Negroes in slaveholding America to migrate to the new land.

Liberty was the watchword, but ironically liberty extended no farther than Monrovia, the capital, and the coastal strip where 20,000 American Negro settlers kept a tenuous hold on the old grain coast of West Africa.

Tribesmen Are Excluded

The primitive tribesmen of the interior were excluded from government as rigidly as in any white colony.

And so Liberia became the Ruritania of Africa—an improbable ramshackle republic. While Europe busily developed and exploited other parts of Africa, Liberia slumbered on, half forgotten.

In 1926 the government granted the Firestone company a vast rubber concession. By the beginning of World War II Liberia was virtually a private economic preserve. No other foreign concessions were granted.

Today a bewildering change has come over the country. Mental images of Liberia formed only 10 years ago are already hopelessly out of date.

Many Changes in Capital

The ramshackle wood and iron capital of 20 years ago is becoming a bustling metropolis with glass and concrete buildings.

Rubber plantations are being extended by several companies. Great mining projects are opening up the interior. For the first time money is pouring into the country.

The change has caught many Liberians unawares. Monrovia still is in the transition stage. Policemen, dressed like New York cops, and petty officials accept many bribes openly. A modern dial telephone system often is out of order. Beggars cluster around the post-office and banks waiting for prosperous foreigners. Rat infested shacks sprawl next door to modern office blocks.

Tubman Asked To Run For Fifth Term As Chief

Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta, Ga.

MONROVIA — (ANP) — President William V. S. Tubman, who has completed four months of his fourth term of office as chief executive of the Republic of Liberia, last week received the fourth request since the current term began in January to seek renomination for a fifth term of office. His present term expires in 1964.

World 5-25-60

While Tubman promised to give the draft demands "deep consideration," he noted that by 1964 he will be 68 years old and wondered if the people would still depend upon his ability and judgement as chief executive.

P. 7

Political observers are saying that although Tubman has not committed himself for a fifth term, his "deep consideraton" promise would certainly cause an influx of more resolutions for him.

Earlier, he announced that he was prepared to welcome the formation of rival partit parties within or without the rank and file of the National True Whig party, of which he is standard bearer.

One of the first groups to draft Tubman for the fifth term was the Liberian National Bar association, headed by House Speaker Richard Abron Henries. Circles close to the Legislature say that a joint session of the two houses will shortly issue a draft recommendation for President Tubman's fifth term.

THE POWER OF FAITH

"Learning," says an African tribal proverb, "is a light that leads to everything lovely." Lutheran missionaries Wes and Roslyn Sadler have brought the light into what was once the darkness of Loma land in the West African state of Liberia. When Wes and Roslyn went to Loma land 18 years ago, the Loma tribe had no literature and its 30,000 members could not read. The Sadlers prepared a primer in the Loma language and began to teach. Then came a dictionary, booklets on religion and health and the Loma Weekly, the only non-English language newspaper in Liberia. Now with the Lomas buying about 16,000 booklets yearly and the newspaper selling out each edition, the Sadlers are taking on a new challenge. They are heading the Africa-wide work for the Committee on World Literacy and Christian Literature of the National Council of Churches, training missionaries and Africans in literacy projects. Their goal: Knowledge and faith—the light that leads to everything lovely.

ACCORD WITH U. S. GROWS IN LIBERIA

March 4-60

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

MONROVIA, Liberia, March 24—Relations between Liberia and the United States have improved markedly. Much of the improvement is attributed by Liberians to the staffing of the American and diplomatic aid missions by career officials.

Until the arrival last September of Ambassador Elbert G. Mathews, the United States was represented in Monrovia by a succession of Presidential political appointees, all of them Negroes. Mr. Mathews was the first white Ambassador and the first career diplomat to be sent here.

Apparently no one objected to this except Thurgood Marshall, the American Negro lawyer who is chief counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He spent five days here in January.

Later he complained in London that the Monrovia Embassy staff had become "pure white" save for "one United States information guy who is out in the suburbs somewhere." Mr. Marshall added: "The people there [in Liberia] don't put this down to ignorance any more. They think it is deliberate."

Of twenty-eight members of the embassy staf, only the communications clerk is a Negro. In the past the staff has been predominantly Negro. At one time it was entirely Negro.

Mr. Marshall was correct in believing that the change in racial composition of the Embassy was deliberate. The State Department had decided that the staffing of an embassy purely along racial lines was absurd. Applied generally, the old policy would have sent only Jews to Tel Aviv, only Irish to Dublin and only Chinese to Taipei.

But Mr. Marshall erred, local observers said, in thinking that the Liberian Government resented the change.

This corespondent was told by Liberian State Department officials that the arrival of a trained American diplomat had smoothed the working relations between the two Governments.

Negroes are prominent in other American official agencies here. The United States Information Agency in Monrovia is directed by a Negro, William Clinton Powell. Mr. Powell runs one of the most competent U. S. I. A. operations in West Africa.

The seven-man United States Military Mission, headed by Lieut. Col. William Maize, is entirely Negro.

The United States Operations Mission to Liberia has a staff of eighty-two. "About 25 per cent are Negro," according to the mission director, James O. Babcock. Mr. Babcock, an Iowa farmer, is white. His deputy, Ernest E. Neal, is a Negro sociologist. Both said they got along fine.

"When we ask Washington for men we never think of color," said Mr. Babcock. "I don't care whether they are black, white or Chinese. But they've got to be competent to do the job."

Mr. Babcock hopes that Congress will approve the Administration's Special Program for Tropical Africa and that a generous portion of the $20,000,000 recommended for the first year will be allotted to Liberia. The program will stress education and training.

"Instead of sending a lot of technicians over here, what we should do is create the institutions where Liberia can train her own technicians," Mr. Babcock said. "We should send teachers and trainers. That should be the mission's major objective."

Most Liberians suffer from a deficiency of proteins. One of Mr. Babcock's missions is to try to enhance the diet by encouraging the cultivation of citrus fruit and tropical nuts and by the stocking of fish ponds.

Marshall Disputes Report

When asked to comment in New York regarding his views on the American Embassy in Liberia, Mr. Marshall stated that he had not at any time said that the embassy should have an al-Negro staff.

"I did not say at any time that it [the American Embassy] should be staffed by Negroes, but that it should be staffed by qualified persons regardless of race," the lawyer said.

"If, however, out of 28 persons on the American Embassy staff, there is only one Negro, it indicates the State Department does not have a sufficient number of qualified Negroes available. It indicates that equal opportunities are not being made available to Negroes for foreign service."

Mr. Marshall added that he did not believe that the Liberian State Department was either satisfied or pleased with the removal of predominantly Negro personnel from the American Embassy staff. He questioned the veracity of the "Liberian State Department Officials" quoted in Monrovia.

Liberia Spotlighted In Reader's Digest

Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta, Ga.

NEW YORK — The growth of Liberia offers a lesson for underdeveloped countries in Africa and throughout the world, according to an article in the July issue of The Reader's Digest.

Liberia, located on Africa's west-coast, had only four million dollars in imports and exports in 1937. Last year the figure exceeded 86 million dollars.

Only a few years ago, reports the Digest, there was not a single road leading anywhere. Today some 5000 autos and trucks speed commerce and enlightment into the deepest upcountry rain forest.

The story of Liberia's spectacular growth during the past 15 years, which no similarly handicapped area in all history has developed so astoundingly, is also the story of what can be done when private industry teams up with an energetic people.

American companies like the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, The B. F. Goodrich Company, Republic Steel, and other foreign firms have poured millions of dollars into Liberia, helping the Liberians to raise their standard of serving, levels of employment and education, and development of skills.

Since 1949 the government's income has increased 600 per cent. President William V. S. Tubman, now in his fourth term, has put as much as 30 per cent of these revenues back into public works.

According to The Digest, as much as 10 per cent of the government revenue goes to public health activity — reportedly a higher ratio of expenditure than in Great Britain

Says Program to Help 10,000 Poisoned by Adulterated Material Will Fall Short When Contracts Expire

Thur. 8-25-60

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 24—One of the largest peace-time rehabilitation operations, modern treatment for 10,000 Moroccans paralyzed by adulterated cooking oil, will fall far short of its purpose unless it is extended beyond Dec. 31 when the contracts expire.

P-3

That warning was issued here today by Dr. Gustave Gingras of the University of Montreal, who organized this venture, but has now returned to his teaching post. He reported its problems and progress to the third International Congress of Physical Medicine at the Mayflower Hotel.

Morocco

Dr. Gingras said that 5,991 of the victims who last year consumed cooking oil that Moroccan merchants had adulterated with lubricating oil containing highly toxic triorthocresyl phosphate were thoroughly tested and evaluated in late 1959.

Continuation Urged

Of these, 6 per cent were so paralyzed in both hands and feet that treatment was useless and they were put on pensions. Fifteen to 20 per cent more, Dr. Gingras said, were slightly paralyzed.

"The balance will require long-term treatment," he said. "There is no doubt that the program should be continued. Some international means should be found to do it."

Dr. Gingras said that those under treatment had shown marked improvement but were likely to retrogress if it was discontinued.

"You can do an awful lot of very good treatment without the fanciest equipment," he told reporters who asked for more information. "We had to use the simplest possible methods. Even the lack of secretaries to keep records was a tragedy in itself.

"Yet the combined work of the Red Crescent and Red Cross societies in my estimation equals a couple of top summit conferences in the goodwill created."

He said the only provisions for carrying on this work after the year ended had been the training of twenty-five Moroccan nurses. But he said that the size of the need was such that the program would be "a complete failure" if it had to be left c[illegible]ly to them.

[illegible]r. Gingras said he had visited Red Cross headquarters while here to urge that the work in Morocco go on. It was jointly undertaken by the World Health Organization and the League of Red Cross Societies. Fifty-five professional rehabilitation personnel from fifteen countries have taken part.

AFRICA'S MALI FEDERATION ASKS AID FROM THE UNITED STATES

Ibrahime Diagne leader of the Mali Federation.

PARIS, June 18. — In a few weeks, there will be another new independent country in Africa—the Mail Federation comprising two one-time French territories, Senegal and French Sudan, on the continent's west coast. Its leaders, men like Leopold Sedar Senghor of Senegal and Modibo Keita of the French Sudan, are hopeful that the Mali Federation with a population of 6,000,000 will obtain the economic and technical help necessary to begin the "leap forward" which all new and underdeveloped countries seek.

One of the country's future leaders is a still youthful trade unionist who recently made his first trip to the Western Hemisphere. He is Ibrahime Oiagne who visited Cuba as a guest of the Castro government during its May 1 celebrations. He returned to his home in Senegal, the port city of Dakar, via Washington and New York where he met AFL-CIO officials.

Moslem Territory

Mr. Diagne heads a union of postal and telecommunication workers in Senegal and sits on the executive board of the recently formed National Confederation of Mali Trade Unions.

By religion a Moslem—probably 90 per cent of the Mali Federation is Moslem—Mr. Diagne said in an interview that "America must be far more interested in Africa than it has been until now."

"And I say this for two reasons," the Senegalese labor leader argued. "First to contribute to the evolution and well-being of Africa and the African people. Second, to check Communist penetration which could constitute a danger for Africa and, therefore, for the world. It is not enough for the United States to be merely interested in Africa, but it must give help especially to underdeveloped countries to stop the penetration of Moscow. Communism is not yet a danger in Africa, but the danger will centainly come."

Political Blend

Specifically, Mr. Diagne said what would be needed when the Mali Federation reaches its stage of independence—the French National Assembly is now in the process of passing a constitutional amendment to make that possible—will be direct economic aid and technological training. And, curiously, he added that Mali would want aid to equip military forces. When asked who the enemy mgiht be, Mr. Diagne said, "Our country should have the means to protect itself." Senegalese soldiers have had a long-standing relationship to the French Army and have served in both world wars as well as in various "police" actions.

The political direction of the Mali Federation seems shaping up as a peculiar blend of Pan Africanism and pro-Western orientation. Even though Mali will be independent—France will formally sponsor it for membership in the United Nations nevt September—and maintain its own diplomatic relationships, Mali's defense and economic policies will be under direction of the French Government.

"We have chosen the Atlantic bloc," said Mr. Diagne, "by voting to remain a member of the French Community, because such a relationship conforms to our interests."

Senegal and the French Sudan voted in 1958 to remain in the Community, although neighboring Guinea voted for total withdrawal. It was quite obvious from Mr. Diagne's references to Guinea that he had little admiration for Sekou Toure, President of Guinea. He emphasized that the Mali Federation enjoyed "good relations" with Togo, Nigeria, and Cameroon, but conspiculously omitted Guinea and Ghana from his list.

A test of Mali's future relationships will come, said M. Diagne next September when the newly formed Mali labor federation will meet to decide its international affiliations. He said only a minority wanted to cooperate with the Communist World Federation of Trade Unions. The "majority tendency" would be for a Pan-African labor federation with the widest cooperation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

TO WORK WITH COMMITTEE

The official delegation to Nigeria largest nation in Africa, comes after nearly a year of study and emphasis on Africa in American churches. he delegation will help the work of the Moderator's Continuing Committee on Africa, which was set up by a consultation on Africa earlier this year.

The purposes of this committee include exploring and offering "dynamic methods of cooperation with African leaders and institutions — particularly the younger churches and Christian institutions." These purposes also include the stimulating of deeper understanding and concern for Africa by American clergymen and laymen. To these ends, the delegation will seek ways of enhancing cooperation with Africans and will help interpret revolutionary Africa to people in the United States.

In an open letter Sept. 1 to "our Christian brethern in African," the Rev. Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, stated clerk (chief executive) of The United Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., and the Rev. Dr. James H. Robinson, chairman of the Moderator's Continuing Committee on Africa, said in part:

"We rejoice that African man, hitherto held in bondage, by external forces, is now becoming free to affirm his human dignity and to forge his own destiny under God. We pray that God will guide the course of history of all African nations toward the full attainment of their vast potential and development."

'World Must Hear Africa' —Nkrumah

The Pittsburgh Courier
Pittsburgh Pa.
Sat 10-1-60

By HAROLD L. KEITH
(Courier Managing Editor)

With resolute steps, forthright speech, and extreme confidence, the African personality strode across the world stage this week.

Ghana's Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah, Nigeria's Premier Balewa and Guinea's Sekou Toure were the embodiments of that personality this week.

Not only did Mr. Nkrumah forcefully and skillfully tell the world that Africa's voice must now be heard in the higher councils of world politics but M. Toure was busily proving the point with an extremely significant jaunt through the key capitals of the Far East, including steps in Indonesia, China, and India.

And, in the wings, waiting to take his turn, was Mr. Balewa who has made it known in no uncertain terms that Nigeria is firmly behind the policy of "Africa for the Africans," and against alignment with either the East or the West in the cold-war struggle.

MR. NKRUMAH left the delegates in a state of shock in the UN with his extremely important proposal of, "I would suggest that when the Charter of the United Nations comes to be revised, a permanent seat should be created for Africa on the Security Council in view not only of the growing number of African members of the United Nations, but also of the increasing importance of the African continent in world affairs. This suggestion applies equally to Asia and to the Middle East."

Another pregnant statement from Mr. Nkrumah was the following: "I am sure that the independent African states will agree with me that the problem in the Congo is an acute African problem which can be solved by Africans only. I have on more than one occasion suggested that the United Nations should delegate its functions in the Congo to the indenpent African states whose contributions in man and material make the United Nations effort in the Congo possible."

Mr. Nkrumah then pointed out that the Ghana government and other independent African states recognize Patrice Lumumba as Premier and Joseph Kasavubu as President of the "legitimate Congo government."

■

ANOTHER proposal that made the high roof of the General Assembly Hall ring was Mr. Nkrumah's espousal of the admission of Red China to the UN.

At the week's end these facts had been recorded in history:

1. No longer will Africa accept global decisions affecting her people unless she is in on the policy-making.

2. Africa is determined to maintain an already declared policy of "positive neutralism" and confident that she can give birth to her own ideology.

3. Africa will play a prominent role in determining whether or not Red China will enter the United Nations.

These are things which must cause a total revision of the earth's power structure. Global politics will no longer be played by white men of East and West alone: The brown, black and yellow men of the world will now have a say in what is to be. History has dictated this situation.

LAGOS, Nigeria (AP)—The 36 million people of Nigeria, the most populous country in Africa, are gliding toward independence from Britain Saturday with ease and decorum.

Many of the literate are aware that the outside world may be asking if there is a chance that Nigeria might become a problem nation like the Congo.

The quick answer is that here there are few if any of the elements that kindled the Congo flames and spread conflicts and cross conflicts that have reached far into the world cold war and have threatened the very structure of the United Nations.

'NO CHANCE'

Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe (Zik), who becomes the first Nigerian governor-General in November, says: "The chaos of the Congo has no chance of repeating itself in Nigeria."

He holds that view strongly "because we have been brought up in an orderly manner to appreciate the democratic way of life."

Ever since it gained independence from Belgium June 30, the eyes of the world have been on the Congo, largest African country in area and among the richest. There they saw the tragedy of bloodshed, turmoil, mutinous troops completely out of control, disease and hunger, complete political ineptitude.

Can British-guided Nigeria prove to the world that it can succeed where the former Belgian administered Congo failed?

RESOLUTE PURPOSE

Whereas, as one embittered observer said, Congolese wandered aimlessly around "like a bunch of accidents looking for a place to happen," the Nigerians, with considerable experience of government behind them, seem to be setting about their independence tasks with resolute purpose.

In Nigeria there has been none of the constitutional rush that hurtled the Congo into independence after antiwhite rioting at the beginning of 1959.

For years, Britain and the Nigerians have been preparing constitutionally for independence, often at a pace that disappointed nationalist extremists.

FRIENDS OF PEOPLE

The preparations—while by no means complete because there still are many British officers in the public service—are remarkaoons, administered by Nigeria. Whites number 27,000—Britons, Lebanese, Syrians, French and Americans.

The country's steady advance toward independence has been based considerably because there are no white settlers, with roots deep in the soil, such as are found in the Union of South Africa.

MOST LIVE IN NORTH

Of the country's 36 million population 19.5 million live in the north, about seven million in western Nigeria, eight million in the east and nearly a million in the Southern Cameroons.

The security forces are friends of the people, not enemies. The army confines itself to strictly military duties and, unlike the Congo, is only occasionally used to quell riots. The police go about unarmed. When they arrest a man he is led away quietly.

Nigeria, about four times the size of Britain, sprawls across 372,647 square miles from the Gulf of Guinea to the Sahara in the north. From south to north there are four distinct physical regions. Along the coastline is swamp and mangrove forest, at places up to 60 miles wide, sparsely populated and almost undeveloped. There follows a belt of tropical rain forest and oil palm bush 50 to 100 miles wide, criss-crossed by rivers and streams. This gives way to a 300-mile wide area of open

NEW YORK — An official delegation is being sent to independence celebrations in Nigeria on Oct. 1 by The United Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., it was announced this week.

The nter-racial delegationi of four persons will be headed by the Vice Moderator of the Church, the Rev. Dr. Edler G. Hawkins of St. Augustine's Presbyterian Church in the Bronx, New York. The others on the delegation will be the Rev. Dr. Archie R. Crouch of San Francisco, the Rev. Carl E. Ericson of Falls Church, Va., and the Rev. Dr. Frank Wilson of New York.

Leaving Sept. 20, the delegation will visit Liberia, Ghana and the Cameroun as well as attending the independence celebrations in Lagos, Nigeria on Oct. 1. They will return in mid-October.

TURNER ANNOUNCEMENT

In announcing the delegation, the Moderator of the church, the Rev. Dr. Herman L. Turner of Atlanta, emphasized its official nature and importance:

"I ask you, the representatives of a non-segregated Church with a revolutionary heritage, to take our official greetings to the people of Africa. We congratulate the people of Nigeria on their day of independence. We welcome them into the community of nations. We express our keen, sympathetic interest in the aspirations of the African people for independence, a free way of life, and equal, responsible citizenship in the world.

"As Christians we are glad for the Christ who suffered, died and rose for all men, and we identify our Church with the aspirations of all men for personal dignity and brotherly responsibility. We believe that our faith lays upon us a special responsibility to strive for the dignity, freedom and betterment of the individual, and to work diligently for the brotherhood of man.

"As I fulfill my official responsibilities as Moderator of the United Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. at the 400th anniversary of the Church of Scotland, the mother Church of our Presbyterianism, my hopes and prayers will also be with you and the peoples of Africa."

TO WORK WITH COMMITTEE

The official delegation to Nigeria, largest nation in Africa, comes after nearly a year of study and emphasis on Africa in American churches. he delegation will help the work of the Moderator's Continuing Committee on Africa, which was set up by a consultation on Africa earlier this year.

The purposes of this committee include exploring and offering "dynamic methods of cooperation with African leaders and institutions — particularly the younger churches and Christian institutions." These purposes also include the stimulating of deeper understanding and concern for Africa by American clergymen and laymen. To these ends, the delegation will seek ways of enhancing cooperation with Africans and will help interpret revolutionary Africa to people in the United States.

In an open letter Sept. 1 to "our Christian brethern in African," the Rev. Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, stated clerk (chief executive) of The United Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., and the Rev. Dr. James H. Robinson, chairman of the Moderator's Continuing Committee on Africa, said in part:

"We rejoice that African man, hitherto held in bondage, by external forces, is now becoming free to affirm his human dignity and to forge his own destiny under God. We pray that God will guide the course of history of all African nations toward the full attainment of their vast potential and development."

Dr. Hawkins and three others in the group wll leave idlewild Airport in New York Sept. 20 on Pan American flight 150 at 5:15 p. m., and are tentatively scheduled to return on Oct. 18. Dr. Wilson will depart Sept. 26 and return Nov. 2.

'World Must Hear Africa' -Nkrumah

The Pittsburgh Courier Pittsburgh Pa.

By HAROLD L. KEITH
(Courier Managing Editor)

Sat. 10-1-60

With resolute steps, forthright speech, and extreme confidence, the African personality strode across the world stage this week.

Ghana's Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah, Nigeria's Premier Balewa and Guinea's Sekou Toure were the embodiments of that personality this week.

Not only did Mr. Nkrumah forcefully and skillfully tell the world that Africa's voice must now be heard in the higher councils of world politics but M. Toure was busily proving the point with an extremely significant jaunt through the key capitals of the Far East, including steps in Indonesia, China, and India.

And, in the wings, waiting to take his turn, was Mr. Balewa who has made it known in no uncertain terms that Nigeria is firmly behind the policy of "Africa for the Africans," and against alignment with either the East or the West in the cold-war struggle.

MR. NKRUMAH left the delegates in a state of shock in the UN with his extremely important proposal of, "I would suggest that when the Charter of the United Nations comes to be revised, a permanent seat should be created for Africa on the Security Council in view not only of the growing number of African members of the United Nations, but also of the increasing importance of the African continent in world affairs. This suggestion applies equally to Asia and to the Middle East."

Another pregnant statement from Mr. Nkrumah was the following: "I am sure that the independent African states will agree with me that the problem in the Congo is an acute African problem which can be solved by Africans only. I have on more than one occasion suggested that the United Nations should delegate its functions in the Congo to the indenpent African states whose contributions in man and material make the United Nations effort in the Congo possible."

Mr. Nkrumah then pointed out that the Ghana government and other independent African states recognize Patrice Lumumba as Premier and Joseph Kasavubu as President of the "legitimate Congo government."

■

ANOTHER proposal that made the high roof of the General Assembly Hall ring was Mr. Nkrumah's espousal of the admission of Red China to the UN.

At the week's end these facts had been recorded in history:

1. No longer will Africa accept global decisions affecting her people unless she is in on the policy-making.

2. Africa is determined to maintain an already declared policy of "positive neutralism" and confident that she can give birth to her own ideology.

3. Africa will play a prominent role in determining whether or not Red China will enter the United Nations.

These are things which must cause a total revision of the earth's power structure. Global politics will no longer be played by white men of East and West alone: The brown, black and yellow men of the world will now have a say in what is to be. History has dictated this situation.

LAGOS, Nigeria (AP)—The 36 million people of Nigeria, the most populous country in Africa, are gliding toward independence from Britain Saturday with ease and decorum.

Many of the literate are aware that the outside world may be asking if there is a chance that Nigeria might become a problem nation like the Congo.

The quick answer is that here there are few if any of the elements that kindled the Congo flames and spread conflicts and cross conflicts that have reached far into the world cold war and have threatened the very structure of the United Nations.

The country's steady advance toward independence has been based considerably because there are no white settlers, with roots deep in the soil, such as are found in the Union of South Africa, Rhodesia and Kenya.

LINGUISTIC CROSSROAD

Nigeria is probably the greatest linguistic crossroad in Africa. Within its boundaries there are about 250 distinct tribal groups and languages. Its linguistic groups range from small units of fewer than 700 people to communities exceeding five million.

The largest groups are the Hausa, almost six million in the north, the IBO, 5½ million in the east, and the Yoruba, just over five million in the West.

English is the official language of the legislatures.

Some 44 per cent of the population is Moslem, 22 per cent Christian and the remainder hold fast to ancient cults and paganism. Thus you find church, mosque and juju (black magic) in close, peaceful proximity.

COAST PROTECTORATE

The British government took over the coast protectorate in 1900 and went on from there bit by bit until 1946 when a new constitution set up a central legislature to administer the whole country and regional houses of assembly were established to advise the central legislature.

The first federal prime minister was appointed in August 1957.

At the center there is a federal council of ministers and in each region and in the Southern Cameroons there is an executive council.

The governor-general has the right of veto but he has never used it.

15 PER CENT LITERACY

In a country where literacy is estimated at 15 per cent of the population, against six per cent in 1952, universal adult franchise applies.

Everyone agrees there are few signs of communism or Soviet infiltration in Nigeria, and few take seriously a threat to form a Nigerian Labor party on Independence Day by Michael Imoudu, president of the Nigerian Trade Union Congress.

The great question mark is whether the federal form of government and the present coalition can continue to work once the controlling hand of Britain is removed Oct. 1.

By TOMMY OLAWAYI OKE

On October 1, 1960, the Federation of Nigeria will receive her independence from Britain and will emerge as the most populous independent nation on the continent of Africa. Nigeria with her 35 million people is a giant among the nations in Africa.

Having been under the tutelage of the British colonial system for more than a hundred years, with the last five years government of her people by her people, we are now on the move toward a future which promises freedom for the three states, dignity for each individual, and a better way of life for everyone. Being abundantly endowed with natural resources, Nigeria is destined to be one of the most important countries in our changing Africa.

Our people, including the leaders of Nigeria, are proud of and loyal to their country. We are dedicated to the idea of securing for our fatherland political freedom, economic security, and world-wide respect. The idea which guides many of our men was instilled in us during our training in Mission schools. Here, the American Missionary, of all faiths, have reason to be proud of Nigerian independence.

It is indeed an occasion of joy to be free. God helping us, we shall take our rightful place in Africa and in world-wide respect.

AFRICA'S FIRST LADY — Rapidly earning the title of Africa's leading feminine politician is Mrs. Funmilayo Ransome - Kuti of Lagos, Nigeria. Mrs. Ransome - Kuti proved her genius for organizing women in 1948, when she led a revolt against a female head tax that drove the powerful Alake of Abeokuta from his throne for more than two years. She is now forming a Common People's Party in Nigeria and plans an Africa-wide organization to fight for women's rights.

It's official for Gov.-Gen. Azikiwe

The Afro-American

LAGOS, Nigeria (NNPA) — Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe was sworn in Wednesday, his 59th birthday, as Governor-General of Nigeria. Queen Elizabeth of Great Britain approved his appointment as a Privy Councillor (a member of the body of men appointed by the crown to advise in matters of state).

Baltimore, Md.

Harold Macmillan, British Prime Minister, sent Dr. Azikiwe, who becomes the first African Governor-General in the British Commonwealth, his "sincere congratulations and all good wishes for the future."

"Zik," as he is popularly known, is the founder of a chain of Nigerian newspapers. He is a veteran nationalist, and a former President of the Federal Senate and Premier of the Eastern Region.

Sat. 11-26-60

HE SUCCEEDS Sir James Robertson, the last British Governor - General, who left Lagos by sea Tuesday for Britain. Representatives of African heads of state, and representatives from the United States, Britain and the United Nations attended the swearing - in.

A crowd of about 70,000 cheered Dr. Azikiwe at Lagos race track as he delivered a strong inaugural speech. He attacked racial discrimination and prejudice.

Constantly interrupted by applause and cheers, he said: "We must regard it as a mark of disrespect and an unfriendly act if any country with whom we have friendly relations indulges in race prejudice in any shape or form, no matter how it may be legally cloaked.

DR. AZIKIWE added that lack of respect for human dignity had led to political bondage in Africa and this had accentuated race relations in Africa.

He said that until this problem has been honestly solved, "it is safe to predict that the political resurgence which is now sweeping all over Africa is capable of leading to a revanche (the policy of a government intent on recovering lost territory) movement which would be disastrous to the peace of the world."

Speaking of Nigeria's foreign policy of non-alignment, Dr. Azikiwe said:

"How can any reasonable world statesman expect Nigerians to associate in an alliance of mutual security with countries which still regard Africa as a colonial pasture fit for safaris and cattle-grazing and not for the enjoyment of basic human rights?"

After the speech "Zik" drove his wife in an open car to State House.

Nigeria, Britain reveal defense pact

The Afro-American
Baltimore, Md.
Sat. 11-26-60

LONDON (NNPA) — A "white paper," published here Monday, revealed a defense agreement between Great Britain and Nigeria.

Under its terms, Britain would undertake to provide training facilities in England for officers, cadets and other ranks of the Nigerian forces, including places at Sandhurst, the British military academy; the Royal Naval College, and the Army Staff College.

Britain also would undertake to provide personnel to assist in staffing, administering and training Nigeria's armed forces. Adequate and suitable modern equipment would be made available.

* * *

NIGERIA WOULD be given the right to demand military assistance in building up her armed forces, and Britain would have the right to fly over Nigerian territory and would have staging facilities in Nigeria for its aircraft.

The two principal airfields in Nigeria are at Kano and Lagos. Britain seeks the right to hold tropicalization tests of aircraft at these two Nigerian fields.

The Nigerian defense policy is to produce small, mobile and well - equipped forces capable of operating in battalion or company groups. There are at present five battalions of the Queen's Own Nigeria Regiment. But it is likely that these will be increased to six so as to complete two infantry brigades.

* * *

IN ADDITION to the infantry, there is a Reconnaissance Squadron, a Field Engineer Squadron, the Ordnance, and the Service Corps with Mechanical and Electrical Engineers to support them. The Reconnaisance Squadron is being equipped with new British armoured and scout cars.

The Army is commanded by a British major - general with two brigade commanders under him. Of 350 officers, some 60 are Nigerians.

The senior Nigerian officers are majors with up to 11 years of service. It is planned to double the number of Nigerian officers by 1962 by sending cadets through the British military academy.

The Royal Nigerian Navy consists of a minesweeper, a Seaward Defense motor launch, two minesweeper motor launches and a landing craft. A second Seaward Defense motor launch is under construction.

There is no Nigerian Air Force. If one is established Britain will undertake to train it.

Azikiwe Is New Nigerian Leader

LAGOS, NIGERIA (HTNS—Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, who became Governor-general of Nigeria Saturday, and Alhaji Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, the Federal Prime Minister represent opposing types but in them many people see the forces that have made Nigeria what it is today and what it may become.

Dr. Azikiwe is by far the better known of the two. He is six feet three inches tall and generally wears a pure white alba, a flowing robe-like garment, that makes him look even bigger. His eyes sparkle, he has a semi-permanent smile and to see him is to remember him.

He is the fountainhead of West African nationalism. Ghana's Premier Kwame Knrumah is widely accounted his disciple and in the years when nationalism was officially disreputable it was Dr. Azikiwe who stumped West Africa pleading, cajoling and exciting the people with a prospect of freedom. From those days to these the crowds call him "Zik."

His career has been almost as flamboyant as his speech. Born 56 years ago he was educated at Methodist schools here and went to the United States at the age of 21. In an eight-year stay he collected four degrees from Lincoln, Howard and Pennsylvania Universities and a lot of callouses, as a boxer, coal miner, laborer and dishwasher. Some of his spirit was exhibited in 1934 when he tried to list himself as the entire Nigerian track and field team for the Commonwealth games. They couldn't let him do it.

In the '30s and the '40s it was Zik who was the main propagandist for independence. He acquired five newspapers and a huge amount of influence in the eastern region but in last year's elections was unable to get enough votes to become the Federal Prime Minister.

The man who did it, Sir Abubaker, is just now coming into his own. He is "a man of the north" which means a Moslem and, in almost feudal sense, a member of the party run by Sir Ahmabou Bello, the Sardauna of Sokoto.

The Sardauna rules the north by hereditary right and with the aid of a ruling class of aristocrats who have always considered themselves every bit as good as the English. Sir Abubakar, who has some of the bland innocence of a wise old crocodile sunning itself on a log, is showing himself nobody's puppet.

He is a moderator, a compromiser, but a man who knows what he wants and works hard to get it. In a country where a good deal more is said on the husting than anyone cares to remember in office, his honesty is a byword.

Rockefeller Presents Eisenhower Message

LAGOS, Nigeria, Oct. 2 (AP). — Newly independent Nigeria wants its friendship with the United States to become stronger, Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa said Sunday.

He gave this assurance to Nelson A. Rockefeller when the New York Governor, with other members of the American delegation to Nigerian independence celebrations, called on the Prime Minister to present a personal message and a gift from President Eisenhower.

Acknowledging that Nigeria has a long way to go to become fully developed, the Prime Minister told the American delegates:

"With the good will of friends like the United States and the United Kingdom, we hope to draw on your experience. We Nigerians are friends of the United States. There is no doubt about it. We want that friendship to become stronger."

If at all possible, he said, the Nigerians would like President Eisenhower to visit here—either as President or later as a private citizen. He said: "He would be greatly welcomed. I am deeply touched by his work for the world, to which he has contributed to bring peace and stability. We have the highest respect and regard for him."

The Prime Minister said his 1955 visit to the United States was one of the turning points of his life. Until then, he said, he had not believed that Nigeria, with its different peoples, languages and religions, could become united.

Mr. Eisenhower's personal gift was a glass vase engraved with the President's seal. America's official independence gift to Nigeria is a supply of books, library furnishings, films and projection equipment for the Institute of International Studies which the Federal government plans to establish.

Israel Sends 100 Experts Into Nigeria

Mission Seeks Ways To Aid Development

By Richard C. Wald

By Wireless to the Herald Tribune

LAGOS, Nigeria, Oct. 4.—Like "the captains and the kings," the ambassadors at last are departing. The fleet of 250 green and white luxury cars purchased specially to speed them around the streets of Lagos is slowly dispersing and the air lines are booked to capacity by diplomatic delegations hurrying on to other fields and newer contacts after witnessing the attaining of independence by Nigeria.

But among the few staying on, one of the most unobstrusively hard-working groups has set out for a tour of the eastern and western regions of Nigeria. The Israelis, led by a former Israeli Chief of Staff, Gen. Moshe Dayan, who is now Minister of Agriculture, are once again demonstrating that they have moved into Africa to stay.

Israelis in Africa

Gen. Dayan, the patch over his left eye giving him the air of a happy buccaneer, said: "We haven't much to give in the way of money but, in a small way, we are almost irreplaceable."

In the last two years, Israeli commitments in Africa have been growing rapidly. Growing, too, has been the reputation of Israel as a purveyor of techniques.

Almost every independent African nation south of the Sahara recognizes and has had some diplomatic contact with Israel. There are 150 Israelis in Abyssinia, 100 in Ghana, fifty in Liberia, twenty in Sierra Leone, and about 100 in Nigeria. A Guinean delegation is studying in Israel.

Israel's Appeal

All this is a sizable effort for a small Middle Eastern nation with less than 2,000,000, population.

"Our activities are restricted more by questions of cost than recognition," Gen. Dayan said.

Part of the attraction of Israel is, undoubtedly, the spirit of neutralism that is growing in Nigeria. The new African nations are willing to, indeed they must, apply to the Eastern or Western blocs for the money to develop themselves. But when it comes to doing the actual job, they would prefer to deal with a small nation that has somewhat similar problems and no possibility of domination.

What Israel Is Doing

The Israelis, in turn, concentrate on exporting agricultural and commercial management techniques. In a continent which is just beginning to see the use of water resources, fertilizers, and planned farm production and which desperately wants African businesses to supply African needs, the Israelis appeal to particular needs.

Gen. Dayan pointed out that in commercial ventures 51 per cent of the capital at least, is sold to local interests and native staffs are trained to be able to take over within seven years. In agricultural projects, profit that might go overseas stays in the country.

For example in the Western region of Nigeria, an Israeli team is outlining a collective farm enterprise that will be financed by the local government. When the money is ready, Israeli organized building companies will do the work.

Local Troubles

Not everything goes smoothly. What is commercially advisable often fails because it doesn't fit in with regional jealousies or personal political ambitions. Also, as in northern Nigeria, Moslem influence is widespread in Africa. Moslems and Israelis do not seem to hit it off any more.

"But you know," Gen. Dayan said, "there is one thing that our (Arab) neighbors cannot do. That is, offer them (the Africans) anything like what we can. We are a small country, but we have a lot of doctors and technicians to send abroad if we want. They can't. I know that Moselm countries like to listen to their friends from Cairo, but they still invite us."

Israel's Motives

Why does Israel do it? To some observers here, representing small countries which cannot quite manage to sell their services and friendship as easily, the reason is that Israel is embattled in the Middle East and is here looking to a second line of defense.

South of the Sahara, they say, Israel possibly can mount pressures that will keep the nations north of that desert in a more peaceable frame of mind.

Sees Focus on Africa

Gen. Dayan said: "We are in the Middle East and in Africa, and we want to be accepted here. We are Western and we will stay Western. But the greatest of events for the next ten years is what is happening here in Africa. It is important not only to us but to the world.

"Also, for the past ten years we have been asking for things. We have always needed aid. Now we like to be able to give something."

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8—President Eisenhower will meet with the leaders of sixteen newly independent nations at the White House Friday.

Herald 10-9-60

The White House made this announcement today shortly after the President had conferred for almost an hour with Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, Prime Minister of Nigeria.

Nigeria, which had been Britain's largest colony, became an independent nation within the British Commonwealth Oct. 1. Sir Abubakar arrived in New York last Thursday and on Friday the new African republic became the ninety-ninth member of the United Nations.

After the meeting Sir Abubaker said that he had invited the President to visit Nigeria and had "some hope" the President would find it "possible" to accept.

When his nation was admitted to the United Nations yesterday, Sir Abubakar said Nigeria intended to be independent of both the Western and Communist blocs.

Asked whether he though Nigeria would be a moderating influence in Africa, the Premier said:

"I hope so. It depends on how our country conducts itself."

The leaders invited to the White House Friday are all heads of delegations—some of them Premiers and others Foreign Ministers—of countries that have been newly admitted to the United Nations.

The Countries Invited

The countries are Senegal, Mali, the Ivory Coast, Malagasy, Niger, Upper Volta, Dahomey, Cameroon, the Central African Republica, Chad, the Republic of the Congo (formerly a French colony), Gabon, Somalia, Nigeria, Togo and Cyprus. The only non-African country in the group is Cyprus.

The Republic of the Congo that was formerly the Belgian Congo will be added to the list if its application for United Nations membership has been approved in time. This has been delayed by the conflict between President Joseph Kasavubu and Patrice Lumumba, the Premier who was dismissed by Mr. Kasavubu. Each faction has sent a delegation to New York.

The meeting Friday will take place at 10:30 A. M. in the President's office. State Department officials said today that the President would send his plane to bring his guests to Washington.

The State Department has been eager that the leaders of the neutral and newly independent nations be tendered official hospitality by the White House. In fact, more than a week before the United Nations General Assembly session opened Sept. 20, the department had prepared a chart listing the names of the various heads of government and foreign ministers of these nations and the dates of their arrival in New York. The chart also had spaces for the dates of possible official visits to Washington.

As the opening days of the session went by and these spaces remained unfilled, State Department officials became more and more unhappy—especially since Premier Khrushchev from the moment of his arrival in New York sedulously paid court to the leaders of the neutralist and newly independent countries.

On Sept. 25 Secretary of State Christian A. Herter gave a luncheon in New York for the leaders of thirteen new African states and Cyprus.

In the early days of the session President Eisenhower twice went to New York—on Sept. 22, when he addressed the General Assembly, and on Sept. 26 for a speech to a dinner of Catholic charities.

He had briefer meetings with Premier Sylvanus E. Olympio of Togo, Deputy Premier Aklilou Abde Wold of Ethiopia, Crown Prince Moulay Hassan of Morocco, Deputy Premier Mohammad Naim of Afghanistan, Premier B. P. Koirala of Nepal, Premier Saeb Salaam of Lebanon and Prince Norodom Sihanouk, chief of state of Cambodia.

However, with the exception of Premier Olympio of Togo, the President did not then meet with the delegation heads of the new African nations.

According to State Department officials, some consideration was given to having the President meet with these leaders in New York. However, some officials argued against this because of the prestige conveyed by an invitation to the White House.

Officials said today that the White House had always had the intention of inviting the leaders to Washington and that the delay was simply a matter of deciding on an appropriate time. However, they volunteered that the invitation had been speeded by newspaper criticism of "our apparent failure to extend hospitality."

These officials denied that President Tito and President Nasser had left the United States with a sense of slight because they had not been invited to Washington by President Eisenhower. Both leaders, these officials said, expressed satisfaction at the opportunity to talk with the President in New York.

New Flag symbolizes Nigeria's Independence

WASHINGTON

As the independence of Nigeria was proclaimed on Saturday, Oct. 1, a new national flag was unfurled at the Nigerian Embassy here in Washington and at all other Nigerian offices and posts throughout the world.

Sat 10-15-60

The new flag replaces all other flags including those of the Nigerian Merchant Marine and the Civil Aviation— except the Naval ensign which will consist of the existing white ensign with the national flag replacing the Union Jack in the upper left canton.

* * *

P. 6

THE NEW FLAG is rectangular in shape, like all other national flags and it is divided vertically into three equal parts. The center part is white and the two other sections green.

The Admiralty and the College of Heralds, found it both unique and satisfactory.

The design of the flag was selected by an open competition organized by the Federal Government and the winning choice was decided by the Council of Ministers, assisted, as in the case of the National Anthem, by the National Planning Committee for Independence Celebrations. The Committee, an advisory body, was set up also by about the middle of 1958 and comprises nineteen members drawn up from all parts of the country.

FOR BOTH the Council and the Committee the task of selecting the winning entry from the 2,870 designs submitted presented no easy problem. Of these entries more than 2,000 were received from Britain, while several came from as far afield as the United States, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Western Germany, British Guiana and the Federation of West Indies. Over 700 were entered by competitors resident in Nigeria.

The Committee met on April 3, 1959, to consider the entries. After the preliminary sorting, a short list of eight designs was made, out of which the final one was selected and recommended to the Council of Ministers. But before the eight were sent to the Council, the Prime Minister and the Regional Premiers examined them as well as a total of forty-five others. The final choice was made at the end of September, 1959.

TWENTY - TWO year old Michael Taiwo Akinkunmi, a Nigerian engineering student at present in Britain, and who comes from Ibadan in the Western Region, was the winner. His design, as previously stated, consists of a rectangle which is divided vertically into three qual parts. The two outer parts are in green and the middle stripe is white.

The green, the designer explains, symbolizes agricultural fertility, which is the mainstay of the country's economy, and the white stands for peace and unity.

The normal size of the flag chosen for official use is 6 feet by 3 feet.

To every Nigerian the flag represents a crowning glory. From each it evokes a real sense of pride in nationhood. More than that, it stands as a symbol of joy in the present and confidence in the future.

As it fluttered on Independence Day— high on homes and above Government buildings, in public squares, in children's hands or at Nigerian offices abroad— the new flag proclaimed in a world - wide, yet, intensely personal manner, the birth of a new nation and the unshaking faith of its teeming millions in the destiny of their country.

TOAST TO INDEPENDENCE — Nigeria, Africa's most populous nation with 33 million inhabitants, attained its independence Saturday (Oct. 1). And in Washington, to help the Nigerian Embassy to mark the occasion was Great Britain's Prime Minister Harold MacMillan (right) who says a toast to the country's future with Nigerian Charge d'Affairs John M. Garba. The toast highlighted a reception given by the Nigerian Embassy at Sheraton Park Hotel.

Nigeria Plans 2 Universities

Chicago Defender
Chicago, Ill.
Dec. 17-23-60

NEW YORK — Nigeria is to have two additional universities when the plans currently being pursued by both the Western and Northern Regional governments of the federation are completed.

The Western Nigeria University, according to Dr. S. D. Onabamiro, Western Nigeria's Minister of Education now heading a ten-man delegation to this country, will be a university that "will open its doors to students from all parts of Africa and the world."

The Universitiy of the North will function in the same manner, although the Northern Regional Minister of Education has not yet made a similar statement.

At a Press Conference held in the Nigerian Consulate-General last week, Dr. Onobamiro said that the proposed Western Nigeria University will be built with government funds and not with funds from foreign foundations as some people have suggested.

HEAVEN HELPS

Stressing that "Heaven helps those who help themselves," Dr. Onabamiro maintained that the present delegation's tour is not concerned with the financial aspect of financing the university but for seeing things and learning a lot on how to start and maintain it.

Dr. Onabamiro said that the core of the delegation's tour is to study the general layout, architectural design and administrative set up of universities in foreign countries with the aim of utilizing such observatons towards the building of Western Nigeria's University.

He said that the university will stress research in agriculture particularly as well as general science and engineering.

Nigerian Mob Of Students Protests Pact

The Washington Post
Washington, D.C.
Sun. 11-27-60

LAGOS, Nigeria, Nov. 28 Hundreds of Nigerian students today forced their way into the federal Parliament here to protest against the defense pact between Britain and this newly independent West African nation.

Members of Parliament, mostly on the Government side, ran in disorder as the students burst in after defying a police barrier.

The students, from University College and the Nigeria College of Arts, Science and Technology, both in the city of Ibada, drove into Logos this morning.

They carried placards with such slogans asr "Down with thme defense pact," "Balewa (Federal Prime Minister Alhaji Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa) betray Nigeria: the world shall hear it," "Military agreement over our dead bodies," and "Macmillan (British Prime Minister) outwits Balewa."

Shouts of "No base, no pact," went up as they rushed into the Parliament building. Police made one arrest—and five persons elected to go with the police in protest against the arrest.

The defense pact provides training facilities for members of the Nigerian armed forces in British institutions and facilities for Britain on Nigerian airfields.

NIGERIA MAY SHOW WAY TO REST OF AFRICA

Atlanta Daily World
Atlanta (3), Ga.

By DON TAYLOR
(Editor of New Commonwealth)

LONDON—Nigeria is a big country, with (by African standards) a very large number of people living in it—no less than 35,000,000, between one-sixth and one-seventh of the population of all Africa. That is the first point to remember when one is considering the problems of this great new Federation which achieves complete independence on October 1.

The second important point is that those people tend to be divided in various ways — by tribe, by religion and by their way of life (rural or urban). All things considered, it is heartening to see how Nigerians are striving to bury the suspicions and misunderstandings of the past, to found a new nation. When I was traveling around the country recently, time and again I was told that "We must be Nigerians above all else — that's the only way we can become a great nation."

RELIGIOUS DIFFICULTIES

Let us take a more detailed look at the whole complicated picture. The main religions are Islam, Christianity and animism. And the traditional gulf between the two former was one of the major obstacles which delayed the formation of the Federation.

Quite apart from the traditional differences between the followers of the two religions, there was the indisputable fact that Christian missionaries in the South of Nigeria gave such an impetus to education that the Muslim northerners felt for a long time that they would be "the poor relations" if they federated. But those fears have been largely overcome, and the northerners are making most powerful efforts to equate their educational position with that of the southerners.

What about tribalism? In the Northern Region, with an area of 264,282 square miles, the Hausa and Fulani peoples (whose emir ruled states always gave them a degree of unity), totaling nearly 10,000,000, are in the vast majority. The Kanuri people (just under 1,500,000) are the next group. The predominant people in the Western Region (43,376 square miles) are the Yoruba (5,500,000), intelligent and able, and closely-knit through their long and colorful history. It is significant that most of the large towns of Nigeria are Yoruba towns, a tribute to their commercial and administrative capacity. Smaller tribes in the Region are the Edo, Ibo and Urhobo.

There are more than 6,000,000 Ibo people in the Eastern Region, smallest of the Regions, with an area of 29,484 square miles, but they had not, until recent years, the cohesion of the Yoruba, nor their organized forms of government. The people tended to live in largely autonomous village communities. It is fair I think, to say that Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe — former Premier of the Region — was largely responsible for drawing the Ibo people closely together, and one can see the recognition of that in the tumultuous welcome accorded him when he visited the capital of Enugu.

GREATER CONFIDENCE

Looking on this Nigerian picture, it is not hard to see how daunting were the earlier problems of uniting the people, when both tradition and religion kept them apart. Add to this the fact that there are many smaller tribes and sub-tribes — and indeed the apprehensions of htese people was one of the last hurdles to be surmounted during the "independence conference" of 1958.

The expanding economy of Nigeria tends to create another difficulty. Industry and the call of town life have created a class of African much removed from the village type. The coalminer of Enugu pursues a way of life and faces problems far different from those of the Fulani herdsman. And the greater sophistication and education of the townsman tends to widen the gulf.

Yet, having drawn a full picture of the difficulties, it remains true that they are being steadily overcome. That was my firm impression, traveling through the country from Kano, in the far north to Lagos on the coast.

EXAMPLE TO OTHERS

Secondly, there is a developing tendency to respect differences of religion. The clash between two religions can be as great a potential danger as racialism. Nigeria may well show the rest of Africa the way to live together. Certainly her Prime Minister, Alhaji Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, gives an inspiring lead in this direction.

Education and communications, both expanding, will surely remove social differences. Together, they are helping the people of Nigeria to know one another better, and to grow accustomed to one another. In short, the barriers created by ignorance and distance are steadily disappearing.

Nobody with a knowledge of Nigeria and its circumstances would pretend that it has a broad and easy road ahead. But, as I said at the beginning, my own journey around this fascinating land convinced me thet a large number of the people (enough of them to shape events) have the conviction that unity will make them a powerful and prosperous nation in a troubled continent. It is a great ideal for them to follow, the ideal indeed of the Commonwealth itself.

Criticize GOP For Snub Of Negroes To Nigeria

Chicago Independent P. 12 Oct. 15-21, 1960.

WASHINGTON — Criticism of the Republican Administration for failing to include any Negroes in the official United States mission to the Independence celebrations in Nigeria was voiced by Congressman Charles C. Diggs.

Diggs is a member of the Sub-Committee on African Affairs of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and is attending the ceremonies in Nigeria which began Oct. 1.

Sen. John F. Kennedy is represented at the celebrations by Theodore M. Berry, former councilman and vice mayor of Cincinnati, who was named as the "personal representative" of the Senator.

In a letter addressed to the Hon. Alhaji Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa on Sept. 22, the prime minister of the Nigerian Federation, Senator Kennedy stated in part.

"I believe that the coming to independence to Nigeria is an event important not only to the nation of Nigeria, or the continent of Africa, but to the world. Although I have often felt that we in the United States have not fully appreciated the significance of the forces which are bringing you, and other nations, to independence, there is no question of the sincerity of our hope for your future, and our desire to help in the fulfillment of these hopes. . ."

MOSCOW ACCUSES NIGERIAN STUDENT

Says Dissident Who Charged Soviet Bias Was Expelled for Being U. S. Agent

By OSGOOD CARUTHERS

Special to The New York Times

MOSCOW, Oct. 29—A young Nigerian was accused today of having carried on subversive work for the United States among fellow African students enrolled in Moscow University.

The accusation was published by the official trade-union journal Trud, which urged vigilance not only by Soviet citizens but also by foreign students in Soviet schools against possible agents of the West in their midst.

Trud said the students Theophilis Chukuemeko Okonkwo, who had identified himself as a dissident son of the Nigerian Minister of Education and had posed in Moscow as a Communist, had been expelled after two years of study in which he had failed to pass a single examination.

The newspaper said two of "his pals," apparently Africans, whose nationalities were not given, were also expelled from Soviet higher schools "for poor progress and free student made bias charge bad behavior."

Charges against Mr. Okonkwo were made after he had been quoted in a West German newspaper, Welt der Arbeit, and later in a Nigerian newspaper, West African Pilot, as having charged that there was racial bias in Soviet universities and having warned of Soviet efforts to brainwash African, Asian and Latin-American students.

Trud declared that Soviet authorities had learned that Mr. Okonkwo had been graduated from a special school in Canada under American tutelage and then had taken further training in Boston in preparation for coming to Moscow.

"The Nigerian Okonkwo could not renounce his nationality," the article said, "but for the sake of the dollar he renounced his people, became a Pentagon man and was zealously preparing to carry out its orders."

On e he was in Moscow, the newspaper charged, the Nigerian told Russian students he was a Communist and voiced "hatred for imperialists and colonialists."

Embassy Visits Reported

However, after frequent visits to the United States and West German Embassies, the article said, he would return "smelling of alcohol and carrying packages of whisky and gin" and behind closed doors regale fellow African students with violent anti-Soviet talks. The paper added that he had tried to induce a group of African students to leave the Soviet Union.

All of this, said Trud, was done under instructions he received from Americans who were trying with money to woo Africans away from Soviet schools.

Foreign students are always welcome, the newspaper said. However, it added that the case of Mr. Okonkwo "teaches us to be vigilant, and not only the Soviet people, but also those who come to us from abroad in quest of knowledge."

Nigeria Emerges As Power In Africa

The Commercial Appeal

By SMITH HEMPSTONE
The Chicago Daily News Service

MALINDI, Kenya, Oct. 1. — Nigeria, Africa's exuberant giant, is the continent's 16th nation to attain independence since the start of the year.

The West African state's independence marks a shift in Africa's political center of gravity. In the past, Africa and the world have danced to tunes whistled by such pygmy states as Ghana and Guinea, important only because of their independence.

Nigeria's population of 35 million makes it more populous than its fellow commonwealth states of Canada, Australia and New Zeland combined.

Plenty Of Wealth

The new nation, the world's 13th largest, is bigger than any European state except Russia, or half again as large as Texas.

Nor is Nigeria without wealth. Exports of palm products, peanuts, cocoa, cotton, rubber, tin and other commodities bring in 375 million dollars annually. Her imports are worth 450 million dollars.

Nigeria's annual national income stands at more than 2.5 billion dollars (more than that of the copper-rich federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Kenya, Tanganyika and Uganda combined). The national debt is small (55 million dollars in 1958), the country's sterling reserves amount to 575 million dollars and the Federal and Regional Governments will spend 900 million dollars, 78 per cent of it from their own resources, on development between 1955 and 1962.

Things are done in a big way: Nigerians gulp six million gallons of beer per year, buy four million pairs of shoes, and purchase three million square yards of textiles, enough to blanket Lagos, the capital, three times.

The country has 17,000 schools, a university (two more on the drawing-boards), and 5,000 students studying abroad. But only 25 per cent of the population over 7 years of age is literate and two per cent of the people are blind.

Nigeria has 500,000 lepers, and ritual murders still take place with alarming frequency. This may diminish now that Nigeria, the first African country to do so, has television.

The Portuguese hacked their way a few miles into the interior in 1485 and the first English trading expedition, which realized a modest profit of 1,000 per cent on "pepper and olifants' teeth and oyle of palm," reached the country in 1554.

Slave Trade Stopped

In the 18th Century, Nigeria became the center of the slave trade as more than 100,000 Africans each year were caught and shipped to the new world (most American Negroes are of Nigerian extraction).

Paradoxically, Britain, which had profited most from the slave trade, moved into Nigeria in 1849 to put an end to the trade.

Although Nigeria has 25,000 whites, these are all missionaries, traders or government servants. A sweltering climate combined with malaria (the Anglican Church buried a bishop a year for one three-year period) to discourage settlement and to earn for Nigeria the reputation of being "the white man's grave."

The tribal animosities which plunged the Congo into civil war are present in Nigeria, which contains more than 200 tribes speaking 40 principal languages.

The British at first attempted to impose a unitary form of government on this restless Conglomeration but, unlike the Belgians in the Congo, wisely backed off in 1954 when it became obvious that it would be unworkable.

But perhaps more important than the system in assuring Nigeria will not go the way of the Congo, is the quality of the country's leaders.

Tafawa Balewa was elected to the Northern House of Assembly in 1947 and to the Federal House four years later.

13 Years Experience

Thus he is already a veteran of 13 years in politics and administration, the last three as prime minister under the British. He favors a neutralist course in world affa ut to Balewa this means ng is- sues on their merits. West could not hope for a b r man at Nigeria's helm.

The most powerful man in Nigeria, unlike Balewa and Awolowo holds no Federal office. He is 51-year-old Sir Ahmadu Bello, a Moslem nobleman who commands the unswerving allegiance of the mass of the North's 19 million people.

Bello, as Sardauna of Sokoto, is the religious head of the Moslems. As the descendant of the tribesman who established the Northern states, his secular writ runs far. In fact, Balewa cannot rule without his support. Bello is premier of the North and every massive inch an aristocrat.

Nigeria's size, population, wealth and the quality of her leaders all hold good promise for the future. But they cannot completely wipe out the problem of sectionalism.

Northern Fulani and Hausa tribesmen despise the more aggressive pagans and Christians of the East and West. The East's Ibos and the West's Yorubas heartily dislike each other and both look with scorn on the North, whose people are comparatively backward.

These problems will not disappear with independence and Nigeria must solve them if she is to assume her natural role of leadership in Africa.

In contrast to the Congo, her leaders have both the will and the ability to do just this.

Nigeria Set to Shed 60-Year British Rule

By Russell Howe

Special to The Washington Post

LAOS, Nigeria, Sept. 25—On Saturday Nigeria will become the world's youngest and Africa's largest nation.

If one takes the last rough population count and allows for normal increase Nigeria has 38 million inhabitants. But indications are that a scientific census would show a figure closer to 48 million—twice the population of Egypt, Africa's second largest nation.

The British regard Nigeria as their finest achievement in Africa. In 60 years of British rule there have been only eight governors—an eloquent tribute to efficiency, for unsatisfactory proconsuls would be replaced long before retirement.

It was here in Nigeria that Premier Harold Macmillan, junketing through Africa in January, decided there was a future for the Commonwealth on the world's richest, most uncommitted continent.

Nine years have been spent preparing this twice Texas-sized country, which has more than 100 different languages and several hundred major and minor kingdoms, for sovereignty.

Federal Structure Forged

Eight constitutional conferences have brought together bitter political rivals and age-old "tribal" enemies to forge a federal structure which is in every sense a compromise. Former Colonial Secretary Allan Lennox-Boyd called this compromise among Africans of greatly differing cultures, with a long background of warfare among themselves, "statesmanship of high order."

Nigerians as a people now are beginning to be conscious of their nationality.

Tribalism is far from dead, and between the three great groups—8 million Yoruba, 8 million Ibo and 11 million Hausa—it is acute. But a sense of overriding national cause will probably prevent such a centrifugal force as has threatened to split the Congo and Mali from developing here.

Nigerians have been both the most proudly nationalist of all Britain's colonial African subjects and yet the most British. They are the East Indians of Africa.

Proud of British Customs

No other African people has borrowed so many British customs and declared them jealously to be their own. The mayor of Enugu, capital of Eastern Nigeria and Nigeria's most nationalistic city, wears a bicorn hat and velvet-lined gown like a British mayor—something no Ghanaian mayor would dream of doing.

Nigerian lawyers cling with fierce tenacity to every aspect of British legal ritual and dress.

Nigerian clubs are at least as rigorously exclusive as their London models, and the most passionate of anti-British pamphleteers will have a portrait of the Queen on his study wall.

Alone among Britain's "colored" Commonwealth associates, Nigeria will continue to accept titles and royal honors after independence. Yet nowhere else in British Africa is the pressure for Africanization so hot—in many ways so rash—as here.

No other African people can be so edotionally and passionately critical of British colonialism nor so obstinately convinced of the superiority of the British system of government over those systems imposed on other African countries.

No other African people has clung so jealously to its own practical form of dress——billowing dust-gathering agbada—nor adopted so completely the badge-bearing British blazer, the British waistcoat, the gaudy choker handlebar mustaches, even spats.

Speak With Oxford Accent

No other West African country has managed to develop vernacular newspapers as commercial enterprises, and no other Africans insist on speaking with such Oxford accents.

Nigeria has, in fact, the greatness and weakness of a major nation. It is inconceivable to Nigerians that any other country could contest Nigeria's supremacy in Africa. Yet Nigerians doubt their abilities more than any other educated African people.

The Ghanaian will wait patiently to inherit a top job held by a European. On attaining it, he will be confident of doing it as well as his predecessor whether or not his confidence is justified by the facts.

His Nigerian equivalent will pay some impecunious friend to campaign for his promotion, will create a racist atmosphere in office which will drive a Britisher home, then will become a nervous wreck convinced that he is failing to do the job properly.

Has Produced Leaders

Nigeria has produced more eminent personalities than any other black African country, notably in the business eld. Six banks are Nigerian-owned. But the general level of efficiency in administration is lower than in Sierra Leone or Ghana.

Nigeria, so commercial in internal politics, promises to be a ponderous, conservative counterbalance in inter-African affairs. The country arrives on the international scene at a time when the continent badly needs realistic, conservative leadership.

Other bids to lead Africa have only created enemies for those who made them. The first was Gamal Abdel. Not of suspicious in sub-Sahara only did this meet with a wall Africa, but it finally alienated the Arab powers as well.

The second was Kwame Nkrumah's. But Ghana was too recent and too wild for Ethiopia and Liberia, too small for Nigeria, too territorially ambitous for French Africa. The third bid was Sekou Toure's and was limited to the French Africian states that foam a majority in the Free African world. This bid foundered on the disappointing results achieved by Guinea's own internal development policy.

Tunisia Ranks High

For over a year the unofficial leader of Africa has been Tunisia, a leadership consecrated by her selection for Africa's Security Council seat. When Nigeria joins Tunisia at the top of the African tree it will be with same quiet, tactful diplomacy and appearance of not trying to lead. For such a maneuver, Nigeria has her admirable First Premier: Alhaji Sir Abu Bakar Tafawa Balewa, who is the exact antithesis of the Castro-Lumumba-Nasser type of politician. Much of Nigeria's success or failure will depend, of course, on investment. Because of its huge consumer market, it is drawing more investments than any other African Country except Algeria. A boom in landprices has made plots around the Lagos race course as expensive per square foot as in London's Picadilly. Rents are more than double New York's

Watched by World

The eyes of the world will be on Nigeria for the next few weeks to see how well this nation, artifical creation of Lord Lugards (who drew the frontiers after conquering Kano in 1900), will hold together.

Nigerian politics has always involved a certain amount violence and bloodshed, so it would be over-optimistic not to expect some political skulduggery in the coming months.

But there will be no Congo here: the army and police are trained, as their British and Sandhurst-Graduate Nigerian officers, proudly chuff to march off a cliff if told to. Mutiny here is unthinkable.

But friends o Nigeria will have ingers crossed as Aria's twenty-ith nation, emerging in this most Aricanof years, sets to cope with the most African of modern problems: how to be "free" without sacrificing those fundamental liberties which we designate as democracy and which alone justify the long struggle for independence.

Nigeria Glides Peacefully Toward Full Freedom

LAGOS, Nigeria (AP)—The 36 million people of Nigeria, the most populous country in Africa, are gliding toward independence from Britain Saturday with ease and decorum.

Many of the literate are aware that the outside world may be asking if there is a chance that Nigeria might become a problem nation like the Congo.

The quick answer is that here there are few if any of the elements that kindled the Congo flames and spread conflicts and cross conflicts that have reached far into the world cold war and have threatened the very structure of the United Nations.

Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe Zike, who becomes the first Nigerian governor-General in November, says: "The chaos of the Congo has no chance of repeating itself in Nigeria."

He holds that view strongly "because we have been brought up in an orderly manner to appreciate the democratic way of life."

POLITICAL INEPTITUDE

Ever since it gained independence from Belgium June 30, the eyes of the world have been on the Congo, largest African country in area and among the richest. There they saw the tragedy of bloodshed, turmoil, mutinous troops completely out of control, disease and hunger, complete political ineptitude.

Can British-guided Nigeria prove to the world that it can succeed where the former Belgian administered Congo failed?

Whereas, as one embittered observer said, Congolese wandered aimlessly around "like a bunch of accidents looking for a place to happen," the Nigerians, with considerable experience of government behind them, seem to be setting about their independence tasks with resolute purpose.

In Nigeria there has been none of the constitutional rush that hurtled the Congo into independence after anti-white rioting at the beginning of 1959.

LONG PREPARATIONS

For years, Britain and the Nigerians have been preparing constitutionally for independence, often at a pace that disappointed nationalist extremists.

The preparations—while by no means complete because there still are many British officers in the public service—are remarkably advanced compared to the Congo. There are smiles, not sullenness. The security forces are friends of the people, not enemies. The army confines itself to strictly military duties and, unlike the Congo, is only occasionally used to quell riots. The police go about unarmed. When they arrest a man he is led away quietly.

Nigeria, about four times the size of Britain, sprawls across 372,647 square miles from the Gulf of Guinea in the south to the Sahara in the north.

DISTINCT REGIONS

From south to north there are four distinct physical regions. Along the coastline is swamp and mangrove forest, at places up to 60 miles wide, sparsely populated and almost undeveloped. There follows a belt of tropical rain forest and oil palm bush 50 to 100 miles wide, criss-crossed by rivers and streams. This gives way to a 300-mile wide area of open woodland and grass savannah, shading off into a large undulating plateau, with occasional hills, which finally is replaced by the sandy tracts of the southern Sahara.

Of the country's 36 million population, 19.5 million live in the northern region, about seven millions in western Nigeria, eight millions in the east and nearly a million in the Southern Cameroons, administered by Nigeria.

Whites number 27,000—Britons, Lebanese, Syrians, French and Americans.

A Patio in Nigeria

The Christian Science Monitor
Boston, Mass.

"Do come over some weekend soon," I wrote my sister and her family six thousand miles away. "Our patio is at last finished!"

While we scarcely looked for their acceptance, it would have been wise to examine a calendar of Nigerian seasons before issuing the invitation. We were enthusiastic but ignorant newcomers, so remained oblivious to warnings that on the heels of these idyllic dry days stalked six months of relentless rain.

Apartment dwelling had long aggravated a hunger for an outdoors of our own in which to stretch and enjoy the sun. After arriving on the new school compound, we rejoiced to discover our comfortable bungalow whose back yard extended deep into the bush. These senior tutor quarters had been thoughtfully situated above and apart from the classrooms and dormitories. All of the buildings, erected on a slight rise, overlooked a valley of palms, iroko, bamboo and umbrella trees. Behind our house the sloping land climbed gently, an apparently harmless whim of nature—ideal, we thought, for our outdoors.

Students enrolled in large numbers, as the young school progressed. We watched dedicated men clear and build in almost impenetrable bush, driven by the powerful motive of expanding education. But the completion of our comparatively insignificant septic tank behind the bathrooms seemed to drag on endlessly. Week after week, resplendent days and twilights wasted away while we yearned to be enjoying our patio. Comfortable lounge chairs were waiting to replace the yawning excavation which had so long confronted us. We pictured ourselves there after school, acquiring a bit of tan and, later on, cooling off under the stars.

Ultimately a monumental effort concluded the back-yard plumbing activities. Stones, timber and heaps of rubbish were carried away, magically transforming the ugly area. So onto this brick-red surface we hastily planted the chairs. Clad in a modest sun suit and large straw hat, I seated myself with an armful of books and papers. While plowing through the grammatical errors to which small Nigerian pupils are prone, I was startled by voices from the nearby path. A group of villagers had spotted the onyeocha (white woman) apparently enjoying the midday heat. "With a little good sense," they doubtless reasoned, "she might be taking a pleasant siesta in the shade!"

They found it difficult to understand the stranger purposely exposing herself to this unnecessary torture. While nature has provided them with a hardy skin pigment resistant to high temperatures, an African is never found "cultivating the sun." I was discovering time and again that what passes as customary behavior in my own land thoroughly puzzled the villagers. Chances were that this would provide a bewildering morsel of conversation in the market stalls.

* * *

The path behind our bungalow, winding diagonally through the palm forest, had been traversed for generations by their forefathers. Now that the land had become a busy school compound, it wasn't easy diverting them to new routes. These people, like most, are not given to sudden changes. After all, why make the longer trek by road, when one could carry the cumbersome headloads and waterpots across the short cut? With uninhibited curiosity the crowd of friendly, laughing folk was drawing closer. What better chance would they find to examine the pointed features, brown hair and unfamiliar clothes of this foreigner?

When ajar, our back door opens abruptly without either porch or steps. While laundering clothes or washing my hair, I noticed that the village women often halted to cast an evaluating eye at my peculiar methods. They seemed fascinated by the bizarre utility room festooned with the uncommon array of our few modern gadgets.

Stretched out upon my long chair in front of this colorful backdrop, I discovered myself the lone performer before an engrossed audience. Waving and smiling several hearty welcomes, I turned again to the red pencil. Sitll my audience continued to point and stare . . . there was no reason to hurry on!

Here a jangling telephone never demands a retreat into the house. Unless a student pulls the rope on our front door bell, or my husband calls from his books, I remain undisturbed outdoors. Having finally completed the work, I arose to go. With my most precise pronunciation of "Ka'emesia" (Ibo for good-by) and a cordial gesture, I wandered into the house. Inside, through a half-closed shutter, I could see the noisily chattering crowd reluctantly pursuing their way to the stream.

* * *

As the weather worsened we read and studied inside, close to the open windows. A corps of laborers, carrying sand and equipment, was completing an adjacent building. Circling out of their way to pass directly in front of the shutters, each day they candidly lingered to peer in at the new tutors. Our own interest in observing and photographing our neighbors must no doubt have appeared equally inquisitive to the Nigerians.

Nonetheless, it shortly became desirable to arrange a small area of back-yard privacy. In this vicinity mud bricks, bamboo poles, or dried palm fronds are used to construct a temporary solution. Undertaking a temporary solution ourselves, we decided upon a shoulder-high fence. Circling our patio with raffia mats, secured against the wind by a taut rope. After our adjusting the mats in uncertain weather obliged our moving serving and clearing to divert excessive water. The day they were many urgent school projects, far outranking our fence, should have weighed, prompted the digging of several run-off ditches inside the building. Occasional showers, a warning we were properly began to justify its name!

Our patio added a touch of luxury. The patio flowers are a pot of exhausted after this night. Considerably and again a privacy. In this vicinity mud bricks, bam-eral stools, and now and daily lifting and hauling, we regretted also that such a small pocket of space was provided. Despite the rigors involved, we agreed that our restful, undisturbed hours were worth any struggle.

But it wasn't long before we faced head-on the realities of equatorial weather. Punishing torrents lightened and thundered onto the zinc roof from early morning well into the night. Then after this downpour, three successive days of scorching sunshine dried and elevated our spirits. With dauntless naïvété we lugged out the mats once more only to be at last duly and irrevocably humbled by the elements.

Following a night-long cloudburst, the morning presented us with a shattering picture. Our bungalow was in the path of a churning river of muddy, red water gushing from the hilly growth above us. As the rain continued, floods leapt over the drain ditches, swept mercilessly across the patio, around the house, down the driveway and past the tennis court. Nothing deflected this deluge until its waters reached the soccer field two hundred yards away. Deep gullies of erosion streaked the surface of our yard. Enormous branches and litter from the bush smothered the smoothly raked ground.

Several such months stretch ahead of us. But undoubtedly when the dry season approaches once more we shall repair the dilapidated patio. Toasting ourselves under the sun while we steal a few minutes for reading and correspondence will tempt us as before. If I know my husband he will again drag out the mats and chairs.

We are tenacious in the hope, however, that a permanent wall will then encircle our land. In any case, by that time we should have learned to adapt our outdoor living to the inexorable seasons of the African tropics.

Nigeria's First African Governor Will Be "Zik"

LAGOS, Nigeria—(ANP) It has definitely been ascertained that Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, 56-year-old President of the Nigerian Senate, and leader of the National Council and the Cameroons, will be Nigeria's first African governor-general.

According to the British Colonial office, Prime Minister Sir Abubaker Tafewa Dalewa intends to recommend Zik to Queen Elizabeth for the post, and the Queen in turn, has signified favorable approval.

Thus, world wide speculation on which of four or five suggested candidates would be tapped for the post seems to have been resolved.

NNAMDI ASIKIWE
President Of Senate

"Zik" To Friends

Dr. Azikiwe, familiarly and fondly known as "Zik", has for many years been a recognized leader in West African affairs, and particularly in Nigeria, as perhaps the most outstanding figure in politics. He is credited with being the foremost proponent for freedom, not only of Nigeria, but of all Africa.

BORN NOV. 16, 1906 at Zungeru, Northern Nigeria, he was educated at mission schools in Onitsha, Calabar and Lagos. He came to the United States in 1925 and studied at Lincoln (Pa.) University and the University of Pennsylvania, from which he obtained the M. A. degree in philosophy, and the M. S. in anthropolgy. He also holds honorary doctorates in law and literature.

From September, 1930, to June, 1934, he was instructor in political science at Lincoln University (Pa.)

IN 1934, HE began his journalistic career in Ghana (then the Gold Coast colony). He returned to Nigeria in 1937 and established five newspapers—The West African Pilot, Lagos; Eastern Nigeria Guardian, Port Harcourt; Southern Nigeria Defender, Ibadan; Nigerian Spokesman, Onitsha; and the Daily Comet, Kano. This was in addition to other business enterprises.

In the interim, he published several articles and pamphlets dealing with Africa's place in world affairs, and the political and economic reconstruction of Nigeria.

cal career which was destined by the middle of November this year to put him in the seat of governor-general of the Nigerian federation.

Five years later, in January, 1952, when a new constitution went into effect, he became the first leader of the Opposition party (National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons) in the Western House of Assembly. He resigned his seat in July 1952, to contest for a seat in the Eastern House of Assembly. He won and was elected a member from Onitsha in January, 1954.

First Premier

When the present federal constitution came into being on Oct. 1, 1954, Dr. Azikwe, became the first Premier of Eastern Nigeria.

FOLLOWING the federal elections held last December, in which Zik was elected to the federal House of Representatives, he was named president of the Senate.

Up to now, it had been rumored that four other leading Nigerian personalities were in the running for the governor-generalship — Sir Adetokunbo Ademolá, chief justice of the Federal Supreme Court; Sir Ahmadu Bello, the Sarduano of Sokoto, Sir Muhammadu Sanusi, Emir of Kano; and the Alake of Abeokuta, Sir Ladapo Ademola, father of the Nigerian Supreme Court Chief Justice.

African fight to go underground

(Special To AFRO)

LAGOS, Nigeria — Word received here, this week from violence-torn Union of South Africa is that the opponents of the racist government of Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd have decided to go underground with their fight for freedom.

This report was confirmed by a statement attributed to Mangalisco Sobukwe, president of the Pan African Congress, outlawed last week by the government.

Sobukwe, a former university instructor, is reported to have told newsmen of plans to take the freedom fight underground.

* * *

HE WAS INTERVIEWED during the trial in Johannesbury of 23 African leaders accused of stirring up incitement which led to the demonstrations against passes.

Since the initial arrests, hundreds of other African leaders also have been taken into custody by South African police, national guardmen and reservists.

Since the initial arrests, hundreds of other African leaders also have been taken into custody by South African police, national guardsmen and reservists.

In addition to the Pan African Congress, which has a membership of over 31,000, the African National Congress also was banned under the so-called national emergency act which the Verwoerd government rammed through Parliament.

* * *

TYPICAL OF the rising fury which the brutality of the of the government has generated in countries throughout the world was the attitude expressed here by Prime Minister Alhaji Sir Abubaker Tafawa Balewa.

The Prime Minister told newsmen that if Nigeria were strong enough, the government would send a military force to fight the white -supremacy government of South Africa.

He said there is little reason to hope that the suppressed Africans would be strong enough in the near future to overthrow the entrenched power of the white rulers.

He compared the African freedom fighters to those of Hungary who were crushed during that uprising by the armed might of the Russians.

The Afro-American

THE NIGERIAN PREMIER also expressed dissatisfaction with the stand taken by the United States.

"It (the U.S.) has not been forceful enough," Sir Abubakar declared.

Sat. 4-16-60

He also termed the United Nations' handling of the issue "weak."

"If the United Nations can not force out apartheid, then what is the use of it?" he asked. "Apartheid is not a domestic affair."

* * *

Meanwhile, in South Africa David Pratt, a white farmer, is being held on charges of attempting to kill Verwoerd.

According to a news dispatch out of Johanesburg, the South African Prime Minister was shot twice last Friday afternoon following a speech at an exposition.

He was beaten and jailed. As he was taken away, he was quoted as saying: "God help me." Verwoerd is one of the major architects of the government's aparthied policy which caused the current uprising in that country.

First African To Be Named Governor in British Colonial Territory

To Take Office On July 1

Fri. 6-10-60

IBADAN, Nigeria.—(ANP)—Effective as of July 1, the Western Region of Nigeria will become the first British colonial territory in Africa to have an African as its governor.

This precent-shattering event was made known by the British Colonial Office recently, in announcing that Sir Adesoji Aderemi, 71-year-old Oni of Ife, had been named with the approval of Queen Elizabeth, successor to Sir John Rankin, British governor whose term expires at the end of June.

Though the first African in British colonial history to become governor, Sir Adesoji, however, follows in the footsteps of the late Adolph Felix Sylvestre Eboue, who during World War II was governor-general of the 912,049 square mile French Equatorial Africa.

Eboue, who died May 17, 1944, was a native of Cayenne, French Guiana, whose career in French colonial administration was so outstanding that he was secretary-general and acting governor of Martinique, acting governor of French Sudan, and governor of Guadeloupe and Chad. He became governor-general of French Equatorial Africa in November, 1940, and served until his retirement in March, 1944.

Sir Adesoji, son of Prince Ocundeyi of the royal house of Ife, and Madam Adekunbi, was born in November, 1889. Educated in schools at Ife, he was for a time a staff member of the former Nigerian Railways. He resigned and returned to Ife to become a trader.

He was installed as Oni of Ife on Sept. 2, 1931, and the following year founded Oduduwa college at Ife, a well known secondary school in the Western Region.

In 1946, he became a member of the Western House of assembly, and in 1951 was named to the Western House of Chiefs, and later as member of the House of Representatives. In 1952, he was named president of the Western House of Chiefs, a post which he still holds.

One of the leading Obas and holder of one of the highest traditional titles in Nigeria, he is chairman of the Conference of Western Region Obas and Chiefs, as well as president of the recently formed Council of Obas and Chiefs,, which advise the Western government on matters affecting the conduct and welfare of Obas and Chiefs in the region.

He was also a member of the defunct Cocoa Marketing board and the Nigerian Produce Marketing Co., Ltd.

Married, he is the father of several children.

Delegates Of 90 Nation's Due For Freedom Fete

By ADEMOLA ILUYMADE

LAGOS, Nigeria — The answer and explanation is "Independence only comes once!"

These words explain the feverish preparations here for the Independence celebration which will begin on Oct. 1 the day Nigeria is to become an independent country.

One of the highlights of the observation is to be the national exhibition: "Nigeria Today and Tomorrow."

* * *

THE TOTAL cost of the exhibit at 1,000,000 pounds starting, slightly over $4,000,000.

The most extensive part of the exhibition will be the trade section which will include the statutory corporations and companies trading in the Federation of Nigeria.

There will be a limited number of shell stands provided by the Federal Government for small traders in a pavilion. Many exhibitors have already planned to design their own buildings and displays on extensive plots in the open.

Overseas manufacturers will have displays in conjuction with their local agents, but overseas manufactures not established in the Federation will have no displays.

* * *

THE EXHIBITION will be open free of charge to the general public for three weeks during the Idnepnedence celebrations. It will enable thousands of foreigners who will visit Nigeria at the time to see astonishing progress which Nigeria has achieved and hopes to achieve in the next few years.

The Exhibition sites are to be decorated particularly with the national flag of Nigeria. The design of the National flag has been approved by the Federal Government. Three and a half million have been ordered for free distribution to school children.

The flag is divided vertically into three equal parts. The centre part is white and the two outer parts are green. The green represents agriculture and the white unity and peace.

Satisfaction has been expressed over the constitutional talks between Nigeria and the United Kingdom which was held in London recently and during which the final drafts for Nigerian Independence were signed by the Governments of both countries.

* * *

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH, London, described the manner in which Nigeria and Britain have reached agreement on the former, forthcoming Independence as a model act of statecraft and editorialized that while Britain is losing a Colony, she is gaining "a powerful new African friend."

This conservative London paper stated:

"There has been no struggle for Independence—merely a mutual readjustment conducted on both sides with gentlemanly restraint and every sign of mutual goodwill. Both countries can justifiably claim great credit for a model act of statecraft."

The Manchester Guardian stated the agrrement that Britain would not seek to establish any military bases in Nigeria and that no land would be leased either to Britain or any other country for military purposes.

This represents considerable victory for those Nigerians who were determined that there should be no single "secret agreement" on defense which might lead to misunderstanding after Nigeria becomes independent.

* * *

THE PAPER STATED: "Tribute should be paid to Chief Obafemi Awolowo, leader of the Opposition, for so couragiously warning the people against impending dangers implicit in the secret Heads of Agreement For Defense pact initiated in 1958."

The "Guardian" went on: "In fact, the plan that now seems likely to be followed is that Nigeria will go ahead with the setting up of a Ministry of Defense arrangements.

More than 90 countries, including the United States and the Soviet Union, will send delegations to the Independence celebrations.

Also, the Pope plans to send a delegation to represent the Vatican City. The Archbishop of Conteburg also is sending a delegation.

* * *

NUMEROUS HEADS of states will be included among the visitors.

Dr. Kwame Nkrumah will represent the Ghana Republic; President William Tubman, Liberia; Sir Milton Marga, prime minister, Sierra Leone; Col. Abdul Nasser, the United Arab Republic.

From the United States, both Paul Robeson and Louis Armstrong have been invited.

All former Governors and other top Administrators who had served in Nigeria are also expected in the country for the celebrations.

Lord Milverton, Sir John Macpherson, Sir John Rankine and Sir Hugh Foot, now Governor in Cyprus, are known to have been invited to attend the celebrations in which round-the-clock fire works, native dances and a West African Games will feature prominently.

"Great Day"...October 1 Nigerian Independence

Atlanta, Ga. Sat. 7/23/60

By WILLIAM A. FOWLKES

Everybody in Nigeria is waiting on the "Great Day"—October 1, when this large African nation achieves independence within the British commonwealth, a member of the Nigerian House of Representatives and labor union leader said in Atlanta Friday.

He was the Honorable Adolphus Mbah, of the Eastern Region, and secretary-general of Shell-BP Workers Union, the largest labor organization of the region.

Visiting Atlanta business and educational enterprises during his nationwide State department sponsored tour, Mbah said that Nigeria may have some difficulty with one member of the British Commonwealth — South Africa, since Nigerians are opposed to racial segregation in any form and fashion.

"My people believe in a parliamentary system of democratic government," Mr. Mbah said. He foresaw, however, that the young nation would be faced with many decisions, both foreign and domestic, after becoming independent. He promised that Nigerians would not mortgage their conscience to the morally wrong side in the world struggle.

The Nigerian leader arrived in the United States on July 3 and will leave on September 17. He has visited Washington and Nashville. From Atlanta, the tour will proceed to Los Angeles, San Francisco, Denver, Chicago, Detroit and back to Washington.

The visitor has been thrilled with the outward expressions toward domestic issues in America.

"Part of our obligation upon becoming free," Mr. Mbah observed, "will be to repair the damages which the Negro image has suffered everywhere."

The visitor had praise for William Gordon, U. S. Information Service official in Eastern Nigeria and former member of the editorial staff of the Atlanta Daily World. Mr. Mbah said that Gordon has made friends with many people at his Enugu, Eastern Nigeria regional headquarters, and sent regards to friends here.

Nigeria Provides Contrast to Congo

By Peter Lyne

Parliamentary Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Christian Science Monitor London

There is a brighter side at this very moment to Africa and colonial disengagement operations. In contrast to the Congo troubles, the British House of Commons has been giving second readings to two bills providing independence for Nigeria and Cyprus.

When Colonial Secretary Iain Macleod introduced the Nigeria independence bill July 15, he said it was a thoroughly happy occasion. The Labor Opposition concurred. The House as a whole felt privileged to be taking the final stage of what has proved to be one of the less troublesome colonial disengagement operations.

This is all the more gratifying because Nigeria, with its 34,000,000 citizens, is the most populous state in Africa. In other words the biggest is giving the least trouble.

Passage Expected

On the other hand Cyprus was for six years one of Britain's bitterest colonial issues. But the bill to give Cyprus independence on Aug. 16 was given an unopposed second reading in the Commons on the night of July 14. It is confidently expected to pass through all its stages before the British parliamentary recess begins July 29.

It has been announced in London this week that the British Government will send a well-known figure in the political world as its first high commissioner (the term used within the Commonwealth for ambassadors) to Nigeria. He is Anthony Head, former Conservative Defense Minister. He will become a Viscount before assuming his new position.

This is welcomed insofar as it shows Britain recognizing the importance of Nigeria's future by choosing one of its more eminent citizens to go there as London's first representative.

Nigeria is seen from here as moving with almost majestic calm toward full statehood on Oct. 1 of this year. The three regions of the federation have already become independent. Nigeria, in short, is poised to become Africa's greatest democratic state.

There are plenty of problems ahead. Colonial Secretary Macleod touched on a few of them when he introduced the Nigeria independence bill July 15.

Diversity Noted

Mr. Macleod reminded the Commons that Nigeria was extraordinarily diverse in race, religion, and social and economic development, so it was not surprising that the political development it had chosen was that of a federation in three regions with each region self-governing.

He said naturally the federal government would have responsibility for defense, security, and external affairs, together with matters affecting the whole of the country including the federal territory of the capital of Lagos.

He said each region would have its own judiciary and would reflect differences of custom and practice in the different parts of the country. There would be safeguards, however: the right of appeal to the federal Supreme Court and beyond that to the judicial committee of the Privy Council.

Code of Rights

Another important point of unity would be the acceptance of a code of fundamental human rights embodied in both federal and regional constitutions.

Mr. MacLeod said he was glad Nigeria had made such good progress already in training its civil service and in following the British practice of insulating the service from politics through an executive public service commission.

He recalled that Nigeria had shown it wanted to remain in the Commonwealth. It had been agreed too that Britain and Nigeria should enter into an agreement on defense after independence day.

Cameroons Issue

Mr. Macleod said perhaps the most difficult matter outstanding, though not directly concerned with the bill, was the question of the Cameroons.

The position now, he said, was that the Northern Cameroons, as the result of the recent plebiscite, had to be separated as of Oct. 1 and administered directly by Britain from that date until another plebiscite could be held. This would take place in February, 1961, when the choice would be whether to join Nigeria or the newly independent Cameroons.

In the case of the Southern Cameroons there would be a plebiscite probably at the same time and with the same questions.

Nigerian ministers had promised that if the people should decide to return to Nigeria, the Southern Cameroons would have the status of a separate region.

Mr. MacLeod declared that there was no basis to the suggestion sometimes made that Britain had an ambition to set up a base in Nigeria.

He ended, "I am convinced the world will be a better place for the emergence of Nigeria in its own sovereign right as a country and I rejoice that this great country in complete friendship with us is going now to take its place on the stage of world affairs."

Opposition Labor spokesmen supported the bill.

KING OF NIGERIA HAS ROYAL TREAT

But Regally Attired Premier Finds All Is Not Gold in Shopping Spree Here

By GAY TALESE

"King! Oh, King," a lady in Rockefeller Center called yesterday,, running breathlessly with an autograph book toward a tall, turbaned man in a damask gown, his head and chin ringed in a red polka-dot scarf designed to keep out sand. As a matter of fact, people all over Manhattan were mistaking him for a king. But he was the Prime Minister of Northern Nigeria, Alhaji Sir Ahmadu Bello, the Sardauna of Sokoto, who is now touring the United States. And when he and his half-dozen dazzling companions visited Macy's, they acted like any other group of bargain-hunters.

They bought eight watches, three transistor radios, stamp albums and luggage, and spent $607 in barely an hour. The sales girls made their slips out to "King of Nigeria," undeterred by the fact that Nigeria has no king. But they were careful not to charge the dignitaries any local or state tax, although the Nigerians freely flipped $100 bills around.

"Have you a brief case?" the Sardauna asked.

"Yes, here's an attaché case like American business men use," said a salesman.

"I'm not an American business man," the Sardauna said. "I wish a case with a combination lock."

"We may have some up on the . . ."

Then the Sardauna, flanked by Alhaji Sir Muhammandu Sanusi, Emir of Kano, was led to the fabrics department.

"Something in brocade?" a sales lady asked.

"Bright! Bright," the Sardauna said. "Gold."

They looked for five minutes then gave up.

"Nothing bright enough," one sales girl whispered to another, with a raised eyebrow.

"We have nice transistor radios, the salesman said, as the entourage approached. "Red, green, gold."

At "gold" the Sardauna eyes lit up. Then his eyes caught the sight of a small boy behind a counter taking his photograph with a box camera.

"I think so," said 12-year-old Richard Sberlati of Flushing.

"If it comes out, you send it to me," he said. "I'll become your overseas friend." An aide gave the Sardauna's card to the boy.

"I'll take another picture," the boy said, gleefully.

By noon the Nigerians, who will begin their eighteen-day tour of America and Canada today in Washington, were out of Macy's and riding four air-conditioned Cadillacs back to the Waldorf-Astoria. It had been a hectic morning.

At 9:30 they had been taken on a tour of Rockefeller Plaza —the Sardauna's third since he arrived in New York Tuesday. He was escorted most of yesterday morning by a Pembroke College girl, Irina Evans, a summer guide at the center.

Special to The New York Times.

LAGOS, Nigeria, Aug. 20—Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa said today an independent Nigeria would discourage any attempts to force African tribals groups to merge.

The Prime Minister outlined to the House of Representatives the principles that would govern Nigeria's policy after the territory gains independence from Britain in October. He said the present boundaries of African states within Nigeria should remain until the people themselves wanted a merger or a union.

He said Nigeria would help any African country to find solutions for its problems and would foster the growth of understanding among all nations, particularly the new ones in Africa.

He said Nigeria would join the British Commonwealth, but select its own policies.

ACCRA, Ghana, Aug. 20—Togo and Dahomey, two newly independent republics lying between Ghana and Nigeria, are forming "a complete economic union."

According to reports received here they have decided to create a commission at a ministerial level to study economic problems.

MRS. ONUEKWUHE SOFALA
New Nigerian bride

Nigerian bride plans return to Africa to fulfill dream

BY ROSEMARIE TYLER

When you enter the Nigerian Chancellery on Connecticut Ave., you will see Mrs. Onuekwuhe Sofala (pronounced show-fa-la). She is quite pretty. She will generally be wearing her own African dress. Her accent is somewhat French.

Mrs. Sofala has been in this country for the past six years as a student. But, what is more important, she is a bride of less than a month! And as she admits this, her eyes just sparkle and her pretty (cosmetic free) face becomes prettier!

While Mrs. Sofala and her Nigerian husband were married in a Christian ceremony, the traditional Nigerian ceremony is quite different. Great emphasis is put on the engagement party. Here, both families come together for feasts, gifts and the dowry arrangement is made. In the old days, the dowry was generally an animal exchange. Now, of course, money is the medium of exchange.

* * *

WHILE THE engagement party is held at the girl's home, the marriage ceremony is held at the prospective bridegroom's home. Generally, the engagement period is very short. Once married, the two young people still feel a responsibility toward their parents.

There is no "mother-in-law problem" as such in Nigeria. "It is only right that we take care of our parents," says Mrs. Sofala. "We do not view this as an imposition, it is only right."

Much of, it not all of Northern Nigeria, is Moslem. In the South, the Christian religion dominates. Mrs. Sofala explained that her husband's Christian name was Johnson.

It seems that the Christian missionaries were too inept or indifferent to the African dialect, so each convert was given an anglicized name. Thus, the missionaries were able to keep track of their new converts. "Much of the resentment against the white missionaries stems from this very act," says the pretty new bride.

* * *

WHEN MRS. SOFALA and her husband, Adeyemi Sofala Johnson return to Nigeria, she will be active with the new National Theatre the government is building. "I much prefer directing rather than acting," she says firmly. She is currently studying drama at Catholic University.

This sensitive young matron is quite proud of the women of her country. We are beginning to take an active interest in politics!" And how do the men feel about suffrage? "Well, they will have to get used to it, I fear. As our country continues to grow, more of our women will become an integral part of the political life of my country," she said.

Mrs. Sofala is quite sure of this. She continued, "It was much the same for the women of your country," she pointed out. "But," she says with a smile, "I think we Nigerians have moved faster in a shorter period of time than your women."

* * *

WHEN YOU MEET Mrs. Onuekwuhe Sofala, it is easy to understand why Nigerian women are moving so fast. Mrs. Sofala is friendly, quick-witted, intelligent and full of purpose. She is anxious to return home to help Nigeria fulfill its potentialities.

Mrs. Sofala typifies her country and most particularly, the women of Nigeria.

TO WORK WITH COMMITTEE

Nigeria Hopes Ties With U. S. Increase

Premier Tells Desire To Benefit From American Experience

By The Associated Press

Lagos, Nigeria, Oct. 2. — Newly independent Nigeria wants her friendship with the United States to become stronger, Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa said Sunday.

He gave this assurance to Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller when the latter, with other members of the U. S. delegation to Nigerian independence celebrations, called on Balewa to present a personal message and a gift from President Eisenhower.

Acknowledging that Nigeria has a long way to go to become fully developed, Balewa told the American delegates:

"With the good will of friends like the United States and the United Kingdom we hope to draw on your experience. We Nigerians are friends of the United States. There is no doubt about it. We want that friendship to become stronger."

Says U. S. Visit A Turning Point In His Life

The Prime Minister disclosed that his 1955 visit to the United States was one of the turning points of his life. Until then, he said, he had not believed that Nigeria, with its different peoples, languages, and religions, could become united.

"But when I saw people of every national origin and race living together in unity and pride above all in their American citizenship, I said in a Washington hotel room that night, 'If all these people within 200 years can completely forget their ancestral homes, there is no reason Nigeria cannot become a united country.' Today I have the chance and henceforth will work for the unity of Nigeria."

Eisenhower's message said: "My country has noted with admiration the statesmanship exhibited by you and other Nigerian leaders in guiding your nation through the successive stages leading to independence, and we congratulate Nigeria for having attained this goal in harmony and friendship with the United Kingdom."

Eisenhower's personal gift was a glass vase engraved with the seal of the U. S. President. America's official independence gift to Nigeria is a supply of books, library furnishings, and films and projection equipment for the Institute of International Studies which the Federal Government plans to establish.

Earlier, the leader of the new African nation's parliamentary opposition, Chief Obafemi Awolowo declared: "There will be no Congo in Nigeria."

Awolowo, federal president of the Action Group opposition party in this newest of the world's independent nations, told a news conference he did not think anyone in Nigeria wanted trouble.

"There will be no Congo in Nigeria," he emphasized. "Nigeria will continue to be stable."

Power For Peace, Nigeria Declares

Jackson Daily News Jackson, Miss. Sun. 10-2-60

LAGOS, Nigeria (AP)—Nigeria—Africa's most populous nation—attained independence Saturday and proclaimed itself at once as a power for peace on the troubled continent.

Drums boomed through the day and tin lids pounded out the time for dancing, but churches, chapels and mosques were crowded with persons giving thanks.

Federal Premier Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa said Nigeria must "at once be ready to deal with grave international issues."

"This fact has of recent months been unhappily emphasized by the startling events which have occurred in this continent," he said. "We are called upon immediately to show that our claims to rsponsible government are well founded."

"Having been accepted as an independent state, we must at once play an active part in maintaining the peace of the world and in preserving civilization,' he added.

His bold statement as chief of Nigeria's foreign affairs came in a morning ceremony under a warm tropical sun while 20,000 Nigerians cheered.

Princess Alexandra, representing Britain's Queen Elizabeth II, handed over to the premier the constitutional documents embodying independence and self-rule for Nigeria's 36 million people. She read a message from the queen welcoming Nigeria as a free and sovereign state into the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Friday midnight Britain's Union Jack was lowered, and the green-and-white Nigerian banner raised in its place. It marked the end of 99 years of British rule.

Some 40,000 boisterous Nigerians watched the ceremony and swept cheering through this capital city which once served as the headquarters for slave traders.

Nigeria soon will become the 99th member of the United Nations and already has announced it is sending soldiers to join the U.N. force in the Congo.

NIGERIA GANGS BURN AND LOOT

The Times-Picayune New Orleans, La. Sun. 10-2-60

Marauding Crowds Sweep Benue Province

LAGOS, Nigeria (UPI)—Marauding gangs Thursday were reported looting and burning villages in Benue province of northern Nigeria despite an official police statement that the situation now was "quiet."

At least 30 persons have been killed and 4555 persons arrested during the rioting which has been rampant for the past month in Benue and the remote Wukari and Tive districts following differences between supporters of the action group-Bornu Youth Movement Alliance and the ruling Northern People's Congress (NPC).

Telephoned reports from Wukari said police were using planes to track down the gangs who were still rioting.

Other reports from Tive stressed that white persons had not been involved in the flareups.

Party leaders of both groups have been trying to cool tempers of their members but while the outbreak has been contained, it has continued for more than four weeks. Observers doubted that the disturbances would spread.

The semi-feudal north, a Moslem stronghold in this former British colony which will get its independence Saturday, has long been noted for its fierce political passions.

Nigeria, or parts of it, had been under British rule for 100 years. Its transition to independence is generally expected to be orderly, in contrast to the troubles that beset the former Belgian Congo. It is expected to become the 99th member of the United Nations within a few days.

Nigerian foreign affairs and relations with the British Commonwealth are to be handled by Prime Minister Tafawa Balewa. The step is seen as a sign of his determination to keep Nigeria's foreign policy stable—thus ensuring continuance of the cordial relations already existing with the United Kingdom.

Balewa is a quiet leader who seems to have both feet solidly on the ground.

Nigeria celebrates new independence

BY ROBERT N. LINDSAY

LAGOS, Nigeria, Oct. 1—(AP)—Nigeria, the most populous country in Africa, boisterously celebrated its independence Saturday.

Cheering throngs took over this capital, once the hangout of slave traders, as Britain's Union Jack was lowered and the new green and white flag of Nigeria was raised over the nation of 36 million people precisely at midnight.

THE SYMBOLIC ACT heralding independence was performed before 40,000 sweating Nigerians at Lagos Race Track 99 years after Britain annexed Lagos and two years after London told the Nigerian Parliament the country could have its freedom by asking for it. The country remains in the British Commonwealth.

Watching the throng in its rainbow of flowing robes and headdress were Princess Alexandra, Queen Elisabeth's representative, New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, who represented President Eisenhower, and the diplomats of 57 other nations.

Rockefeller, in a statement, said the United States does not expect Nigeria, or other newly independent nations of Africa, to be a "committed ally."

The United States, he said, wants Nigeria to serve its own interests, not "our interest or positions."

OBSERVERS SAID they did not expect that Nigeria's independence would be attended by the same pangs as those experienced by the Congo.

Nigeria has an educational system that has produced thousands of college graduates and which has two and one-half million children in schools, though only one in five Nigerians of primary school age are in classrooms.

It has 600 physicians and 544 lawyers. More than 37,000 of the government staff of over 39,000 are Nigerians.

Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, 48, who will head a delegation to New York when Nigeria, as expected, becomes the 99th member of the United Nations, is a quiet leader who is regarded by diplomats here as having his feet on the ground. The wealthy former teacher is reported determined to pursue an independent course but to keep cordial relations with Britain.

Nigeria Seeks Close U. S. Tie

LAGOS, Nigeria, Oct. 2 (AP) Newly independent Nigeria wants her friendship with the United States to become stronger, Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa said today.

He gave this assurance to Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller when the latter, with other members of the U. S. delegation to Nigerian independence celebrations, called on Balewa to present a personal message and a gift from President Eisenhower. Acknowledging Nigeria has a long way to go to become fully developed, Balewa told the American delegates:

"With the good will of friends like the United States and the United Kingdom we hope to draw on your experience. We Nigerians are friends of the United States. There is no doubt about it. We want that friendship to become stronger."

If at all possible, he said, Nigerians would like President Eisenhower to visit here—either as President or later as a private citizen. "He would be greatly welcomed. I am deeply touched by his work for the world, to which he has contributed to bring peace and stability. We have the highest respect and regard for him."

Earlier, the leader of the new African nation's parliamentary opposition, Chief Obafemi Awolowo declared: "There will be no Congo in Nigeria."

Awolowo, federal president of the Action Group opposition party, told a news conference he did not believe anyone in Nigeria wanted trouble. Then, sensing that the Nigerian and the international public wanted an assurance about the future from the opposition, Awolowo said:

"We want to live in peace to insure that Nigeria has an important place in Africa and in the world. Our natural resources must be exploited efficiently for the benefit of all our peoples."

Emerging countries like Nigeria must depend greatly on foreign capital and technical knowhow, he said, and cautioned that people with capital and technical assistance to offer will not go into disturbed countries. People with capital fled the turmoil of the Congo, which is now facing economic collapse, he added, and no Nigerian wants to see a repetition of that tragedy.

"There will be no Congo in Nigeria," he emphasized. "Nigeria will continue to be stable."

Awolowo's party holds 75 of the 312 seats in the House of Representatives, with 237 held by the two government coalition parties. Awolowo said the opposition would conduct its business constructively and constitutionally.

WASHINGTON (UPI)—President Eisenhower Saturday invited representatives from 16 newly-admitted members to the United Nations 15 African states and Cyprus- to meet with him at the White House next Friday, his 70th birthday anniversary.

The White House did not say as much, but President Eisenhower is known to be anixious to establish close relations with the new republics in hopes of keeping them out of the Communist camp. Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev has been making personal overtures to nearly all the nations.

The White House announced the invitations and guests list for the one-hour meeting a short while after the President conferred with Prime Minister Sir Abubaker Tafawa Balewa of Nigeria, Africa's newest and most populous nation.

Associate White House press secretary Ann Wheaton said the President had set up Friday's meeting so that he could personally meet the nations as newly-admitted members of the United Nations. The invitations covered the head of each delegation to the U.N., Miss Wheaton said, noting that in some cases this would mean the prime minister and in others the foreign minister.

CONGO TO BE ADDED

In addition, she said, a 17th nation - the Republic of the Congo will be added to the guest list if it has been seated at the U.N. by Friday. Miss Wheaton said the meeting will be held at 10:30 a. m. EDT in the President's office.

Invited were representatives from Senegal, the Mali Republic Ivory Coast, Niger, Upper Volta, Dahomey, Cameroun, Central African Republic, Chad, Republic of the Congo former French territory, Gabon, Somali Republic, Nigeria, Togo, Malgasy and Cyprus.

The President's meeting with the Nigerian prime minister was viewew as epscially significant since the United States is known to have high hopes that economically-blessed Nigeria will be able to assert a moderating influence for other newly-emerging African states.

After the one-hour meeting, Balewa told reporters he had invited Eisenhower to visit Nigeria and that he was hopeful the President would accept. Regarding the invitation, the tall Negro staesman said, "He has given me an answer. His answer indicates it might be possiible."

Informed souces said Eisenhower had agreed to go "after the beginning of 1961, if arrangements can be made." But the prime minister said he did not know whether it would be before the President's term ends Jan. 20 or after.

THE OCCASION also will mark the end of an era for 'Zik," one of Africa's greatest political messiahs, who has spent the past 20 years fighting the British colonial policy in Africa. The irony of it all is the fact that "Zik" will now be the head of state, appointed by Queen Elizabeth as her representative, since Nigeria is a full - fledged member of the British Commonwealth.

His appointment is a consolation to many who were disappointed when "Zik" failed to be named prime minister of the federation following the general elections last December. The National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons, of which "Zik" was the former leader, is a partner in the federal coaliton government.

MAKING IT a three - some for "Zik' on Wednesday will be the presentation of a universal brotherhood award to the new governor - general by Dr. Tomlinson D. Todd, president of Club International, and director of the "Americans All" radio program, which originates in Washington, D.C.

Dr. Todd, who studied with Azikiwe at Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, is attending the ceremonies as guest of the Nigerian government.

Nigeria Is Different

Editor's Note: Only months ago the name Katanga was known to few people. Today it has explosive meaning. The man who first anticipated its significance was Rene MacColl who now takes a look at another critical area in African Nigeria.

BY RENE MacCOLL

The pupils, with their jet-black, laughing faces, so full of anticipated happiness, so eager to be off on their own, are sure that they have own, are sure that they have done well in their exams. Are sure that they can from now on make out splendidly without the masters.

In booming, teeming Lagos, with all the frenzy of new, building which is in progress, the formidable traffic jams and the general air of excitement, the Nigerians are as friendly and as welcoming as ever they were.

* * *

AND THERE are no signs at all of the sort of unhappy exodus of Europeans which marked the Congo's independence.

By 1970 Nigeria will be the second Commonwealth country—and her present rulers are determined to remain within the Commonwealth—after Canada in oil production. New oil deposits have been proved recently.

Her other natural wealth includes palm oil, palm kernels, Cocoa, cotton, copra, hides, tin, and coal. There is an abundance of timber. And Nigeria produces over 95 per cent of a metal called columbite, which is essential in many manufacturing processes.

Who are the men who will be running Nigeria? They are—HER PRIME MINISTER Alkaji Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa. He is a satin-voiced, melancholy-eyed man of 48, dressed all in snowy white, from Moslem north.

* * *

* * *

* * *

THESE THREE represent the parts of the big tropical country, north, east, and west, which are inclined to be hostile to and suspicious of one another.

But, faced with the challenge of independence—and above all the necessity of doing better than such already independent black-faced "Joneses" as Ghana's Nkrunah, Guinea's Sekon-Toure, and the Congo's Lumumba, it is pretty certain that Nigeria will pull together in order to avoid hanging separately.

Britain's record in Nigeria is a model of enlightened colonialism. British administrators, legislators, school teachers, missionaries, medical officers and economic advisers have done a superb job.

Most important of all Britain has been working towards sovereignty for this big country for many years past. The Nigerians have been patiently and thoroughly trained to take over the responsibility (where the Congolese were not).

"I'm not at all surprised that the people in Britain and the other European countries should have been worried about what may happen here, and may fear that we could follow the example of the Congo. But all I ask is their sympathy.

* * *

ON OCTOBER 1 we won't magically become a better government than that of Britain, but we shall be running our own show for better or for worse.

"There may be some excitement. But given sympathy and understanding, things will settle down. Our relations with the United Kingdom just could not be better than they are and we want it to continue that way. The British hand-over is better conducted smoothly and in the best possible spirit."

Nigerian Plea: 'Wear Clothes'

By PETER LYNCH

LAGOS, Nigeria — (UPI) — With Nigerian independence just around the corner, government officials pleaded with natives Sunday to please wear clothes.

Abakaliki Province officials said it simply would not be dignified for nature-loving natives to wear in independence what they wore under British colonialism—exactly nothing.

Natives in other provinces have given up their altogether habit and have donned clothes. But in Abakaliki Province folks just won't wear even a fig leaf, much less a loin cloth.

Provincial Secretary J. W. Leach said Nigeria gets independence in 90 days and Abakaliki natives must get clothes in 30 days. After Aug. 1, any person found naked or scantily clothed will be prosecuted, Leach said.

Provincial commissioner Peter Onwe, one of the few clothed natives in the province, ordered all local government councils to ban nudity.

Other officials were asking all well dressed Nigerians to donate old trousers, dresses and coats to the needy folks of Abakaliki. They have collected more than 1,000 items of clothing, but have had no luck in getting the Abakaliki to accept the clothes.

This was not the first attempt to clothe the people of Abakaliki. In 1943 the government administration, the legislature and local newspapers boomed a massive campaign for dressing up the province. It wasn't exactly a success.

Azikiwe To Be Nigeria's First African Governor

LAGOS, Nigeria. — (ANP) — It has definitely been ascertained that Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, 56-year-old president of the Nigerian Senate and leader of the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons, will be Nigeria's first African governor-general.

According to the British Colonial office, Prime Minister Sir Abubaker Tafewa Belewa intends to recommend Zik to Queen Elizabeth for the post, and the Queen in turn, has signified favorable approval.

Thus, world-wide speculation on which of four or five suggested candidates would be tapped for the post seems to have been resolved.

He's "Zik" To Friends

Dr. Azikiwe, familiarly and fondly known as "Zik," has for many years been a recognized leader in West African affairs, and particularly in Nigeria, as perhaps the most outstanding figure in politics. He is credited with being the foremost proponent for freedom, not only of Nigeria, but of all Africa.

Born November, 16, 1903, at Zungeru, Northern Nigeria, he was educated at mission schools in Onitsha, Calabar and Lagos. He came to the United States in 1925, and studied at Lincoln (Pa.) university and the University of Pennsylvania, from which he obtained the M.A. degree in philosophy, and the M.S. in anthropology. He also holds honorary doctorates in law and literature.

From September, 1930, to June, 1934, he was instructor in political science at Lincoln university (Pa.).

In 1934, he began his journalistic career in Ghana (then the Gold Coast colony). He returned to Nigeria in 1937 and established five newspapers—The West African Pilot, Lagos; Eastern Nigeria Guardian, Port Harcourt; Southern Nigerian Defender, Ibadan; Nigerian Spokesman, Onitsha, and the Daily Comet, Kano. This was in addition to other business enterprises.

In the interim, he published several articles and pamphlets dealing with Africa's place in world affairs, and the political and economic reconstruction of Nigeria.

Starts Career In 1947

In 1947, he began a political career which was destined by the middle of November this year to put him in the seat of governor-general of the Nigerian federation.

Five years later, in January, 1952, when a new constitution went into effect, he became the first leader of the Opposition party (National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons) in the Western House of Assembly. He resigned his seat in July, 1952, to contest for a seat in the Eastern House of Assembly. He won and was elected a member from Onitsha in January, 1954.

First Premier In 1954

When the present federal constitution came into being on October 1, 1954, Dr. Azikiwe, became the first premier of Eastern Nigeria.

Following the federal elections held last December, in which Zik was elected to the federal House of Representatives, he was named president of the Senate.

Up to now, it had been rumored that four other leading Nigerian personalities were in the running for the governor-general ship—Sir Adetokunbo Ademola, chief justice of the Federal Supreme court; Sir Ahmadu Bello, the Sarduano of Sokoto; Sir Muhammadu Sanusi, Emir of Kano, and the Alake of Abeokuta, Sir Ladapo Ademola, father of the Nigerian Supreme Court Chief Justice.

London

This fine, upstanding man, largely American educated, is here for talks with British Government officials on the handover of power when Nigeria achieves complete independence on Oct. 1.

Dr. Azikiwe and his colorful colleagues in their flowing robes are a striking sight in London as they sweep around in their gleaming Rolls-Royces.

Responsibility Pledged

But it warms the heart of this mother country to hear the appreciative way the Nigerian leaders at this momentous stage in their history speak about their apprenticeship for freedom under British colonial rule.

With its 35,000,000 population, Nigeria is Africa's most populous country. And judged by the most responsible estimates here, there is going to be no repetition of the Congo troubles when Nigeria becomes independent.

Dr. Azikiwe has given an assurance on this in London. And Alhaji Abdul Maliki, who arrived here Sept. 19 to become Nigeria's High Commissioner (Ambassador) in Britain, underlined this assurance.

Mr. Abdul Maliki said, "No foreign blood has been shed during the struggle for our independence—and none will be shed after independence. We shall not fail Africa. We shall not disappoint the world."

Choice Indicated

Dr. Azikiwe, who is at present President of the Senate in Lagos, has not yet been appointed Governor General. But it has been officially indicated here that Queen Elizabeth II would be pleased to accept such an appointment. This is taken to mean that the appointment has been put forward by the Nigerian Government.

Dr. Azikiwe has made it clear here that when Nigeria is independent, it will apply for membership in the Commonwealth and for membership in the United Nations.

This reporter met Dr. Azikiwe, Mr. Abdul Maliki, and other Nigerians at a fine banquet they gave to members of the British and foreign press in London on Sept. 19.

The Nigerians here are making it clear that while they have no doubts about a smooth change-over to independence by their country, they are extremely anxious to have a fair press throughout the world.

This doesn't mean that they don't want criticism. They are ready to accept criticism and maybe benefit from it provided it is responsible, they say.

Dr. Azikiwe says Nigeria may make plenty of mistakes. But he looks at this possibility with the eye of a history student who has studied at Lincoln College, Ill., and the University of Pennsylvania, and knows all about the mistakes the old countries of the world made in their progress in democracy.

Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe
A pledge for Nigerians

There has been a tendency lately to decry democracy and say it is not suitable for the emerging countries of Asia and Africa. But Dr. Azikiwe and his colleagues speak warmly of the democracy they have learned from the British and from studying the democratic movements of other countries.

Dr. Azikiwe was known as one of the fiercest agitators against British colonialism. But he exhibits no bitterness today. When he arrived in London a week ago, he said the prospect of his becoming Governor General had made him humble.

Debt Acknowledged

The intention is for the present British Governor General, Sir James Robertson, to continue in his post till Nov. 15 before handing the post over to his Nigerian successor.

Speaking to the representatives of the press of the world here, Dr. Azikiwe said, "We must give credit to those who have enabled us to become democratic. We owe a debt to Britain for the imperishable tradition of law and respect for human dignity."

The Nigerians certainly got off to a good start with the British and foreign press in London. They provided a splendid banquet in London's plush Savoy Hotel. In the best Western style there were ample literature and glossy publications on Nigeria available for the newspaper representatives.

It was the traditional sort of state banquet with a stentorian-voiced toastmaster in red tail-coat dealing courageously with the unfamiliar African names.

We were even provided with copies of the words and music of the national anthem of the Federation of Nigeria. We didn't actualy sing it. But the feeling of friendship and good will toward the new nation of Nigeria was very marked.

Azikiwe To Become Nigeri Governor-General Nov. 1

Atlanta Daily World
Atlanta, Ga

LONDON (NNPA)—Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, 56, President of the Nigerian Senate, is to become Governor General of the Federation of Nigeria after the retirement of Sir James Robertson on November 15, it was learned Saturday.

Sun. 9-18-60

It was recently announced that Governor Robertson would continue until mid-November, after Nigeria becomes independent within the British Commonwealth on Oct. 1.

A British Colonial statement said the Prime Minister of the Nigerian Federation intended to recommend Dr. Azikiwe to the Queen for the office. It had been learned that, if such a recommendation were made after Nigerian independence, the Queen would be pleased to accept it.

This announcement would not have been made unless Dr. Azikiwe had already agreed to accept the appointment. The result will be that within a month and a half of becoming an independent member of the British Commonwealth, Nigeria will have an African of outstanding personality as Governor - General.

Thus, Dr. Azikiwe, among the first West African politcial leaders in the fight for independence and for decades a critic of the rate of progress in British colonial policy, will represent the Queen in Africa's biggest independent country.

After the Federal elections, his National Council, for Nigeria and the Cameroons went and formed a coalition to organize the Federal Government, without Dr. Azikiwe becoming a Federal Minister. The arrangement then was that he accepted the sinecure as President of the Senate.

The appointment is an indication of Nigeria's determination not to be distracted from its new and vital role in Africa by regional and tribal rivalries. In the past, as Premier of the Eastern Region and leader of the Ibo tribe, Dr. Azikiwe was considered as the pattern of the tribal political leader.

ISLAM ADVANCING IN WEST AFRICA

The N.Y. Times

Christians Worried by Gains —Simple Moslem Tenets Credited for Appeal

New York

Special to The New York Times.

LAGOS, Nigeria, Oct. 6—Christian missionaries say they are worried about the advance of Islam in West Africa.

They include the Anglican Bishop of Lagos, a Nigerian and a Roman Catholic churchman who has been in West Africa for many years. The Catholic cleric said:

"Christianity here is skin deep only. Some Africans we baptized now go to the mosque and observe Ramadan [the Moslem month of purification]."

A British official of eleven years' service in Nigeria suggested that Christianity was felt to be the "white man's religion" and was rejected as contrary to the "African personality."

An American who works for a philanthropic foundation here said: "Islam is spreading like wildfire. It offers Africans an uncomplicated creed with a few simple tenets."

Islamic Leaflet Circulated

A similar view is expounded in a Moslem proselytizing leaflet circulated here. It says that the Prophet's law "has been found practicable all over the world."

It praises Moslem acceptance of divorce and polygamy and declares: "The law of Islam * * * makes human beings better human beings. It does not claim to change human beings into something else."

The leaflet was published by the Amadiyya Mission, a Pakistani group active here. For the most part, however, Islam is said to be gaining ground in West Africa without an organized missionary effort.

Nigeria, which has just become independent, already appears well on her way toward becoming a predominantly Moslem nation. Of her population, officially estimated at 35,948,000 in mid-1960, about 15,000,000 are thought to be Moslems, 15,000,000 pagans, 4,000,000 Protestants and 2,000,000 Roman Catholics.

Islam is the prevailing faith in the huge Northern Region, where Arabic influence is deep-rooted. That self-governing region is ruled feudally by Moslem emirs. Theocratic government found expression until last year in northern courts where Islamic law was dispensed. A new secular code has taken over many Moslem concepts.

Politically, the Moslem north and its dominant party, the Northern People's Congress, control the Federal Government. The Prime Minister, Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, is from the north and is a strict, if tolerant, Moslem.

Urban Moslems Criticized

Many orthodox northern Moslems charge that the Prophet's law is being violated by big-city Moslems in the coastal areas, who, among other things, drink alcoholic beverages.

Fresh converts to Islam along the Gulf of Guinea are said to be more rigorous in the observance of their new religion's commands than members of old Moslem families in this part of West Africa. Some of the latter allow themselves more wives than the four permitted by Islamic law. This and other peculiarities of Moslem practice in the coastal area are seen as survivals from paganism.

Islamic advance is reported to be particularly noteworthy among the Yorubas, the main tribe of Western Nigeria. The Ibos of Eastern Nigeria, who account for most of the Roman Catholic strength in the area, are called "the Irish of West Africa."

Zik in line to become Sen. prexy

LAGOS, Nigeria—American educated Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, president of the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons, reportedly will be appointed president of the soon-to-be-created Nigerian Senate.

If he fails to get this post, a possible alternative position for Dr. Azikiwe will be that of Prime Minister of the Federation immediately after independence on Oct. 1.

It is speculated that Prime Minister Alhaji Abubakar Balewar will be the obvious candidate to be the first African Governor-General of Nigeria, thereby leaving the prime ministership to fall into the hands of Azikiwe.

Should he be named president of the Senate, he automatically gives up his seat in the House.

THE SENATE will be composed of 44 members, 12 of whom will be appointed from each Federation region. There will be four Senators from this capital city—including the King of Lagos and a chief, selected by chieftians from among themselves.

All members of the Senate must be at least 40 years of age, and any member who fails to attend two consecutive meetings without presidential approval loses his seat.

NIGERIA MINISTER WINS

Election Opponent's Petition to Oust Him Is Dismissed

Special to The New York Times.

LAGOS, Nigeria, April 9—The high court in Warri today dismissed a petition against the victory of the Federal Finance Minister, Chief Festus Okotie-Eboh, in last December's Federal elections.

The petition was brought by O. N. Rewane, defeated candidate of the Action Group, the ruling party in Nigeria's Western region. Mr. Rewane alleged that Chief Okotie-Eboh and his agents had used bribes and held election eve parties.

Justice Stephen Thomas dismissed evidence of the petitioner's witnesses as untrue and said there was no evidence that those who gave the parties were acting on behalf of Chief Okotie-Eboh. The Minister was awarded costs equivalent to $5,600.

Nigeria Sculptor Scores English Types in Colony

By Thomas Wolfe
Staff Reporter

"A cheap grade of Englishman" "uncivilized" and ne'er-do-well — is spiritually corrupting the emerging African nation of Nigeria its noted sculptor and government arts adviser, Ben Enwonwu said yesterday.

"They are cheap technicians from small English suburbs and working-class towns who go to Nigeria because they cannot get jobs in England," Enwonwu, touring America, said in a talk at Howard University.

"There was a time when the Englishmen who came to Nigeria were graduates of the finest universities. They may have been interested in adventure or in philanthropy but they were men of high quality in any case."

The largest remaining British colonial territory, Nigeria is slated for independence Oct. 1 within the British Commonwealth.

But the infuence of British colonialism has been so subtle and pervasive, said Enwonwu—himself member of the Order of the British Empire—that Nigeria finds it difficult to compose a national anthem for the occasion.

"It is also difficult to choose the colors of the national flag. It is difficult to prepare for an independence celebration. In fact, it will not be an independence celebration but a jollification. The people will eat, they will drink, they will be happy in a vague way."

Far more spiritually, said Enwonwu, are the Africans of South Africa, who have suffered racial oppression, and the Africans of Ghana, who have brought their resentment against the British out in the open.

The Washington Post

BEN ENWONWU

. . . Nigerians too peaceful

"This violent reaction is desirable," he said flatly. "That way a nation is able to establish a point of view, an aim, and a man can say to himself, 'I know what I want to do.'"

"A nation must have an ideal" — and comparatively well-fed and well-treated Nigeria doesn't have one, he said.

"There is too much peace in Nigeria," said Enwonwu.

Meet West Nigeria's 1st Lady Of The Land

The Chicago Defender, Chicago, Ill.
Sat. 6/25/60

When she was 13 years old, Emily Faderera Awomolo decided that, among other things, she wanted to become a trader.

Throughout West Africa (Emily was born in Western Nigeria) the traditional role of women has been the buying and selling of goods. Even in the most remote villages, the majority of women are engaged in trading small items, often hawking their wares from around tin trays which they imperturbably balance on their heads.

STILL TRADING

Today, some 30 years later, she is still trading. But now she is importing from Germany into Nigeria's busy port of Lagos up to 10,000 bags of cement each month; giving state dinners for an average of 30-40 persons; negotiating with a West German firm for the importation of a famous brand of beer and casting a speculative eye on the New York and London Stock Exchanges.

She has also ound time to become a trained nurse, a graduate of the Paris Dress Design Academy in London, to rear five children and to learn English, French and what she describes as a "smattering of Hausa," the chief language of the Muslims of Northern Nigeria. Her own native tongue is Yoruba.

Mrs Akintola is tall for a Nigerian, almost five foot eight inches, and she carries her height with the peculiar grace and dignity that characterizes the West African women.

BUSIEST COUPLE

Samuel and Emily Akintola could be described as one of West Africa's busiest couples. Chief Akintola himself has combined a career embracing newspaper editing, teaching, law and politics. He has served as Nigeria's Federal Minister of Communications and Aviation, deputy leader of the Action Group political party, and Leader of Opposition in the Federal House of Representatives.

"Before he leaves the office in the morning he sees between eight or nine persons," Mrs. Akintola said. "And sometimes he doesn't get home from work until past midnight." She made her observation, age-old among the wives of public figures, with an air of pride and understanding.

The Akintolas live in a government-built, two-story, four-bedroom house in the New Reservation suburb of Ibadan, capital of Western Nigeria. They drive a four-door blue Plymouth and belong to the Ebenezer Baptist church in Lagos.

Married for 25 years, the Akintolas' five children range in age from twenty-three to nine. The eldest, Mrs. Delle Odunjo, lives in Lagos and has a one-year-old child. Abayomi, 21, is studying in Dublin and hopes to become a doctor and their eighteen - year - old daughter, Abimbola, is attending school in Yorkshire. Ladio, 15, another daughter, is in school at Lagos as is the youngest, nine-year-old Tokunbo.

The Chicago Defender, Chicago, Ill.
Sat. 6/30/60

When she was 13 years old, Emily Faderera Awomolo decided that, among other things, she wanted to become a trader.

Throughout West Africa (Emily was born in Western Nigeria) the traditional role of women has been the buying and selling of goods. Even in the most remote villages, the majority of women are engaged in trading small items, often hawking their wares from around tin trays which they imperturbably balance on their heads.

So at 13 Emily Awomolo acquired a round tin tray, a supply of assorted items which she bought with her pocket money and began her business career.

STILL TRADING

Today, some 30 years later, she is still trading. Christianity may lose all Nigeria, evangelist says

The Birmingham News

LAGOS, Nigeria, Jan. 30—(AP)—Evangelist Billy Graham opens his African crusade tonight in Nigeria, where Islam and Christianity meet and compete for converts.

The Evangelist told a meeting of churchmen in Lagos Anglican Cathedral yesterday that Nigeria will be lost to Christianity unless the church in Nigeria takes vigorous measures.

Islam's missionaries have been winning a large proportion of Nigeria's pagans for many years, although Christian missions from nearly all major denominations have been active here for more than 100 years.

NASSEM SAIFI, Moslem representative in Nigeria, said Islam has about 21 million followers among Nigeria's 35 million population. There are about 7 million Christians. Northern Niegria is almost solidly Moslem.

Saifi said in an interview he was interested in creating cordial relations between the two great religions in Nigeria and had sent a message of welcome to Graham. Saifi said he hoped to arrange a meeting with the American Evangelist.

Graham's associates advised Saifi, however, that because of a heavy schedule and doctor's orders to Graham to cut down on his activities, a meeting between the Evangelist and Islam leaders would be impossible.

Saifi expects to attend the first Graham revival meeting tonight at the race course, he said.

GRAHAM HAS BEEN discussing the Nigerian situation with church leaders here for two days.

"If we Christians don't provide the answers, the people will go elsewhere," he told them Friday. "People are demanding something they can believe. The intellectual climate of the world has been prepared and the world today is ripe for the preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ."

A record crowd is expected for Graham's first public meeting. Thousands of Nigerians, some from villages as far as 60 miles away, have arrived in this Nigerian capital.

Graham's associate Evangelist, Grady Wilson, has held six preliminary meetings here. About 2300 Nigerians made decisions for Christ, Graham's associates said.

'Zik' refuses cabinet post in Federation Government

The Afro-American, Baltimore, Md.

By ADEMOLA ILUYOMADE
AFRO CORRESPONDENT

The elections, held on December 12, show a victory for the Northern Peoples' Party (NPC) which won 142 out of a total of 312 seats.

The Deputy leader of the NPC, Alhaji Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, who was the Prime Minister in the last government, has been reappointed Prime Minister of the Federation of Nigeria.

In the newly - formed cabinet there are 17 ministers including the Prime Minister. There are also 10 junior ministers to be officially known as parliamentary secretaries.

* * *

This coalition became necessary because although the NPC won more seats than any other party which contested the elections, it fell short of 12 votes needed to enable it to form a government all on its own.

According to the constitution, no party can form a government unless it has an over-all majority of two thirds in the general elections.

Because the Deputy leader of the NPC has refused to concede the Prime Ministership to Dr. Azikiwe, "ZIK," as Dr. Azikiwe is popularly known throughout West Africa, refused a post in the new cabinet.

Zik's exclusion from the cabinet has caused misgivings and apprehensions of the NCNC supporters and sympathizers generally. Of the 17 ministers in the cabinet, seven are from the NCNC and 10 from the NPC.

* * *

A STATEMENT issued by the National Emergency Committee of the NCNC said that the coalition government was formed with the consent of the leader of the party, Dr. Azikiwe.

Satisfactory arrangements have been made for a position benefitting Dr. Azikiwe "now and in the future," the statement added.

In a personal statement, Dr. Azikiwe said:

"It remains for me to allay the fears of our supporters regarding my personal role in this coalition.

"Of my personal volition, I made it clear that I did not intend to serve my country in any official capacity in this coalition cabinet for personal reasons.

"I begged my colleagues to respect my feelings in this regard and not to press me to change my decision on this issue, which is one of my very irrevocable decisions in life."

* * *

THE ACTION GROUP (AG), led by Chief Obafemi Awolowo, won 73 seats, coming third in the elections.

Although defeated, the AG emerged in the election as the only truly national party in the Federation of Nigeria because it is the only party that won seats in all the three regions.

Nine other minor parties which contested the elections won no seats, but eight independent candidates succeeded.

In all, 12 parties contested the elections. There were 320 constituencies and nine million Nigerians were qualified to vote.

Except in the Northern Region, women above the age of 21 were qualified to vote. There were three women out of a total of 954 candidates.

* * *

FOLLOWING THEIR election to the Federal Legislature, Dr. Azikiwe and Chief Awolowo have relinquished their positions as Premier of Eastern and Western Nigeria, respectively.

Chief Awolowo becomes leader of the Opposition in the new Federal Legislative.

In place of Dr. Azikiwe, Dr. M. I. Okpara, a physician, has been appointed Premier of Eastern Nigeria, while Chief S. L. Akintola, journalist and lawyer, replaces Chief Awolowo as Premier of Western Nigeria.

The new Nigeria Federal House will meet on Jan. 11, 1960, and the first business of the House will be to pass a formal resolution asking the United Kingdom Government to confirm Oct. 1, 1960, as the date of Nigeria's independence.

Africa Responds To Billy Graham

Tallahassee, Ala.

Thurs. 2-4-60

By LYNN HEINZERLING

LAGOS, Nigeria — (AP) — The old-time religion in Africa has had a severe shaking up since Billy Graham pitched his first pulpit in Monrovia late in January and then headed south through the palm trees.

Graham's nine-man team of evangelists is spreading the gospel in this turbulent, primitive continent as it never has been done before. Old-time missionaries—plagued by slow river boats, long jungle hikes and malarial mosquitoes — wouldn't believe it.

Every move, every meeting, almost every prayer, has been planned in advance with a precision that would charm a general.

The American evangelist wound up his crusade in western Nigeria Wednesday night before a crowd of 40,000. About 850 came forward to embrace the Christian faith, including Moslems and Animists—a primitive religion whose followers believe all objects possess souls.

The Graham organization said in the first eight days of his African tour 2,306 persons were converted and about 7,000 Christians rededicated.

He has run into some hositility but the over-all reception has been enthusiastic.

Much of the credit for the crusade's smooth operation goes to two associates, Jerry Beavan, 41, of Bethesda, Md., and Charles Riggs, 43, of Nashville, Tenn. Beaven is a former teacher, news broadcaster and sports editor. Riggs worked seven years in the Texas oilfields and spent four years in the Army before he joined Graham.

Last May the Rev. Howard Jones, an American Negro and Baptist minister from Cleveland, visited Africa. He went down the West Coast and up the East Coast and recommended meeting places. Beaven and Riggs then took over.

They spent seven weeks last fall flying all over Africa, arranging for local committees, making hotel and airline reservations for a tour which started at Dakar, extended as far south as Bulawayo in Southern Rhodesia and then proceeded up to Ruanda-Urundi, Tanganyika, Kenya, Ethiopia and finally Egypt.

They checked the food and water at dozens of hotels. They tried out the hotel beds and looked out for air conditioning.

They also made accommodations for Graham's associate evangelists, the Revs. Grady Wilson, Joseph Blinco and Leighton Ford, to reach each stop about a week or 10 days ahead of Graham to hold preliminary meetings.

One important element of the crusade is known as "Operation Andrew." It is so called because it is based on the 41st and 32nd verses of the first chapter of St. Johns Gospel, where it is said of Andrew: "He first findeth his own brother . . . and he brought him to Jesus."

Operation Andrew is an organized effort among Christians in the community "to bring their uncommitted friends under the sound of the Gospel by making certain that they are in attendance at the campaign meetings."

27 Nigerian Tribesmen Accused Of Joining in Cannibalistic Rite

ABAKALIKI, Nigeria, Jan. 29—Cannibalism, which had been believed extinct in Nigeria, had a brief surreptitious revival in late December.

Twenty-seven men, including a Juju priest, are in prison on charges of having killed three men in an itnertribal dispute over land. The police say the flesh of two victims was eaten by their assailants.

East of the River Niger among the Wawa, or bush people, the term for human flesh is "long pig." Anyone who knowingly partakes of long pig is liable to life imprisonment.

The clash occurred Dec. 25 near the Cross River, below Obubra. It involved two clans of the illiterate, pagan Izi (pronounced easy) tribe who had long disputed title to farmland lying between their respective settlements.

Policemen Find Bodies

The police, who found the bodies of the three men Dec. 30, obtained statements that cannibals had mutilated the bodies.

Not a word of this has appeared in Lagos newspapers. With national independence only eight months away, the Federal Government is understandably sensitive to what it calls "destructive" reporting.

A British journalist who reported seeing "naked, diseased choldren" during the recent visit of Prime Minister Macmillan was sharply reprimanded by the Minister of Information.

Cannibalism, commonplace in these parts a centur yago, rarely happens today. The act bears little resemblance to the American conception of cannibalism, an image usually based on cartoons showing a fully clothed missionary perspiring in a pot.

Past of Juju Ritual

The Wawa bushmen no longer crave human flesh to supplement their diet of yams. A stunted longhorn breed of cattle with a hide imperivous to the tstse fly has been introduced locally and provides ample beef.

Today's occasional cannibalism is performed as part of a Juju ritual. One who eats the heart or some other part of his slain enemy is said to acquire strength and courage.

The men imprisoned at Obubra awaiting preliminary trial are members of the Nkpani clan, who live in the mud-hut settlement of Nkpani, near the Calabar frontier. The victims were Nko Clansmen, whose village, also called Nko, was five miles north.

Last year, the Federal Supreme Court decided the land dispute in favor of the NKO. In early December the Nkpani sent a delegation to Nko with gifts o fmeat and palm wine. The delegation pleaded with the Nko people to be allowed to farm some of the disputed land. The Nko said no.

Nkpani Vote War

The Nkpani peace mission went home humiliated. On Dec. 24 th eNkpani men voted war on the Nko.

A special clearing was prepared in the forest, where clansmen picked to slay the Nko people would like in isolation. These men were told they must not slee pon any mat or take food supplies from their women until the town was avenged. They were armed with guns, machetes, bows and arrows.

A Juju priest named Kno Bassey erected a small hut in the clearing and initiated the warriors. Each was marked with a small "X" on each breast, the forehead and each shoulder blade. The marks were made with a razor or some other sharp instrument. Ash was rubbed into the open wounds.

The warriors were told the marks would render them invisible to enemies and impervious to bulets.

Victims Are Ambushed

The initiation over, the warriors prepared ambuscades. They had not long to wait.

On the morning of Dec. 25, Tom Isong of Nko began working on the disputed land with a fellow clansman. Suddenly five men emerged from the forest, shot Tom and dragged him away. His companion escaped.

Later five Nko people gathering wood were ambushed by Nkpani warriors. Two were shot and dragged off. Subsequently the police found the dismembered torso of Enang Mbam and the body of Ekat Akpama. The heart had been removed from each body.

The police arrested thirty-eight men. Of the twenty-seven still in custody, nineteen carry brand marks. Human bones were found in the Juju priest's hut.

Police Facing Threats That Killers of 219 May Gain Freedom by Politics

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

ABAKALIKI, Jan. 29—A poket of barbarism still exists in eastern Nigeria despite some success by the regional government in extending a crust of civilization over the tribe of the pagan Izi (pronounced easy).

cannibalism marked the closing days of 1959, when two men killed in a tribal clash were partly consumed by enemies in the Cross River country below Obubra.

But what bothers the police more than this is a constant threat of revival of a secret society called Ndozi Obodu. The society murdered at least 209 persons over a five-year period before it was crushed eighteen months ago.

Thirty-six members of the society, including a tribal chief, have been hanged. Seventy others have had their execution stayed by appeal. One chief regarded by the police as a most ruthless leader of the gang was freed last week by a strange intercession of politics just as his case was about to be heard bya special judge.

Started as Vigilantes

Like the Ku Klux Klan, the Ndozi Obodu started as a kind of vigilante society with ostensibly laudable aims. Its original goal was the elimination of thieves and adulterers. Its title roughly means "Keep the Town Clean." Soon, however, the organization fell under the control of dissolute chiefs, who made it a society for murder and extortion.

Garroting was the society's favored method of execution. None of the victims was eaten, at least not by society members. Less lurid but equally effective ways were found to dispose of them.

According to the police, about twenty-six were weighted with stones and timber and thrown into flooded rivers. No trace has been found of these bodies. A few were buried in ant heaps. But most became human fertilizer for the yam crop.

Abakaliki Province is known as the best yam country in Nigeria. It is mostly a gently undulating savannah with light brush and an occasional thrust of dense forest.

The Izi, a branch of the Ibo people that dominate eastern Nigeria, number over 5,000 and spill over into northern region. They are looked down on by other Ibos as backward poor relatives who stayed on the farm while their more industrious kin went into commerce and industry.

Here a man is deemed rich if he has three wives, ten rows of yams and a cow or ten dogs. Daughters at age 12 are sometimes send to a "fattening house," where they are stuffed with yams and peanuts and allowed no exercise.

Emerging three months later, fat and sullen as baby hippos, they are paraded on market day in hopes of marriage bids. Since fatness is considered a sign of well-being, a well stuffed girl commands a dowry of £20 ($56).

The Izi have a pathological hatred of thieves, prticularly yam thieves. The police seldom penetrate the countryside, which has few motorable roads. So the Izi, following a spate of thefts, decided to form vigilante groups. Besides keeping an eye on yams, these guardians also protected farmers' wives from enticement and adultery.

In the early Nineteen Fifties, the Ndozi Obodu society began extorting money and goods from accused persons. Those who failed to pay were strangled. The society worked so efficiently that two native courts closed down for a lack of business.

Leper Colonies Searched

Five years passed before the police in the provincial capital took notice of a disappearance of large numbers of people. Invariably neighbors insisted that the missing person had leprosy. But a search of leper colonies failed to produce the missing man.

The investigation was hampered by a lack of evidence. The police never thought of looking under yam mounds. The usual weapons associated with murder in rural areas were missing. Society members were sworn to secrecy and witnesses were warned under pain of death to fabricate evidence in favor of members brought to court.

The cult's power was such that the leaders began murdering with impunity. Chief Nwaiboku Obodo strangled one of his fifty-three wives with a copper strand because she had "displeased him." He has since been hanged.

Sickening of slaughter, a district commissioner finally found courage to write to the police. He named thirty-eight men allegedly responsible for murdering fourteen persons. He was murdered within a month, but his testimony broke the case.

The police learned that the society had subjected virtually the entire Izi population to a reign of terror. No one was safe except a few influential persons so well known to the Government that their disappearance would cause talk.

The entire worldly wealth of a man would be taken away, including his wives and daughters. If a family revolted against the cult, the whole male section would be exterminated. Women left over became part of the chief's retinue. Sometimes they were given to male slaves, but any issues belonged to the chief.

When a victim was seized and brought before the society he was immediately told the reasons for his arrest. But arguments in defense were rarely accepted. Victims were usually throttled with a U-shaped copper rod, although some areas favored a bicycle chain.

Freedom party set

The Afro-American
Baltimore

By DICK CAMPBELL

LAGOS, Nigeria (Special)—Next Oct. 1, the 13th largest country in the world will receive its independence when Great Britain grants Nigeria its freedom.

Simultaneously, nearly 40-million people within its boundaries will go on a binge. It'll be a lulu.

I have just concluded a three-week trip through the country, visiting eight of the leading cities comprising the three regions known as the Federation of Nigeria.

I HAVE seen at first hand the plans being made, and I can safely predict there will be nothing like it in history.

It will be a New Orleans Mardi Gras on a country-wide scale. Nothing, but nothing, will equal the pageantry, color, dancing the streets, music, drumming exhibitions, parades, games, contests, speech-making, ceremonies, rituals, colorful costumes, parties, State balls, and just plain balls which everyone will have.

It will be the most garish, gaga and gala carnival spirit ever.

There are just two things of which I am skeptical.

First, I doubt whether anyone will get any sleep from the last week of September through the first week of October, (but who wants to during that period?).

Northern Nigeria's Chief Warns Missionaries to Avoid Politics

Sardauna of Sokoto Stresses Need for Unity—Reveals Plans for Trip to U. S.

New York Times 7-12-60

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

KADUNA, Nigeria, Feb. 10—The Prime Minister of Northern Nigeria warned foreign missionaries in that region today to keep out of politics.

The Prime Minister is Alhaji Sir Ahmadu Bello, the Sardauna of Sokoto. He is the head of the Northern People's Congress, which won the Nigerian federal election in December. He is undoubtedly the most powerful figure in Nigeria, which is to become independent of British colonial rule Oct. 1.

In an interview the Sardauna repeated a warning he gave last Friday to the Rev. Dr. Billy Graham, the American evangelist now touring Africa. As an example of political meddling by the 1,200 missionaries in his region, the Sardauna said, "They asked people to vote for Christians in the December election."

About 63 per cent of the nearly 20,000,000 northern Nigerians are Moslems, as is the Sardauna.

Christians in Cabinet

The Sardauna said that missionaries in some isolated areas had engaged in forbidden political maneuvering. This hurt him, he said, because he had appointed Christians to his Cabinet.

He recalled that last year, in a speech to Christian missionaries, he stressed the importance of peaceful coexistence between Christian and Moslem. He said:

"I gave this assurance. I told them: 'You are here as our friends. We've got to live together. We Moslems have the greatest respect for teachings of Christ. He is God's prophet.'"

The Sardauna said he had done nothing about the offending missionaries. He pointed out that all missions received financial aid from the regional government. He added that the Government was reluctant to withhold grants.

The Sardauna disclosed he would visit the United States this summer, probably in July, to seek aid for his under-developed region from the Government and private foundations.

The Americans will find him an eyeful. A huge man, standing well over six feet and weighing probably 220 pounds, the Sardauna appears even bigger in his ceremonial dress. He wears richly embroidered robes and his height is increased by a large white turban.

He is reported to be short-tempered and newsmen are advised not to ask him to count his wives and children.

Sokoto, a province at the northwest corner of Nigeria, is bigger than Maine and has more than 1,700,000 people. Cotton and peanuts are its main crops. The Sultan of Sokoto, who is the Sardauna's cousin, is the spiritual leader of the Moslems in Northern Nigeria.

The Sardauna was born in Sokoto 52 years ago, the descendant of a long line of hereditary rulers. He is a great-great grandson of Usman Dandodio, the first Sultan of Sokoto.

Alhaji Sir Ahmadu Bello, the Sardauna of Sokoto.

He attended a Koranic school and the provincial school at Sokoto and later attended the Katsina training college, where he qualified as a teacher.

The title Sardauna, which can be held only by a member of the royal house, was conferred on him by the Sultan in the early Nineteen Forties. At that time he already controlled all the African administration departments in Sokoto Province.

After studying local government in Britain the Sardauna returned and entered politics. He served in regional and Federal Legislatures and later became Minister of Works and Minister for Local Government in the northern region. He has been the Prime Minister of Northern Nigeria since 1955. In that year he also made a pilgrimage to Mecca and he has made annual pilgrimages since.

Technical Help Desired

His region dwarfs Eastern and Western Nigeria in size and population but lags behind them in education and social developments. The women do not vote and the Sardauna is vague about their eventual enfranchisement.

He said today that Northern Nigeria was retarded partly because Moslem parents had resisted Western education, fearing that their children might embrace Christianity. Such apprehensions no longer prevail, he said.

"We know we can work with anyone," he added.

When in the United States he will seek aid in obtaining teachers. He said Nigeria needed all the technical help it could get. Advice on water conservation also has high priority, he added.

The Sardauna said he was confident that Federal Nigeria would stay together after it became independent. He admitted he had doubts about this as late as three years ago when the political leaders of Eastern and Western Nigeria were feuding. There is now some political stability, but he deplored what he called the persistent fear in Western Nigeria of domination by the Moslem north.

Zeke gives up life ambition for sake of country

LAGOS, Nigeria (ANP) — With the opportunity of becoming either the first prime minister or governor-general of Nigeria within his grasp, Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwi, who has dominated the fight for Nigerian freedom, stepped aside to insure unity in his nation as Nigeria faces independence.

"Zik," as he is popularly known — now president of the Nigerian Federal Senate — outmaneuvered skilled British planning which sought to save this last and largest of Britiish colonial possessions by dividing the regions and using the Moslem North—long-time holdouts from Nigerian independence—as a pawn.

"Zik" had been offered the prime ministership provided he aligned himself with the rival Action group, headed by Chief Obafemi Owolowo.

However, he preferred to see the two top prizes go to the present Prime Minister, Alhaji Abubaker Tafewa Balewa, and Sir Ahmadu Bello, Sardauna of Sokoto and premier of Northern Nigeria.

The Sadrauna had previously announced his retirement from politics, but retracted it on Dec. 30 when the post of governor-general appeared possible.

ZIK TURNED down Owolowo's Action Group—whose votes combined with NCNC would have insured control—because the Northern region, where the British have kept 75 percent of the country's heavily armed forces, could easily have been persuaded to start a civil war that would have thwarted independence and assured continued British control.

The prime problem was whether freedom could be achieved while retaining unity in the country. The deciding factor was the attitude of the North.

DR. NnAMDI AZIKIWI

For years, this region, refused to consider the idea of independence. The British officials and expatriates had great influence in that sector and consistently spoke against the idea, developing fear that the South would move into control.

There were many conferences through the years and before the elections The Action Group and NCNC both knew they could not canvass enough votes to organize a goverment.

The NCNC then decided to court the Northern region to secure its support. They finally did secure their consent to go to the London conference and support a request for independence.

* * *

MANY BLOCKS were overcome, including those of the middle states. Zik oscillated between the two groups, selling the idea that only by striving for unity and opposing the divisive program of the Britiish could they ever hope to achieve independence.

He was offered definite cooperation by the Action Group. They pointed out that the two parties could organize the government, but Zik was certain civil war and the dissipation of the effort for freedom would result.

The elections finally came. The Action Group offered Zik the post of prime minister and the larger share of ministries—warning him of the danger of trusting the strength and character of the North.

Zik, still fearful of the British—against whom he seems to have a fetish—went to Alhaji Abubaker and continued their alliance—certain it was neecssary to keep them in line.

Thus, as it now apparently stands, Zik has settled—temporarily, at least—for the number three spot, president of the Senate in the Nigerian government.

Only time will tell what other moves he will or feels he must make to ensure the continued unity of his country.

NIGERIANS BATTLE SLEEPING DISEASE

The New York Times

Cut Huge Swaths in Bush to Stem Spread of Illness Caused by Tsetse Fly

New York

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

KADUNA, Nigeria, Feb. 11—Northern Nigeria is slashing away vegetation in four-mile-wide swaths—like firebreaks in a forest—to halt the spread of sleeping sickness.

This disease, less dramatic, but far more deadly than leprosy, is a major killer of man and cattle in Northern Nigeria. While statistics are lacking, the authorities know that villages have been decimated by sleeping sickness and large areas abandoned, after becoming infested by the tsetse fly, which carries the disease.

The tsetse fly likes still air and humidity. Its favorite breeding place is in thick bush along the rivers. It lives on blood—at least the female needs blood when producing larvae. Its victims frequently are Africans who go to the river to wash, fish or fetch water.

The tsetse fly travels fast and straight, like a bee. It generally probes for a moment before stabbing. Its flight range rarely exceeds a few miles. This simplifies control and explains the broad slashes of bush.

According to Dr. Diarmid Ross, senior health officer in charge of rural health for the Northern Nigerian Government, sleeping sickness is a slow, wasting disease, like chronic tuberculosis. Some patients live for a year or two with no sharper symptoms than fever and headache.

The sleeping phenomenon does not appear until final stages of the disease. Then the patient suffers insomnia at night but cannot stay awake for long intervals in daytime. "Sometimes they fall asleep with food in their mouths," Dr. Ross said.

The disease is easily detected. The trypanosome, the parasite communicated by the tsetse fly, is found in the salivary glands. Mobile field teams invade stricken areas where local chiefs have rounded up the villagers. The people file past to have their necks squeezed by internes. Swollen glands are punctured and the extracted juice examined for trypanosomes. One team can press 1,000 necks a day and Dr. Ross said his office was now examining 1,500,000 to 1,700,000 a year in an endemic area of 11,000,000 people. Mass examinations have resulted in the detection of 4,800 to 5,000 cases a year.

Patients in early or intermediate stages are treated over a seventy-day period with antrypol. Advanced cases are treated for twelve weeks with melarsen sodium. Dr. Ross said that just under 60 per cent of advanced cases are cured by this drug.

"Every man who has it will die of it if he isn't treated. Sleeping sickness is undramatic, unspectacular, but damn dangerous."

Mid-Southerners Play Part In New Hospital For Nigeria

BARDSTOWN, Ky., Feb. 26.—Two Mid-South families had a part in the dedication of the new $130,000 32-bed hospital in Kontagora, Nigeria, where Dr. Billy Graham recently conducted a crusade.

Dr. J. Edwin Low, Southern Baptist missionary, is the only doctor on the hospital staff. He is the husband of Mrs. J. Edwin Low, the daughter of Mrs. H. L. Calvert of Shreveport, La.

The Baptist Church here gave $500 to furnish the nursery ward as a memorial to Carolyn Lee Floyd and Melinda Ruth Floyd, daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Richard P. Floyd of Bardstown, who drowned last year. Nine-year-old Carolyn had wanted to be a missionary nurse.

Dr. J. T. Burdine Jr., is pastor of the Bardstown Baptist Church and has been notified of the dedication of the new hospital in Kontagora.

First In Northern Nigeria

Dr. Graham in the dedication speech told about 300 persons that the hospital "is in answer to Christ's command that we have this hospital." It is the first Baptist hospital to be opened in Northern Nigeria.

Shortly before the service the harmattan haze, dust of the dry season, cleared away to a visibility of three miles so that the two small planes bringing the evangelist and his team could land safely at the small Kontagora airstrip.

"The foreign mission board is very glad this hospital has come to Kontagora," Dr. Graham continued. "It will be a happy place where hundreds will have healing for their bodies. It will be a place where all will be welcomed—the rich and the poor; the little babies and the old people, the Moslems and the Christians and the pagans.

Has African Staff

"Most of the hospitals in Nigeria, and the world, have been built by people who believe in Jesus. All who come to this hospital will know by the treatment they receive that the staff members believe in Him. People in America gave money to build the buildings, but they are doing more than that. They are praying for this hospital."

Dr. Low is now operating the outpatient department with an African staff of four graduate nurses, two midwives, a laboratory assistant, and a chaplain. When more workers are available the wards will be opened. Another missionary doctor and two missionary nurses are expected to join the staff by 1961.

Buildings for the 32-bed hospital, costing $130,000, were made possible largely by the Lottie Moon Christmas Offering, a foreign mission offering sponsored each year by the women of the Southern Baptist Convention.

Emir Attends Ceremony

The emir of Kontagora, an elderly man who had often expressed the wish that he might live to see a hospital in his town, attended the dedication ceremonies, accompanied by his council. "This is a great day which will not be forgotten in our lives because having this hospital will be a great help to our people," he said. "We pray Almighty God to help us as well as the hospital staff to make it a success." The emir and council gave full co-operation to Baptists in securing land and erecting the buildings.

Mrs. Low, in reporting the dedication, picked up this thread of history. "The first Southern Baptist medical missionary to Nigeria, Dr. George Green, who arrived soon after the turn of the century, dreamed of opening medical work somewhere in the northern provinces," she said. "Limited personnel and funds prevented such work.

"Although 50 years late, a Baptist hospital now stands in Northern Nigeria, a Christian institution in a predominantly Moslem land."

BRITISH FREE NEGRO LEADER HELD FOR YEAR

Sat. 4-2-60
Chicago Daily Tribune

ZOMBA, Nyasaland, April 1 (AP)—Dr. Hastings Banda, leading Negro nationalist in the British protectorate of Nyasaland, was released after a year's detention Friday so he could talk to British Colonial Secretary Ian Macleod.

The 54 year old American educated physician was flown from Gwelo prison, in Southern Rhodesia. He had been held since last March.

Minister on Tour

Macleod is touring the Central African federation—composed of Southern and Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland—to collect opinions about the federation's future.

Banda wants Nyasaland to be separate, contending its largely Negro population is being dominated by the ruling white minority in Southern Rhodesia.

Banda is head of the African National congress in Nyasaland. He was imprisoned during an outbreak of violence in Nyasaland. The protectorate government headed by Sir Robert Armitage accused Banda and his congress of plotting a massacre of white and Negroes.

A British government commission investigated Armitage's charge and reported last July it had failed to uncover any detailed plan for a massacre plot.

Approached Martyr Status

An unlikely looking prospect for the hero of an independence movement, Dr. Banda studied at the University of Chicago. He had returned to Nyasaland only seven months before his arrest, after a self-imposed exile of 30 years.

He had forgotten most of the language, and his speeches had to be interpreted to his followers. He was out of touch with Nyasa customs and manners. He dressed like a London banker.

But he captured the imagination of Nyasaland's 2½ million Africans and became regarded as an apostle of freedom. He advocated passive resistance and civil disobedience.

Governor Indicted In Report on Kenya

Christian Science Monitor
Boston, Mass.
Wed. 6/1/60

By Peter Lyne

Parliamentary Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

London

A scorching indictment of a British colonial governor and his administration is the keynote of an official report just published here on the Mau Mau campaign in Kenya which rent the East African colony from 1952 to 1957.

Blamed, too, are left-wing Britons in London, who are charged with having "no knowledge of what was going on behind the clever facade so successfully built up by Jomo Kenyatta and his associates, whose prestige was greatly strengthened in the eyes of the Kikuyu and other tribes by apparently close association with British politicians."

The report is the work of Frank Corfield, a former provincial governor in the Sudan. It took 2½ years to produce and runs to over 300 pages.

Governor Named

The British Governor who is blamed for "blindness and inefficiency" in failing to prevent the Mau Mau troubles was Sir Philip Mitchell. Two British socialists in London named for their responsibility are Labor Party members of Parliament Fenner Brockway and the late Lord Strabolgi.

Mau Mau leader Kenyatta is still detained in Kenya despite increasing pressure for his release from Africans and from sections of left-wing opinion in Westminster.

[African nationalists declared that they would continue to press for the release of Mr. Kenyatta despite the findings of the Corfield report, Reuters reported from Nairobi.]

Cost Reported

The Mau Mau campaign was one of the most gruesome chapters in British colonial history. Through a system of secret oaths and horrible practices the Mau Mau terrorized the people of Kenya—European, Asian, and African.

As the Corfield report recalls, the Mau Mau rebellion cost 1,167 Army and police and 1,800 African civilians, 32 Europeans, and 26 Asians killed. Before the campaign was suppressed more than 11,000 Mau Mau terrorists were killed.

In the House of Commons in Westminster May 31, Colonial Secretary Iain Macleod was asked about reports of a revival of Mau Mau terrorism in Kenya.

Mr. Macleod replied: "The Kenya Government are watching closely for any signs of revival and are investigating recent reports of oathtaking. But although there has been some increase in lawlessness there is so far no evidence to show that any lawless act or crime has been specifically committed in furtherance of Mau Mau."

Blunt Charges

The Corfield report is outspoken in its charges of dilatoriness against Sir Philip Mitchell. It also implies a major criticism against the Colonial Secretary at the time in London, Oliver Lyttleton, who has retired from politics as Lord Chandos and has become a business magnate.

The report quotes top-secret telegrams between Nairobi and London. Sir Philip left the colony in June, 1952, and was succeeded by "strong man" Sir Evelyn Baring, now Lord Howick. But Sir Evelyn did not arrive in Kenya until the end of September.

The report indicates that it was the vacation custom which caused this delay, though Sir Evelyn was ready to start meeting the situation earlier. It seems the Colonial Office in London did not think this was necessary.

Work Praised

The report says senior officers in the Kenya administration take their holidays in July and August and the new Governor was told in effect "everybody will be on holiday now. Nothing much happens politically in July and August. Leave it until September."

Sir Evelyn is shown to have been too late to prevent the terrible happenings in Kenya. But he is praised for the fine work he did in the long-term repairing of the damage done by the Mau Mau campaign.

The Corfield report was big news in British newspapers June 1. The Times, of London, says that the report shows clearly that the Kenya Government did know about the threatening emergency but that the administrative machinery was at fault in failing to act.

Difficulties Underlined

The Times also underlines the difficulties caused by a British-imposed legal system, ill-fitted to deal with a secret society practicing wholesale intimidation of witnesses.

It says, too: "There was the innate contradiction in British colonial philosophy, which placed the colonial government between the twin fires of liberal opinion in Britain and extremist nationalist politicians in the native reserves."

The conservative Daily Mail sees the report as the most effective answer to those demanding the release of Mr. Kenyatta to lead a new nationalist movement in Kenya.

It says the Corfield report shows Mr. Kenyatta's aim to be destruction of government and reversion to a primitive tribal society in which his own tribe, the Kikuyu, would be supreme.

Mau Mau, according to the Daily Mail, is shown as a savage manifestation of race hatred.

NYASALAND HAILS BANDA ON RETURN

N.Y. Times N.Y.

'We've Got Self-Government in All But Name,' Leader Says After London Talk

Thurs. 8/11/56

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

BLANTYRE, Nyasaland, Aug. 10—Dr. Hastings K. Banda, Nyasaland's nationalist leader, received a tumultuous welcome here today on his return from London.

"We've got self-government in all but name," he told a jubilant crowd of 10,000 singing, dancing, cheering Africans who greeted him at the airport.

Dr. Banda, as president of the Malawi Congress party, was the leader of the African delegation to the conference in London that decided last week to grant Africans a majority in Nyasaland's Legislative Council.

Hours before Dr. Banda and his fellow delegates arrived in a special plane from Nairobi, Kenya, truckloads of gaily dressed Africans began to gather at the airport. Thousands lined the ten-mile route from the airport into Blantyre as Dr. Banda drove slowly along in a bright red convertible with the top down.

At a news conference at the airport Dr. Banda said that whites who foresaw a ten-year transition period before Nyasaland became independent "are living in a fool's paradise." He said there would be "no quarter given" to anyone who opposed him and added, "I am not in mood for any nonsense now."

Later, in o forty-five-minute speech to a crowd outside the airport, he said one of his main goals was still to break up the "stupid Federation" of Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

Representatives of the British protectorate's 80,000 whites, Dr. Banda told his cheering listeners, "fought me like hell" in London. "But we got the circumstances of self-government," he said, pointing to the other African representatives standing near him.

28 Africans Due in Council

He asserted that the British administration had "stooges" representing Africans in the present Legislative Council in Zamba, the capital of Nyasaland. "Very soon you will see some changes in Zamba," he declared.

Under Nyasaland's new Constitution it is expected that at least twenty of the twenty-eight elected members in the thirty-three-member Council will be Africans. Three will be ex-officio members and two will be nominated by the Governor.

As Dr. Banda spoke, the beat of drums sounded on the fringes of the crowd. Earlier there had been dancing and singing of African nationalist songs. The words of one said:

"All people have their own country. This country is ours and we don't want Federation."

Some carried placards reading, "Next Step Secession and Independence." This referred to the dsire to break Nyasaland's link with the Rhodesias.

The Banda party traveled in a chartered aircraft from Nairobi. The Malawi Congress party paid $3,000 for the special flight. At the airport Dr. Banda and the other delegates were subjected to a meticulous examination of their luggage by Customs officials. A few undeclared shirts were turned up.

Colonial Secretary Proposes Broader Vote but Shuns Universal Franchise

Sat. 7/30/56

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, July 29—Iain Macleod, Britain's Secretary of State for the Colonies, called today for a greater role for Africans in the Government of Nyasaland.

Asserting that it was "Nyasaland's destiny to develop as an African nation," the Colonial Secretary said, "African opinion must now be expressed through the ballot box."

Mr. Macleod's unequivocal demand for a reduction of white and colonial authority in the territory was contained in "four principles" for guiding the colony's advance toward self-government and independence. His statement concluded five days of general debate on Nyasaland's constitutional future.

Details Yet to Be Decided

The next stage of the conference will hear the Colonial Secretary add the details of Nyasaland's constitutional reform.

At that point the British Government and eighteen delegates from the territory, representing several African and non-African viewpoints, will come to grips with the real issues.

Although the African nationalists are also demanding separation from the white-dominated Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, that issue is not being considered at this conference.

Mr. Macleod's first point noted that "it is beyond argument that African peoples are in a majority in Nyasaland." It proposed the recognition of that fact by increasing the African membership in the Legislature.

The Colonial Secretary asked for "a clear African majority" on the unofficial side of the Legilative Council. This side includes those who are not members by virtue of holding government office.

At the same time, Mr. Macleod directed attention to "the vital contribution" made by the non-African communities "to the progress and prosperity of the country," and said they must continue to make them.

They, too, must have "sufficient representation" on the Legislative Council to enable them to continue their contribution, he said.

'Qualitative' Ballot Urged

His second point emphasized the importance of the ballot box in reflecting African opinion. Yet the Colonial Secretary said that, because the next elections would be the first on a country-wide basis, he believed "a qualitative rather than a universal franchise" was appropriate.

In other words, in contrast to the "one man, one vote" principle demanded by Dr. Hastings K. Banda, the leading African nationalist of Nyasaland, the Colonial Office favors a selective franchise that will enable many more Africans than at present to vote but will not provide a universal vote.

This limited ballot would be consistent with constitutional reforms already worked out for other Central and East African territories moving toward self-government.

At last winter's Kenya constitutional conference, the agreed franchise gave voting rights to anyone who could read and write, or, alternatively, was over 40 years old, was an office holder at certain level or had an income of at least £75 ($210) a year.

Advisory Executive Proposed

in his third point, Mrs. Macleod discussed the relationship of the Executive Council and the Governor's powers, which he said had been subject to "widely divergent points of view."

The Colonial Secretary is opposed to making the Executive Council entirely responsible to the Legislative Council or to having the executive group chosen by the Governor without reference to the legislative body. He proposed instead that the executive remain advisory to the Governor, as in Tanganyika.

Finally, Mr. Macleod asked that the unofficial members of the Executive Council be drawn mainly from the elected members of the Legislative Council and be "associated with the work of the government department."

This suggested to some observers that committees or individual members would be assigned to watch governmental activities in which they had interest or qualifications.

The sum of all of Mr. Macleod's points was to expand the African responsibility in the Government of Nyasaland as the territory progressed toward independence.

Monckton Commission Expected to Urge More Power for Territories and Cut in Authority of Federal Regime

Sun. 8/12/56

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

BLANTYRE, Nyasaland, Aug. 13—Political leaders in Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland believe the three territories are headed for a looser alliance than their present federation.

This belief is bolstered by reports from London that the Monckton Commission will recommend continuation of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland but with greatly increased powers for the three territories.

The territories would be given the right to secede after five years. The authority of the Federal Government, headed by Sir Roy Welensky, would be reduced and the jurisdiction of the Federal Assembly curtailed.

The commission, headed by Lord Monckton of Britain, has been engaged since early this year in reviewing the federation's development since it was established in 1953. The board has been considering the main arguments for and against changes in the federal Constitution. The commission's report is expected to be completed by the end of this month.

Conference to Use Report

The report will be used by representatives of Britain, the federation and the three territories at meetings early next year in London to decide the future of the federation.

The conferees will not be bound to accept the Monckton Commission's views, but the report is certain to have a strong influence at the conference.

The commission is expected to recommend that all questions on voting rights be left to the territories and that the control of white agriculture and white education, now held by the Federal Government, be restored to the territories. The territories now control African farming and African primary and secondary education.

The apportionment of Federal funds among the territories also is reported to be due for revision. At present, revenues such as icome taxes are collected by the Federal Government and redistributed among the territories.

Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland have complained that Southern Rhodesia has been receiving the major share of Federal funds.

Ralph Nicholson, Minister of Finance in Northern Rhodesia, estimated recently that since 1954 his territory had contributed $140,000,000 toward Federal expenditures outside its borders. Northern Rhodesia is rich in copper and other minerals.

African Majorities Favored

The Monckton Commission is also reported to favor the establishment of elected African majorities in the legislative counciles of Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia.

Agreement on this step for Nyasaland was reached in London last week at a constitutional conference at which Iain Macleod, British Secretary of State for the Colonies, presided.

The commission is also expected to recommend greater political representation for Africans in Southern Rhodesia, where no Africans now sit in the territorial assembly.

In anticipation of this, Sir Edgar Whitehead, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, announced this week that negotiations to provide an expanded assembly with African representation would be carried out "as a matter of great urgency."

He said he expected this would be done by early October, before he travels to London for discussions with the Colonial Office on Southern Rhodesia's Constitution. Sir Edgar has announced he will seek greater autonomy for Southern Rhodesia.

Meanwhile, he expressed some doubt whether the federation would continue, saying: "I don't see why we should be particularly upset if Nyasaland leaves."

The Monckton Commission is expected to contend, however, that continuation of the federation as an economic unit is desirable.

35 Negroes Among Students In Operation-Crossroads Africa

Atlanta Daily World
Atlanta Ga. Thur. 6/16/60

NEW YORK—Thirty-five Negroes from the North and South will be included in a group of 180 American college students who are going to Africa this summer to work alongside college students of 10 African countries.

Those involved will be participating in a student work and study project called Operation - Crossroads Africa. It was conceived by the Rev. Dr. James H. Robinson, Negro Presbyterian minister who has founded many community center programs on the Eastern coast of the United States. He is pastor of the Church of the Master in New York City and the founder of the Morningside Community Center which adjoins the Church.

This will be the second summer Dr. Robinson has led an interracial and interreligious group of American students to Africa. In 1958, the pilot project of Operation -Crossroads Africa saw him lead about 60 American students to that continent.

WINS PRESIDENT'S PRAISE

For the first project five countries were visited. The students built schools, a chapel, and a water supply system. Upon their return to the United States two months later, the project and the participating students got unqualified praise from the State Department. President Eisenhower has since specifically praised Operation - Crossroads Africa in a letter to Dr. Robinson.

This year's project will take in 10 African countires — Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Nigeria, Senegal, Ivory Coast, Dahomey, Togo, and Cameroon. Once in Africa the students will be divided into 14 groups. They will work on projects designated by the countries they visit.

Their motivation is the desire to come to grips with Africa on a strong personal basis. They will be in an area that is rapidly coming of age in a political sense. Ghana and Guinea have recently become sovereign nations, while Nigeria will soon become a full - fledged Commonwealth nation. Cameroon, Togo, and Senegal recently have become nations within the French family of nations.

In these new Negro nations the visiting Americans will be exposed to an intense nationalism, the likes of which they probably have never before experienced.

FRUITS OF PROJECT

The Africans, on the other hand, will be able to see for the first time a cross sectional group of Americans. Both the participating Americans and Africans will have much to learn from each other. Dr. Robinson, and many of those who have worked with him to support Operation - Crossroads Africa, believe that the new knowledge the American students bring back from Africa and the knowledge about America thye leave behind will be the most valuable fruits of the project.

The students from this year's project were carefully selected from 70 colleges in the United States and Canada. They hail from 27 states and three Canadian provinces. One student is from the Republic of Uruguay.

The students will depart by air for Africa June 21 and 22 after an intensive week of orientation in New York City. They will return to the United States in late August.

To help pay for the project each student must contribute $800. Scholarship aid is given in cases where the need is shown. However, it costs about $1,650 to send each student to Africa. The rest of the money, as well as the money for scholarship aid, has to be raised through support from private foundations and gifts from individuals and corporations. The fund raising to finance this year's project still is going on.

NEW YORK, July 2 (UPI)—American students are working with their hands on construction projects in 10 African nations to gain understanding of the forces remaking the face of Africa.

DIVIDED INTO 14 groups with matching numbers of African students, they are putting in work days on construction projects specified by the nations they are visiting in Ghana, Nigeria, Libera, Sierra Leone, Senegal, Dahomey, Togo, Guinea, Ivory Coast and Cameroon.

President Eisenhower, in a letter to Robinson, Negro minister of the Church of the Master in Harlem and originator of the program, said:

"The contribution made by the participants in Operation Crossroads Africa, working through private 'people-to-people' channels is most welcome. I feel confident it will help establish strong bonds of understanding and friendship with the eager young people of Africa."

NEW YORK—Thirty-five Negroes from the North and South will be included in a group of 180 American college students who are going to Africa this summer to work alongside college students of 10 African countries.

Those involved will be participating in a student work and study project called Operation - Crossroads Africa. It was conceived by the Rev. Dr. James H. Robinson, Negro Presbyterian minister who has founded many community center programs on the Eastern coast of the United States. He is pastor of the Church of the Master in New York City and the founder of the Morningside Community Center which adjoins the Church.

This will be the second summer Dr. Robinson has led an interracial and interreligious group of American students to Africa. In 1958, the pilot project of Operation -Crossroads Africa saw him lead about 60 American students to that continent.

WINS PRESIDENT'S PRAISE

For the first project five countries were visited. The students built schools, a chapel, and a water supply system. Upon their return to the United States two months later, the project and the participating students got unqualified praise from the State Department. President Eisenhower has since specifically praised Operation - Crossroads Africa in a letter to Dr. Robinson.

This year's project will take in 10 African countires — Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Nihomey, Togo, and Cameroon. Once in Africa the students will be divided into 14 groups. They will work on projects designated by the countries they visit.

Their motivation is the desire to come to grips with Africa on a strong personal basis. They will be in an area that is rapidly coming of age in a political sense. Ghana and Guinea have recently become sovereign nations, while Nigeria will soon become a full - fledged Commonwealth nation. Cameroon Togo, and Senegal recently have become nations within the French family of nations.

In these new Negro nations the visiting Americans will be exposed to an intense nationalism, the likes of which they probably have never before experienced.

Mali Split Eludes Patching

Christian Science Monitor Boston, Mass Thur. 8-25-60

By the Associated Press

Paris

Senegal's Premier Mamadou Dia left by air for home Aug. 24 after talks with President de Gaulle that apparently failed to heal the rift splitting the Mali Federation of Senegal and the former French Sudan.

"My first concern is the construction of my country, the consolidation of the independence of Senegal," Mr. Dia told reporters as he boarded a plane for Dakar Aug. 24.

On his arrival in Dakar he declared that the independence of Senegal can no longer be doubted.

General de Gaulle invited both Mr. Dia and Sudanese Premier Modibo Keita to Paris in an effort to mediate the struggle for power between the leaders of the two former French colonies. The French are certain that Senegal will remain in the French Community, but they fear that Mr. Keita may turn to leftist-led Guinea, another former French colony that refused to join the Community and is now getting help from the Soviet bloc.

Mr. Dia made clear on his arrival in Paris Aug. 23 that Senegal's break from the union with the Sudan was final, but he appeared ready for some sort of link with the neighboring territory.

Mr. Keita has not set a date to come to Paris, but he sent a telegram warning the French President that if he recognized the "secession" of Senegal, "this could have extremely grave consequences internationally."

Mr. Keita was Premier of the Mali Federation. Seeking to consolidate his power, he dismissed Mr. Dia from the vice-premiership Aug. 19. But troops and police in Dakar—capital of both the federation and Senegal—were loyal to Mr. Dia. Mr. Keita was put under house arrest and later packed off to Sudan by train.

The Premier of the Sudan against France in the Mali Federation breakup in a speech delivered to the people in Bamako, his capital.

It goes far beyond the brief protests in Mr. Keita's message to President de Gaulle and the virtual rejection of the latter's invitation to Mr. Keita to come to Paris to talk over a settlement with Senegal, the other member of the federation.

Mr. Keita says: "The divorce between the Sudan and Senegal is primarily political and not with the Senegalese people. It is with a few leaders who are more French than the French, who would Frenchify Mali. That is the true problem.

String-Pulling Charged

There also exist economic differences. Our party is favorable to an African monetary zone and common market. Because I rest faithful to the program of the African federation, because in Liberia I proclaimed our efforts toward creating an African monetary zone, those who pull the strings in France were disturbed. Their have been colonized, who have been put at the disposition of Mali sought, with the complicity of French officers, to compromise the unity of the Mali Federation.

"The second problem is equally political. We have waited too long to take a position on the Algerian problem. Would you want us who Nations troops dug in at Léo- fought for independence, to stand dumb before the heroic struggle of a colonized people, a subjugated people?

Indifference Rejected

"That is why I have affirmed that Mali could not rest indifferent before the Algerian drama and that, if it must be, if despite all efforts to impress France on this issue with the collaboration of the other African states we should fail, the only means left to us would be to affirm African solidarity by the recognition of the provisional Algerian government.

"By having said that, we disturbed the men in Paris who still pull the strings. I also wish to have the colonized peoples take over progressively the economic control of the former colonial areas.

"For having said all that, Mali must die. But Mali will not die, because we have sworn to maintain it and we respect our oath."

Thur. 8-25-60

By W. GRANGER BLAIR

Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, Aug. 24—There was a growing expectation in official circles today that Premier Modibo Keita of the Republic of Sudan would come to Paris to consult with President de Gaulle on the political breakup of the Mali Federation.

The West African federation fell part last Saturday when Senegal seceded from its union with the Sudan. The two republics formed the Mali Federation eighteen months ago and had received their independence from France two months ago.

No message from Mr. Keita, who is Premier of Mali, has been received here since he warned President de Gaulle yesterday that French recognition of Senegal's secession could have grave international consequences.

Officials here were more optimistic today that Premier Keita would avail himself of President de Gaulle's offer to try to patch up differences that divide the two republics.

Premier Dia Pulls Out

Premier Mamadou Dia of Senegal pulled out of the federation after a long struggle for political supremacy. His defense and external security powers had been canceled by Premier Keita.

He conferred yesterday with President de Gaulle and said Senegal wished to negotiate new accords with France as soon as possible.

It was General de Gaulle's reserved reaction to Mr. Dia's announcement that appeared to be calming the dispute.

General de Gaulle was said to have simply noted the Sengalese position and to have assured Mr. Dia that France's aid would be continued.

No Official Recognition

Since President de Gaulle gave no official recognition to Senegal, hopes were raised and tempers lowered in Bamako, capital of Sudan.

Officials here were willing to be optimistic about a possible visit from Premier Keita. However, few officials believe that the Mali Federation can be resurrected. What is hoped is that differences between Sudan and Senegal can be ironed out to the benefit of both republics and of other African states linked to France in the French Community.

Mr. Dia was said to be satisfied with the French position and to have expressed his understanding of France's desire not to do anything before hearing the other side.

Mr. Dia left tonight by plane for Dakar, capital of Senegal. Another passenger on the plane was W. Averell Harriman, former Governor of New York, who is beginning an eighteen-day tour of West Africa in behalf of Senator John Kennedy of Massachussetts, Democratic candidate for President.

Mr. Harriman discussed African problems with Foreign Minister Maurice Couve de Murville this afternoon. When he ends his African trip, Mr. Harriman hopes to visit President de Gaulle before returning to the United States.

Premier of Former French Colony Requests Security Council Session on Split

By Reuters.

BAMAKO, Sudan, Aug. 25—Mobido Keita, Premier of the Republic of Sudan and of the Mali Federation, announced today that he had asked Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold for a United Nations Security Council meeting on the break-up of the federation.

The Republic of Senegal, the other member of the federation, broke away from it last Saturday.

Tie to Algeria Threatened

Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, Aug. 25—Premier Modibo Keita of the Republic of Sudan, in West Africa has threatened to recognize the Algerian Provisional Government.

This was disclosed last night in Bamako, capital of Sudan, when a speech Mr. Keita made last Monday was rebroadcast over the Mali radio.

The Sudanese Premier, who also is Premier of the Mali Federation, originally made the speech after he had been expelled from the neighboring Republic of Sengal. The two Republics had made up the Mali Federation until last Saturday, when a conflict of political personalities and of interests led Senegal to break away from the federation.

Mr. Keita's remarks on the Algerian question were viewed here with apprehension. Should Sudan eventually recognize the Algerian rebel Government, it would be the first open support for the rebels from among the African states that are members oft he French Community.

Observers here found significant the fact that the speech, which went almost unnoticed when it was made, was rebroadcast after Mr. Keita had returned to Bamako from Dakar, capital of Senegal and former capital of Mali.

The rebroadcast, it was held here, would tend to confirm that Mr. Keita's threat about Algeria was not something uttered on the spur of the moment and in anger over the break-up of the federation and his expulsion from Senegal.

According to reports of the speech, Mr. Keita linked the break-up of Mali to "disturbed men in Paris" who were aware of Sudanese sympathy for the Algerian rebel cause of independence from France. These men, he said, set in motion events that resulted in the secession of Senegal from Mali.

It appeared that there was another potential trouble spot in the French Community when it was reported today that Vice-Premier Gabriel Lisette of the Chad Republic, in Central Afric, had been removed from office while he was absent on a visit to Israel.

African Checkers

Much of Africa at the moment appears as a checkerboard on which forces working for freedom and order must move their pieces on "squares" that keep changing shape and position in a phantasmagoria.

Before a Congolese federation can be achieved, or even the central government's rights clearly established, the Mali federation of two former French colonies, the Sudan and neighboring Senegal (capital, Dakar) is rapidly disintegrating. Insofar as Senegal's leadership is concerned, indeed, the Mali federation is already a thing of the past. Senegal has seceded. But the Sudanese leader, Premier Modibo Keita, denies the possibility of secession and says France itself is party to the federation agreement, thus inviting French intervention on his behalf.

The Mali and Congolese crises are curiously linked by practical considerations. But they also present strange contrasts which illustrate the diversity of problems which independence-pell-mell presents to friends of freedom everywhere.

Mali troops are part of the United Nations operation in the Congo. They are reported in battle with tribesmen in Katanga. But complicating the UN's problem is the fact that the governmental authority under which the Mali troops are supplied is itself seriously in question.

Of more generalized interest is the fact that federation of the onetime French Sudan with Senegal has given the Sudanese Premier, backed by a much bigger population than that of Senegal, a political advantage that Senegalese Mamadou Dia refuses to tolerate. The Sudanese leader moreover is reported as using his advantage in a highhanded way.

Obviously here, as in the Congo, the clash of personal ambitions is very strong—perhaps stronger than any concept of national interest. But whereas in the Congo antifederationists seem bent on imposing their wills on their opponents with little or no compromise, it is the federationist element in the Mali situation that seems to be playing that role.

WELENSKY WARNS RHODESIA RIOTERS

Federation Prime Minister Pledges Firm Action to Halt Outbreaks by Africans

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, May 14—Sir Roy Welensky, Prime Minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, gave a stern warning today against violence by African nationalists.

He said on his arrival here by plane from London, where he attended the conference of British Commonwealth Prime Ministers, that the Federation's Government would give "full and complete support to the efforts of Northern Rhodesia to restore law and order."

In the last week, Africans have engaged in arson and stoning of whites during outbreaks of violence in the vicinity of the Northern Rhodesian copper-mining centers of Ndola and Kitwe.

Noting that the federal Government has a strong air force and troops, Sir Roy said: "There is a belief in the world that violence pays but I want to say that violence will not pay in the Federation."

Sir Roy, speaking at a news conference on the Commonwealth meeting, said he was "not very happy" that "some members of the Commonwealth enjoy all the privileges but make no contribution."

"Some of the rules of the club need to be revised," he asserted.

He criticized the policy of nonalignment in world affairs practiced by some Commonwealth countries, such as India. As for the Federation, he said "we are aligned with the West and as members of the Commonwealth club we are ready to make our contribution." The Prime Minister referred specifically to the availability in Western defense plans of the jet-equipped Royal Rhodesian Air Force.

Sir Roy also said he was concerned whether such states as Sierra Leone, Malta and Cyprus should become full members of the British Commonwealth and have representation at Prime Ministers' conferences after they achieve independence.

"I do not want to see the Prime Ministers' conference become a sort of Commonwealth United Nations," he said. "It would be odd for St. Helena, for example, to talk about world disarmament."

Sir Roy said he had gone to the Commonwealth meeting "very unhappy" because "I thought there was going to be a first-class dust-up." This was avoided, he said, largely through the influence of Prime Minister Macmillan of Britain, who presided.

"South Africa was the villain of the piece," Sir Roy commented, adding that during his stay in London he had "made it very clear" that the Federation's policies toward Africans were "quite a bit different" from those of South Africa.

Turning to a suggestion by Ghana and India that travel documents issued by them to persons not citizens of the two countries should be honored by the Federation, Sir Roy said the Federation had to think of its relations with its neighbors.

Ghana and India had offered to provide travel papers to political refugees from South Africa who were denied passports by the South African Government. Sir Roy said the subject was not discussed at the Prime Ministers' conference.

Congo Tribes Cautioned

Special to The New York Times.

LEOPOLDVILLE, Belgian Congo, May 14—The new Governor of Leopoldville Province, Alain Stenmans, warned today that his administration was preparing "drastic measures" to deal with any recurrence of yesterday's tribal fighting, in which five Congolese were slain.

Leaders here of the warring Lulua and Baluba tribes were summoned to City Hall by the chief burgomaster, Georges Depi, to discuss the restoration of calm. Widespread deportation of the Lulua and Baluba to their homelands in the Kasai Pro[illegible] of the stern quarter remained under a state of military occupation. Bars were closed at 6 P. M. No gatherings of more than five persons were permitted. The funerals of the victims—two Lulua and three Baluba — were held quietly.

In their present fearful state, the city's 5,000 Lulua would welcome deportation, since they are outnumbered four to one by the Baluba here. Moreover, their tribe seems to be winning the six-month-old war with the Baluba in the Kasai.

African Group Seeks Freedom

Crisis Year for Rhodesia and Nyasaland

BY ARTHUR VEYSEY

[Chicago Tribune Press Service]

[Reprinted from Monday's late editions]

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, May 8—This is crisis year for the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, formed only 7 years ago from two British colonies and one former colony.

Banda

Talk of secession and war range up and down the high central African plateau, an area one-third as large as the United States. Ministers, politicians, and business men are flying between the three capitals — Salisbury, Lusaka, and Blantyre—and London, separately and in groups.

Crisis Has Come

The crisis has come now because the federal constitution provided for a review after 7 years. At the same moment, the British government is working on a more liberal constitution for Nyasaland, the home of three million Negroes, opened to the world by David Livingstone, the missionary-explorer a century ago.

Decisions taken in the next few weeks may set the pattern for life of 300,000 whites and 7 million blacks in the federation for some time.

At one extreme, African politicians including the Chicago trained Dr. Hastings Banda, demand Nyasa independence now. They want the territory, still under colonial rule, to be taken out of the federation and the government handed over to them.

Ask for Partition

At the other extreme, a minority of whites want the best parts of the federation partitioned as a new nation or part of the Union of South Africa. The rest of the area would be thrown to the blacks to do with as they please.

The prime minister, Roy Welensky, supporter of racial partnership and federation, says that Nyasa secession would mean bankruptcy. To the white would-be partitioners, he snaps:

"If 300,000 whites can't live among 7 million Africans how will they be able to live with the 3 million who will remain in the much smaller area? They will still be outnumbered 10 to one."

Demand British Move

Welensky's supporters demand that the British government move out of central Africa and turn over all of its remaining powers to the three separate territories and trust each territory to make proper relations with its citizens and with the federal administration.

To meet the fact that Nyasaland is almost entirely black and primitively argricultural and the two Rhodesias have large white populations, fine modern cities, vast European farms, and multi-billion dollar mines, Welensky suggests a federal senate be added with equal representations from the three areas.

The colonial office has no declared intention of moving at once out of central Africa or being a prime mover in breaking up the federation.

Oppose White Rule

That Africans oppose federation in particular and white rule in general is an unchallenged fact. The opposition got so strong last year that governors in Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland declared emergencies which allowed the arrest, without warrant or trial, of almost 2,000 Africans. The majority were freed within three months and the rest came before special tribunals which ordered further detention for those it considered a danger to public order.

Now about 170 are held. Their cases are reviewed at least once every six months. Rhodesian law permits holding the troublemakers up to five years. In Nyasaland the term is indefinite.

Calls Up Troops

To grab the troublemakers the governments called up troops and police and gave them power to arrest without warrant. The troops and police were authorized to shoot. They did so only in Nyasaland, killing about 50 and injuring three times that number. In Southern Rhodesia, no African has been killed in political turmoil since 1896, a record few long established countries can match.

(Arthur Veysey, chief of The Tribune's London bureau, has been touring Africa for several weeks. This is another of a series of articles on Rhodesia and Nyasaland and other parts of the continent where nationalism is bursting the bonds of colonialism.)

Mobs Stone, Burn Whites in Rhodesia

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia (AP)—Negro mo violence has flamed against white settlers in Northe Rhodesia, a part of Britain's Central African Federatio

Police held 127 Africans and sought others Monday for a series of fire and stoning attacks in the Northern Rhodesia cooper belt over the weekend. Several persons were injured.

The sudden outburst led to speculation that a scheduled visit by Britain's Queen Mother Elizabeth to the Federation—a union of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland in which 282,000 whites dominate a native population of 7½ million—will be canceled. She was due in Salisbury Wednesday for a 20-day tour.

A white woman and her two daughters were among victims of Negro bands on a rampage that recalled the nationalist-inspired racial troubles that the Federation government crushed with troops last spring. All three were burned.

Cars were special targets of the mobs. Mrs. Lillian Burton, 38, was driving with her daughters Rosemary, 12, and Debbie, 4. Police gave this account:

A band of about 30 blacks stopped the car at Ndola, the chief trouble spot. They stoned the car and, with all three of the Burton family inside, doused it with gasoline and set it afire.

Mrs. Burton was burned severely. The two girls were slapped and kicked by the Negroes, but escaped into the brush. All three were hospitalized.

Eight other white men reported their cars damaged in similar raids Sunday near Ndola. At Kitwe five white men said they were stoned in their cars or in the yards of their homes.

RHODESIANS STUDY U. S. CONSTITUTION

But Interest in the Document Coincides With Growth of Anti-Americanism

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, March 18—An outbreak of anti-American feeling has coincided here with increased interest in the United States Constitution.

In recent weeks a series of letters critical of the United States' concern about Africa has appeared in Salisbury newspapers. One paper, The Sunday Mail, published an editorial accusing Americans of "meddling in our affairs." At the same time, requests to the United States Information Service for copies of the Constitution have increased sharply.

Revision of the Constitution of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland is scheduled to be discussed in London later this year and considerable interest has been expressed here in making changes based on provisions of the United States Constitution.

Sir Roy Welensky, Prime Minister of the Federation, has spoken of the possibility of adopting a bill of rights in the Federation's new constitution. He also has spoken of the creation of a bicameral legislature with a new senate as the upper house and the present Assembly as the lower.

Africans preparing for the London conference also have been giving close study to American constitutional guarantees of civil rights.

Increased interest in the United States Constitution was touched off by R. S. Garfield Todd, former Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia and leader of the liberal Central Africa party, in a speech last July calling for a bill of rights on the American pattern. Since then the United States Information Service has distributed 700 copies of the Constitution and has ordered 500 more to meet the continuing demand.

Press Cites 'Pressure'

One theme running through anti-American letters appearing in the local press is that recent decisions by Britain to advance Africans politically were made under pressure from the United States.

One letter published in The Rhodesia Herald, Salisbury's morning newspaper, said a "decadent British Government, under American pressure, is  * * steam-rollering its accursed policy right through Africa in order to give political control to the Africans so that America can beat the Russians to it."

Another letter in the same newspaper said Americans are "naive enough to suppose that by a great flourish of dollars and promises of rapid advancement to the Africans they can woo the Africans away from Britain or Russia and into the loving arms of America."

The Sunday Mail complained that Americans have sponsored trips to the United States for Africans among whom were "the most active troublemakers in their own countries."

The newspaper called for "some kind of Monroe Doctrine in Southern Africa" and said "the American State Department should be left under no illusions about the mounting resentment in the subcontinent against American intrigue and interference in our affairs."

Rhodesia Calm With 12 Killed

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

BULAWAYO, Southern Rhodesia—The death toll in this riot-torn city rose to 12 Wednesday as the African labor force flocked back to work.

All was quiet after three days of violence. The police said they believed the racial fury that had gripped the city since Sunday had spent itself. In addition to those killed, 113 persons were treated for injuries and 360 were arrested.

Three Africans died in the hospital Wednesday of wounds or injuries suffered during the disturbances of the last three days. Nine other deaths had been counted up to Tuesday night.

No whites were killed during the rioting, but some suffered minor injuries from stoning by Africans.

After a quiet night Africans who had stayed away from their jobs on Monday and Tuesday began streaming into the city's industrial and business centers about 6 p.m. By 8 a.m. nearly all of the 65,000 who were employed here were back at their jobs as though nothing had happened.

Long lines of troops with fixed bayonets were on guard along the routes into the business and industrial sections to protect workers against possible attacks by intimidators. None developed. Much of the violence in the last few days has been attributed by officials to hooligans and agitators, and a heavy display of force by police and troops has been made. Many of those arrested have been accused of intimidation and looting.

Officials who toured Bulawayo's eight African townships, where more than 150,000 Africans live, estimated at more than $300,000 the damage done during the riots. More than a score of African shopkeepers have been put out of business as a result of looting and burning of their shops.

Crews of municipal employes were at work throughout the day in the townships with shovels, rakes and brooms trying to clean up the debris-strewn streets.

Meanwhile police, supported by troops, moved through the townships searching houses for goods stolen from shops in the last few days. A police spotter plane circled overhead on lookout for Africans trying to bury loot.

A tour of the townships disclosed wrecked and burned beer halls and administrative offices, metal telephone and light poles bent double, telephones ripped from public booths, thousands of broken windows in homes, schools, clinics and shopping centers, and post offices and motion picture theaters destroyed.

Police said they could not understand why the African rioters turned on fellow African businessmen and destroyed their shops and other establishments.

At least one explanation seemed to be that after the rioting was sparked Sunday by the prohibition of a political meeting, Africans stormed beer halls and wineshops and a political riot turned into a two-day drunken orgy Monday and Tuesday. Gangs of up to 7,000 roamed over a 42-square-mile area wrecking and looting as they went.

It was only the presence of more than 1,500 troops that prevented them from entering white areas of the city, which they tried to do Sunday night.

Africans Die While Singing For 'Freedom'

Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta, Ga.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia — (UPI) — European police Saturday night opened fire on an African mob chanting "freedom" and killed at least six Africans.

They acted after the Africans stoned cars and buses and set fire to buildings in Harare Township, a Negro quarter near here, in rioting that started with a traffic accident involving a white and an African.

Police, backed up by reserve squads and riot forces, fired tear gas into the crowd but the rioting continued. Then they used their guns.

At least two Europeans, a pregnant woman, Stephanie Mendoza, 18, and her husband, were injured in the stonings. Mrs. Mendoza is English and her husband Portuguese.

Shooting was heard sporadically from scattered parts of town, and the flames of burning buildings lighted the area.

The rioting began with a traffic accident in which a white woman in a car apparently injured an African cyclist. The fate of the woman was not known.

Appearance of African police apparently inflamed a crowd that had gathered at the scene of the accident. The mob began stoning the police and passing traffic.

Monckton Report Puts Macmillan on Spot

Washington, D.C. Sun. 10-9-60

By Rhys Meier
Special to The Washington Post

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia—Tuesday may well be a day of crisis for the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland and its prime minister, Sir Roy Welensky.

For then the results of the Monckton Commission report will be published. It is known that Welensky objects so strongly to the commission's reported recommendation favoring the right of secession from the Federation that he is prepared to resign and call a general election on the issue.

When Southern and Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were joined in the Federation in 1953, it was a sense a preliminary arrangement. The Federal Constitution approved by the British Government contained a clause opening the Constitution to adjustment in not less than seven and not more than nine years.

Welensky, who contends that the present Constitution gives no right of session and quotes ministerial statements from the House of Commons to back up his stand, recognized that this review proviso gave an air of impermanency to the Federation and caused overseas investors to hold back essential development capital.

With this consideration very much in mind, Welensky persuaded the British Government to hold the constitutional review at the end of 1960—as soon as the minimum period of seven years was up.

The Nyasaland riots intervened. Dr. Hastings Banda, the Nyasaland leader, and his lieutenants were arrested and an investigating commission found that the unrest was inspired by widespread dislike and distrust among Africans of the Federation and the association with white-dominated Southern Rhodesia.

The British Labor Party pressed the Government to appoint a committee of British members of Parliament to inquire into the affairs of the Federation. This was strongly opposed by Welensky. Out of the dispute came the compromise of the Monckton Commission.

Lord Monckton, eminent British lawyer and former Tory Cabinet Minister, presided over a commission of 26 members made up of British members of Parliament, representatives from thte Federation and its member territories (these included Africans), and representatives from Commonwealth countries with experience in operating a federal form of government (Australia and Canada).

Welensky insisted that the Commission should not have the right to consider or recommend the right of territories to secede or anything that would involve the dissolution or break-up of the Federation.

He considered he was given a categorical assurance to this effect by the British Prime Minister, Harold MacMillan. In fact, he is believed to feel that he has the assurance in writing.

As proof that others also believed MacMillan had given this assurance, he can point to the fact that the British Labor Party refused to participate in the Commission because it could not consider the secession of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and that the African nationalist political organizations in these two territories (Kenneth Kaunda's United National Independence Party and Dr. Banda's Malawi Congress Party) boycotted the Commission for the same reason.

Despite this, it is understood now that the Commission has recommended that any territory with responsible government (only Southern Rhodesia at this stage), and all of the three territories after another five years of federation, should have the right to secede if they wish.

It has recommended, also, a return to the territorial governments of many of the responsibilities that were ceded to the Federation on its inauguration—European agriculture, health, education, and so on. The Federal Government would be left with only such things as commerce and industry, customs, external affairs (where these are not conducted by Britain), defense and one or two other subjects.

All the reports on the Monckton Commission's recommendations are, of course, "leaks." They began in London and have continued in Salisbury—and they are known to be reasonably accurate.

Perhaps the only aspect of the report that they do not emphasize is that the Commission comes out strongly in favor of the Federation continuing—especially as an economic unit. Its recommendations are designed mainly as an attempt to overcome political objections to the association.

Welensky, it is understood, considers almost everything in the report negotiable — with the exception of the recommendation on the right of secession. On that point he believes he is committed.

He told the Federal Parliament when the appointment of the Commission was announced: "It will be realized that the Federal Government would never have been party to any inquiry which had as its purpose an inquest on the affairs of the Governments in the Federation or have associated itself with anything which called into question the continuation of the Federation itself."

He repeated this assurance to the electorate at public meetings throughout the country.

He has demanded therefore that Macmillan honor his assurance now and join with him in declaring that the Commission acted outside its authority in hearing evidence and recommending on the question of secession.

That, it seems, the British Government is not prepared to do at this stage—at least, not in a form acceptable to Welensky. The new Commonwealth Secretary, Duncan Sandys, spent a week in Salisbury in mid-September — much of the time in blunt argument with Welensky and his Government on the subject. But it seems he was unable to move Welensky.

Sandys is understood to have returned to London with a message to Macmillan to the effect that if he would not join with Welensky in rejecting secession recommendation, Welensky would do two things:

He would unilaterally repudiate that part of the report himself, and he would resign and go to the country on the issue in the feeling that the electorate had a right to an explanation of how he had come to give categorial assurance that had proved wrong.

Welensky followed this with a meeting with his United Federal Party leaders from the two Rhodesias and Nyasaland. It is known now that they decided to back him unanimously.

It is a hot one indeed for Macmillan. He knows that whatever he does he will be attacked in the House of Commons by the Labor Party. If he stands firm against Welensky, the Laborites can attack him on grounds he misled them and caused them to refuse to join in the Commission's work. If he gives in on the secession issue, he can be attacked for letting down African opinion in the Federation.

In the Federation itself a general election on the Monckton Commission's report, particularly with secession as the central issue, would be emotionally packed and bitter.

Mny of the electorate (who are mostly white) would be hostile to Britain and the British Government on the grounds that they had been betrayed. Only extreme rights wing members of the Dominion Party in Southern Rhodesia, would support the provision.

They want the right to secede so they can escape the threat that "black rule" in the other territories will swamp Southern Rhodesia at some future data.

Most politically conscious Africans throughout the Federation, on the other hand, would be hostile to Welensky for making the recommendation an issue at all. Secession is what they have been demanding with an ever-louder voice ever since 1953. Out of the election they would make Welensky an even more monstrous symbol of white domination and opposition to African aspirations.

If, to avoid this, Macmillan bows to Welensky's demands, he can expect fierce criticism from African politial leaders, perhaps denuniation. His fear must be that they will then turn away from Britain and seek support elsewhere.

It is as neat a dilemma as any Prime Minister has ever been in. Tuesday will show whether Macmillan is indeed Wondermac."

African Rioters Widen Attacks In South Rhodesia Factory Area

Special to The

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, Sept. 7—There were renewed outbreaks of terrorism today in the textile-manufacturing area of Gatooma, eighty-five miles south of here.

The police fired tear gas at groups of African rioters who continued a campaign of arson, stoning and intimidation that started yesterday after cotton-mill workers had gone on strike for more pay.

The trouble spread from Rimuka, an African township on the outskirts of Gatooma, to Ngezi, another African residential quarter four miles away.

A European who drove into Ngezi to bring employes to work fled when his car was heavily stoned. At Rimuka a large crowd forced its way into a beer hall that had been partly demolished and stole the remaining stocks of beer.

Last night the rioters set fire to the office of the native administration, started grass fires to decoy police patrols and stoned a train.

A reward of £500 ($1,400) has been offered by the police for information leading to the arrest and conviction of persons posting notices said to have incited the strike in Gatooma.

A spokesman said rewards would also be offered in other parts of the colony where violence occurred.

A. E. Abrahamson, Minister of Labor, held emergency conferences with Gatooma's police chief, civil commissioner, Mayor and clerk and with textile employers.

Capt. Luke Mutzigwa of the Salvation Army was assaulted last night. He fled with his family from their house and spent the night in the railway waiting room. Windows of the Salvation Army church building were broken.

Mrs. Elisabeth Mugwagwa, wife of a mill foreman, was seriously assaulted when a gang beat down the door of her house with an axe.

Gatooma's African school teachers, repeatedly molested, planned to form a barricade camp for the defense of their families.

RHODESIA FIGHTS TO REMAIN SEDATE

Proud British Africa Looks Unaffected by the Congo, but Only on Surface

By A. M. ROSENTHAL

Special to The New York Times.

CHINGOLA, Northern Rhodesia, Sept. 24 — Twenty-five miles from the hysteria of the Congo, the waiter in the hotel dining room put this neatly typed note on the table:

"The management reminds its guests that ties must be worn at lunch and jackets at dinner, think you."

This is British Africa, determinedly sedate a half hour from the border post of chaos. Chingola is burly Welsh copper-miners buying the week-end's pork sausage at supermarkets, little girls with long curls reading "The Adventures of Noddy" while their mothers have "perms," meat pies in the tea rooms, newspapers from Manchester, unsalted fried potatoes, policemen in Sam Browne belts, and the startling awareness that they are white policemen.

Congo Seems Unreal

Chingola, like the towns around it, looks so little like a stranger's image of Africa that within an hour or two the Congo begins to seem unreal.

It is a town that could be plucked up and put almost anywhere in the English-speaking West—four or five streets of shops, a bookstore, cars parked diagonally in the streets, the faceless sort of modern architecture over which the eye glides quickly and without registering anything except a feeling of familiarity.

Outside a toy store a prim little girl says exactly what little girls outside toy stores are in a habit of saying anywhere, "I want that set." Her father remarks, "Well, there's no harm at all in wanting," and drags her away.

Everywhere, at all times, there is the unbreakable social rite of Kyew.

"Kyew," says the man in the store when he hands you cigarettes. "Kyew," he says when you give him money, and "Kyew," he says when he gives you change. "Kyew," you say, too, always. It is not so much a matter of courtesy but of ritual.

The Congo and its nervousness, wild politics, smashed shops and Europeans holding getaway reservations on a half-dozen planes seem impossibly far away.

But they are not. It is just twenty-five miles to the border and everybody remembers it.

Chingola is a town that lives around its copper mine. The great copper belt of this part of Africa does not acknowledge the Rhodesia-Congo border and neither does the feeling of restlessness and change.

No Comment on a Beer

The Rhodesians have seen the long convoys of cars filled with Belgians driving the rutted road into safety. They read that the Northern Rhodesian police were rushed to the border, where there was a tribal revolt in the Congo. And there are other reminders of changing times.

In the lobby of a hotel an African in an open-collared white shirt—open collars are permissible in the lobby—sits down and orders a beer. He drinks it and that is all; nobody comments.

Just a few weeks ago an African would not have sat in the lobby and would not have ordered a beer. He still cannot order a whisky—hard liquor is forbidden to Africans. But every hotel restaurant and cinema in Northern Rhodesia is open to him.

Northern Rhodesia, federated with Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, wiped out social segregation by law. There was trouble and some rioting in nearby towns. And there were some "What-is-the-world-coming-to?" letters in the newspapers.

The miners who fear economic competition from lower-paid Africans protested. But the Africans stayed and the law was enforced.

"Oh yes," said a gray-haired woman who runs a combination grocery store and restaurant. "They are coming in," she said in a whisper. "But we don't make a fuss as long as they behave."

Segregationists have driven themselves into a sort of standing-up isolation. Africans take most of the tables in the bars of some Rhodesian towns. Whites who prefer not to sit in the same room retreat to the bar where they take their drinks standing. They look a lot less comfortable than the Africans.

Southern Rhodesia Faces Race Issue

The Commercial Appeal-Chicago Daily News Service

MALINDI, Kenya, Sept. 28.—In an attempt to avert race warfare, the self-governing British colony of Southern Rhodesia is to hold a great indaba (pow-wow) at which all shades of African opinion will have the opportunity to put their case.

Although Southern Rhodesia's racial policies have often seemed little more than apartheid-with-a-smile, the indaba is in the great tradition of the man whose name the country bears.

In 1897, the warlike Matabele tribe, a branch of South Africa's Zulus, rose in a rebellion which could only spell disaster for both white and black. Empire-builder Cecil Rhodes courageously went alone and unarmed into the Matopos Hills to hold an indaba with great Matabele chiefs.

Averted War

Rhodes' action averted war and it was the proud boast of Southern Rhodesia that no African had been killed by police gunfire since the Matabele put down their spears.

Termination of this record came at the industrial center of Bulawayo (which means "place of slaughter" in Matabele) in August when 11 Africans were killed and 441 arrested in riots following the arrest of black nationalist leaders. And it is this which has set the stage for the second great indaba.

Prior to the disorders, Prime Minister Sir Edgar Whitehead had been slow to grant reforms because he is responsible to an electorate which is 99 per cent white. His United Federal Party holds only a three-vote majority in Southern Rhodesia's legislative council and it was feared that any pronounced liberal moves would bring his government down.

Steps Taken

Now it is recognized that apartheid (strict racial separation) is a luxury which the tobacco - rich co[illegible],000 whites can no longe[illegible]d to enjoy at the expense of [illegible]hern Rhodesia's 2.7 million Africans.

In an effort to head off African discontent, Whitehead's government has already taken several important steps, some of which were planned even before the Bulawayo riots.

The all-white 30-member National Assembly is to be expanded to 50 seats, four of which will probably be held by Africans.

A parliamentary select committee has recommended repeal of the 30-year-old Land Apportionment Act, which places 48 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's 96 million acres in the hands of white owners, who regard the act as their Magna Carta. Acceptance of the report would mean that henceforth ownership of land would be open to all.

African wages have been hiked although much remains to be done in this regard. The average African annual wage is less than $280 and the gap between African and white earnings has widened in recent years.

Wage Boosts

The government believes that $450 per year is the minimum at which a married African urban worker can live, and without a wage increase the Africans understandably cannot be expected to believe that Rhodesia's vaunted policy of racial partnership has meaning.

Making the country's all-white civil service multi-racial with equal pay for equal work is also under consideration.

And it is possible that Southern Rhodesia, like Northern Rhodesia with which it is federated, may pass legislation making it an offense to refuse entry to hotels, movie theaters, restaurants and bars purely on grounds of color.

Racial Conference Set In Southern Rhodesia

The Evening Star Washington D.C. 9-23-60

By SMITH HEMPSTONE
Contributing Writer

MALINDA, Kenya. — White and African leaders of Southern Rhodesia will meet in a great indaba (or pow-wow), this fall in an eleventh-hour attempt to ease racial tensions in that self-governing Central African British colony.

Although Southern Rhodesia's racial policies have often seemed little more than apartheid-with-a-smile, the indaba is in the great tradition of the man whose name the country bears.

In 1897, the war-like Matabele tribe, a branch of South Africa's Zulus, rose in a rebellion which could only spell disaster for both white and black. Empire-builder Cecil Rhodes went alone and unarmed into the Matopos Hills to hold an indaba with great Matabele chiefs.

Rhodes' action averted war, and it was the proud boast of Southern Rhodesia that no African had been killed by police gunfire since the Matabele put down their spears.

Eleven Killed in Riots

Termination of this record came at the industrial center of Bulawayo (which means "place of slaughter" in Matabele) in August when 11 Africans were killed and 441 arrested in riots following the arrest of black nationalist leaders. And it is this which has set the stage for the second great indaba.

Prior to the disorders, Prime Minister Sir Edgar Whitehead had been slow to grant reforms because he is responsible to an electorate which is 99 per cent white. His United Federal Party holds only a three-vote majority in Southern Rhodesia's Legislative Council and it was feared that any pronounced liberal moves would bring his government down.

Now it is recognized that apartheid is a luxury which the tobacco-rich country's 230,000 whites can, no longer, afford to enjoy at the expense of Southern Rhodesia's 2.7 million Africans.

Several Steps Taken

In an effort to head off African discontent, Mr. Whitehead's government already has taken several important steps, some of which were planned even before the Bulawayo riots.

The all-white 30-member national assembly is to be expanded to 50 seats, four of which will probably be held by Africans.

A parliamentary select committee has recommended repeal of the 30-year-old Land Apportionment Act, which places 48 per cent of Southern Rhodesia's 96 million acres in the hands of white owners, who regard the act as their Magna Carta. Acceptance of the report would mean that henceforth ownership [illegible] land would be open to all.

African wages have been increased, although much remains to be done in this regard. The average African annual wage is less than $280 and the gap between African and white earnings has widened in recent years. The government believes that $450 per year is the minimum at which a married African urban worker can live, and without a wage increase the Africans understandably cannot be expected to believe that Rhodesia's vaunted policy of racial partnership has meaning.

Equal Pay Considered

Making the country's all-white civil service multi-racial with equal pay for equal work is also under consideration. And it is possible that Southern Rhodesia, like Northern Rhodesia with which she is federated, may pass legislation making it an offense to refuse entry to hotels, movie theaters, restaurants and bars purely on grounds of color.

Although inadequate housing, poor social conditions, low wages, unemployment, discrimination and unhappiness over land apportionment unquestionably are contributory factors to the general ill-feeling which exists between the races, the heart of the matter is the Africans' desire for a greater say in the affairs of the country.

Too much has happened in Africa during the last decade for the black nationalist leaders to be satisfied with four seats out of 50 in the legislature and an improvement in their economic condition, although moderate Africans, of course, will welcome these moves.

New Political Opposition

For the first time in its history, Southern Rhodesia faces an articulate and efficient African nationalist political machine, the National Democratic Party. In the past, membership in such parties has been restricted largely to hooligans.

But in recent weeks, the most liberal of the multi-racial parties has lost the bulk of its African membership, university men trained in political organization, to the NDP. It was evidence of the growing power of the party which led Mr. Whitehead to make the arrests which touched off riots in Salisbury and Bulawayo.

The total success of the indaba, which will be held in November under the chairmanship of Sir John Kennedy, a former governor of Southern Rhodesia, is doubtful. The government will not be bound to accept its recommendations and the African political leaders are unlikely to do so. But it is a hopeful sign when men of different races can sit down to discuss their grievances and aspirations at the same table south of the Zambezi.

WHITE RULE CHALLENGED

The Montgomery Advertiser Montgomery Ala. Sun 7-26-60

Troops, Police Seal Off Site Of Rhodesian Riots

BULAWAYO, Southern Rhodesia (AP)—Troops and police sealed off native townships Monday night after two days of rioting and a strike against white rule.

So far police have not used bullets against native rioters in this commercial and industrial center of 52,000 people. But ground and air forces have used tear gas.

Police engaged in a club-swinging battle with native mobs in the afternoon and were forced to withdraw.

More than 2,000 troops and police, both blac and white, surrounded the native quarters, which were ablaze with fires as rioters burned cars and houses.

Many white residents locked themselves in their homes for the night, armed with guns. They were wondering whether the government has enough troops to put down any full-scale uprising.

Police, backed by white British troops, quelled a riot of several thousand Africans Sunday night.

Monday morning Negro agitators moved into white suburbs of Bulawayo—which means "place of the killing" in the native language—and persuaded many Negro servants to quit their jobs. White attendants also were put to work at some gasoline stations where Negroes usually man the pumps.

Seventy-two Negroes appeared in court Monday on charges of taking part in riots. They were ordered held until Aug. 8 for trial.

Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland comprise Britain's Central African Federation, which lies between the chaotic Congo and the white-supremacist Union of South Africa.

The racial policy of the federation officially is "partnership," but the Negroes claim they are a long way from equal rights with the whites.

Rhodesia Looks to African Rule; Constitution Changes Due in '61

British Officials in North See Next Step as Shift in Council's Majority

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

LUSAKA, Northern Rhodesia, Aug. 8—Officials here believe the next step in this British protectorate's advance toward self-government will be changes in its Constitution next year to provide for an African majority in the Legislative Council.

They see this development as a consequence of the decision last week in London to grant Africans a majority in Nyasaland's Legislature. To give Northern Rhodesia's 2,500,000 Africans less, it is believed, would be inviting trouble.

However, because there are 80,000 whites here, Constitutional changes will not be made so easily as in Nyasaland, where the white population totals only 8,000. Many whites in North Rhodesia are opposed to yielding their present domination of the government to Africans.

Sir Evelyn Hone, Governor of Northern Rhodesia, said in an interview that violent events in the Congo had made the majority of whites here more determined to hold out against African political advancement. "The attitude of most of them is based on fear," he said.

Whites Buy Firearms

One indication of the extent of white fear in recent weeks has been the race to buy firearms. The three gunsmiths in Lusaka have sold out their stocks of pistols and revolvers as well as substantial quantities of ammunition. About 100 guns have been sold and new supplies have been ordered from Britain.

The views of many whites were summarized by John Gaunt, who represents Lusaka in the Federal Assembly in Salisbury. He said:

"I am not prepared to live in a country under a black government with a black prime minister, black judges and black policemen, because I don't believe that they have the same high standards of integrity and behavior that I am acustomed to. They may reach those standards in time, but there is no sign of it today, as events in other countries have shown."

Meanwhile, the Government under Governor Hone is acting to prepare Northern Rhodesia for the changes it regards as inevitable. Legislation barring discrimination in restaurants and movie theatres has been adopted and the Governor is trying to get African and white leaders together to draw up a timetable for orderly constitutional moves toward African control. Safeguards for whites would probably be included in a bill of rights.

Police Force Expanded

At the same time, Sir Evelyn says his chief task is to insure that law and order are maintained. Police and military units are being expanded and British troops are available in Kenya.

Economically, what is at stake in Northern Rhodesia is the copper-mine area between Ndola and Bancroft that lies hard against the border of potentially explosive Katanga in the Congo. The copper belt is the economic bulwark of the Federation of Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and is the chief source of revenue and employment for Northern Rhodesia.

The attitude of some whites toward Africans in Northern Rhodesia is strongly influenced by the presence of many white South African mine workers in the copper belt. They have brought their harsh racial opinions with them from South Africa and give them full voice at every opportunity.

But other points of view are often heard in the territory, too. Among them is that of Sir John Moffat, leader in Northern Rhodesia of the multi-racial Central African party and a member of the Legislative Council. He said:

"The Africans here are extraordinarily reasonable people, but they are getting impatient. After all this is a protectorate, not a British possession. It belongs to the Africans and if they want to govern it why shouldn't they?

"Basically here it is a white problem, not an African problem. We have a small white community that won't face the facts of life in Africa and the time we've got is too short to abolish the differences between the two. At the most we have five years to train the Africans for self-government."

Nyasaland to Aid Africans

ZOMBA, Nyasaland, Aug. 8 (Reuters)—A program to educate African voters for elections under Nyasaland's new Constitution was announced today by the Government.

The Government statement was taken as a rejection of a demand yesterday by Dr. Hastings Banda, leader of the African Malawi Congress party, for an election in November.

The statement said: "It will be some time before the territory is ready for a general election. It is impracticable to say now precisely when this will be."

P. 3

NDOLA, Northern Rhodesia, Sept. 3 (Reuters)—The police took strong measures to prevent further racial violence today after whites and Africans clashed in Northern Rhodesia's copper-mining area last night for the second time in two days.

Herald 9-4-60

At least two persons were injured in the fighting. The violence was touched off by a new Northern Rhodesian law opening hitherto white-only hotels, movie theatres and restaurants to all races.

Newspaper

The police used tear gas and clubs Thursday night at Kitwe, the copper belt's other main town, to disperse whites protesting against the law.

Last night's battle here began when an African and a white man started fighting in the street near the Shelbourne Hotel patio, which was crowded with African men and women. Twenty yards away, white people were drinking at a cocktail bar.

Within minutes, Africans and whites had left the hotel and come to blows. A group of white men broke up a dart game to join in, and chased Africans with darts still in their hands.

White women pleaded with their husbands to "lay off" and tried to drag them back to their quarters in the hotel. Children became hysterical when the fighting broke out.

As the battle raged, a lone African stood in the middle of the street delivering a speech on the elimination of the color bar. He was unmolested.

At Kitwe, the police closed the bars early at the Astra Cafe and Nkana Hotel, center of Thursday's disturbances, and called in reservists to reinforce patrols.

Southern Rhodesia: Strikes and Riots

The Christian Science Monitor

Boston, Mass.

By the Associated Press

Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia

Several hundred African industrial workers are striking in the Southern Rhodesian city of Bulawayo after a weekend of rioting elsewhere in the country.

Oct 11 1960

The walkouts appear to indicate continuing racial tension upon the eve of publication of the report of the commission headed by Lord Monckton on the constitutional future of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland.

The controversial report was prepared by a 26-member advisory commission headed by Viscount Monckton, a former Conservative cabinet minister.

Advance press reports about the commission's findings already have brought tension to boiling point in the federation. The advance reports said the Monckton commission would recommend the right of secession to northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

The two African territories are both British protectorates. In 1952 they were formed into a Central African Federation with Southern Rhodesia, a self-governing British colony.

There were race riots in Bulawayo in July but the Oct. 10 strike is peaceful, according to a police spokesman. Riots in the African townships near Salisbury and Gwelo Oct. 8 and 9 mark the fourth outbreak of violence in Southern Rhodesia in three weeks.

Civilian police reserves were called out in Bulawayo as the strike intensified. At least nine Bulawayo factories reported none of their African workers showed up. The local bus company reported all its African staff stayed home.

A sitdown strike was reported by Rhodesian wire industries, where 200 workers were sitting outside factory buildings. Police said Africans were reported to have threatened other African workers who tried to enter the factory.

All was reported quiet in Gwelo after industrial property was damaged by Africans who set fire to numerous buildings and automobiles. Gwelo police said three Africans were in the hospital with gunshot wounds. Four were arrested.

The Gwelo rioting started after a meeting of the African nationalist political party which reportedly protested against police shooting at Africans in Salisbury's Harare Township. Seven Africans were killed at Harare and about 100 wounded.

Except for Bulawayo, African workers were reported back at work in Southern Rhodesia Oct. 10. Tension has grown during the past few months here because of planned or suggested changes in the social and political setup.

Africans have demanded greater equality under the racial "partnership policy" in the Central African Federation of Nyasaland and Southern and Northern Rhodesia. Whites have been angered by talk that Britain might allow Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland to secede from the federation.

2 Bakeries and a Factory Burned at Gwelo—Police Reserves Called Out

New York

GWELO, Southern Rhodesia, Oct. 9 Reuters)—Police reserves were called out here tonight as rioting broke out in the wake of disturbances at Salisbury that left seven persons dead and eighty injured.

Herald 10-10-60

Two bakeries and a shoe factory were reported set on fire as a crowd of Africans converged on a housing area for persons of mixed race. Five cars and a truck were also set afire.

The police reserves—volunteers recently organized for use only when white residential areas are threatened — were called out after regular police were sent to several trouble spots.

The rioting occurred after the police quelled a crowd with tear gas when a meeting of the National Democratic party broke up in disorder.

At Salisbury, two Africans were arrested tonight after an African crowd smashed windows of a cocktail lounge in near-by Highfield, an African township. The trouble occurred when an African was refused admission because he did not comply with the bar's dress rules.

Riot Toll Reaches Seven

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, Oct. 9—The death toll in last night's African rioting here rose to seven today. The number of injured, including Africans and whites, was placed at more than 100.

Among the injured, four were in Critical condition with gunshot wounds.

More than eighty Africans were arrested, most of them for looting and others for assault and arson. Damage to shops and beerhalls that were swept by fire or sacked by rioters was estimated at $300,000.

Harare the African township where the riots occurred, four miles from the center of this capital of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, was tense but quiet today. Hundreds of Africans wandered through streets to view the damage done in disturbance that ended today.

Policemen armed with submachineguns, shotguns,, rifles, pistols and tear gas patrolled the area and hundreds of others stood ready at police posts. It was feared more demonstrations would occur tonight.

5,000 Rove Streets

Last night's violence, during which 5,000 Africans roved the streets of Harare, started after a white motorist ran down an African cyclist. The situation has become increasingly tense in recent weeks among Salisbury's Africans for several reasons.

There is serious unemployment, and unrest among the Africans has been aggravated because some of those employed had expected a wage increase Oct. 1 that did not materialize. Basically, however, the hostility to whites has been mounting since July, when rioting occurred following the refusal of Prime Minister, Sir Edgar Whitehead, to meet with African leaders to discuss African grievances.

In Harare about fifteen shops were burned or wrecked by rioters and two beerhalls and several automobile service stations were damaged by fire.

An African explained that the stores and gasoline stations were attacked because they were owned by whites, although operated by Africans.

Emergency Rule Prepared to Keep Africans From Disrupting Services

New York, N.Y.

Wed. 10-19-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, Oct. 18 — The Southern Rhodesian Government prepared today to declare a state of emergency if African political demonstrations interrupt vital services. African troublemakers would be taken into custody as part of such a program.

Legislation containing stiff provisions to deal with possible civil disorders was introduced today in the all-white assembly of this self-governing British colony. The measure was introduced by the Prime Minister, Sir Edgar Whitehead.

The legislation was prompted by African rioting ten days ago in Salisbury and by similar unrest in Gwelo and Bulawayo. Seven died in the outbreaks at Salisbury and property damage was high.

Troops were rushed into the areas last Friday. Since then the African townships have been quiet.

The proposed legislation, which is expected to be enacted within ten days, will enable the Government of Southern Rhodesia to declare an emergency should there be any interference or threat to such essential services as hospitals, transportation, power, water supplies, sewerage, food deliveries, fire protection, coal mining or communications.

The bill also provides for summary arrests and the removal of persons from one part of Southern Rhodesia to another. Violations of the emergency regulations carry penalties up to $1,400 in fines and two years imprisonment.

Another bill gives the police the power to arrest any person "who is unable to show that he is living by honest means and has a setled way of honest living." Such persons are to be classed as vagrants and sent to "re-establishment centers" for vocational training.

There are thousands of unemployed Africans in Southern Rhodesia—no one knows precisely how many—and the recent disorders have been attributed principally to unemployment. However, many persons fear that Government attempts to take into custody large numbers of unemployed Africans would lead to violent disorders.

Under the proposed legislation those classed as vagrants would be forcibly confined to re-establishment centers.

Other items on the Southern Rhodesia Government's program for curbing African riots include five-year prison terms for stoning automobiles. The Prime Minister has said this practice is "tantamount to attempted murder."

After the emergency proposals were submitted, Sir Edgar opened debate on the Monckton Commission Report.

Rhodesian Solution?

The N.Y. Times

New York

Of the regions that are still European dependencies in sub-Saharan Africa the British-controlled Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland presents a potentially most explosive situation. The Federation government, established in 1953, exercises considerable autonomy and is controlled by Southern Rhodesia's white settlers. The Africans, who outnumber the whites fourteen to one in Southern Rhodesia, thirty-nine to one in Northern Rhodesia and 250 to one in Nyasaland, bitterly resent white rule. In the last two states, opposition to the Federation—which is equated with white rule—has led to explosions of violence. Last winter Britain established a twenty-five-man commission, headed by Viscount Monckton, a former Cabinet Minister, and including five Africans, to review the Federation's constitution and make recommendations.

Report Is Issued

Last week the Monckton Commission released its report. It recommended that the federal link continue because it provides economic advantages for all three member states. But it urged drastic changes to provide greater freedom for the members, the establishment of political parity between the 6,000,000 Africans and the 300,000 whites (the Africans now have only twelve of the fifty-nine seats in the Federal Parliament) and the right of secession for each member state.

The extremists on both sides criticized the report. The whites in the Federation flatly rejected the provision granting the right of secession, and the Africans demanded that the Federation be scrapped entirely. Nonetheless, the report is to serve as the basis for discussion of a conference on the Federation's future which is scheduled to convene in London in December.

Rhodesia Girls Fighting Lobola, Ancient Marriage Fee Custom

The New York Times

New York, N.Y.

Urban Foes of Males' Dominance Rebel at 'Humiliating' Custom of Price, Once Set in Cattle, Now Cash

Sun. 9-25-60

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, Sept. 20.—African brides-to-be in Southern Rhodesia are rebelling against Lobola—the traditional marriage price that has been paid in cattle to parents for centuries.

Middle-class African girls who are abandoning in the cities and towns their beads and skins for European-style dresses, chic hats, and high-heeled shoes are protesting that the lobola system has become "a humiliating, masculine racket."

Their outcry, "We are no longer mere goods and chattels," is symptomatic of the urge in modern Africa to snap the shackles of slavish tribal custom and to gain equality with the male in a country where the law of the kraal (village) is still deep-rooted and dies hard.

The campion of emancipation in Southern Rhodesia, Mrs. Jane M. Chivanga of Salisbury, leads the campaign against lobola. She is rallying hundreds of women to her banner.

Once Every Girl's Aim

"At one time in this country, it was expected of every normal girl to bring home cattle for her lobola," says Mrs. Chivanga. "It was the envy of the girls in the village to see the elders leading the cattle into the kraal from one of their sisters. No grandmother or aunt considered her social duties done until all the daughters of the village, for whose behavior she was responsible, were married.

"From childhood the girls were brought up to realize that it was a great shame for any girl to get an illegitimate child; that girls were there to provide cattle for lobola for their brothers so that they, too, brought wives into the village to swell the numbers of the tribe.

"Old spinsters were not heard of. If a girl looked as if she was not attracting enough attention of the opposite sex for a marriage at the right age, a marriage was arranged for her.

A rich old man was approached and he gladly gave the required number of cattle and the embarrassing situation was avoided. Bitter old maids dodged by marriage were not known."

Mother Held Key Role

In the ancient rules of lobola, the bride's mother played an important role, for "no man in his right mind would dare accept it from a son-in-law without first consulting the mother if it was right for him to do so."

Evidence that loloba has become commercial can be found in letters to African newspapers and magazines. Father boast of cash tariffs of up to £100 ($280) for each of their daughters and of "side gifts" of cigarettes and crates of beer.

"Lobola is no longer a symbol where two or three oxen were sufficient," Mrs. Chivanga declared vehemently. "The man no longer thinks that the mother should be consulted because lobola is now paid in money—and women are supposed to keep their hands off any money affairs."

Mrs. Chivanga contends lobola has become "a torture" for the woman because the husband—"modern, shirt-tie type"—maintains that "no woman for whom I have paid lobola can do as she likes; no woman for whom lobola was paid can own money or property, or answer me back."

RHODESIA TROOPS ANGER AFRICANS

The N.Y. Times

Racial Tensions Aggravated by Call-Up of Forces and White Vigilantes

New York, N.Y.

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesian, Oct. 15—Bitter feelings between Africans and whites in Southern Rhodesia were further aggravated last week by police and troop action to avert race riots. Some observers here described the situation as explosive.

P 21

One element of danger is the determination of many whites to "teach the Africans a lesson they won't forget."

African rioting in Salisbury and Gwelo led to the formation of vigilante groups by some whites who threatened to march on Africans. Troops were called out by Sir Edgar Whitehead, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, to prevent race riots and to keep Africans in check.

Africans were enraged in Salisbury last Saturday when an African cyclist knocked down by a white motorist was left lying in the road critically injured while white policemen took the uninjured motorist away from the scene. Africans became more angered when the police fired tear gas into a beer hall where many African men and women were peacefully enjoying Saturday night entertainment.

New Trouble Indicated

There were other developments that indicated more trouble to come

For two hours one morning Prime Minister Whitehead met with representatives of the National Democratic party, the only political organization representing African interests in Southern Rhodesia. Membership in party is open to anyone and about twenty white have joined.

Leopold Takawira, president of the party, asked that the party be represented at any future conference between Britain and Southern Rhodesia to discuss changes in this British colony's Constitution. The Prime Minister refused.

Sir Edgar also informed the party delegation that he intended to send troops into African townships. Mr. Takawira warned him that if the police arrested any party members who had lost their jobs as a result of a riot in Salisbury in July, a general strike of all African workers in Southern Rhodesia would be called. He warned it would be a continuing strike.

Mr. Takawira emphasized that he was not opposed to the arrest of "holigans."

Unrest Is Analyzed

An African affairs specialist said privately during the week that 50 per cent of the trouble in Salisbury's African townships was economic. Forty-eight per cent of the unrest, he said, is caused by overcrowded housing. Only 2 per cent of the trouble was said to be political in nature.

Thousands of Africans are unemployed in Salisbury and those who are working have been caught in a pinch between low wages and rising prices.

The report by Britain's Monckton Commission last week on constitutional changes for the Federation of Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland added to the turmoil.

Most white Southern Rhodesians reject its recommendations for a greater African participation in affairs because they want to continue imposing white supremacy in the colony.

African spokesmen say that Africans are not interested in continuing the federation because to them it stands for white domination.

"The trouble here is caused because the African has come to associate the white man with domination," Enos Nkala, general secretary of the National Democratic party said in an interview.

"First we want African governments in the three territories, then we will talk about our own federation," he declared.

RHODESIA URGES AFRICANS TO VOTE

The N.Y. Times

But Native Leader Opposes Salisbury's Campaign as 'Qualified Franchise'

New York, N.Y.

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, Oct. 16—The exuberant strains of "Skokiaan," a popular African song, were played on tape to the swaying passengers packed in an African bus driving into the city.

Over the loudspeakers came the call: "Attention, please. Claim your vote now."

This was part of a new Government campaign to persuade Africans to register in time for the next election. The same exhortation came over the public-address systems in beerhalls and at other centers in the African townships.

The slogan "Claim your vote now and have a share in your future" has been appearing in commercial radio announcements and in advertisements in European and African newspapers. The drive is aimed at persuading the tens of thousands of "lost" European and African voters to register before the delimitation commission sits at the end of the year.

20,000 Natives Eligible

It is estimated that at least 20,000 Africans eligible for the vote on the qualified franchise have not registered. More than 40,000 Europeans also have not registered.

Thirteen new registering officers have started work, many at temporary offices in the African townships.

The Government is spending several thousand pounds on the campaign. It is estimated officially that just over 60,000 Europeans and 2,200 Africans have registered.

"It is the duty of the Government to try to get as many people to register as possible," Sir Edgar Whitehead, the Prime Minister, said recently in Parliament.

The authorities, however, are opposed by the African nationalists, who refuse to help in the registration drive.

Party Leader Opposed

"We are against the qualified franchise in Southern Rhodesia and therefore we will take no part in any voters' drive or any election until universal franchise is introduced," said Morton Malianga, vice president of the National Democratic party.

The qualifications that Mr. Malianga opposes include a considerable income or possession of property.

There is a limited registration of persons with lower qualifications, but it stops when their number is equal to 20 per cent of the total number of other registered voters.

Southern Rhodesia's Parliament will be enlarged to fifty members next year. Sir Edgar has said that if enough Africans register as voters at least three and possibly four African members could be elected.

White Guards Activated In South Rhodesia

The Christian Science Monitor

Boston, Mass.

Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia

Two more all-white battalions of National Guardsmen have been ordered activated, and a ban on political meetings has gone into effect in new government moves aimed at "rehabilitating" African agitators.

Some 1,600 trained white reservists, plus a few older men, have been told to report for duty in Salisbury and Bulawayo Oct. 28 for "training and organization." An estimated 1,600 reservists of the first and second battalions, activated last week, were on duty Oct. 17 in African townships.

General Secretary Enos Nkala of the African National Democratic Party said the troops represented a symbol of white supremacy and created suspicion among the people.

The government of Central Africa's Rhodesian Federation termed the activations part of "operation rehabilitation," aimed at clearing out troublemakers in African townships around the white sectors of Salisbury, Bulawayo and Gwelo. There have been disturbances in all three Southern Rhodesian communities since July.

A month-long ban on political meetings went into effect Oct. 15. The ban was announced as federal troops moved into the African townships around the three communities.

Rhodesia Vitalizes Desegregation Law

The Christian Science Monitor

Boston, Mass.

Kitwe, Northern Rhodesia

Overshadowed by events elsewhere in the Rhodesias, a new desegregation law has come into existence in Northern Rhodesia.

It is a new ordinance, making it illegal to exercise a color bar in restaurants, cinemas, cafés, and similar places of refreshment. These have previously been the almost exclusive preserve of white men in Northern Rhodesia.

The new measure's introduction has been partly marred by incidents in which groups of whites staged noisy and at times violent demonstrations against both Africans and restraining policemen.

Mob Broken Up

In one particularly disorderly clash, police had to throw tear gas grenades to disperse a mob of whites who were intent on teaching the African his "place."

However, objective observers of the scene in recent days have noted the good humor and tolerance with which the Africans, with few exceptions, have borne white hostility. Observers are also full of praise for the just and impartial manner in which the police have carried out their duty of enforcing the law.

But if the Africans are willing to exercise patience and forbearance, the authorities are not. The government is determined that their move to abolish racial discrimination shall not be thwarted.

Demonstrators Warned

Sterner measures are to be taken against demonstrators in future. The magistrate at Kitwe who tried cases arising out of the original disturbances imposed maximum sentences prescribed by the ordinance on a number of men.

But instructions have been given for prosecutions under the criminal code, which enables prison sentences to be inflicted on people guilty of assault, to be brought when the occasion warrants.

The fact that unruly scenes have been largely confined to the copper belt is not without significance. A very large proportion of the male populations of the mining towns consists of South Africans, recruited because of their technical skills from the Witwatersrand and Orange Free State gold fields. They have the traditional apartheid outlook on race relations.

'Superiority' Threatened

Another large segment is composed of British colliers and lower-grade artisans who oppose African advancement because they consider it menaces their own security, and who resent social equality because they have been enjoying a standard of living and a social standing that were denied them in their home country.

A rockbreaker in the copper mines earns between £200 and £300 a month, including overtime, commission and bonuses.

With few exceptions, the new anticolor bar measure has gone off smoothly in other parts of Northern Rhodesia.

Such outward scenes as have occurred outside the copper belt are regarded as "teething troubles" and optimism is felt in government circles that in spite of resentment by diehard white supremacists the whites of the territory will soon resign themselves to a fait accompli and gradually grow accustomed to the new order.

Meanwhile a formidable bill for compensation for loss of profits by proprietors of cafés and restaurants has already mounted up as a result of white boycotts during the first few days of the operation of the anticolor bar provisions.

Traders are reported to be apprehensive. But perhaps they may take heart from a restaurant manager in Ndola who said that business had even "picked up a bit" since desegregation became official policy.

RHODESIA TO SEEK CURB ON VIOLENCE

Salisbury Plans New Laws —Native Leader Scores Measure as 'Hitlerism'

New York, N.Y.

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, Oct. 24—A set of drastic new laws, designed to stamp out rioting and other violence in Southern Rhodesia, will be introduced tomorrow by the Prime Minister, Sir Edgar Whitehead.

The legislation consists of a bill with sixty clauses, including penalties for intimidation, boycott, arson, looting, malicious damage to property and throwing stones at motor vehicles.

The plan to rush the bill through Parliament was denounced today by Munukayumba Sipalo of Lusaka, secretary general of Northern Rhodesia's United National Independence party, as "running into the madness of Hitlerism."

Under the legislation the Government will be given powers to order a curfew, restrict "irresponsible publications" and control processions and public gatherings.

The Crown will be given the right for the first time to appeal court sentences that it considers too lenient.

Secret Oaths Covered

Carrying offensive weapons or material without authority would be made an offense. Support and protection would be given to security forces including the police, firemen and ambulance personnel.

The Government belief that a secret organization similar to the Mau Mau of Kenya exists among the natives was shown by inclusion of a clause prohibiting "unlawful oaths" and witchcraft.

About 500 Africans and two Europeans have been arrested in a drive against "hoodlums."

Secret hearings under a new Vagrancy Act were attacked and defended today by two lawyers, who are members of Southern Rhodesia's Parliament.

Dr. A. Palley of the Dominion party described the exclusion of the press and the public as "disgraceful."

John Pittman of the ruling United Federal party, replied that under the new legislation a magistrate informally inquired into a man's means of subsistence and that there was no reason why the proceedings should be in public.

Rhodesians Treated It As A Joke

Threatens Africans And Whites—"Army" Units Widespread

By Associated Negro Press

What shows every sign of developing into a Central African Ku Klux Klan has now emerged in Southern Rhodesia.

Going by the name of the Rhodesian Republican Army, it seeks to combine the tactics of Ireland's IRA, the intimidation of the KKK, and the secrecy of the underground resistance movements of World War II.

IT IS THE first time that a white underground movement has been established in Africa —with the exception of the abortive "Freedom Radio" station in the Union of South Africa, which was rapidly uncovered — and all the police in Southern Rhodesia have now been put on a nation-wide alert.

The R. R. A. first showed its hand around the middle of October, when it began distributing somewhat lurid circulars in Bulawayo, the country's commercial capital.

Many of the public figures receiving the circulars were known to be sympathetic towards African advancement. The circulars made it clear that the R. R. A. was dedicated to the maintenance of white supremacy.

The documents fell into the hands of the police and the newspapers, and were promptly treated as jokes: One newspaper report, headlined "ssh Read any good thrillers, lately?" poked fun at them on the assemption that the documents, all cyclostyled, had been sent out by a crank.

HOWEVER, an anonymous telephone call to the newspaper, gave this message: "You'll probably change your tune soon."

It is still being treated as a joke, but a rather poor one. Federal Prime Minister Sir Roy Welensky dismissed the whole thing as a hoax. But soon it became apparent that the R. R. A. had members in various parts of the country and their activities showed that there was quite a few of them.

IN SALSIBURY, Bulawayo, and other towns, hundreds of slogans went up overnight and the letters R. R. A. were crudely daubed on fences, walls and even traffic signs.

They were painted out by the authorities — and the next morning twice as many had gone up again. From the number it was obvious that no single person, or even a mere handful of people, could have been solely reponsible.

POLICE SET about tracking down the perpetrators (so far without any success) and the R. R. A. then sent a letter to the press explaining that even if individual members were caught, the movement was so organized that they would be unable to give away any valuable information.

Then came a daring arms raid on Gwelo school armory. Sixteen rifles, complete with bolts, were stolen and believed whisked away by lorry. They have not yet been recovered yet and the police now say:

"WE DON'T KNOW who is behind the R. R. A., but the possibility that it is connected with the Gwelo arms raid obviously cannot be entirely ruled out at present."

The R. R. A. began flooding the country with copies of a new bulletin 5,000 worlds long, printed on foolscap paper, and signed, "The Operator, Rhodesian Republic Army, GHQ, Southern Rhodesia."

IN IT, THE "Operator" talks of a bandit unit being set up, and states: "Europeans deaths by Negro savages will not be tolerated. Negroes will be discouraged from violence by violence."

The whole tone of the bulletin is a mixture of the juvenile and the sinister and ends with what might be a typical KKK threat:

"If the Government will not smash Negro killer mobs, they will soon get out of hand. We shall undertake this responsibility ourselves."

Rhodesia Frees Africa's Banda

Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta Ga.

ZOMBA, Nyasaland (UPI)—Dr. Hastings Banda, U.S.-educated leader of the Nyasaland African National Congress, was released after more than a year's detention in Southern Rhodesia as a subversive and flown here Friday.

Sat. 4-2-60

An official announcement said Banda talked with Gov. Sir Robert Armitage and British Colonial Secretary Iain Macleod at government house before motoring to his home at Limbe.

A government spokesman explained that Banda was released as an individual in an action resulting from the normal practices of review. He said the state of emergency decreed in the protectorate in central Africa following nationalistic riots last year would remain in effect.

Banda and about 150 other African Nationalists were detained March 3, 1959, following riots in Nysaland to protest its federation with southern and northern Rhodesia.

The colonial office quoted Gov. Sir Robert Armitage as saying that Banda now would be available to take his part in talks with Colonial Secretary Iain Macleod.

TO CONSIDER CHANGES

Macleod, Armitage said in a broadcast statement, was visiting Nyasaland for the express purpose of considering changes in the Constitution.

He said political leaders of all races had started talks with Macleod.

However, Armitage added that the state of emergency decreed after the March, 1959, riots would remain in effect as long as necessary in the interest of public safety.

Banda, 55, spent more than 40 years of his life abroad. But he was hailed by the Nyasas as a messiah when he returned to his homeland almost two years ago.

IS PASSIONATE SYMBOL

The stocky, grim little man had been in the forefront of the Nationalists fight for the independence since 1951. To the 2,500,000 natives, he was a passionate symbol of freedom.

Banda, born of poor, uneducated parents who belonged to the Chewa tribe, ran away at 13 to get an education. He worked in South African gold mines and saved enough money to pay for sea passage to the United States.

He lived in the United States for 12 years, studying medicine at the University of Chicago. He went to Britain later and studied at the University of Edinburgh before setting up practice in a London suburb.

Banda returned to Nysaland in July 1958 in response to appeals from supporters after the Nysaland Congress split on failure to move toward secession.

Negro Violence Flares Suddenly Against Northern Rhodesia Whites

The Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery Ala.

Sun. 5-10-60

Police held 127 Africans and sought others Monday for a series of fire and stoning attacks in the Northern Rhodesian copper belt over the weekend. Several persons were injured.

P. 9A

The sudden outburst led to speculation that a scheduled visit by Britain's Queen Mother Elizabeth to the Federation—a union of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland in which 282,000 whites dominate a native population of 7½ million—will be canceled. She was due in Salisbury Wednesday for a 20-day tour.

A white woman and her two daughters were among victims of Negro bands on a rampage that recalled the nationalist-inspired racial troubles that the Federation government crushed with troops last spring. All three were burned.

Cars were special targets of the mobs. Mrs. Lillian Burton, 38, was driving with her daughters Rosemary, 12, and Debbie, 4. Police gave this account:

A band of about 30 blacks stopped the car at Ndola, the chief trouble spot. They stoned the car and, with all three of the Burton family inside, doused it with gasoline and set it afire.

Mrs. Burton was burned severely. The two girls were slapped and kicked by the Negroes, but escaped into the brush.

All three were hospitalized, as was a white man, W. Meyer. He reported he was attacked by about 40 blacks four miles from Ndola, who stoned his car.

Eight other white men reported their cars damaged in similar raids Sunday near Ndola. At Kitwe five white men said they were stoned in their cars or in the yards of their homes.

At Bancroft, near the Belgian Congo border, three shelters at a beer hall were burned down Saturday night.

At Luanshya police used parachute flares and tear gas to disperse a Negro mob rioting at a beer hall. The officers said they retaliated after the Negroes stoned them.

Contributing to the tension in Northern Rhodesia were new disorders in the adjacent Belgian Congo. Many Rhodesian whites are bittter at the Belgians for giving the Congo independence and thus contributing to pressures from African nationalists.

New Riots Raise Fears In Rhodesia

The Washington Post 18a

Washington D.C.

LUSAKA, Northern Rhodesia, May 14 (AP)—Africans stoned police and other whites in sporadic clashes today in Northern Rhodesia.

Sun. 5-15-60

More violence is feared over the weekend and civilian reserves were alerted to assist police patrols, which already have been strengthened.

An African crowd stoned Luanshya police after they were discovered at an illegal political meeting. A petrol bomb was found later in a house and one African was arrested.

In some places, police reported that whites replied with assaults of their own. In Kitwe, the copper mine center, four whites in a car were reported to have stopped an African and whipped him with a bicycle chain.

A police reserve spotter plane flew over Kitwe and the surrounding area looking for illegal meetings of the banned United Independence Party, which has been outlawed in Northern Rhodesia's western province, including the copper belt.

Africa Whites Ask Protection

The Evening Star

Washington D.C.

LUSAKA, Northern Rhodesia, May 11 (AP)—The European Mineworkers Union, the strongest white group in Northern Rhodesia, has asked for Federal government intervention to maintain public safety. The request followed week - end Negro violence culminating in the beating and burning of a white woman and her two children near Ndola.

Wed. 5-11-60

Emrys Williams, the Union's acting general secretary, said the request was made to Sir Roy Welensky, prime minister of the Central African Federation, because of what Mr. Williams termed the territorial government's slowness in curbing Negro violence. The federation includes Northern and Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

The Union also asked Sir Evelyn Hone, Governor of Northern Rhodesia, for a meeting to discuss the situation.

Meeting Requested

The Union on Monday had asked him to resign.

The Negro United National Independence Party, which was blamed for Sunday's attack on the mother and her children, called for a week-lnog boycott of beer halls.

In the mining town of Bancroft, police broke up a Negro demonstration advancing on a police station following dispersal of an Independence Party meeting by police. Five Negroes were arrested.

Meanwhile, about 1,000 whites met in the town of Mufulira to support motions demanding the resignation of Sir Evelyn and cancellation of Queen Mother Elizabeth's visit to the federation.

Salisbury Joins in Plea

White settlers in Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, also put pressure on Sir Evelyn, urging him to move swiftly.

The Southern Rhodesia Association, a new group representing whites, cabled Sir Evelyn demanding his government "carry out its primary function of maintaining law and order."

The Rhodesia Herald of Salisbury charged that "the list of atrocities is growing" in Northern Rhodesia and called for drastic action.

SALISBURY, Rhodesia — (UPI) — Police planes dive-bombed the African quarter with tear gas Thursday night and truckloads of soldiers and police swarmed through the streets to smash riots by stone-throwing Africans that lasted throughout the day.

Sun. 5-22-60

Authorities reported 129 Africans arrested in the outbursts which police blamed on a handful of professional agitators who tried to stage a work stoppage.

Meanwhile

Police and federal troops attacked the rioters with tear gas and clubs but the crowds of Africans continued to mill around in the streets.

Negroes Attack Whites in N. Rhodesia

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, May 9 (AP)—Negro mob violence has flamed against white settlers in Northern Rhodesia, a part of Britains Central African Federation.

Police held 127 Africans and sought others today for a series of fire and stoning attacks in the northern Rhodesian copper belt over the weekend. Several persons were injured.

The sudden outburst led to speculation that a scheduled visit by Britain's Queen Mother Elizabeth to the Federation—a union of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland in which 282,000 whites dominate a population of 7½ million—will be cancelled. She is due in Salisbury Wednesday for a 20-day tour.

A white woman and her two daughters were among victims of Negro bands on a rampage that recalled the nationalist-inspired racial troubles which the federation government crushed with troops last spring. All three were burned.

Cars were special targets of the mobs and Lillian Burton, 38, was driving a car. With her were her daughters Rosemary, 12, and Debbie, 4.. Police gave this account:

A band of about 30 blacks stopped the car at Ndola, the chief trouble spot. They stoned the car and, with all three of the Burton family inside, doused it with gasoline and set it afire.

Mrs. Burton was burned severely. The two girls were slapped and kicked by the Negroes, but escaped into the brush.

All three are hospitalized.

Also hospitalized is a white man, W. Meyer. He reported he was attacked by about 40 blacks four miles from Ndola. His car was stoned and its windows smashed, but he managed to get away.

Eight other white men reported their cars were damaged in similar raids yesterday near Ndola. At Kitwe five white men said they were stoned in their cars or in the yards of their homes.

Last Sunday a mob of Negroes at Ndola stoned a car driven by a white woman, set her afire and beat her two small daughters. She is in serious condition.

AFRICAN OPPOSES RHODESIAN STRIKE

Kaunda, Nationalist Leader, Asks Passive Resistance at News Parley Here

By MURRAY ILLSON

A plea for nonviolent resistance to white rule in the troubled British protectorate of Northern Rhodesia was sounded here yesterday by an African nationalist leader who has just completed a month's tour of the United States.

Kenneth Kaunda, 36-year-old president of the recently outlawed United National Independence party, which opposes any form of white minority rule in Central Africa, declared that "violence is no solution to our problems at home."

In making his statement, Mr. Kaunda referred to reports of rioting in Northern Rhodesia's rich copperbelt area that resulted in the death of a white woman, the buying by whites there of "more and more firearms," the banning of his party and the arrest of "more than 120 Africans, including some of my colleagues."

Holds News Conference

Speaking at a news conference in the headquarters of the American Committee on Africa, 801 Second Avenue, Mr. Kaunda said he would not know until he returned home what had "led to this very unfortunate, sad and deplorable situation."

However, he observed that Northern Rhodesia had been politically unstable ever since Britain formed the federation of the protectorates of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland with the colony of Southern Rhodesia. He asserted that federation was imposed "on the unwilling Africans just to satisfy a handful of power-hungry settlers in 1953."

"Last year," he said, "a new Constitution—another of the many impositions—was introduced in Northern Rhodesia. It provided twenty-two seats for 70,000 settlers and only eight seats for 3,000,000 Africans."

Mr. Kaunda said the banned Zambia African National Congress, which was succeeded by the United National Independence party, had "opposed this constitutional arrangement as un-Christian, unethical, impolitic and unworkable in an area in which there was mass awakening on the African continent."

"We were arrested and exiled," he continued. "Some of us were rearrested, tried and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, while others remained exiled. We were all released early this year."

Sees Dictatorial Powers

Mr. Waunda, a former head teacher in mission schools of the Church of Scotland (Presbyterian), asserted that recent legislation known as the Public Security Bill "gives the Governor powers of a complete dictator." The present Governor is Sir Evelyn Hone.

Referring to recent reports of violence, Mr. Kaunda continued:

"But violencee I condemn very seriously as a method of achieving our noble ends. Violence I condemn without reserve and very strongly no matter where it comes from. Distant as I am from my country, I wish to appeal to all my people to refrain from any acts of violence and to remain calm no matter how trying the circumstances."

In a message to his followers, he said that he would present their case before Ian Macleod, Colonial Secretary, at a meeting in London next Tuesday, and that he expected to return to his country soon afterward.

Speaking of his tour of the United States, which included several Southern cities, Mr. Kaunda said he had been "impressed with most of the things that I saw—apart, of course, from one thing—your own domestic problems that fall in the way of the Negro."

Patrols Are Reinforced

KITWE, Northern Rhodesia, May 13 (AP)—The Government reinforced armed police patrols in white and Negro areas throughout the Kitwe region today to prevent new racial violence.

Negroes Press 'Fire' Drive In Rhodesia

BULAWAYO, Southern Rhodesia (AP) — Rioting workers Tuesday pursued a scorched-earth campaign against white domination. Police gunfire killed one, described as a looter.

The known death toll from three days of violence in this industrial city of the British-run Central African Federation rose to seven, all Negroes. Scores of persons have been injured.

LABOR FORCE

The shooting came in one of Bulawayo's Negro sections, where fires touched off by the rioters have ruined many homes, shops and cars, and terrorized moderates in the native community. Even a medical clinic was burned.

More than 2,000 soldiers and police sealed off the Negro sections in an effort to prevent the trouble from engulfing the city's 45,000 white residents. Many of the whites have armed themselves in fear of a full-scale uprising.

SOLDIERS BEGGED

A general strike of the native labor force to protest white rule paralyzed most of the city's 450 factories. It developed much like those that crippled industrial centers of neighboring South Africa last spring.

While thousands quit work on their own, others dropped out under the threats of Negro gangs roving from plant to plant. Agitators persuaded many servants in white homes to leave their jobs.

RHODESIAN RIOTS STIR NEW FEARS

Race Relations in Federation Strained as Constitutional Conferences Approach

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, July 23—The riotous events of last week in Salisbury, capital of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, have increased concern over future race relations here.

The situation was reported calm today in both Harare and Highfields, the townships where most of Salisbury's more than 200,000 Africans live. Yet troops and policemen still were patrolling against the possibe recurrence of the violence that started Wednesday.

The violence occurred when the Africans attempted to hold a mass demonstration to show their anti-Government feelings. They became enraged when the police used tear gas against them and when leaders they respected were arrested.

To foreign observers it appeared that the Government of Sir Edgar Whitehead, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, was out to teach the Africans a lesson.

Death of Partnership Seen

One outspoken member of the Opposition in the all-white Southern Rhodesia Assembly, Dr. Arne Palley of Salisbury, said yesterday in the debate on the situation that "politically speaking, the disturbances have driven the last nail into the coffin of partnership."

Racial partnership was the theoretical policy upon which the Federation was established in 1953.

The events in Salisbury take on added significance in view of the forthcoming talks in London on the constitutions of Nyasaland, Southern Rhodesia and the Federation. The Nyasaland conference is scheduled to begin Monday. The Southern Rhodesia talks will be in September and a review of the Federal Constitution early next year.

Meanwhile, outbreaks of violence here, in South Africa and in the Congo have hardened white and African views in the Federation.

One reaction was the announcement early this week that the Federation's defense forces would be enlarged to include two white battalions and four African battalions and that they would be re-equipped. Most of the new equipment, such as high-velocity rifles and heavy armored cars, would be useful quelling possible internal disturbances.

About 150 Africans, Asians and whites gathered last night to discuss possible ways of overcoming racial strife.

The meeting was called by the multiracial Central African party and did not fall under a ban imposed by the Whitehead Government because it was held outside the African area and was technically private.

The speakers included one top official of the predominantly African National Democratic party who was among those arrested earlier in the week.

Deploring Government moves to hinder African political parties, one African speaker addressed himself to the whites in the audience and said:

"Don't waste your time going to African rural areas. Don't waste your time going to the African locations. Go and teach your own friends."

Welensky Sees Soviet Plot

SALISBURY, July 23 (Reuters)—Sir Roy Welensky charged today that many persons criticizing Belgium's rule of her former Congo colony were trying to pave the way for Soviet take-overs in Africa.

The Prime Minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland made his charge in a talk opening a tobacco exhibition here.

Southern Rhodesia Takes Strong Line

Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia

The disclosure by Sir Edgar Whitehead, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, to the United Federal Party congress here, that he had a "good rip-roaring row" with the British Government at his recent talks in London on the colony's constitutional future surprised few people.

Southern Rhodesia is linked with Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland in the Central African Federation. The constitutional status of the federation is to be reviewed later this year or early next. Southern Rhodesia — or at least the white minority which holds political power in the territory—is impatient for independence within the Commonwealth. The Africans of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, on the other hand, would prefer to opt out of the federation.

Temper Gauged

Sir Edgar knew that to retain his own post and to keep his party in power, he had to take a strong line with the Colonial Office in London. The white barricades are going up in Southern Rhodesia and he is too shrewd a politician not to be aware of the present temper of the predominantly European electorate.

If he can persuade the British Colonial Office to remove the existing reserved clauses in the Southern Rhodesian constitution, which give Britain the right to veto legislation dealing with African affairs, he will have won an important round in the pre-election battle.

Hence, it is not difficult to discern the strategy behind his announcement that there will be a general election "by early next year, but there is no guarantee that it will not be held before the end of this year."

Coupled with his statement that the next stage of the constitutional discussions will be held in Rhodesia in September, this can be taken as a clear pointer to the fact that if Sir Edgar manages to shake off the shackles of Colonial Office tutelage he will feel sufficiently strong to make an immediate appeal to the electorate to return him to office.

Postponement Possible

If, on the other hand, he fails, he will almost certainly postpone this vital election until early next year, after the Monckton Commission has presented its recommendations on the future of the whole Central African Federation and the federal constitutional review has been held.

A rebuff to his ambitions in September would force him to play a waiting game in the hope that British Colonial Secretary Iain Macleod will be able to produce a rabbit from the hat in the shape of a formula that will hold the shaky fabric on the federation together and not provoke open revolt by either whites or blacks.

Sir Edgar's position is a precarious one. He has a majority of only four votes over the right-wing, white supremacist Dominion Party in the Southern Rhodesian Assembly.

Had it not been for the operation of the preferential vote system, the Dominion Party would have gained power at the last election, when they won a majority of votes at the first count.

Wave of Concern

Today, such a wave of concern for the future has swept over the colony's white population that political observers believe the Dominion Party would "romp home" at an immediately contested election.

This concern has been caused by suspicions of British intentions to "hand over" to African nationalists in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland—a move that white Southern Rhodesians believe would lead inexorably to eventual black domination of the federation. And with the uncertainty into which the Belgian Congo, on the federation's northern border, has been plunged through the grant of independence, which is seen here as premature, European uneasiness has been greatly intensified.

Few people who know Sir Edgar doubt the sincerity of his threat to take Southern Rhodesia out of the federation if African nationalism triumphs in the northern territories. But it would be a move taken as a last resort.

Supported by Welensky

He is thoroughly wedded to a "middle of the road" policy and is a loyal supporter of the federal concept. He still believes that racial partnership, with gradual advancement of the African people to a position of parity with the Europeans, can be made to work.

A trial of strength with the Dominion Party now, he realizes, would inevitably force an issue that may never have to be faced. For the victory of the extreme right-wing, secessionist, "what we - have - we - hold" William Harper, who was reelected president of the Southern Rhodesia division of the Dominion Party after an open clash with the federal leader, Winston Field, proved that a large—and many believe predominant—section of the colony's whites want to "go it alone" now.

20,000 March on Salisbury After Leaders Are Jailed—Police Bar Paraders

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, July 20 — Twenty-thousand angry Africans marched on the center of Salisbury today. Police riot squads dispersed them, using tear gas against some.

Anti-Government demonstrations, which included a strike of half of Salisbury's 100,000 African workers, were touched off by the arrest yesterday of three top leaders of the National Democratic party, which was formed early this year to replace the banned African National Congress.

The marchers were headed for the office of Sir Edgar Whitehead, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, a self-governing British colony, when they were stopped by the police.

It was the second time in twenty-four hours that Africans had tried to march into the city. The police also blocked 4,000 who were on their way early this morning to demonstrate outside the residence of Sir Edgar.

500 Reserves Called

More than 500 civilian members of the police reserves were called to duty to help seal off Salisbury's two principal African townships, Harare and Highfields. This capital city of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland has a population of more than 200,000 Africans and 80,000 whites.

As a result of the disturbances the Government prohibited all processions in the Salisbury area for the next three months.

Africans stoned cars driven by whites in the vicinity of the African townships and set up roadblocks. One African driving for a white was dragged from the car, but the white passenger was permitted to drive on.

Some Africans were arrested and a few received minor injuries in the panic that followed the firing of the tear gas into their midst.

Township Road Blocked

The African marchers never got beyond the limits of the townships but for three hours they blocked the main road into Harare, facing 500 policemen thirty yards away.

The three African political leaders were arrested in a series of pre-dawn police raids in Salisbury, Bulawayo, Umtali and Gwelo, Southern Rhodesia's main centers. Those arrested were Michael Mawema, president of the National Democratic party; Sketchley Samkanga, treasurer, and Leopold Takawire, an executive member of the party and a leader in the multiracial Capricorn Africa Society.

So far the Government has given no reason for the arrests except to say that those seized had violated the Unlawful Organizations Act. The National Democratic party, which is open to white members and has a few, has not been declared unlawful.

There has been bitter speculation here among persons sympathetic to African political aspirations that the Southern Rhodesian Government is using the unsettled situation in the Congo, which became independent of Belgium June 30, as an excuse for suppressing African political action.

Africans openly criticized Sir Edgar, saying "he claims to be the Prime Minister of all the people, but he does not speak to us."

Following the arrest of their leaders, the Africans met in Harare and Highfields. The meetings lasted through the night. This morning 20,000 gathered at Stodart Hall, a social center at Harare. When they heard that Sir Edgar had refused to see a two-man delegation they had sent to him to protest against the arrest of their leaders, they decided to march on the city. Other leaders urged them to do so peacefully. Observers said there had never before been such a mass demonstration by Africans in Southern Rhodesia.

Later the Whitehead Government sent a letter to the National Democratic party to say that the Prime Minister would not address an illegal gathering. The letter said that after the gathering had dispersed and the Africans had returned to work in Salisbury, members of the Government would be prepared to discuss grievances with them.

Riots in Bulawayo

The New York Times

The riots in Bulawayo in Southern Rhodesia, following similar disturbances in the capital of Salisbury last week, are ominous portents. How ominous they can be the world knows only too well after witnessing events in the former Belgian Congo just to the north. Southern Rhodesia is an internally self-governing territory that is part of the Central African Federation. The other two sections are the British-ruled protectorates of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

There has been trouble in Central Africa since the reluctant protectorates were forced to join the federation in 1953. Southern Rhodesia is a land of white supremacy, the whites being settlers who own land or conduct business as their parents and grandparents did before them. The Africans have caught the same fever of independence which rages all over the continent and they want an end to racial discrimination.

Since the blacks are in an enormous majority, this would mean African control of government. The agitation led to Government raids on the homes of the leaders of the African National Democratic party in Salisbury on July 19. This, in turn, was followed by serious rioting, arson and looting in Salisbury and, for the last three days, in Bulawayo.

It is a potentially ugly and dangerous situation. As always in such times, the moderates are rendered helpless. Positions harden; extremists take over. It looks as if the British must impose a solution more satisfactory to the Africans than the present state of affairs.

VIOLENCE FADES AT BULAWAYO

Negroes Return to Work in Homes, Factories

BULAWAYO, Southern Rhodesia (AP)—Violence faded Wednesday and Negroes streamed back to work in British homes and factories of this troop-guarded industrial city.

Eleven Negroes had been killed—six by police gunfire—and 118 injured in riots, arson and looting since last weekend in Bulawayo's Negro townships.

White rule was the target of the demonstrations. It was backed by a general strike called by the militant National Democratic party over the objections of many Africans. At least one of the dead had wanted to continue working. He was slain by a squad enforcing the strike.

CHARGE HURLED

The police said they used their guns only in self-defense and to stop looting by the rioters.

Some Negro groups charged that Prime Minister Sir Edgar Whitehead's government is practicing white supremacy, like the neighboring Union of South Africa though it preaches racial partnership.

Among factors which promoted the return to normalcy were:

1. A cordon of more than 2,000 soldiers and police—white and black—sealing off the Negro sections.

2. Depletion of liquor supplies seized by the rioters from beer halls they had sacked and burned.

3. Disapproval of the outbreak by many of Negro townships' 100,000 residents.

Eighty per cent of the labor force showed in the morning to revive operations in the city's 450 factories. Others trickled in later.

BREATHE MORE EASILY

The city's 45,000 white persons, many armed, breathed more easily.

Orderly groups of workers tackled a tough street-cleaning job in the Negro townships. First they had to haul off the charred wreckage of many cars.

The worst-hit section was the old Bulawayo location of 1893, three miles north of town. Local government offices, rows of shops, a milk depot, a large beer hall and countless vehicles were wrecked and burned in a campaign to destroy property of whites and their Negro sympathizers alike.

Mike Hove, a Negro legislator of the ruling Federal party, said "Africans are as appalled as Europeans at what has happened and are ready to band together to bring the mobsters to book."

Hove estimated that less than one per cent of the city's 100,000 Negroes had any hand in the riots.

1st Natives Killed In S. Rhodesia Race Strife

Chicago Defender

BULAWAYO, Southern Rhodesia — (UPI) — Six natives were reported killed and 60 persons injured in clashes with police Tuesday that broke a proud 60-year record of Southern Rodesia, which boasted that no Africans had ever been killed here in racial disturbances.

Three of the fatally wounded victims were shot by police and three by whites defending their stores after mobs of Africans rampaged through native settlements for the third day. One European was reported killed but this was not confirmed by police officials.

The government has ordered a nation-wide call of white reserve troops to deal with any emergency.

WHITES UNEASY

About 45,000 whites waited uneasily behind locked and barred doors in the European section of the city, the anti-white riots in the nearby Congo fresh in their minds.

A few Africans, drunk from raids on beerhalls, were reported roaming the countryside near the European sections but heavily armed white and native troops supported by armored cars and riot police protected the section.

Premied Sir Edgar Whitehead flew in here Monday from the capital city of Salisbury and immediately ordered in troop reinforcements to cope with what officials described as an "explosive situation." He pledged the disorders would be put down at all costs.

NATIVES SCARED

The violence flared again Tuesday when 7,000 Africans gathered on a football field and refused to return to their jobs until three arrested Nationalist party leaders were freed. The crowd broke up into gangs which roamed the African settlement bent on violence.

There are about 140,000 natives living in the sprawling townships. However, it was believed in the European section that most of the natives were as much distressed by the violence as the whites.

Troops reported turning back hundreds of natives who tried to get out of the townships. Small groups of Africans huddled in the "no man's land" between the townships and the heart of the city, too terrified to move.

Sat 8-6-60

Marauding bands of Africans swarmed out of their townships Monday to attack shops and cars and clash in pitched battles with outnumbered police. An attempt was made to derail a freight train.

CRIPPLE INDUSTRY

Industry was crippled when gangs of intimidators roamed through the city and forced African workers to leave their jobs. White men took over the job of manning gasoline pumps for the first time in the history of this city.

A European rescued a 19-year-old African night watchman who tried to defend single-handedly his concrete works from a gang of looters. The European pulled the African into his automobile and then drove three miles under a barrage of stones until reaching a group of soldiers.

Troops also went to the rescue of the visiting paramount chieftainess of neighboring Bechuanaland, who was trapped and attacked by rioters. When troops arrived, her retinue was defending her gallantly against superior odds.

The trouble erupted Sunday in the wake of a round-trip of native political leaders in Salisbury. A mob of 7,000 natives tried to seize control of the center of the city but was beaten off in a day-long battle.

Integration Law Passed In Rhodesia

Lusaka, Aug. 5.—The Northern Rhodesia Legislative Council moved Thursday to lower the color bar in this British protectorate.

Legislation that would make it illegal to bar any person because of his race from tea-rooms, cafes, restaurants, hotel dining rooms and lounges, and motion-picture theaters was approved. It carries stiff penalties for violations and is scheduled to become effective next month.

Considered Milestone

The law is considered to be a milestone in this part of the world where racial discrimination is one of the most difficult problems with many political, social, and economic ramifications.

The decision to take formal action against discrimination was made after efforts to gain voluntary removal of color bars had failed.

Northern Rhodesia's mixed population includes 2,500,000 Africans, 80,000 whites, more than 6,000 Asians, and 2,000 persons of mixed blood.

Death Toll Is 7; 250 Under Arrest; Few Go to Work

Wed 7-27-60

Reuters

BULAWAYO, Southern Rhodesia, July 26—Police bullets killed an African today, boosting to seven the death toll in three straight days of heavy native rioting against a ban on political meetings.

Police opened fire three times during the day in renewed clashes with Africans but the dead man, described as a looter caught in the act, was the sole reported casualty.

A police spokesman said the situation was developing into a military operation. An estimated 250 Africans have been arrested and few natives went to work.

Police indicated the six Africans slain Monday were not killed by law officers.

Two were described as looters shot by a merchant and it was presumed the other four also died in the bloody upsurge of rioting, looting and arson that saw about 60 persons hurt, half a dozen beerhalls burned down and a filtration plant completely wrecked.

Two Stores Destroyed

The burnings went on all night and two African stores were destroyed.

The trouble began here Sunday with demonstrations against a ban on a meeting of the National Democratic Party, an African group which has had several of its leaders arrested.

The violence here followed ismilar but milder outbreaks last week in Salisbury, capital of this self-governing British territory, after three NPD leaders had been arrested and party offices had been raided by police.

The violence flared up in and around Bulawayo's Negro townships.

Today, government industrial officers were stoned at Npopoma African Township after failing to persuade a crowd of more than 7000 natives to break up and go to work.

The crowd called for the immediate release of detained NDP leaders.

A heavy stoning injured a news photographer in Bulawayo's Old Township Police dispersed his attackers—groups of three and four men—with a salvo of tear gas shells.

About 150 arrests were made in the Old Township as police combed it for looters and "known troublemakers."

When loot was discovered in a house, its male occupants were arrested and marched at gunpoint—carrying the loot on their heads—to an assembly point.

Train services were normal but only a small number of African workers heeded the back-to-work calls of sound trucks.

Meanwhile, Southern Rhodesia's Prime Minister charged that "certain leaders" of the NDP had planned civil disorders.

Prime Minister Sir Edgar Whitehead, addressing Parliament in Salisbury, said three of seven wanted NDP members already had been arrested.

He declared that the arguments advanced at NDP meetings "are becoming more and more blantantly militant and anti-European" despite the fact that the party, formed early this year, "may in theory be open to all races."

He said some whites were known to be assisting in setting up party activities, adding several o fthese "were present in the center of things" during last week's Salisbury disturbances.

Whitehead charged that another feature of NDP sessions was "the apparent hatred against missionaries" while many statements were made in an obvious bid "to subvert the loyalty of African constables."

The Rhodesian Federal Defense Ministry ordered four battalions of troops to duty today in the Bulawayo area. They will suport three companies flown in Monday from Salisbury to aid polce units.

Colony's Premier to Call Up All Fit White Men—Also Spurs African Housing

Sat. 7-30-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, July 29—Sir Edgar Whitehead, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, announced tonight a vast expansion of security forces to deal with future outbreaks of violence in this British colony.

African riots in the last two weeks in Salisbury, capital of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and in Bulawayo, a Southern Rhodesian industrial city, have cost the lives of twelve Africans and caused damages esteimated by officials of more than $300,000.

Sir Edgar said all able-bodied white men would be required to serve in either the army reserve or the police reserves. He said that the African police reserve would be greatly enlarged "to deal with intimidators and those intent on evil" and that a special constabulary would be formed for white men not in the reserves.

In addition, he said, the regular police force would be expanded to provide for new police stations in African dwelling areas and suburban and rural districts.

Concern Mounting

In a radio broadcast, the Prime Minister said "the Government is determined to achieve the position where it can protect the community against any subversive or hooligan elements."

"The Government will use the full force at its disposal to crush any disorder before it starts," Sir Edgar declared.

The Prime Minister's announcement reflected the concern that has engulfed the federation in recent weeks over the deterioration in relations between whites and Africans.

The rioting in the last two weeks developed after the leaders of the National Democratic party, a predominantly African political organization that succeeded the banned African Congress, were arrested on charges of violating the Unlawful Organizations act. The National Democratic party has been campaigning for a liberalization of the Government's policies toward Africans.

Although he did not mention the National Democratic party name in his broadcast, Sir Edgar said, "There is no intention of the Government to be driven from its set task by recent events—either by putting the clock back or by being driven in the opposite direction."

He said his Government would try to improve the lot of the Africans and would begin by starting "a crash program" to provide better housing for Africans in the cities.

Sir Edgar said that the expanded army reserve was necessary for home defense, particularly to provide "security for women and children and to guard key points."

He angrily rejected a proposal by his predecessor as Prime Minister, R. S. Garfield Todd, that the Constitution of Southern Rhodesia be suspended and British forces be brought in.

"Internal security is a matter for the Government of Southern Rhodesia," Sir Edger declared, reminding his listeners that the colony has been self-governing since 1923.

Party Defines 'African'

The National Democratic party in a statement during the day accused the Prime Minister om misleading Southern Rhodesia about the party and of contributing to confusion in the colony.

The party insisted that it is "non-racial" and reported that an increasing number of Asians and white were joining it.

"Our concept of the word African is very embracing and wide," the party statement said. "Any citizen, irrespective of color, who accepts the equality of all human beings is an African. But we would like to make it abundantly clear to those who think they are a super race in Africa that Africa has no room for them."

The party challenged Sir Edgar to prove that Africans in southern Rhodesia were different from and inferior to Africans in other parts of Africa where universal suffrage "is working efficiently well."

It charged that Prime Minister Whitehead was preparing to ban the party and was trying to make such action appear just when the ban was imposed.

The shooting came in one of Bulawayo's Negro sections, where fires touched off by the rioters have ruined many homes, shops and cars, and terrorized moderates in the native community. Even a medical clinic was burned.

NEGROES SEALED OFF

More than 2,000 soldiers and police sealed off the Negro sections in an effort to prevent the trouble from engulfing the city's 45,000 white residents. Many of the whites have armed themselves in fear of a full-scale uprising.

A general strike of the native labor force to protest white rule paralyzed most of the city's 450 factories. It developed much like those that crippled industrial centers of neighboring South Africa last spring.

While thousands quit work on their own, others dropped out under the threats of Negro gangs roving from plant to plant. Agitators persuaded many servants in white homes to leave their jobs.

Many terrified Negroes begged soldiers to let them out of the tumultuous native sections. The soldiers, however, were under orders and refused. The supplicants huddled fearfully in a no man's land between their quarters and the soldiers.

Stones as well as torches were used by the rioters.

AGENTS ARE STONED

Government industrial officers went into Mpopoma township, the site of Bulawayo's railway yards, to urge a throng of more than 7,000 Negroes to disperse and return to work.

The crowd rejected the appeals and beat and stoned the officers as they left. They demanded the release of three arrested leaders of the National Democratic party.

This party is a young nationalist organization, policies of which are described by Southern Rhodesia's Premier Sir Edgar Whitehead as blatantly militant and anti-European.

Whitehead told Parliament in Salisbury that raids on National Democratic party premises has brought information of a serious nature to light and that it appears clear that certain leaders have contemplated action to disturb order.

Police Kill Looter As Death Toll Rises; Scores Are Injured

Rhodesian Sets Up 'School' for Beggars

The Washington Post

Washington, D.C.

Jairos Jiri grew ashamed as he watched the beggars roam the village streets of his native Southern Rhodesia. So he made them a proposition:

"Come let me put you to work," he told them, "and I'll do the begging."

And so in 1952, in the town of Bulawaya, Jiri founded the rehabilitation center of the African Society for the Blind and Physically Handicapped, of which he also is founder and life president. And since then he's been traveling all over the world, begging for funds to keep the center going.

This week Jiri, 39, came to Washington on a 5-month United States tour sponsored by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Recently he sat in on a session of Municipal Court and learned two things of interest: "I found out about your program for rehabilitating alcoholics, which is quite marvelous. And I learned that even when a judge sentences a man, he can feel kindly toward him."

Jiri, who taught himself to read when in his early 30s by studying newspapers and books, got the idea of helping the handicapped in 1943, during his World War II service in a British Army mess kitchen in Southern Rhodesia.

"I watched the people wandering and begging and I felt I had to do something, he said. I pestered the government and finally they agreed to help with money and a building."

Jiri's center offers therapy, education and vocational training and so far has trained 118 graduates. All are self-supporting and 15 run their own businesses.

His government provides 25 per cent of his budget and 30 per cent more is earned from the sale of wares made in the center's workshops. For the rest, Jiri goes tramping with his hand out. "My address is Bulawaya," he said, for any who may care.

DR. ALBERT SCHWEITZER

Gls Popular In Africa, But Bobby Hit Jackpot

Africa, the "Dark Continent," is a brighter part of the world today because American servicement are winning the trust of its peoples through personal contacts.

The Navy has been in Africa since the Allied landings in November 1942. It big Port Lyautey base mirrors the good-neighborliness existing between the thousands of American military and civilian residents and their hosts.

"YOU ARE A great friend to us and we can never repay you in kind for your generosity and help to our people," said the Pasha of Kenitra after the base football championships brought almost $1,000 in gate receipts for Kenitra's welfare fund.

It was one of many instances where the Navy planned its recreational events to serve a community end—in this case the gridiron playoff was purposely moved up from Thanksgiving Day to a local holiday, with an intramural soccer match as a curtain-raiser.

IT'S A TWO-WAY street, this stout friendship between Americans and North Africans. Visitors from the U. S. are saluted by tribesmen with the reckless fantasio, their horseback ceremony which is as wild as any Indian charge.

One such visitor, Bob Hope, promptly teamed up with ace Moroccan golfer Bouchaib Hadadi for a benefit match. Proceeds went for the purchase of English language texts for a local school.

WHEN DISASTER strikes, Americans have been quick to answer Morocco's request for aid—as in December 1958 when the heaviest rainfall in 16 years flooded the Sebou River valley. Working with the Air Force, Navy relief crews evacuated villages in the path of flood waters and dropped food from helicopters to isolated farms.

More recently, the Air Force reached across Libya from Wheelus Air Base to Benghazi with an airlife of food and blankets to relieve the plight of hundreds of flood victims in Derna.

BUT IT DOES not take flood or famine to summon American assistance to a North Africa fighting poverty and disease. When members of a Minneapolis Naval Air Reserve patron squadron went overseas for active duty they brought the kind of goodwill offerings which would warm any farmer's heart. These included:

—Artificial insemination material to breed 100 Jersey and Hereford cattle.

—Five varieties of insecticides for plants and animals.

—Three Columbia lambs.

MOST U. S. service contacts with Africa's population are necessarily limited to the Mediterranean coastal areas. But the People-to-People Program was sparked dramatically by the 13-year-old son of an Air Force sergeant in Naples, Italy and a world-revered medical missionary deep in French Equitorial Africa. This is the story of Bobby Hill and Dr. Albert Schweitzer.

It began because Bobby's father, S/Sgt. Henry Hill, had impressed on the boy the peaceful aims of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization — the reason why the Hills, like thousands of other service families, lived overseas.

BOBBY HILL did some thinking on his own. How could he help? He had read the inspiring story of Dr. Schweitzer's selfless dedication to treating the sick of Africa. Well, why not start at the top?

Bobby wrote a letter to Lt General Richard C. Lindsay, Commander of NATO's Allied Air Force, Southern Europe. "I want to help Dr. Schwaitzer," he wrote.

"I have asked my father to buy me some medicine. He told me he would buy as much as he can if a way is found to have it delivered.

"YOUR PLANES, if they go where Dr. Schweitzer is, could deliver the medicine for me. . . Maybe other persons also will feel what I feel and offer medicine too."

Other persons did. General Lindsay endorsed Bobby's project. The Italian press, radio and television gave it wide publicity. Contributions, large and small, poured in. Italian pharmaceutical firms donated generously.

ALL TOLD, Bobby Hill's wish to collect "some medicine" for the legendary Nobel Prize winner amassed some $400,000 worth of medical supplies. These were flown to Lambarene, French Equatorial Africa in two French and Italian air freighters, with Bobby aboard.

Dr. Albert Schweitzer and Bobby Hill are shown in Africa, when the boy delivered some $400,000 worth of medical supplies. Dr. Schweitzer, the legendary Nobel Prize winner, has devoted his life to the unselfish treatment of the sick in Africa. When Bobby's desire to send medicine to Dr. Schweitzer became known, a flood of contributions came from all over the globe. (From a photo in Yank magazine)

SENEGAL WARNS WEST ON POLICY

President Says New Nation May Become Neutralist if Not Recognized

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

DAKAR, Senegal, Sept. 14—Leopold Sedar Senghor, President of the Republic of Senegal, warned today that this newly independent pro-Western state might be forced to adopt a neutralist policy if the Western powers ingnored it much longer.

He was epressing in an interview the irritation felt by the Senegalese that none of the Western countries had followed France in formally recognizing Senealg's independence. Senegal withdrew Aug. 20 from the Mali Federation with its neighbor Sudan because of political differences.

The Senegalese are particularly annoyed over what they feel is Western preoccupation with the next moves to be made by Sudan, which contends the Mali Federation cannot be dissolved. Senegal has given eight countries, including Britain, West Germany and Italy, until Sunday to recognize Senegal as an independent state or remove their diplomatic representatives here.

The Senegalese also are pressing for United States recognition, but have set no deadline.

Missions Sent to Mali

The difficulty is that the missions are accredited to the Mali Federation, which, as far as the Senegalese are concerned, is dead. "If these diplomatic representatives want to remain here in Dakar, they must recognize us. Otherwise they must go to Bamako," Mr. Senghor said. Bamako is the capital of Sudan.

Mr. Senghor noted that the Western nations were concerned that Sudan, already leaning on the Left, might decide to try a pro-Communist alliance as a result of its pique over the Mali affair. He said there should be equal concern for Senegal and its strategically important port of Dakar.

"Surely the United States will recognize us, but I think that the Soviet Union would recognizze us equally, because in the Mali affair the Soviet has been very careful," Mr. Senghor said. The Soviet Union, he said, "is as realistic as the United States and Senegal is a reality." He indicated that the treatment Senegal received from other nations would help his people to recognize "friends from our our enemies."

Mr. Senghor said Senegal hoped to be admitted to the United Nations, but that there might be difficulties because the Security Council already had approved the admission of the Mali Federation.

Of the future, Mr. Senghor said, "here we want to build a Socialist state respecting human freedom and religion and a multi-racial, multi-religious state."

"There is no question between white and black here," he said. "My wife is French lady. There is no question of religion. The biggest part of the population is Moslem. I am a Roman Catholic, but I do not have the difficulties of Senator Kennedy in America."

CALMNESS RULES IN SIERRA LEONE

Colony Prepares for Stable Independence—Plans to Stay in Commonwealth

New York

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone, March 17—Under the cautious leadership of Sir Milton Margai, Sierra Leone gives evidence of emerging next year as the most stable of the new African nations.

Sun. 3-27-60

There seems to be no danger that Sierra Leone will follow her neighbor Guinea into a vacuum that the Communists might fill.

p. 18.

All political groups, including the Opposition, agree that Sierra Leone should remain within the British Commonwealth after independence is attained in April, 1961.

Sierra Leone is on the coast of the hump of West Africa between Guinea to the north and east and Liberia to the south.

Compared with most of West Africa, Sierra Leone is a haven of temperate, civilized thought. The frontiers are tranquil. Despite minor friction between the aristocratic "Creoles"—descendants of freed slaves that were the founding settlers of the colony—and the "natives" of the protectorate, there is internal harmony.

Guinea Stirs Concern

Sir Milton, the Premier, feels no urge to throw his Opposition into jail. He confesses some anxiety over events in the neighborhood of Guinea, where agents from the Communist bloc are settling. He is perturbed over the visits to Conakry of his embittered brother Albert. But he has put no hindrance on his brother's activities.

Recent Guinean visitors to Freetown have complained of police surveillance. They say their hosts are questioned about their reasons for being here, where they go and whom they see. Albert Margai said that his mail from Guinea had been mysteriously delayed.

"President Touré [Sékou Touré of Guinea] sent me an invitation late last Summer to attend a convention of his party," Albert said in an interview. "It took that letter a month to get here. I finally received it on the very morning that the convention was to open."

"I went to Conakry to explain why I hadn't answered the invitation," he said.

He denied Sir Milton's implication that he had sought President Touré's aid in building up the People's National Party, which he founded last year to oppose his brother's Sierra Leone Peoples Party.

Unemployment Is High

There is considerable unemployment in Freetown. The country faces a heavy budget deficit. Yet, according to the Governor, Sir Maurice Doorman, solvency could be assured if some way could be found to eliminate illegal digging and smuggling of diamonds.

Diamonds of gem quality were discovered in 1930. They were so near the surface that they could be found with a pick, a shovel and a sieve.

In 1933 the Government gave the Sierra Leone Selection Trust all rights to diamond mining in Sierra Leone until 2033. But bootleg mining was so easy that it was impossible to safeguard the company's rights.

Illicit mining and smuggling reached a peak in 1955. In that year the Government persuaded the Selection Trust to release its monoply rights over all but 450 square miles in return for compensation of more than £1,500,000 ($4,200,000).

Land Opened to Africans

The released land was then opened to Africans. More than 6,000 licenses were issued to diamond miners in the first year. By October, 1956, more than 75,000 persons were digging.

In a move against smuggling, Sir Milton expelled 20,000 Liberians and Guineans who were digging diamonds illegally. He also reduced taxes.

The results were encouraging. Legal dealings in diamonds in the last four months of 1959 were double the rate of the same period in 1958, and sales for the year set a new record of almost £6,000,000 ($16,800,000). But even so, the majority of diamonds continued to slip out of the country illegally.

Besides diamonds, Sierra Leone has important mineral wealth, particularly iron ore and chrome ore.

Sierra Leone is primarily an agricultural country. Most of the 2,200,000 inhabitants grow their own food. Export crops include palm kernels, coffee, cocoa and kola nuts.

Freetown and the mountainous thrust of the Sierra Leone peninsula may some day develop as a tourist center. Freetown is a steamy, squalid forest of huts and little gabled houses behind a few waterfront blocks of solid stores, banks and Government buildings. A new hotel will open in December and the beaches a few miles from the city are among the finest and safest in Africa.

Established for Freed Slaves

Like neighboring Liberia, Sierra Leone was established as a haven for freed slaves. British rule has been exemplary. Britain gave Freetown the first college in West Africa—the Fourah Bay College—and the first printing press.

Friction between "the settlers," as the descendants of the freed slaves call themselves, and the "natives," is diminishing.

The political dominance of the "settlers" ended in 1948 when Sir Hubert Stevenson, then Governor, inspired reforms that gave the protectorate chiefdoms the main voice in the Government.

LONDON, May 4 [Reuters]—Britain will grant Sierra Leone its independence on April 27 next year, it was announced here Wednesday.

The announcement by Iain Macleod, colonial secretary, came after 14 days of talks with Sierra Leone leaders. The 27,925 square mile West African country has a population of 2,500,000.

Tells Long Friendship

Macleod said "Sierra Leone and this country have been friends for 150 years.

"All of us who have taken part in these talks are determined that this friendship will continue in all the years that lie in front of them."

Asks No Regrets

Premier Sir Milton Margai said: "We hope we shall never be in a position to make her majesty's government regret what we [the conference] have done. We shall ever be friends of Britain."

An official statement said Britain will give Sierra Leone 7,500,000 pounds [21 million dollars] in loans, grants, and technical assistance because "the initial burdens of independence, including defense and compensation, would present some difficulty at a time when normal colonial type assistance would cease."

Visiting Minister Favors Western Way for Africa

By MOHAMMED A. RAUB, JR.
Contributing Writer

A Sierra Leone minister said last night he would much prefer newly independent nations of Africa to lean toward the West than the East.

B. Taylor Kamara, minister of Trade and Industries, who is here on a State Department invitation, was attending a party given in his honor by William Fitzjohn, his country's representative in Washington, at 4821 Colorado avenue N.W.

"African nations have been nurtured on the Western type of democracy, and we are not sorry for it.

"It's true we suffered hardships under colonial rule, but that is past now, and its memory is no reason why, after independence, a jump should be made towards the other side," he said.

Sierra Leona, a 28,000-square-mile country in west Africa, produces 35 per cent of the world's supply of gems, and its independence from British rule is due in April next year.

The 58-year-old leader, who was called to the bar from Lincoln Inn in 1949, was emphatic in rejecting neutralism.

"One hundred per cent neutrality is impossible," he said.

After independence, he added, his country proposes to enter into a defense pact with Britain.

The party, which was attended by a large number of African diplomats, was highlighted by the presence of Joseph C. Satterthwaite, Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs.

Ambassador W. H. Q. Halm of Ghana expressed firm belief in the eventual creation of a "United Africa."

The ambassador was accompanied by his wife and two daughters. The latter are leaving for England next week.

S. El Goulli, Tunisian minister, was accompanied by his French-born, golden-haired wife, Zeinab. She wore a lovely blue cocktail dress with white dots on it.

SOMALI PREMIER SEEKS WEST'S AID

Asks Optimism for Future of Territory — Freedom Scheduled for July 1

By JAY WALZ

Special to The New York Times.

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Feb. 5 — Premier Abdullah Seyyid Issa pleaded today for an end of the "misguided pessimism" about the future of this costal territory, which will become independent July 1.

"Certainly there are troubles ahead," he said. "And we know we are poor. But we have confidence in our friends and in our strength as a free people."

In the t en years that Italy has been preparing Somalia for independence this United Nations trust territory has rid itself of few troubles.

Supported by Tribesmen

The consensus is that the Premier has won the support of the 1,300,000 Somalis, most of whom are nomadic tribesmen who in the past have reserved their first allegiance for tribal chiefs. It is also agreed that he has earned the respect, and probably the full cooperation, of leaders of foreign powers able and willing to help Somalia.

After members of his Somali Youth League won eighty-three of ninety Parliamentary seats last spring, Premier Issa persuaded the United Nations to advance the Dec. 2, 1960, independence date.

Now, there is every confidence among Somalis that "our friends" will supply the Premier the budgetary support he says the new government must have to remain in business over the next several years.

The Premier said in an interview that he would need $5,000,000 in outside aid annually. He named the United States, Britain and Italy as his prospective benefactors. In addition, there is hope that Italy will continue to buy Somalia's banana crop, which accounts for 60 per cent of the territory's exports.

Disclaims Soviet Help

Premier Issa said there had been no thought that any of the necessary help might come from the Soviet Union. The Italian administrators of the trusteeship have not permitted the Soviet Union to set up so much as a consulate in Mogadishu.

"We have no relations with Russia," the Premier said. "After our independence, we shall see."

The Premier declared that his countrymen wanted freedom so much that "we are ready to start from the beginning" on the march to prosperity and security.

The Premier wore a white, open-at-the-throat tropical suit, and spoke rapidly in English, which he developed a decade ago as a petitioner before the United Nations for Somali independence.

Premier Changes Stand

Political opposition, headed by Haji Mohammed Hussein, leader of the Greater Somali League, has forced the Premier to veer decidedly from his former stand against the Pan-Somalia movement.

He said there was strong sentiment for union among Somalis in Somalia, British and French Somalilands, and such a Greater Somalia would double, perhaps triple, the present Somalia's territory. Premier Issa concedes that it would also magnify his political problems, since the Somili Youth League is not powerful outside Somalia.

Under the pressure of politics and public opinion Premier Issa's Youth League has committed itself to the idea of a Greater Somalia to be achieved by "peaceful and legal means." The Premier conceded that the key words, "peaceful and legal means" might be academic, as well as political.

The Premier noted that his nation could not take the Somali areas in Ethiopia and Kenya by force.

Seeks Boundary Settlement

He said that if British Somaliland decided to become associated with Somali he would welcome it. But, he added, that his only immediate ambition was to preserve the boundaries of the "territory that formerly belonged to Italy."

It was this dispute that Mussolini took advantage of to begin his attack on Ethiopia in 1935. Emperor Haile Selassie has refused to accept a provisional line offered by the British during their occupancy of Somali after World War II.

Vote Delayed—No Opposition

BY ROBERT C. RUARK

Special to Scripps-Howard Newspapers

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Somalian elections scheduled for this Spring have been indefinitely postponed.

The Hisbia Dighil Mirifle Party, the loyal opposition, is currently without a candidate. The season is that their top boy has been recently stabbed to death, and so the elections have been put off although Somalia achieves its independence in July.

He couldn't have been much of a candidate. Nobody in the American consulate general knew his name, and I shopped around through the bazaars, so to speak, and nobody could tell me anything about him.

Why they bothered to kill him is hard to see, because the last election, which put the Somalia Youth League in power, was flagrantly crooked. Abdullahi Issa's party rolled in.

The opposition wasn't permitted to register with the various district commissioners. These officials, Somalis all, just disappeared on registration day. And to insure a solid vote, some loyal party members or otherwise voted as much as a dozen times, each.

* * *

ABOUT THE 1956 ELECTION, there are some interesting remarks in "Somalia," written by A. A. Castagno Jr., under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. I quote:

"The number of votes recorded was equal to one-half of the total population (1,250,000), although it should not have exceeded 300,000. In the towns the elections were conducted on the basis of universal male suffrage, with secret ballots. But in the interior they were based on the traditional 'shir' in which the nomads voted for tribal leaders who in turn cast a multiple vote valued in proportion to the number of registered electors in the group. Inadequate supervision encouraged dishonesty."

Even a census was dishonestly unsuccessful. Says Mr. Castagno; "chiefs in the nomadic areas were eager to report an impressive number of tribesmen. Some submitted figures that exceeded the total population of the country . . . It may be assumed that in the forthcoming elections the nomad will vote according to the consensus of his tribe rather than on the basis of individual choice."

The man in the saddle in Somalia is a chap named Mohamed Abshir Mussa. He is the chief of police, which also means he is commanding general of the army, of which there is none — only cops.

Nobody knows how many cops there are. In 1958 the force was supposed to number 3500 officers and men. I'd say it was easily three times that now, and with nobody to arrest except strangers.

Somalia is so poor it can't afford an army, but it is already contemplating war with Ethiopia. It is possible that if this comes to pass we will subsidize it, as the Russians have already bought up Ethiopia with a massive loan, and it takes two to tango, and this particular tango has been going on a long time.

To all best of knowledge, when the Italians move out American tax money will pay the police force and subsidize internal finances.

* * *

DURING THE TIME I've been in Somalia, one thing has impressed me. That is the "give me," used consistently by the police and customs, on down to the vendors of dik-dik skins and worthless baubles in front of the Croce Del Sud Hotel, the shoeshine boys, the paper hustlers, or the horribly crippled beggars. For instance:

In Africa there is a universal rule that when the driver of a foundered vehicle waves you down, you stop, to give aid. If he does not need help, he waves you on.

On one occasion we were flagged by a Somali standing beside a stopped vehicle. We got out, prepared to help.

"You give me wan cigaret," he demanded in pretty fair English.

On another occasion we picked up a couple of ragged waifs in Kismayu and it is the usual habit when dealing with African hitchhikers to share the comforts of the car. I tossed a couple of packs of American cigarets to them. One, an Arab, tossed them back.

"I want corktips like you are smoking," he said in Swahili.

Somalia's Capital Whitewashed For Independence Proclamation

N.Y. Times N.Y. Mirror Star 6/30/60

New Hotels House Guests of Republic for Ceremonies Scheduled at Midnight

By JAY WALZ

Special to The New York Times.

MOGADISHU, Somalia, June 29—Mogadishu, which history has had a way of bypassing through the centuries, is bathed in the glow of public notice.

Preparing for the proclamation of Somali independence tomorrow at midnight, this capital of 75,000 is gleaming with fresh whitewash. The new republic's emblem of a blue field and white stars flies proudly from the public buildings alongside the Italian tricolor.

After Friday the blue and white flag will fly not only over the territories that for seventy years have been under Italian or British administration, but also over the former protectorate of British Somaliland which became independent Sunday.

Some $2,650,000 miles are being added to the rapidly growing territory of free Africans. The Somalis live on the 400,000 square miles of the eastern bulge of Africa between the Indian Ocean and the Red Sea.

To accommodate 400 important guests pouring in from all points in Africa and from capitals as far away as Washington and Moscow, two new hotels have been rushed to completion. Named the Giuba and the Uuebi Scebeli after Somalia's two rivers, the hotels are so new that the wine tumblers on the tables still bear the pasted stickers identifying the manufacturer.

The bartender last night had to consult with the manager on the price a gin and tonic. The manager was aggrieved. "But everyone here is the guest of the Republic," he said.

The tiny, unlighted airport that normally takes three or four flights a week has been abuzz all week with charter and scheduled aricraft bringing in well-wishers. Once aground, Mogadishu's guests have forty Fiat automobiles, newly imported from Italy, at their disposal.

Yesterday saw the departure of the last vestige of Italian military might that Mussolini massed in Mogadishu twenty-five years ago to invade Ethiopia. To the roll of Somali drums and bugles two sergeants respectfully carried the Italian military emblem aboard a plane bound for Rome.

Before Friday the eighty-eight members of the Somalia Assembly and the thirty-three members of Somaliland's former British Assembly will meet to ratify a pact of union.

On Friday, after independence is proclaimed, the joint Assembly will meet to debate the draft constitution and to elect a President. The President in turn will name a Premier.

There are two leading contenders for the presidency—the present Prime Minister, Abdulla Hissa, and Aden Abdulla Osman the President of the Assembly

The New York Times June 30, 1960

Somalia (diagonal shading) will be independent tonight.

Under the draft constitution as it stands, Signor Issa, 38 years old, is ruled out because he is too young.

The Political Committee has recommended to the Assembly that the minimum age be 40.

Signor Issa, who sparked the independence movement through the Somali Youth League twelve years ago, is working to have the age rule modified. But his supporters are meeting resistance from opponents on two sides.

One side feels Signor Issa has worked too long under the Italian trustees to assume the leadership of the new republic now. Others accuse him of being "too dictatorial" through months of forging a Government for Somalia.

Still Signor Issa's supporters feel he is the only leader who commands the respect of a majority of his own people and of the heads of foreign powers to whom Somalia must turn for aid during her early days. When the fireworks of independence day are over, the new leaders, whoever they are, must seek a foreign source for the $5,000,000 needed annually to balance the budget.

Some observers feel that if either Signor Osman or Signor Issa gets the presidency, he almost must certainly choose a Premier from the former British protectorate. In that case the choice would undoubtedly fall on Mohamed Ibrahim Egal, who is the Prime Minister in the Somaliland capital of Hargeisa during the five-day interval between independence from the British and union with Somalia.

Tariff Aims At South Africa

HARGEISA, Somaliland, June 29 (Reuters)—The Government of the new state of Somaliland decided today to exclude South Africa from the Commonwealth countries that will enjoy a 15 per cent preferential trade tariff with Somaliland.

An official spokesman said the decision had been taken because of South Africa's racial policy.

A. G. Lynch envoy to Somali

The Afro-Am Baltimore, Md 7/16/60

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Andrew G. Lynch, the first United States ambassador to the Sondi Republic represented the U.S. Government at the mammoth independence celebration here Thursday.

Some two million Somalis celebrated fulfillment of a decades - old dream — a free and united Somali nation on the horn of Africa. The coming of independence also marked the end of Italy's African empire. It coincided with the Union of Somalia and Somaliland, a former British territory, which became independent only five days ago.

The merger constitutes one step toward the goal of all Somali nationalists — the union of the 2½ million Somali tribesmen. About half of them live in Italian Somila and 600,000 in British Somaliland.

At one second past midnight on Thursday, the flag of the new republic — a five-pointed white star on a blue field — was raised over the government palace. The Italian banner was lowered.

* * *

LATER, the Somalia Assembly gave formal approval to the merger with British Somaliland. Immediately afterwards the 90-member Italian Somalia Assembly and the 20 - member Italian Somalia Assembly and the 20 - member British Somaliland Legislative Council merged into a single Legislature for the new republic.

Mr. Lynch, the U.S. ambassador to the new republic, has had broad experience in African affairs. For the past two years, he has served as Consul General in Magadishu. Previous overseas assignments in Africa were to Lagos, Nigeria and Tripoli, Libya.

Heading the official United States delegation to the independence ceremonies was Secretary of Commerce Frederick Henry Mueller. He was the personal representative of the President with the rank of Special Ambassador.

Secretary of State Christian A. Herter sent this message to the Council of Minister of Somaliland:

"I extend my best wishes and congratulations on the achievement of your independence. This is a noteworthy milestone in your history, and it is with pleasure that I send my warmest regards on this happy occasion."

HARGEISA, Somaliland, Aug. 20—Extra police have been sent to reinforce border patrols along the northwestern sector of Somaliland's frontier with Ethiopia following reports of Ethiopian military action against tribesmen near the border.

British Somaliland became independent June 26 and on July 1 united with Somalia when that Italian trust territory became independent in its turn. Border troubles with Ethiopia were part of the new Somali republic's inheritance as nomad tribesmen have grazing rights on both sides of the border.

Magazine Edited by Briton Seeks To Improve Nonwhites

By MIKE MAHONEY

Special to The Constitution

JOHANNESBURG, Union of South Africa — "The thing we are trying to do with our magazine is to make it the voice—both politically and culturally—of the nonwhite population of the Union of South Africa."

So spoke Tom Hopkinson, 55, editor of "Drum," a monthly magazine addressed to Africans, Coloureds (mixed-races) and Asinas in this land where only the white man has the vote.

Hopkinson, a British citizen, has been editor of "Drum" for three years. The magazine has been in existence 10 years. A veteran journalist, he formerly edited the "Picture Post" (now defunct) in London, which was a weekly picture magazine with a circulation of one-and-a-quarter million.

CIRCULATION IS 252,000 ..

"Drum," whose head office is at 15 Troye Street in Johannesburg, has a circulation of 75,000 in the Union, 100,000 in Nigeria, 50,000 in Ghana, 15,000 in East Africa (Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika) and 12,000 in the Central African Federation (Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland) — for a grand total of 252,000.

"Our aim is to give the nonwhites, and particularly the Africans, a sense of pride and self-respect in themselves," he said. "You may think the reason we always put a picture of a pretty, dark-skinned girl on the cover of 'Drum' is because we want to sell more magazines. On the contrary, we do it to prove there are beautiful nonwhite girls in this country—just as beautiful and sometimes even more so than the white girls. This is just one example of the way we try to build up these peoples' pride in themselves.

WORKING FOR ADVANCES

"Every increase," he continued, "in African standard of living, in dress, in education — everything of that sort is what we are working for just as much as we try to help their political expression to be clear and reasonable.

"The African is trying to give up tribalism here and become Westernized. We should welcome this attempt and say: 'Thank God you are trying to give up tribalism. Let us help you move on into the 20th century.'

"Unfortunately, the government is only encouraging tribalism by its policy of Apartheid (separation of the races)."

EDITOR VISITS CONGO

Hopkinson said he had made three trips to the Congo since its independence from Belgium in June.

"I have seen what tribalism can do there," he commented. "I've seen people hunting other people to death in the streets for no better reason than that they were members of a different tribe. The Nationalist government has made a great point out of the Congo. They say this is what happens when you give the black man his freedom. And yet, ironically enough, they encourage the very thing that caused the tragedy of the Congo — tribalism!"

"This is why," he added, "we are trying through 'Drum' to bring the African into the 20th century and wean him away from his tribal past."

UNION BEARS DOWN

To the question of whether the Union government has been bringing adverse pressure to bear on "Drum," Hopkinson replied:

"Yes, we have our difficulties with the police and the government. Our chaps are constantly harried and harassed by the cops. After Sharpeville (the riots in March which resulted in the death of 67 Africans) we were raided by the police — the first time since I took over as editor. They searched our offices in Capetown and Durban, but not here. They told us they were going to file suit against us under the Emergency Regulations, but they haven't done so yet.

"It wouldn't take much to close us," he said, "We run this operation on a shoe-string. We only have one old broken-down car for the whole organizaton."

FUTURE DISCUSSED

As to the future of the Union of South Africa, Hopkinson stated he believed the Verwoerd government would make an unsuccessful attempt to "woo" the English - speaking (as opposed to Afrikaans - speaking) peoples in the Union over to its apartheid policies.

"This will not work," he said, "and thereafter things here will get very tough. The cost of living will go up, economic conditions will worsen, and the general political upheaval in Africa will continue to swell. It will be harder and harder for the government to hold down the African population and more and more restrictive measures are likely to be introduced — particularly against the press. Witness the case of Mr. Duncan (Patrick Duncan, editor of the racially liberal magazine 'Contact,' who has been imprisoned by the Nationalist government for refusing to reveal the source of information of an article published in his magazine.) In other words, the outlook is tougher and stormier. They are screwing the lid down tighter all the time."

PARTIES OUTLAWED

Hopkinson then remarked that he believed the government had made a big mistake when it outlawed the two African Nationalist political organizations—the African National Congress and the Pan-African Congress.

"The African is not drawn to communism at all," he said, "but with both their parties suppressed, it could create a kind of enforced interest in that ideology. Since Dr. Verwoerd came to power in April, 1958, he has done more to educate the Africans politically than anyone else ever has. He has accomplished this by suppressing their political parties and consequently making them twice as aware as before of their political potential. The African in the Union will now settle for nothing less than one man—one vote. Three years ago—yes, but now—no. Thanks to Dr. Verwoerd."

PRESSURES GROWING

When asked if he thought the problems of the Union would finally be resolved through violence or by peaceable means, Hopkinson replied:

"I could easily be wrong, but it is my personal opinion that outside world pressures, which are becoming stronger and stronger all the time—especially with the emergence of so many newly independent African nations—will at last force the Nationalist government to modify its suicidal and fanatic racial policies. I think this will happen before total violence breaks out. At least, I hope so. In the meantime, through the medium of 'Drum,' my staff (98 per cent of which is nonwhite), and I will continue to do all we can to prepare the African for his responsibilities in the 20th century."

He added grimly: "That is—unless I am thrown in jail or deported."

WORLD COURT GETS SOUTH AFRICA CASE

The New York Times

Ethiopia and Liberia Submit Charge of Repression in Mandated Territory

Sat. 11-5-60

By DAVID ANDERSON

Special to The New York Times.

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., Nov. 4—A complaint charging the Union of South Africa with violation of its mandate in South-West Africa was filed today with the International Court of Justice in The Hague.

This action was taken by the Governments of Ethiopia and Liberia, which were members of the League of Nations when South-West Africa, a former German colony, was mandated to South Africa in 1920. The two Governments acted on behalf of all the independent African states in line with a decision made at a conference of these countries in Addis Ababa last June.

Foremost among the charges against South Africa is that of racial discrimination. The application to the world court requests a finding that "the Union has the duty forthwith to cease the practice of apartheid [segregation] in the territory." Another major charge is that the civil rights of the inhabitants of South-West Africa have been suppressed.

Africans living in the territory, according to the complaint, cannot vote, join trade unions, live where they wish or travel freely about the country without special passes. They are denied adequate schooling and can hold no grants or leases on land. The document said.

The complaint also charged that the territory's inhabitants were liable to criminal prosecution for leaving a job and were subject to curfew orders and forcible deportation without appeal. Membership in political parties is forbidden and severe criminal penalties, including corporal punishment, is provided for violators, the Court was told.

South Africa is accused of having extended its administration and legislation to South-West Africa with a view to absorbing the mandated territory into the Union. The complaint notes that the Government repeatedly has refused to transmit petitions from the inhabitants to the United Nations or to submit annual reports on its administration.

Joseph Graham, Liberian Ambassador to the Netherlands, filed the application with the registrar of the world Court at noon today in The Hague. The action was announced subsequently at a news conference here.

At the news conference Dr. Tesfaye Gebre-Egzy, delegate of Ethiopia, and Nathan Barnes of Liberia were Andre Akakpo of Togo, chairman of the African-Asian group of states here this month, and Mburumba Kerina, a petitioner from South-West Africa, who will testify before the General Assembly's Trusteeship Committee.

The principal spokesman, however, was Ernest A. Gross, a member of the New York Prevost, Colt & Mosle, who is counsel in the proceedings. Mr. Gross was a member of the United States delegation at the United Nations from 1949 to 1953.

Interest in the case is widespread because South Africa has registered attempts over the last fifteen years to have its League of Nations mandate reclassified as a trusteeship under the United Nations. No other country with mandated territories took a similar position, yet none could effectively challenge South Africa's legal right to perpetuate its control.

Mandate Cited in Complaint

The complaint filed in the world court is based on Article 7 of the original mandate. South Africa agreed forty years ago to submit to the Permanent Court of International Justice, predecessor of the present world court, any dispute with "another member relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate."

In 1950, the International Court of Justice ruled that the mandate was still in force.

It is not known whether

The New York Times Nov. 5, 1960

MANDATE DISPUTED: Ethiopia and Liberia have filed a World Court complaint that South Africa has violated its mandate in South-West Africa, shown above by diagonal shading.

South Africa will recognize the complaint as legally valid. Mr. Gross said it was expected that certifiel copies of the document would be served on the South African Government by the Court and that counsel for both sides would be called to confer on a date for the pleadings. He estimated that the preliminaries would take several months.

Should South Africa challenge the competence of the Court, it was said, the jurists at The Hague have the power to decide for themselves on the merits of the argument. In the event that he case goes to trial and he bench rules against South Africa, Mr. Gross continued, Article 94 of the United Nations Charter Authorizes the Security Council to "make recommendations or decide upon measures to be taken to give effect to the judgment."

Paton Tells U.S. Of Hopes for Africa

The Christian Science Monitor

Boston, Mass.

By Mary Hornaday

Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

New York

Alan Paton, long-time opponent of the South African Government's racial policies, is in the United States to tell Americans of his hopes for a better South Africa.

The noted author, leader of the South African Liberal Party, believes one way to assist in solving South Africa's problems would be through the influence of the World Council of Churches in ending "apartheid," or race segregation.

In particular, he is anxious to break a deadlock which has arisen between the Anglican and Dutch Reformed churches in South Africa over an important interchurch conference on apartheid scheduled for Dec. 7-14.

Meetingplace Debated

Because of the recent ouster of Anglican Bishop Ambrose Reeves of Johannesburg, South African Anglicans are urging the removal of the meeting to Rhodesia so the Bishop can attend, but the Dutch Reformed Church is insisting that it be held in South Africa.

Mr. Paton who is currently in the United States on a lecture tour, had planned to attend the consultation as a delegate from the Church of the Provinces (Anglican).

Initiative in convening the meeting of the eight World Council member churches was taken in Geneva after the Sharpeville trouble earlier this year. In general, the Anglican Church opposes apartheid and the Dutch Reformed Church supports it, though some churchmen have questioned whether the latter is as monolithic in its opposition as has sometimes been made out.

"In the deportation of Bishop Reeves," Mr. Paton says, "we have lost one of our best negotiators."

Interviewed at his New York hotel, the author of "Cry, the Beloved Country," expresses dissappointment that United Nations Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold has not yet been able to go to South Africa to carry out last summer's Security Council instructions to seek an end to apartheid, but casting his thoughts to the United Nations General Assembly a few blocks away, he observed: "The outlook in South Africa is not quite so bad when you come over here and realize that it is really the future of the human race that is at stake."

Mr. Paton is convinced that what is troubling mankind today—and especially Western man—is a "strong sense of inferiority." He explains: "Man is really beginning to believe that he is a depraved creature and he needs to be reminded that is not the truth. He needs to have his self-respect restored."

The noted South African cast cold water on the proposal for formation of a non-white South African government-in-exile in London. It would be "slightly impudent" he argued, to try to form a government when most of the leading opponents of apartheid are either in jail in the union or are determined to stay there and stand firm.

Opponents in Millions

"That's all right when a government has thrown out all its opponents," he said, "but in South Africa that could never happen because the opponents number millions."

It is his conviction that Africa offers modern man the chance he needs to restore his self-respect by bringing his expenditures for constructive aims up to those being made for destruction.

Vital Need Accented

In an address he made here after receiving the 1960 Freedom House Award he praised highly President Eisenhower's five-point plan for Africa. "No Western country," he declared, "can afford to appear lukewarm about the liberation of Africa."

He called on the West (1) to help African countries to develop their resources, raise their standard of living, attack poverty and disease, and (2) help them to eliminate illiteracy and to train in as short a time as possible scientists, administrators, doctors, teachers, engineers, architects, accountants and agriculturists."

REPUBLIC IS VOTED FOR SOUTH AFRICA; VERWOERD VICTOR

The N. Y. Times

Nationalists Win All-White Referendum in Move to Sever British Ties

New York, N. Y.

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Oct. 6—Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd and the ruling Nationalist party have won public approval by a comfortable margin for making South Africa a republic.

Their victory became apparent today as the results of yesterday's all-white referendum on the republic question were totaled. Indications were that when the final return was tallied, the Nationalists would have a majority of more than 70,000.

The result of the referendum means that South Africa will cease to be a constitutional monarchy owing allegiance to the British crown and that Britain's Queen Elizabeth II will be replaced by a President as chief of state.

Dr. Verwoerd has indicated that legislation to accomplish this will be enacted by the South African Parliament at its next session, which is scheduled to open Jan. 20 in Cape Town.

Foes Lose Ground

Early today opponents of a republic had rolled up a majority of 155,000 against a republic. But as returns continued to flow in from polling places throughout South Africa and South West Africa, which South Africa administers under a mandate from the League of Nations, it became apparent that a Nationalist victory was in the making.

Throughout the day the anti-republic majority dwindled. A majority f or a republic then began to mount. Early returns were from the cities and towns where a great majority of anti-Government voters live. Nationalist rural strongholds were heard from later on.

Commonwealth Tie at Issue

The result showed the great cleavage that exists between the urban business man and the rural farmer; that is, between the white South Africans of British ancestry—most of whom oppose the Verwoerd Administration—and the Afrikaners, who are descendants of early Dutch settlers and are fervid supporters of Dr. Verwoerd.

The poll was confined to the country's 3,000,000 whites, 55 per cent of whom are Afrikaners and 45 per cent of British blood. The country's non-white majority of more than 11,000,000 was excluded.

Also at issue in the referendum is South Africa's membership in the British Commonwealth. As a new republic, the country would have to be accepted for continued membership by the other members.

Many South Africans fear that such countries as Ghana, Nigeria, Malaya and India, which strongly oppose the Verwoerd Government's white supremacy policies, would seize South Africa's conversion to a republic as an opportunity to oust South Africa from the Commonwealth.

Dr. Verwoerd has said that he would attend the next meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss the situation.

Meanwhile, it is believed that an actual change to a republic would be delayed until after the Prime Ministers' conference.

Commenting on the outcome of the referendum, Die Transvaler, Johannesburg's Afrikaans newspaper of which Dr. Verwoerd once was editor, said:

"Those who voted against the republic must also be converted to the republican ideal because their contribution to the further building and development of the country are also necessary."

Dr. Jan Steytler, leader of the anti-Government Progressive party, said: "The danger of South Africa is that the rest of the world may regard a majority yes vote as an indication that all whites approve of racial discrimination."

Premier's Attacker Adjudged Insane

PRETORIA, South Africa (AP)—The man who shot South Africa's prime minister last April was adjudged mentally disordered Monday, sent to a mental institution and his trial for attempted murder abandoned.

Expect No Sympathy from Kennedy

Pittsburgh

By RICHARD KASISCHKE

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa's white supremacy government has indicated somewhat bitterly that it does not expect any sympathy for its racial segregation policies from the Kennedy administration in the United States.

Nor, apparently, do the nation's gold producers and gold speculators—although they cling to a hope that the United States may have to raise the official world price in order to halt the drain on its gold reserves.

Sun. 11-27-60

An official commentator on the state-operated South African Broadcasting Corp. recently complained: "It looks like the Kennedy administration will follow the policies of the Eisenhower administration — and perhaps go even further — in its bid for the favor of black nationalism in Africa."

"This means," the commentator continued, "the white minority in Africa will be pushed even further into the background in United States policy. It means the United States, and some other Western countries, will continue trying to outbid the Communists for the favor of the Africans—not only politically but with material gifts. And this to the disregard of South Africans, who have always been anti-Communist and true to the traditions of the West."

South African Nationalist Government leaders repeatedly have alleged that Western policy is "willing to sell-out the whites in Africa." The Johannesburg Sunday Times—as well as some other leading newspapers here—have expressed belief that "men who are likely to be top aides" in the administration of John F. Kennedy are uncompromising opponents of the South African government's racial policies. The Sunday Times named Adlai Stevenson and Chester Bowles in this connection. The newspaper quoted from speeches and writings of these two men condemning South Africa's "apartheid."

South Africans also tend to blame Kennedy for the bursting of the October-November gold speculation bubble, which enriched the South African treasury as well as mine owners. Much of the rise in the gold bullion market was attributed here to anticipation of a Kennedy victory and when the Democratic candidate did win there was another quick rise in the Johannesburg market. But all this last rise—and more—was lost when Kennedy repeatedly stated he did not intend to devalue the dollar but aimed to find other means to halt the United States gold outflow.

South African Republic

The New York Times

It has been well called "the last Battle of the Boer War," this South African referendum to establish a republic. Almost sixty years ago the Boer republics were blotted out after a bitter and a bloody struggle. Now the ironic wheel of history has turned, and the Boers (called Afrikaners now) have won their final conflict with the British.

New York

In a matter of months the Queen will be replaced by a President; and the Union of South Africa will become the world's youngest republic. The vote this week that settled the issue was fairly close: of more than 1,600,000 ballots cast, the republican margin was only 75,000. It came from the rural strongholds of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's Nationalists, composed primarily of the dogged conservative segregationist Afrikaners who form a majority of the union's 3,000,000 whites. Of course none of the country's 10,000,000 Africans, nor even the 1,000,000 "coloreds" of mixed blood, were allowed to participate in the voting. Now that Dr. Verwoerd has achieved his ambition in a renunciation of the monarchy and an endorsement of the republic, he may feel encouraged to push on even more strongly than heretofore with his ultra-restrictive racial policies that have made the name of South Africa condemned throughout the world.

The decision to become a republic will bring to a head the long-simmering question of South Africa's continued membership in the Commonwealth. Under normal procedure, a change of status such as that in prospect for the Union would require at least a formal approval, by the other members of the Commonwealth, of South Africa's readmission. Because of the policy of apartheid, it is unlikely that such approval would be readily forthcoming from the non-white members such as India, Ghana and Nigeria, each of whom has severely condemned South African racism. But the Commonwealth is a highly flexible organism, and the advantages to all parties of South Africa's continued role in it are great.

This is so not only for the obvious economic reasons, but also for the political reason that pressure for moderation on racial questions can be applied more effectively from within the Commonwealth than from outside it. It is not yet certain that the new republic will even wish to remain within the Commonwealth; but the probabilities are that it will if it can.

Rejects Move To Integration

The Defender

Chicago Ill.

12/3/59

PRETORIA, South Africa — (UPI) — Prime Minister Hendrik Vorwoerd has rejected proposals that colored people sit in South Africa's Parliament as a first step toward integration.

He told the newspaper Transvaaler he had ruled out the possibility that colored people be allowed direct representation or returned to the common voting roll from which the Nationalist Government removed them in 1956.

Vorwoerd said giving the colored people back the vote would be contradictory to the segregation policy advocating separate development for whites, Negroes and colored people.

He denied world opinion would be mollified toward South Africa by such a move.

"The truth is otherwise," Vorwoerd said. "The world would welcome such signs as surrender to an integration policy and infer its pressure helped bring it about. The world would then increase its pressure, hoping to gain more racial concessions."

Vorwoerd attacked the opposition United Party's policy which he said "sooner or later must lead to black supremacy."

Nyasaland Lifts Emergency

The Christian

Once more, Africa is astir with new developments — some encouraging and some not.

The British Governor of Nyasaland, Sir Robert Armitage, has announced the lifting of the state of emergency that has been in effect there for 18 months.

But almost simultaneously, emergency rule was imposed in a Belgian Congo province. And Sir Robert indicated he would retain certain special powers since conditions were "not yet wholly normal."

Christian Science Monitor 6-15-60

The Belgian Congo is scheduled to become an independent state at the end of June. And elsewhere in Africa important moves marking the end of colonial administrations are impending, too.

86 Million Involved

In July, Somalia, which once was an Italian colony but which more recently has been a United Nations trust territory, also becomes independent. It then is scheduled to unite with adjacent British Somaliland.

Such French territories as the Federation of Mali, the Equatorial Union (former French Equatorial Africa), Dahomey, the Ivory Coast, Niger, the Volta Republic, and Madagascar all look forward to early independence. Cameroun and Togoland, former French trusteeships, already have made the transition this year.

The result is that with a minimum of violence and misunderstanding some 86,000,000 Africans in a single year will have emerged from European control by the British, the French, or the Belgians.

But there are clouds on the horizon, too. The looming Congo crisis gives ground for concern, with a breakaway movement reported in Katanga and the threat of an attempt to link up with the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Moreover, border trouble between the Somalis and Ethiopians is forecast.

Few Still Detained

Meanwhile, the termination of the Nyasa emergency restrictions had been antcipated for some time in London. Strict regulations were put into effect in March, 1959, when the Nyasaland African Congress was banned and its leader, Dr. Hastings Banda, and 1,300 other members detained. Dr. Banda was released from custody last April.

Christian Science Monitor 6-15-60

Sir Robert explained a small number of persons still would be detained, but added his opinion that "the peoples of Nyasaland as a whole are prepared to abandon violence and rely on peaceful means for the attainment of their ends."

Dr. Banda now heads the Malawi Congress Party, the successor to the Nyasaland African Congress, and as such has been invited to the Nyasaland constitutional conference scheduled for July 25 in London. But he has indicated he might not attend unless his chief deputies, some of whom are still in jail, could accompany him.

The emergency originally was invoked following disorders in which 47 Africans were killed. Its imposition provoked a heated debate in the House of Commons on colonial issues.

Malaya to Hound Apartheid

But Gently

The Christian

The government of the Federation of Malaya intends to try to take the lead in what it hopes will become a worldwide campaign to make the Union of South Africa abandon its internal policy of apartheid (racial segregation). But the federal Prime Minister, Tunku (Prince) Abdul Rahman, realizes the Federation must go gently in its quest for international support. And all he intends to do for the time being is to write to the heads of government of all members of the United Nations, including South Africa, asking them what they think ought to be done next.

Christian Science Mon 6-16-60

After giving the House of Representatives in the federal capital here an account of his recent personal controversy in London with South African Minister of External Affairs Eric Louw, the Tunku told members that, while he had a mandate from them to press the issue to the "bitter end," it was difficult for him to determine how. He reported he had raised the apartheid question fearlessly in London in May during the conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, as directed by his government, but with due regard to the tradition at such meetings of not discussing formally any Commonwealth country's internal affairs.

He gave the House of Representatives a detailed account of what took place between the obdurate Mr. Louw and himself, and pointed out that apartheid was discussed far more during the conference than the final communiqué about the proceedings suggests.

Touchiness Noted

The Tunku insisted the "members must appreciate that most leaders of the world are touchy about their own prestige and dignity." He added with characteristic perception, "I do not think they would welcome any suggestion emanating from this country which would bind them to any positive acts. My feeling, therefore, is I should be given a mandate to take whatever steps I consider correct. All I propose to do is to write to the Prime Ministers of all countries in the Democratic world and ask what I should do in the matter and how they propose to contribute to whatever action we take."

The Prime Minister continued, "If we go any further than that, I do not think we will get support. I do not think this matter should be confined to the countries of Asia and Africa. To the best of my knowledge, one European country already has taken definite action. The Government of Sweden has passed a resolution to boycott South African goods. The Dutch Government has passed one condemning apartheid.

"Most of the countries populated by white people have taken some step to show their abhorrence of apartheid. Therefore, it would be a mistake to confine our appeal to the countries of Asia. I think it should go out to all other countries which we feel dislike this policy."

Menace Discussed

The House of Representatives went on the next day, June 21, to discuss the safeguarding of the federation's future against militant communism. What has been called for the past 12 years "the emergency"—the jungle conflict with Communist terrorists that started in June, 1948—is to be declared at an end officially July 31. But this is a unilateral decision, and the Communists who still have not surrendered (the latest estimate places them at a total of 583) are still concealed in the Malayan-Thai borderlands, crossing the frontier unobserved almost at will and waiting for interracial trouble to develop in the federation that would give them an opportunity to revert to their old role.

Deputy Prime Minister and Defense Minister Dato Abdul Razak bin Hussein said, "These terrorists remain a potential threat to the security of the country. We are fortunate in having a friendly neighbor with whose government we are on the best terms. It is the intention of the Federation Government and Royal Thai Government to continue taking necessary actions to eliminate remnants of the terrorist movement."

New Council Set

For this purpose, the federation is replacing the present "Emergency Operations Council" by a body to be named the "Border Security Council," probably under the chairmanship of the Prime Minister.

The director of its undertakings is to be the present director of emergency operations. The areas affected are the states of Perlis, Kelantan, Kedah, and the northern part of Perak, in north Malaya. For combat duties there the Federation will still be able to call upon the assistance of Commonwealth troops stationed in Malaya as the Commonwealth's strategic reserve.

Opposition to the internal security bill designed to cope with subversion after July 31 was split three ways during the debate June 21, but the only members calling for total rejection have been representatives of a left-wing organization named the People's Progressive Party. They took particular exception to powers under the bill allowing arrest for preventive detention. The Defense Minister said in this connection that the government is content to stand on its record: for, whereas there were 250 detainees in 1957, today there are only 70.

Malayan Boycott To Hit Apartheid

By Ronald Stead
Southeast Asia Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Kuala Lumpur

The government of the Federation of Malaya has decided to impose a total boycott on the introduction of South African goods of all kinds to this country from Aug. 1 as the start of what the Prime Minister, Tunku Abdul Rahman, termed "an economic war upon the Union of South Africa" in the hope that this will help compel abandonment there of the internal policy of apartheid or racial segregation.

Asked by this correspondent what he thought the consequences were likely to be in relation to GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) to which the federation subscribes, the Tunku replied, "Maybe we shall be kicked out—but this is a possibility we took into consideration when taking this action."

Optimism Aired

The Prime Minister added that the effectiveness of this practical step of leadership in seeking to mobilize world opinion and economic pressure against apartheid depends for its success upon the extent to which Malaya's lead is followed in other countries.

The Tunku is optimistic that those in the East will back up the federation in the imposing of economic sanctions on South Africa, though he does not expect Western countries to follow his line since they see the matter in a different perspective.

Malaya's decision to prohibit the import of all goods of South African origin after July has already been reported to the prime ministers of the Commonwealth countries, including the Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa.

Implications Weighed

This was done July 6 in a cable explaining, "This step is taken only after very careful consideration of the various implications of this country's obligations under GATT.

"The government felt impelled to adopt this course in view of South Africa's policy toward its own Negro and colored people and the insuperable barrier which this policy places in the way of normal relations between South Africa and other African and Asian nations.

"The government intends to maintain this stand until such time as the South African government gives sufficient indication of its sincere intention to tackle its problem in a humane way."

Notification to the people of Malaya that they can no longer import South African goods of any sort has been made through the medium of an official order in the government gazette. There is widespread public support behind the government's move.

Letter Sent Out

An explanatory letter is being sent to the Commonwealth prime ministers while all other countries in direct diplomatic relationship with the Federation of Malaya are being apprised through their representatives in the federal capital.

Canned fish is the chief item among imports from South Africa, worth $17,300,000 Malayan (nearly $6,000,000 U.S.) in 1959, against exports to South Africa worth $15,900,000 Malayan. Total trade between the two countries is thus worth over $11,000,000 and the balance in favor of South Africa is nearly $500,000.

No difficulty is envisaged in making substitutions for South African imports because the federation's own fishing industry now provides enough from the sea to meet the country's needs. In other matters—such as chemicals, for example—the United Kingdom and West Germany can provide alternative supplies.

The Tunku told this correspondent that the reaction in GATT to the federation's defiance of its regulations is likely to depend on the attitude taken by South Africa. He pointed out that the federation is a valuable member of GATT, describable broadly as "the only country in the whole of Asia with money to spend."

This derives mainly from the fact that it produces about one-third of the world's natural rubber and tin. The federation joined GATT in 1957, the year in which Malaya became independent of British control.

The Tunku said this boycott will not affect the federation's cost of living and that the measure was adopted regardless of such consequences anyway, because the Cabinet feels there is all too great a danger of protests against apartheid turning out to be nothing more than words — whether in the United Nations, in Commonwealth conferences, or any place else.

Surface Calm Covers South Africa

Cape Town

The state of emergency has been lifted in South Africa after being in force for exactly five months.

A notice in the government gazette Aug. 31 repealed the emergency regulations and brought to an end what Sir de Villiers Graaffff, leader of the opposition, has described as "another chapter in the government's deplorable administrative record."

The detainees have all been released now. At one period there were 2,000 political detainees and also 18,000 nonpolitical detainees whom the authorities classified as "idlers."

Various opposition newspapers have joined Sir de Villiers in vigorously criticizing Prime Minister Heindrich F. Verwoerd's government for its handling of the situation which arose in South Africa after the Sharpeville disturbances at the end of March; for arming itself with "excessive powers" and then being reluctant to divest itself of them; and for arresting thousands of whites and nonwhites apparently for no valid reason.

Few Brought to Trial

Most of the political detainees spent at least four months in prison. Only a few of them though were brought before the courts—in spite of a specific assurance by the Minister of Justice that charges would be preferred against them "when the investigation has been completed and evidence is available."

Writing in an opposition newspaper, Harry Lawrence, MP, national chairman of the Progressive Party and a former Minister of Justice, said, "The public of South Africa were led to believe that citizens who had been arrested had in some way or another contravened the laws of the land, and that in the interests of public safety and the security of the state their detention was essential pending investigations which would result in evidence being sifted and produced against them in the established courts of the land."

Tragedies Evident

Pointing out that these promised trials had not materialized and that meanwhile the detained have suffered mental strain and financial loss, Mr. Lawrence added, "Homes have been broken up, wives and small children have been subjected to distress, and untold misery has been caused by what would now appear to be arrests without any legal justification other than the dictatorial powers contained in the emergency regulations."

Both the United Party, of which Sir de Villiers is the leader, and the Progressive Party have announced their intention of questioning the government closely on its handling of the emergency at the next session of Parliament.

The "unnecessary prolongation" of the emergency was "disgraceful," said the newspaper Cape Argus. It was "one of the grossest interferences with the liberty of South Africans that the country has suffered."

And the Rand Daily Mail commented: "The lifting of the state of emergency will bring to an end a dark and ugly episode in the Union's history.

Problem Remains

"We know that the situation is completely quiet now; we know that the African political organizations have been smashed; and we know that the chances of large-scale disorders are for the moment remote.

"What we do not know is how the basic problem of white-black relations in this country has in any way been reduced during these past five sorry months."

The paper finally observed that, though outwardly the situation might seem to have improved, the basic condition remains as dangerous as ever.

This is the anxiety of many white South Africans today: They concede that law and order — of a sort — has been restored, but they are wondering when the next round in the white-black conflict will begin.

They believe there must be a next round because the factors which gave rise to the Sharpeville disturbances still remain. Dr. Verwoerd's government dealt with the unrest in a purely military sense. It made no political concessions.

Business World Rebuffed

In fact Dr. Verwoerd has personally and in public rebuffed the business world of South Africa for presuming to suggest a way of improving race relations.

Foreign investors have withdrawn large sums of money from the country. This has resulted in many big projects being either canceled or postponed, and unemployment is increasing throughout the construction industry.

Not only will the nonwhites be hit hardest by this unemployment, but under the government's "job reservation" policy, nonwhites can be dismissed to provide employment for out-of-work whites.

Already many nonwhite ex-detainees are finding it difficult to obtain work. They have returned to their homes from prison embittered but not cowed. Their organizations—the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress—have been banned, but no doubt they will create new organizations.

Rumors Circulate

In their present mood they are apparently skeptical of the value of passive resistance as a policy.

Vague rumors are being circulated that some of the "young bloods" have decided that nonviolence is a waste of time.

While the 12,000,000 nonwhites sit back and recover from the effects of the emergency, the 3,000,000 whites are arguing whether South Africa should become a republic or not. The danger is that if the whites in their exclusiveness agree to have a republic, the nonwhites may regard this as a final ganging up of the whites on the basis of apartheid (segregation).

Methodist head hits apartheid

CAPETOWN, South Africa—In a statement criticizing the South African government's racial segregation policy, the Rev. Leslie A. Hewson, president of the Methodist Church in South Africa, called for a true partnership between the races in the country.

The letter, read in all Methodist churches in South Africa, said domination of one race by another is "now out of date."

"Our church in South Africa," he declared, "has consistently maintained that apartheid (racial segregation) by compulsion has brought far more evil than good to our country. Our best friends among Christian leaders and writers are as disturbed as we are at the injustice, suffering, harm and loss which apartheid has brought to our black, colored and Indian people, and at the growing fear it has brought to the white people of South Africa."

South Africa: All Quiet on Freedom Day

Christian Science Monitor 7/27/60

Johannesburg

Pressure is building up in opposition circles in South Africa for Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's Nationalist government to lift the state of emergency which has been in force now for three months.

June 26 was Freedom Day, but it passed quietly in spite of an earlier warning by the Minister of Justice that it might be the occasion for renewed racial disturbances.

In Johannesburg it was a normal Sunday, although a few days previous stickers had been dropped from rooftops downtown calling for the ending of the emergency, the release of the 1,700 or more political detainees, and the payment of higher wages to Africans. Spotter planes kept an eye on the situation from the air, and the police kept several Saracen armored cars in readiness for trouble.

Rumors that Africans would stage another stay-at-home strike June 27 were disproved. The country's vast African labor force turned up for work as usual.

A disturbing feature of life in South Africa is that with nearly every African leader of importance behind bars—there must be at least 1,500 Africans in dentention—the whites have no reliable way of assessing the mood of the African masses. South Africa could be on the verge of another major racial outburst or it could be in for a fairly long period of calm; no one knows.

Now that June 26 has passed without incident, the opposition parties in South Africa, and also business circles, feel there is no justification for the government's continuing the state of emergency. According to unconfirmed reports the government may start lifting the state of emergency in some districts and also releasing some detainees.

Public Reminded

It is not expected, though, that the state of emergency will be withdrawn entirely and all the detainees released. Government politicians never cease reminding the public that states of emergency have lasted for many months, even years, in British territories in Africa like Kenya and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

There is a strong suspicion in opposition circles that the government intends to retain certain emergency powers for some time yet to intimidate its party political opponents.

Pointing out that, apart from the unrest in the tribal reserve of Pondoland, South Africa has been free from violence for two full months now, the Rand Daily Mail of Johannesburg says, "There is logically no reason for continuing the emergency."

The newspaper admits, however, the average white South African is becoming accustomed to living under the emergency and that "it suits the Nationalists to have the possibility of legally unchallengable action hanging over the heads of political opponents. . . . While the government can ban political organizations and newspapers, seize property, and arrest and detain without warrant, opponents are intimidated and criticisms must be kept within limits. . . . With the republic referendum in the offing, this continued intimidation is to the government's advantage."

Dependents in Need

The plight of the dependents of the political detainees, meanwhile, is becoming desperate in many cases. Homes have been broken up and sources of income cut off. Many politically active whites are being forced to devote their entire time to welfare work—raising money for dependents and distributing relief.

There is also growing concern over the position of Africans who have been detained under the emergency regulations for nonpolitical offenses, like being without permits in urban areas or having no job or fixed place of abode. Apparently they have been appearing before secret "courts" in the jails, not for trial but for committal to some unknown "place of detention."

Some lawyers believe these places of detention are labor camps and that the nonpolitical African detainees — of whom there are hundreds if not thousands—are also being hired out to white farmers to help with harvesting.

The Africans are not allowed legal representation when they appear before the "courts," and no one, not even their relatives, are told where they are being sent.

Advertising In Africa: A Multiple Headache

NEW YORK, (UPI) — Life in multi-lingural South Africa poses unique advertising problem, a leading Jonnesburg ad man said Tuesday.

David Hart, who heads ad operation in the Union and nearby British, French and Portuguese territories, said advertising in South Africa tends to follow American methods in the main—gbut it's different.

White Drivers Stoned By African Negroes

EAST LONDON, South Africa (AP) — White motorists were stoned by Negroes and one traveler was fired upon in a new outburst of racial trouble in South Africa's strife-torn Pondoland, police confirmed.

The incidents occurred between Port St. Johns and Lusikisiki, on the Indian Ocean coast road.

Newsmen have been banned from Pondoland since a series of clashes between police and demonstrating Africans culminated in a skirmish last June. The government said police killed six Africans. Press reports said they killed 27.

South Africa Cries 'Foul' Over Boycott

Pittsburgh Courier Pittsburgh, Pa. Sat. 8/13/60

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y.—Even South Africa can cry "foul," the Government of Ghana has found out. The Ghana mission to the UN told last week of a cry from the Ministers of External Affairs of the Union of South Africa that the boycotts by Ghana and Malaya against South Africa were a flagrant breach of "solemn undertakings given in an international instrument" — the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Ghana has countered with the statement that they consider South Africa "an international delinquent."

The boycotts were started as a protest against the oppressive treatment of Africans in South Africa under the official government policy of apartheid.

Zulu Educator Here Predicts Rise of Turbulence in Africa

The Washington Post Washington, D.C.

Wed. 8-3-60

By Rasa Gustaitis

A soft-spoken Zula from tiny Basutoland said yesterday that in no more than five years "Africa will run red—with blood or communism."

"The patience of 75 per cent of the African people is breaking right now," said James J. Machobane ,46, head of an unusual agricultural college in the Britsh portectorate surrounded on all sides by the strife-torn Union of South Africa. "It is still possible to repair relations. Yet in no more than five years, I believe, Africa will take any means available to rise from poverty and hunger, and evil means are most accessible."

Mr. and Mrs. Machobane have been traveling since May 24 in this country on a Ford Foundation grant. They are studying techniques of intensive agriculture and mass education applicable in Machobane College which they founded three years ago.

Popularly known as "Banishers of Starvation", their school has no buildings, no paid teachers and practically no capital. Yet it already has taught some 5000 persons to reduce the huge infant mortality rate, raise better crops and increase the income of the 800,000 population eking out an existence from the country's 11,720 square miles of rocky terrain.

In 1944 Mr. and Mrs. Machobane left a comfortable house and job and "went into the wilderness" of Ngechambo. After years of study which included "eating, sleeping and talking with the people", they founded a school with 12 students aged 30-75. These they taught for a year in their home, then sent them out "to teach without discrimination and without pay."

One year's instruction leads to a certificate enabling a student to teach others and to be a member of the school's marketing and purchasing cooperative. But it takes five years of work with the people and occasional instruction to earn the blue and white academic robe patterned after a tiger skin and to have the right to start a similar college.

"We have heard a great shouting for help from the whole country," Machobane said as his wife nodded agreement. "When our students return to a village after a year and begin to raise a record crop, when their families begin to look healthier, people come from all around and walk about the house and land looking and wondering."

Basutoland has five women to every man, largely because men seek jobs in South African mines and "either die there or come home with tuberculosis to die", Machobane said. It is the widows who own most land and are the poorest." Therefore the school requires that five women be taught to every man.

"We have nothing but a little knowledge and a voice", mused Machobane, "but our people spoke out their needs and they are being met."

The Machobanes said their trip here "will probably have profitable results." They will go to England, France and Germany after leaving the United States in September and return to their school in December.

Mr. and Mrs. James J. Machobane, of Basutoland in South Africa, visited Washington yesterday on their Ford Foundation tour of the United States. Mr. Machobane, who heads an agricultural college, predicted that poverty and hunger will force Africa to communism within five years.

Bishop's Sudden Ouster Raises Storm In Africa

The Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—The sudden deportation of the Anglican bishop of Johannesburg, the Rt. Rev. Ambrose Reeves, has raised a storm likely to have great political repercussions in this racially troubled nation.

Sunday 9-15-60

The bishop was hustled aboard a plane Monday on orders of the government less than 48 hours after he returned from England. He had left in April at the height of the racial crisis because he feared arrest.

ANGERED AFRICANS

Some estimate the deportation has cost Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's government thousands of votes in the Oct. 5 national referendum on the question of converting South Africa from a constitutional monarchy under the British crown into a republic with a South African chief of state.

Optimists in the anti-Republican camp even think the Reeves issue may bring defeat to Verwoerd's proposal because it has angered many English-speaking South Africans — just the people to whom Verwoerd's Afrikaaner-dominated party has been appealing for votes with a "white unity" slogan.

The nationalist government said Bishop Reeves—a British subject and not a South African—was expelled because of the tone in which he criticized racial segregation.

Although many English-speaking South Africans do not like the bishop or his way of doing things, they have been affronted by the way he was allowed to return and then thrown out of the country without legal advice or a court hearing.

The Dutch-descended Afrikaaners, who speak their own Dutch dialect, are bitterly anti-British. Their ancestors were defeated by the British in the Boer War. They resent Queen Elizabeth II as head of state even though she has no power here.

Many South Africans of British background — about one-third of South Africa's white population—cling to England as "home" and want to retain some ties with it. Those ties might be cut by exclusion from the British Commonwealth if South Africa becomes a republic.

The separation within the white community also is religious.

Most Afrikaaners belong to the Dutch Reformed Church, which has yet to voice firm opposition to the nationalists' segregation policy. Leading prelates of the Anglican Church, on the other hand, have condemned the policy, and most British-descended whites are Anglicans.

REPORT ON CASE

The Dutch Reformed Church declared the deportation is no concern of the World Council of Churches. The council's secretariat asked for a report on the case.

Addressing one of the biggest religious meetings ever held in Natal Province, the Anglican archbishop of Cape Town, the Most Rev. Joost de Blank, denounced Bishop Reeves' deportation as religious persecution. He was cheered on the steps of City Hall by a crowd of 4,000.

Prof. L. I. Rabinowitz, chief rabbi of Transvaal and the Free State, in a statement urged the government to permit Bishop Reeves to return "for the sake of the good name and reputation of South Africa."

The English-language press, which opposes Verwoerd's plan for a republic, used Bishop Reeves' ouster to lash anew at the government.

Ghana Move Provokes South Africa

The Christian Science Monitor

Cape Town

The South African Government is drafting legislation to deal with "disloyal" South Africans who sign Ghana's new anti-apartheid declaration.

Such "disloyal" South Africans will be refused South African passports or they will lose other privileges.

This was announced by the Prime Minister, Dr. Hendrik Verwoerd, in a statement published Aug. 15. He said the legislation would be introduced at the parliamentary session which begins in January.

First One Ban Affects

Ghana's ban on South African travelers came into effect at midnight on July 31—two weeks ago. I was the first South African to come under the ban. The Pan-American plane in which I had traveled from Lisbon landed at Accra airport half an hour after midnight.

I found the entry permit issued to me as a Commonwealth citizen by the Ghana Embassy in London a few days earlier was worthless. Under Ghana's new anti-apartheid laws, South Africans are now treated as non-Commonwealth citizens.

I signed an application form at Accra airport for a visa and I was given an emergency visa costing $3.

Signature Required

I would have been taken into custody, however, as an illegal immigrant if I had not signed the additional anti-apartheid declaration which reads "I am opposed to apartheid and racial discrimination as practised in the Union of South Africa and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true."

No South African can enter Ghana without signing this declaration. Even if he is a tran- for British passports to escape the ban (South African citizens who were born in Britain, or whose parents were born in Britain, are entitled to claim British passports).

Hard Choice Provided

Dr. Verwoerd intends punishing such South Africans by refusing them South African passports — if they ever re-apply. Yet if they retain their South African passports, they must sign the anti-apartheid declaration in order to enter Ghana—and this in turn will be a "disloyal" act which will incur penalties under the proposed legislation.

It seems that South Africans living in Ghana will be forced therefore either to sever their links with South Africa or to quit Ghana permanently.

The legislation will be retroactive to Aug. 15. It will not apply to the dozen or so persons who have signed the declaration during the past two weeks —including this writer.

Repercussions Seen

Opposition M.P.'s commented that Dr. Verwoerd's proposed legislation was "grossly unfair" on South Africans resident in Ghana and that it was "spiteful" in that it sought to prevent any South Africans from visiting Ghana in the future.

These M. P.'s pointed out that the emergent African states are mounting a massive campaign sit passenger he must sign the form.

Airline companies such as Pan-American commit an offense if they try to conceal the identity of any South African passengers in transit.

Dr. Verwoerd's statement says that his government "cannot countenance cooperation by union citizens in aggressive action against South Africa."

It adds, "It will be understood that the union government cannot agree to union citizens, including those in transit to or from the United States of America or elsewhere, being obliged to sign an affidavit which in effect means agreement that a foreign government has the right to intervene in the union's domestic affairs."

Referring to the anti-apartheid form, Dr. Verwoerd's statement says, "Such a sworn declaration will be regarded by the government as disloyal action against South Africa, the country of which the signatory is a citizen."

There are a number of South Africans resident in Ghana. Some apparently have applied against South Africa and that other airfields such as Kano in Nigeria, Khartoum in the Sudan, Léopoldville in the Congo, and possibly even Nairobi in Kenya, may all be closed to South Africans one day.

If the campaign spreads south, Africans may soon have to make all their journeys by sea if Dr. Verwoerd refuses to let them sign anti-apartheid declarations.

White Police Crack Down In South Africa

News + Courier Charleston, S.C. Tues. 9-13-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa's white police are cracking down on underground remnants of the outlawed Pan-Africanist Congress and staging regular raids to confiscate firearms hidden by blacks.

Last Friday, the African men and a woman, alleged members of PAC, were arrested in a dawn swoop by security police. They were held for trial on charges of being members of an unauthorized political organization.

The Pan-Africanist Congress was outlawed, together with the older but less militant African National Congress, after the bloody racial violence of last March and April.

Pan-Africanists launched a protest campaign against the law which requires blacks to carry identification passes, and it was this campaign that brought on violence and resulted in the white government proclaiming a state of emergency March 30 that was lifted only last Aug. 31.

Since then there have been indications the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanists have been virtually smashed, since most of their leaders have been imprisoned, but the new police swoops indicate authorities are taking no chances. There is continuing unrest as news sifts down from the strife-torn Congo and also from Rhodesia, where there have been recent race riots.

Vote for a Republic Raises Problems of Commonwealth Ties and Internal Rifts

New York

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Oct. 8—The decision to form a republic by a small majority vote among South Africa's 3,000,000 whites this week has left the country with new problems to add to the heavy ones it already had.

Foremost among them is the question of South Africa's continued membership in the British Commonwealth. Next is the matter of internal political turmoil and domestic divisions, which produced a threat today by the Province of Natal to seek secession from the fifty-year-old union with the Transvaal, the Cape Province and the Orange Free State.

The voters of Natal, which is strongly pro-British, showed themselves strongly against a shift from the present constitutional monarchy to a republican system. The country-wide tabulation showed 849,958 in favor of the change and 775,878 opposed. Slightly more than 90 per cent of the eligible voters participated.

The apparent vote of confidence in the Administration of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, observers believe, is certain to increase the Government's determination to continue and strengthen its white supremacist policies. At the same time, it is expected that the anti-Government attitudes of the more than 11,000,000 nonwhites, who wer not consulted about a republic, will harden.

Verwoerd Addresses Nation

South Africa's future relations with the British Commonwealth are a matter of great concern. Dr. Verwoerd indicated in a broadcast to the nation last night that this question would be given priority.

There is a possibility, however, that such Commonwealth members as Ghana, Nigeria, India and Malaya, which deplore South Africa's racial policies, will reject the new republic.

Dr. Verwoerd and his supporters have contended that Britain and the older white nations of the Commonwealth would protect South Africa from exclusion. But their opponents believe that any attempt to group the Commonwealth countries along such racial lines would cause the collapse of the Commonwealth.

Dr. Verwoerd and his followers have maintained that the loss of Commonwealth membership would not necessarily cost South Africa its valuable economic preferences with Commonwealth countries. These, they say, exist as separate trade agreements and could be continued whether South Africa remained in the Commonwealth or not.

At home, Dr. Verwoerd is faced with the fact that 775,878 white South Africans voted against the republic and to some extent against him and his policies. In Natal, where sentiment against the governing, Afrikaner-dominated Nationalist party is particularly strong, a plan for political partition was published today.

Meanwhile, a political realignment in South Africa was being freely predicted. Dr. Verwoerd encouraged it in his speech last night. It is expected that the principal opposition group, the United party led by Sir de Villiers Graaf, may disappear and be replaced by a powerful new Center party dedicated basically to apartheid, the Nationalists' racial segregation policy.

A small official opposition, composed of a combination of the present Progressive and Liberal parties, would remain, along with the politically unrecognized mass of Africans and other nonwhites.

Many South Africans are worried about what the Nationalist victory in the republic referendum will mean to them. They see their country becoming a grim fortress against a tide of African nationalism that is sweeping south in the continent.

A Country Of Black Men

P. 4 Afro-American

"South Africa is a country of black men—and not white men. It has been so; it is so; and it will be so.

Sat. 4-16-60

Thus spoke an English visitor, Anthony Trollope, 90 years ago after a brief sojourn in Johannesburg.

Frightened white South Africans have been laboring ever since to prove that he did not speak the truth.

But their labors are in vain. Time is running out and the winds of change increase in intensity with each passing hour.

Having drawn the censure of the United Nations by their merciless slaughter of 89 men, women and children in the affair of Sharpeville, the Boers of South Africa, in their desperate efforts to stay the inevitable, have refused to heed the worldwide outcry of shocked humanity.

* * *

A HALF CENTURY ago the world was equally shocked by the ruthless action of another European in Africa — King Leopold of Belgium.

To become the world's richest man, he killed some eight million Africans. They were the workers who were unable to make Leopold's daily quotas of ivory and rubber.

If an African came up short, his hand or foot was cut off. Breasts of women workers were mutilated and strung on rubber trees.

Brutal overseers, to teach others the price of slow production, would bring in whole baskets filled with human hands and feet and display them to reluctant villagers.

That was 50 years ago and the 12 million descendants of these unfortunate African workers kept alive the tales of horror visited upon their ancestors by the King of the Belgians.

They bided their time until the opportune moment. That moment will come on June 30 of this year when the Belgians, no longer able to hold on, decided it will be wiser to depart, leaving the Congo and its great wealth in rubber and minerals to its natural owners.

* * *

AFRICANS TO THE South need not wait 50 years. True, brickbats and stones are no match for machine guns and jet planes.

But Africans can sit down. They can refuse to work. They can boycott the stores. They can paralyze South African industry and commerce.

And like the Algerians, by sheer weight of numbers they can overwhelm hated police raiding parties. They can raid arsenals for guns and ammunition.

Even more stupid than the shocking and senseless Sharpeville massacre and police beatings at Durban, Capetown and Nyanga is Africa's vengeful jailing of African leaders.

The 100-year-old African National Congress and the newer Pan-African Congress is thus driven underground where the Government will find their angry membership impossible to keep up with or control.

Something is going to give in South Africa.

And just as it was the British in Ghana, the French in Guinea and the Belgians in the Congo, our prediction is that it will be Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd's Nazi-like Afrikaners who must either quickly accept human brotherhood or face wholesale bloodshed and chaos.

South Africa and Commonwealth

The Christian Science Monitor

The victory of the South African Nationalist Party in the referendum on the Union's form of government holds possibilities of bitter debate among members of the British-led Commonwealth of Nations. Afrikaaners in the party may say that a republican form will foster more unity between them and their British-descended fellow citizens, since the latter will no longer be pledged to loyalty to a British-based sovereign. But most members of the Commonwealth, including non-Britons, tend to link the South African move for a republic with the Nationalists' extreme racial policies.

Of the two white communities in South Africa, the ethnically Dutch-French Afrikaans and the Anglo-Saxons, the latter have shown most resistance to the government's "apartheid" measures which nonwhites all over Africa resent.

So the move toward a republic appears directed to establishing unity among white South Africans by insulating the more liberal of them as much as possible from Commonwealth support.

This background of the situation accounts for Commonwealth opposition to Prime Minister Verwoerd's maneuvers. There is no bar to republics within the Commonwealth.

But there is a growing determination to resist racial discrimination. There is also a belief among many members that Prime Minister Verwoerd is too little interested in Commonwealth ties to warrant efforts by other members in behalf of South Africa's membership.

The Verwoerd government is expected to act in line with the referendum. Some Commonwealth members may see in such action an opportunity to challenge South Africa's right to stay in the Commonwealth. But in taking such a position they might endanger one notable Commonwealth rule — namely that the Commonwealth does not interfere in domestic problems of members.

South Africa will not automatically read itself out of the Commonwealth by becoming a republic. But it is expected to ask for continuation of membership under a new formula. At the last Prime Ministers Conference in London, Ghana received assurances that its then-projected republican status would be upheld. But the South African delegate could not obtain similar assurances for his country.

The reason is, of course, that much more than a choice between forms of government is involved in South Africa's case.

Violence Keeps Tension High in South Africa

CAPETOWN POLICE ASSAULT AFRICANS

Clubs, Whips and Guns Used Against Crowds in Effort to End Work Stoppage

By The Associated Press

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 4—Squads of policemen used clubs, whips and guns today in an effort to drive rebellious Negroes back to work and clear the streets of alleged troublemakers.

Witnesses reported that hundreds of Africans apparently were beaten in Capetown.

One witness said the police were wielding Sjamboks—whips made of strips of rubber—against crowds near Caledon Square in the center of the city.

Unofficial reports said that thirty-five persons were wounded by gunfire when the police cordoned off the Nyanga East and Nyanga West townships and made a methodical house-to-house search in some areas for Africans who had stayed away from work.

One Killed Near Durban

The police denied that there were many wounded from gunfire. Hospitals confirmed that four persons had been wounded by shots.

Violence elsewhere in South Africa resulted in at least one death near Durban, where about 20 per cent of the labor force remained away from work. A Negro was killed in the suburb of Claremont when the police charged 3,000 demonstrators. The crowd assembled again and the police scattered it a second time.

Seventeen persons were injured at Welkom, Orange Free State, in the first reported racial disturbance among gold miners. Policemen there charged about sixty Africans who refused to disperse.

There were isolated outbreaks in several other places. At Port Elizabeth vehicles were stoned, roadblocks were thrown up and a school was burned.

The African townships at Capetown are strongholds of the Pan-Africanist Congress. This group organized a work boycott last week in protest against police shootings of demonstrators who defied South Africa's racial segregation laws requiring nonwhites to carry passbooks.

Approximately five out of six Negro workers observed the boycott at its height last week, but about 60 per cent of the labor force returned to work today.

The police action here began in the morning after the start of regular work hours.

Some desperate Africans in the settlements finally made a stand on a hill, and it is then that the police are reported to have opened fire. By 5 P. M. the police had withdrawn.

Persons in the townships described the scene by telephone as policemen, backed by armored cars, swept the settlements. The witnesses, including a nurse and a priest, said hundreds were beaten with whips and clubs.

Warning the Africans not to "laze around," policemen went into one house and beat a man lying in bed, the witnesses said.

A nurse at a hospital in Nyanga said she had run out of bandages to use in binding up wounds.

Dr. C. K. Madikiza turned his house into a field hospital and treated the injured as fast as they arrived, it was reported. get out of the settlement and bac kto work, tried to do so but were stopped by a military cordon and ordered back.

Patrick Duncan, editor of the Liberal magazine Contact, reported that the police were using whips on Africans near Caledon Square. The Liberal party, made up of Africans and whites, favors conciliation between the races.

Col. I. P. S. Terblanche, deputy commissioner of police, acknowledged that stern action had been ordered under Government emergency regulations against Negroes "who can't account for themselves in the city streets and other areas."

He said these persons were to be "dealt with on the spot" in an effort to get "potential intimidators and troublemakers off the streets."

The police have said that much of the effectiveness of the work boycott was a result of intimidators' threatening those who wanted to return to their jobs.

Protest in Parliament

As news of the rough police methods reached Parliament, Harry Lawrence, chairman of the Progressive party, protested and called on the National party Government of Prime Minister Henorik F. Verwoerd to the rule of the jungle."

A Government bill outlawing the Pan-Africanist Congress and the more moderate African National Congress was passed in the lower house on the third and final reading. The measure now goes to the Senate where prompt passage is assured.

One informant who reported on the incidents by telephone said that the police had been beating up "almost every African they can see, and shooting at random."

In reporting four Negroes wounded, the district commander of police at Athlone, Maj. J. J. Rheeder, said:

"We were trying to disperse a crowd of natives who had gathered in a threatening manner. There was an incident and the sergeant was forced to fire at point-blank range. Eariler, police used their batons on many troublemakers and open intimidators in the location.

The police set up a military cordon around the Nyanga settlements after much of the population had gone to work in Capetown and nearby.

C. J. Reinecke, press relations officer in the Defense Department, said army units were moved into Capetown to guard key points—road and rail junctions, oil storage points, docks and the Houses of Parliament.

As the troops took their stations, helicopters flew over the African townships, dropping leaflets telling the residents they had to be out of the area by 8 A. M. if they wanted to work.

Policemen moved about the streets, warning Africans not to "laze around" in the city. Then they moved into the African townships and started house-to-house searches in some areas. Any groups of persons were dispersed by force if necessary.

Police officials denied that there had been any wholesale arrests. They said arrests were made to stop trouble from potential loiterers.

The police in Johannesburg said that all trains and buses in that industrial and commercial center were running normally and the labor boycott had been ended.

In Johannesburg, Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe, president of the Pan-Africanist Congress, and twenty-two other Negroes refused to enter pleas in court against charges of inciting protests against the pass laws. Explaining his refusal, Mr. Sobukwe said:

"It is beyond contention that the law under which we are charged is a law made exclusively by the white man, and officers administering the law are white men. We don't see how justice can be done in these circumstances."

BANDA ASKS PEOPLE TO GIVE NO TROUBLE

Special to The New York Times.

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, April 4—Dr. Hastings K. Banda warned his followers today against causing trouble.

Dr. Banda, the Nyasaland African nationalist leader, was reelased from jail Friday. He had been detained since the declaration of a state of emergency in Nyasaland a year ago.

He appeared today on the balcony of the headqquarters of the Malawi Congress party in the town of Limbe and acknowledged applause from a crowd of Africans. He assumes control of the party tomorrow.

"People said the Nyasa people would give trouble if I was brought back to Nyasaland," Dr. Banda said. "I told them they would not. I have come back and I want to get all our men out of detention. I want you to keep quiet, not only for me but for Mr. Macleod [British Colonial Secretary Iaian Macleod]. He is a good man and a great man. He is a great Christian man, and I want you to help him as well as me. To do this you must keep quiet. There must be no trouble."

Earlier today 2,000 excited Africans flocked through the streets of Nyasaland's commercial capital of Blantyre to cheer Dr. Banda when he paid a surprise visit to the town.

South Africa to Push Segregation Policies

Philadelphia Inquirer 5-2-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 1 (AP).—The hopes of Liberal and other groups that South Africa will relax its strict segregation policy has been dashed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd from his sickbed.

This was disclosed by M.D. De Wet Nel, Minister of Bantu (Negro) Affairs and Development at a Nationalist Party meeting Saturday night in Pretoria after he visited the wounded Verwoerd, who is recuperating from a recent assassination attempt by a white foe of his racial policy.

'INSTRUMENT OF DEVIL'

"Dr. Verwoerd believes more than ever now that the policy being followed in South Africa is the correct one," said Nel, who is the chief executor of the Government's policy toward the Negro majority.

"That is the message I bring you from the Prime Minister. All the bullets and all the scandals will not deter us from our path.

"We have no illusions that the man who shot Dr. Verwoerd was the instrument of the devil's hand . . . Those bullets were not only aimed at Dr. Verwoerd but they were a specific challenge to the European (white) population of South Africa."

Nel repeated frequent nationalist charges that English language newspapers and Anglican clergy as well as elements abroad prompted South Africa's Negroes to stage their campaign against white supremacy laws.

He added that the Government intended to retain the pass book system by which it controls the movements of Negroes and which blacks fervidly hate.

The Negro demonstrations that broke out in March, leading to bloodshed and disorders, were aimed primarily at the pass books.

RAIDS CONTINUING

Nel's words were emphasized by continuing police and army raids on Negro settlements throughout the country. In the last fortnight, 4000 Negroes were arrested, including 1200 in one big raid Friday at East London. Untold numbers of Negroes have been banished as troublemakers from cities and sent to native reserves in the interior.

Despite Nel's stern words, English language newspapers and some businessmen continued to demand an early lifting of the state of emergency under which some 1600 persons of all races were jailed without arraignment.

In London, two leaders of the British Commonwealth arrived Sunday with South Africa on their minds.

President Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana and Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru of India flew in for sessions of the commonwealth prime ministers conference opening Tuesday.

The Negro president told newsmen he wanted South Africa's race problems raised formally at the conference, adding: "If no one else raises the matter, I will myself."

OPPOSED TO POLICY

Nehru said he did not yet know if the conference would discuss South Africa formally, but declared:

"It is a question that cannot be glossed over. Ultimately we cannot have racial discrimination in the commonwealth. I am wholeheartedly, absolutely, completely and unalterably opposed to apartheid (segregation). What more can I say."

The statements by Nkrumah and Nehru, the main spokesmen for the Asian-African nations within the commonwealth, indicated a growing cleavage between the visiting prime ministers.

Canada, Australia, Ceylon and Pakistan are opposed to any formal discussion of South Africa's segregation policies during the 13 conference sessions.

Europeans Cool to Calls for Migration, Refugee Body Says—Talks Continue

New York

By PAUL HOFFMANN

Special to The New York Times.

ROME, May 7—Requests by the Union of South Africa for large numbers of white immigrants are finding European countries unresponsive, it was indicated today.

Marcus Daly, the American director of the Intergovernmental Committe for European Migration, said member governments showed "no anxiety" to resettle Europeans in South Africa.

He said his twenty-nine-nation agency, through its mission in Pretoria, had had conversations on the subject with the South African Government. The question of the proposed white mass immigration into South Africa is in a "fluid" stage, he added.

Mr. Daily suggested that programs for such a migration movement might be considered after a "hiatus," when racial tension in South Africa had eased. He said South African industrialists were "violently in favor" of European immigration.

30,000 A Year Wanted

The Government is understood to have told European governments and the agency informally that it wanted up to 30,000 European immigrants a year, and that it was prepared to set up the necessary administrative machinery to process them. For this purpose, funds amounting to the equivalent of $1,400,000 to $1,700,000 a year would be appropriated, it was reported here.

Mr. Daly said South Africa expressed a preference for immigrants from countries in "Europe's northern tier," but appeared to realize that they were not available in sizable numbers. He said he thought South Africa would gladly take skilled settlers from overpopulated Southern European countries like Italy and Greece.

Commenting on South African demands for skilled or semi-skilled workers, Mr. Daly said that with the present industrial boom in Western Europe they were becoming scarce, and few were willing to emigrate.

South Africa's call for European settlers is being discussed unoficially by the participants in a meeting of the policy-making council of the migration agency that opened in Naples last Thursday. The delegates came to Rome today for contacts with the Italian Government and for an audience with Pope John XXIII.

At the Vatican, Representative Francis E. Walter, and chairman of the Naples conference, thanked the Pontiff for the support given to the agency in the eight years of its operations.

In his reply, Pope John praised the agency for its efforts to reunite families whose members had become separated through Europe's political and economic upheavals, and for its vocational training programs.

The council meeting will resume in Naples next week. A main topic is the expansion of loan funds enabling migrants to make a goo dstart in their new countries. The money borrowed by resettled persons is repayable to the agency in three to five years.

AFRICAN WORKERS TELL OF HARD LOT

On Street in Johannesburg, They Discuss Grievances Against White Regime

New York

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 5 — In Johannesburg's industrial areas, the African workers start to gather for lunch just before 11 A. M. at little sidewalk food kiosks. It is their first food since breakfast at between 5 and 6 A. M.

Curried beef and fat cakes, a holeless doughnut, cooked by an African woman inside the 6-by-8-foot structure no bigger than a Times Square newsstand, cost 3 shillings (42 cents). The food is served in chipped enamelware dishes. The workers rest their dishes on the sidewalk and squat before them.

While they eat they talk. The talk these days centers more often than not on their grievances in a white-dominated country, on their hopes and on the bitterness left by recent racial strife.

"I am not happy about my life," said Milton Dlamini, a 38-year-old laborer, to a stranger who stopped to talk with him. He told of supporting a wife and three children on $10 a week.

Works 'a Long Day

To get to work each day he rises at 5 A. M. in the two-room house he has in a segregated dwelling area about seven miles outside Johannesburg. He gets home at 6 P. M.

He first thought when asked what made him unhappy was the system under which Africans must carry Government-issued identity passes. It was protests against the passes that led to recent violence.

"If you leave your pass just inside your house, you get arrested and it costs a fine of £8 [$22.40] even though you have the document," Mr. Dlamini said.

"It is a cruel life we live," commented Dora Leepile from inside the kiosk, where she had been busy since early morning preparing food for the workmen. She said she stayed away from her job, which pays her $8.40 a week, during the recent work stoppage by Johannesburg Africans because "I wished that our people would live well."

Alpheus Makqobane, an $11-a-week messenger, joined in to explain the failure of a week-long strike by Africans called after Easter by the African National Congress, a banned political organization.

"People had become scared because of the killings and beatings by the police and they didn't have the weapons to fight back," he said.

"The Africans must unite and not have differences, and then talk with the Government," he suggested.

On a corner of the sunny street was a cafe for Africans run for many years by a stout African woman. Her jolly face turned hard when she talked about the future.

"We have nothing else to do but plunge in and fight," she asserted, adding grimly, "If we get shot, we get shot."

A 44-year-old clerk employed by a Government agency sat at a table drinking tea with a colleague. First making sure that he was not talking to a detective and requesting that his name not be published, he told about himself and gave his views.

Has 14 Years' Schooling

Unlike many of the laborers, who are semi-literate, he has had fourteen years' schooling. On a salary of $92 a month he supports a wife and six children in a four-room house in one of the African townships. Rent costs $10 a month and he pays $20 in annual income and poll taxes.

"We can do nothing to improve ourselves," he said. "Our hands are tied. Ours is to bark and never bite."

"There is not a single sane African among all the many thousands who work in Joburg who would ever say he wants to carry passbooks," he added.

The clerk explained that Africans hesitated to use work stoppages as a weapon because most live from payday to payday.

What of the future?

"There is still going to be bloodshed because we cannot get our freedom without lives being sacrificed," he replied. "I will probably lose mine but I will give it."

Africans Ease Emergency Rule

Montgomery Ala. Montgomery Advertiser

PRETORIA, South Africa (AP)—The South African government Wednesday lifted the state of emergency regulations imposed March 30 to cope with racial violence.

During the 156-day period, the nationalist government held almost unlimited powers of arrest and deportation and the right to hold suspects in jail indefinitely without trial.

Approximately 20,000 persons were arrested. Nearly 2,000 of all races were seized as suspected political subversives. Another 18,000 blacks were accused of being work shirkers or jobless drifters, and many of the latter were deported from cities to native reservations in the interior.

The government promised with the ending of the emergency to release the last of the political detainees.

South Africans Vote In Favor Of Republic

Close British Ties Will Be Severed

The News & Courier
Charleston S.C.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa has voted to become a republic with a president instead of the British monarch as chief of state.

The republic will be proclaimed next year to replace the Union of South Africa, a setup that came in 1910 in the peaceful aftermath of the Boer War to reunite the four provinces and Britain. A previous Republic of South Africa, recognized by the British in 1853, had dissolved in long conflicts.

The decision in Wednesday's referendum—to return to the republic and end the constitutional monarchy relationship of mutual sovereignty—may cost South Africa its membership in the British Commonwealth, with all its trade advantages.

BLACKBALL POSSIBLE

Members opposed to South Africa's white supremacy policy may blackball South Africa when it seeks admission as a republic to the British community.

Bearing out predictions of an electronic brain, votes favoring the republic Thursday night rose to more than half the 1,800,748 total registration in South Africa.

The South African Press Association said final figures from all 156 voting districts gave the republic a majority of 73,980. It gave this breakdown: for the republic 849,958, against 775,978.

In the main, the referendum was a battle between the Afrikaans-speaking South Africans of mainly Dutch descent who favor a republic and English-speaking South Africans who want to retain the constitutional monarchy. The big majority in South Africa—the 10 million Negroes and those of mixed blood — were not allowed to vote.

SLAP AT VOTE LAW

This fact was seized upon by Dr. Jan Steytler, leader of the opposition Progressive party, in assessing the results of the referendum.

He declared the referendum was not an endorsement of Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd's Nationalist policies of white domination. He said the vast majority—the nonwhites—could not make their views known.

Steytler called on Verwoerd to summon a national convention representing all sections of the population to plan "the government of our multi-racial country."

Prof. Arthur Bleksley, who ran the electronic computer, predicted the victory margin favoring a new republic would be close to 80,000 votes when the tally ends.

AFRICANS PLAN PROTEST

Negro Leader Asks Flouting of South African Pass Laws

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, March 18 (AP)—The Pan-Africanist Congress issued a call today for a nation-wide campaign of nonviolence against South Africa's pass laws for Negroes.

Starting Monday, Negro men who heed the call will invite arrest by going to police stations and declaring they are not carrying the passes required by law.

Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe, president of the Congress, said at a news conference that the campaign was meant to crowd the jails and courts and cripple industry.

"The pass laws of this country are a symbol of oppression, exploitation and degradation of Africans," he said.

Mr. Sobukwe said he would appear at a police station at 8 A. M. Monday.

Thousands of Negroes are arrested annually for not having passes. The system was designed by the Government to control the movements of Negroes, who outnumber whites three to one.

Turnout Called 'Fantastic' in Balloting on Republic—No Violence Reported

New York, N.Y.

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Oct. 5—White South Africans turned to the polls today to vote on whether their country shall become a republic.

Officials of both the governing Nationalist party, headed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, and the opposition United party described the large turnout as "fantastic." Some election experts said that the referendum might prove to be the heaviest national poll since the Union of South Africa was formed fifty years ago.

The polling places were open for fourteen hours, from 7 A. M. to 9 P. M. The final result will not be known before late tomorrow.

The mass turnout led to predictions that more than 90 per cent of the country's 1,800,748 qualified voters will have participated.

The voters were asked to reply yes or no to the question: "Are you in favor of a republic for the Union?" Paper ballots were used.

Prime Minister Verwoerd and his supporters have insisted that they merely wanted an indication of popular sentiment on the republic question alone and that the referendum was not to be considered an indication of popular feeling on other matters such as apartheid, the Nationalist policy of racial segregation.

Confidence Test Seen

But opponents of the Verwoerd Administration have contended just as strongly that the outcome of the referendum will indicate the amount of popular confidence in the Verwoerd Government.

The voting was held in clear, sunny weather in most of South Africa and the territory of South-West Africa, which is administered by South Africa under mandate of the League of Nations and was included in the referendum by the Union Government. Rain along the Indian Ocean coast in the Durban area did not appear to deter the voters.

In many constituencies, more than 50 per cent of the qualified voters had cast their ballots by noon. Long queues formed at some polling places before they opened.

There were no reports of violence during the voting, but a number of complaints of voting irregularities were made. Some persons arrived at polling places to find that other persons had voted in their names. Others were told that postal votes had been recorded for them.

There was at least one instance reported of votes cast for persons who had died.

Africans Watch Silently

The voting was limited to white persons. Africans, Asians and persons of mixed blood were excluded. At many polling stations in the Johannesburg area groups of up to 100 Africans gathered across the street. They stood watching silently, as if to portray the conscience of the country.

Whites to Ballot on Shift to a Republic—Verwoerd's Future May Be at Stake

New York, N.Y.

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Oct. 4—White South Africans will vote tomorrow on whether their country shall become a republic. Their decision is bound to have an important bearing on future events in Africa, south of the Sahara.

Observers here believe that a vote in favor of the republic proposed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd and the governing Nationalist party would strengthen their determination to continue the policy of white supremacy known as apartheid. This policy is in sharp conflict with the trend in most of the rest of Africa toward greater African participation in national affairs.

On the other hand, if the vote goes against a republic, it is believed this could be the beginning of the downfall of the Verwoerd Government and of a gradual change in South Africa's relations with her neighbors.

Of South Africa's 3,000,000 whites, 1,800,748 are entitled to cast ballots. Participating for the first time in a national vote will be 100,000 persons between the ages of 18 and 21.

Africans Cannot Vote

Excluded from the referendum are South Africa's 10,000,000 Africans as well as more than 1,000,000 persons of mixed blood, known as coloreds, and Asians. However, 37,000 white voters in South West Africa, which South Africa administers under a mandate from the former League of Nations, are being permitted to participate in the polling.

The campaign ended last night with radio addresses by Dr. Verwoerd, who appealed for support for a republic, and Sir de Villiers Graaf, leader of the opposition United Party, who advocated defeat of the proposal.

Prime Minister Verwoerd said that the whites in South Africa must unite in a republic to prevent "the black man" from gaining political control here as he was doing in such places as Kenya and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. "Unless a government is in power with a clear color policy as at present, the South Africa we know has no hope of survival," he said.

Sir de Villiers declared that by becoming a republic rather than remaining a constitutional monarchy owing allegiance to Britain's Queen Elizabeth II, South Africa would undoubtedly lose her membership in the British Commonwealth and become isolated. He said there was a danger that South Africa would become a small friendless nation standing alone in a world of emerging African-ruled states.

Isolation Foreseen

For the most part the republic campaign in the last few weeks in South Africa has been a dull one, marked by only a few incidents of violence and outbursts of emotion. National-ist party newspapers have hinted at "bomb plots" and efforts to sabotage the balloting, but no postal votes, was ordered by the police have reported trace of such activities.

Willem A. Maree, Minister of Bantu Education, (African) who is acting as an inspector of Natal Supreme Court to stop interfering with persons submitting these ballots.

Rain along the Indian Ocean coast in the Durban area did not appear to deter the voters.

In many constituencies, more than 50 per cent of the qualified voters had cast their ballots by noon. Long queues formed at some polling places before they opened.

There were no reports of violence during the voting, but a number of complaints of voting irregularities were made. Some persons arrived at polling places to find that other persons had voted in their names. Others were told that postal votes had been recorded for them.

There was at least one instance reported of votes cast for persons who had died.

Africans Watch Silently

The voting was limited to white persons. Africans, Asians and persons of mixed blood were excluded. At many polling stations in the Johannesburg area groups of up to 100 Africans gathered across the street. They stood watching silently, as if to portray the conscience of the country.

Whites to Ballot on Shift to a Republic—Verwoerd's Future May Be at Stake

New York, N.Y.

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Oct. 4—White South Africans will vote tomorrow on whether their country shall become a republic. Their decision is bound to have an important bearing on future events in Africa, south of the Sahara.

Observers here believe that a vote in favor of the republic proposed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd and the governing Nationalist party would strengthen their determination to continue the policy of white supremacy known as apartheid. This policy is in sharp conflict with the trend in most of the rest of Africa toward greater African participation in national affairs.

On the other hand, if the vote goes against a republic, it is believed this could be the beginning of the downfall of the Verwoerd Government and of a gradual change in South Africa's relations with her neighbors.

Of South Africa's 3,000,000 whites, 1,800,748 are entitled to cast ballots. Participating for the first time in a national vote will be 100,000 persons between the ages of 18 and 21.

Africans Cannot Vote

Excluded from the referendum are South Africa's 10,000,000 Africans as well as more than 1,000,000 persons of mixed blood, known as coloreds, and Asians. However, 37,000 white voters in South West Africa, which South Africa administers under a mandate from the former League of Nations, are being permitted to participate in the polling.

The campaign ended last night with radio addresses by Dr. Verwoerd, who appealed for support for a republic, and Sir de Villiers Graaf, leader of the opposition United Party, who advocated defeat of the proposal.

Prime Minister Verwoerd said that the whites in South Africa must unite in a republic to prevent "the black man" from gaining political control here as he was doing in such places as Kenya and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. "Unless a government is in power with a clear color policy as at present, the South Africa we know has no hope of survival," he said.

Sir de Villiers declared that by becoming a republic rather than remaining a constitutional monarchy owing allegiance to Britain's Queen Elizabeth II, South Africa would undoubtedly lose her membership in the British Commonwealth and become isolated. He said there was a danger that South Africa would become a small friendless nation standing alone in a world of emerging African-ruled states.

Isolation Foreseen

For the most part the republic campaign in the last few weeks in South Africa has been a dull one, marked by only a few incidents of violence and outbursts of emotion. Nationalist party newspapers have hinted at "bomb plots" and efforts to sabotage the balloting, but no police have reported any trace of such activities.

Willem A. Maree, Minister of Bantu Education, (African) who is acting as an inspector of postal votes, was ordered by the Natal Supreme Court to stop interfering with persons submitting these ballots.

Oct. 5 Vote Promises South Africa Climax

The Christian Science Monitor

Johannesburg

The republican referendum in South Africa on Oct. 5 is another stage in the country's hastening political crisis.

Only white voters, of whom there are 1,750,000, are allowed to vote in the referendum. The 12,000,000 nonwhites are completely excluded.

The nonwhites regard their exclusion from the referendum as an act of provocation by the government. They declare they have as much right to decide South Africa's future constitutional form as any white man has.

If Dr. Verwoerd loses the referendum, it will be the first major setback the Nationalist government has received at the polls since it came to power in 1948. The political situation will immediately become fluid, and Dr. Verwoerd's own position as Prime Minister will be in jeopardy.

Reaction Anticipated

If Dr. Verwoerd wins the referendum, he will begin to apply apartheid policies more rigorously, and this inevitably will precipitate racial unrest.

Whatever the outcome of the referendum, therefore, it must accelerate the climax in South Africa's affairs. Whether this climax will be peaceful or violent, it is impossible to say.

All Dr. Verwoerd's followers are Nationalist Afrikaners, and they will vote for a republic. This does not mean that automatically they will get a republic.

Although Dr. Verwoerd controls two-thirds of the seats in the House of Assembly, his support in the country numbers only approximately half of the electorate. This disproportionate representation has been achieved by a favorable arrangement of the electoral system.

Chance to Win

Now, for the first time, a referendum is being held, and although the nonwhites are excluded, every white vote will count. This means that the antirepublicans, who comprise roughly half the electorate, have a fighting chance of winning.

Political commentators are being cautious in forecasting the outcome of the referendum. Some of them feel that certain imponderable factors, like apathy among the antirepublicans, inadequate canvassing, and the incomplete state of the voters' roll, will weigh in the government's favor and ensure a majority in favor of a republic.

It would not be a substantial majority, though. It might be between 50,000 and 150,000 votes, or less than 10 per cent of the total electorate.

This is certainly not the majority contemplated by the two late Nationalist Prime Ministers, Daniel Malan and Johannes Stridjom, who consistently stated the view that a republic could be established only if it rested on the "broad basis of the will of the people."

Neither Dr. Malan nor Mr. Stridjom ever committed himself to a precise figure, but the Minister of Transport, some years ago, said that a two-thirds majority would be required. The republicans would have to poll at least 500,000 more votes than the antirepublicans to obtain this two-thirds majority.

They clearly have no hope of obtaining this majority. Their most optimistic forecast is a majority of 150,000 votes. This raises the question whether a republic established on such a slender majority would be a stable republic.

Antirepublicans are arguing, and arguing convincingly, that major constitutional changes, like establishing a republic, should be brought about only by a substantial majority.

Reminder of Ideal

Dr. Verwoerd has told the white electorate that the referendum will confront them with a simple choice between a republic and a monarchy.

He has emphasized that a republic is the Afrikaner's highest ideal, dating back many years. The Afrikaner republican movement gained impetus after the Boer War of 1899-1902, when Britain conquered the two Boer republics of the Transvaal and Orange Free State.

Within a decade, these two former republics had been joined with the provinces of Natal and the Cape to form the Union of South Africa, which became a fully sovereign country. The republican movement, however, grew stronger, and ultimately, by skillfully exploiting the racial situation, the Nationalist Party came to power in 1948.

The republican referendum of Oct. 5, according to at least two of Dr. Verwoerd's Cabinet Ministers, is the "last stage" of the Boer War.

Others Concerned

While the republicans are united by a common emotional bond, the antirepublicans have no such bond. Some are fiercely loyalist and want to preserve the link with the British monarchy at all costs.

Others are concerned lest a republic would lead to South Africa's exclusion from the Commonwealth, and that this would isolate South Africa internationally and harm the country economically.

Finally, many South Africans fear that a republic would strengthen Dr. Verwoerd's government and that a peaceful solution of the racial question would then become impossible. The only hope of a peaceful solution, they declare, is if Dr. Verwoerd's government is overthrown soon and is prevented from suppressing nonwhite aspirations until they reach bursting point.

No official reason has been advanced why Dr. Verwoerd is pressing ahead with the republican referendum at this stage—"The wrong republic for the wrong reasons at the wrong time," as one commentator expressed it.

One Explanation

One acceptable explanation is that Dr. Verwoerd wants urgently to form a solid white front in South Africa, so that he can confront the 12,000,000 nonwhites as the leader of white South Africa. He thinks this can be best achieved through a republic.

Once he has the support of all the whites, Dr. Verwoerd would go into siege against the nonwhites and against the world. This is the tradition of the Afrikaner people: they are an embattled people.

Now Dr. Verwoerd wants to bring all whites into the same laager. Should he achieve his aim, exhorting the whites to fight to a finish in the last ditch rather than surrender their privileges, the consequences for South Africa would be—many believe—too staggering to contemplate.

South Africa Vote Favors Republic

By Stanley Uys

Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Johannesburg

By a small majority the white electorate of South Africa has decided in favor of a republic. This can be stated as fact although the final figures in the Oct. 5 national referendum were still not in at the time of this writing.

About 1,600,000 men and women voted, giving a 90 per cent poll, which is unprecedented in South Africa. An electronic computer estimates the republican majority at more than 80,000 votes. Political observers think it will be between 70,000 and 80,000.

This—in the view of many—is patently an inadequate majority with which to bring about a major constitutional change like establishing a republic, especially in view of the exclusion of the country's 12,000,000 nonwhites from the referendum. But nothing will deter Dr. H. F. Verwoerd's government now from pressing ahead with implementation of its racial policy with all possible speed.

Political Lines

Voting was largely on party political lines, with government supporters voting for a republic and opposition supporters voting against it. There was a big enthusiastic anti-republican poll, but somehow the government produced unexpected reserves of republican votes.

Electoral irregularities and an incomplete voters roll were said to be important factors in the referendum—and they were not factors which assisted the antirepublicans.

Another decisive factor was government racial propaganda, which on this occasion was based on the upheaval in the Congo. The single shouted word "Lumumba" probably earned republicans more votes than any other slogan in their extensive political vocabulary.

At one Johannesburg polling station republicans brandished Liberal Party posters showing white hand clasping black hand. They asked, "Do you want South Africa to be ruled by these Kaffir lovers?"

Gloom gripped antirepublicans through South Africa Oct. 5. After 12 years of fighting a losing battle against the nationalist government, many although certainly not all of them are strife weary and ready for peace at almost any price.

Dr. Verwoerd, a shrewd mass propagandist, is expected to exploit this mood. He wants white "unity" to strengthen him in his struggle against the nonwhites and against the world, and he may be prepared to admit a few English-speaking representatives into his government as a token of his bona fides.

In the opinion of some observers this would be South Africa's ultimate tragedy because the getting together of the English-speaking and Afrikaans-speaking selections in support of common apartheid policy would not be genuine unity, but simply the ganging up of the whites against the nonwhites.

Opposition Press

Undoubtedly, Dr. Verwoerd's regime has been strengthened by the result of referendum. His followers are triumphant, and they are likely to demand more vigorous policies.

One of first targets of attack by the government is certain to be the opposition press in South Africa. A leading government supporter has described the opposition press as the "last bastion" which the government still has to overcome.

Government newspapers have described the role of the opposition press during the referendum campaign as "unforgivable." Government spokesmen have made the most vitriolic attacks on opposition newspapers and newspapermen. The situation is ominous.

Further exodus of South Africans from the country is expected. A number left after the Sharpeville shootings earlier this year, but others were awaiting the outcome of the referendum. Now there will probably be a fresh outflow of emigrants to Britain, Australia, and Canada.

They are not leaving in large numbers, although it is sufficient to give South Africa a net deficit in arrivals and departures. What is alarming is that the refugees, as they call themselves, are valuable citizens—doctors, lawyers, engineers, university professors, etc.

South African Government Cracking Down on Church Activities, Vatican Says

The Miami

ROME — (UPI) — The government of South Africa is placing increasing restrictions on the activities of the Roman Catholic Church there, Vatican sources said Saturday.

The restrictions are most in evidence, sources said in the church's parish and missionary work among the non-white population.

The Catholic Church hierarchy in South Africa has been outspoken in its criticism of the government's apartheid segregation — policy and of racial discrimination in any form.

The sources listed these as restrictions which have become increasingly severe in South Africa over the last five years:

The government refuses to issue permits for the establishment of new parochial schools for non-whites and each year closes a number of old schools by refusing to renew their permits.

Sun. 6-26-60

Authorities in some areas are making it difficult to establish new churches in non-white communities by refusing to grant building permits to Catholic congregations.

In only rare cases does the government grant entry permits to missionary priests from non-Commonwealth countries.

Authorities are enforcing apartheid laws in the area of religious instruction and worship, making it impossible for some white priests to live with their flocks, for white and non-white seminarians to study together and, in some areas, for whites and non-whites to attend mass together.

'BLUEPRINT FOR DISASTER'

White South Africa Has Big 'Mixed' Group

CAPE TOWN, South Africa—Piet van der Merwe glanced at his fingernails and ran his hands nervously through the tight brown curls of his hair. He was thinking hard, his lips were pursed in concentration, and beads of sweat stood out on the olive skin of his forehead.

He was dressed in his best suit, but Piet van der Merwe was not in a festive mood. He was worried, and he had cause to be. In a few minutes he would go before the board which would hear his appeal against the decision under the Population Registration Act which classified him as a colored person—that is, one whose veins carry some African blood.

The decision of the board would determine where he could live, which church he could attend, for whom he could vote, what job he could hold, where his children were to go to school and who they could marry when they came of age.

His dilemma suggests a question: How white is white South Africa and to what extent does the answer to this question condition the racist policies of the Union?

Nine out of 10 of South Africa's known 1.4 million coloreds live in Cape Province and, until the coming to power of the Nationalists in 1948, considered themselves and were regarded by most whites as an appendage of the white community.

In contrast to the Africans, they have in the past been allowed to bear arms, to vote on a common role with whites, to own property, to buy liquor, to move freely without passes and to have recourse to the courts on equal terms with whites.

Most ha Afrikaner names, are members of the Dutch Reformed Church, speak Afrikaans as their native language and live—or attempt to do so—at a white standard.

Since they despise the Afrikans whom they helped to conquer and identify themselves with the whites in general and the Afrikaners in particular, coloreds as individuals have always sought total absorption within the white community.

To this end, there has been a considerable amount of "passing," of movement from the darker racial group to the lighter on the part of light-skinned individuals in search of greater economic and social opportunities.

Coloreds who have "passed" are known to those who have not as "play-whites" or vensterkies ("window-watchers"): When vensterkies are greeted publicly by a colored person they turn their backs and stare into a shop window.

The "play-whites" go through all the agonies of their American counterparts. They powder their faces, use hair-straightener, wear hats as much as possible to hide their curly hair, avoid the sun.

P 14A

Many With Mixed Blood

There is no way of telling how many coloureds have "passed" into the white community. There are a few old Cape families who could or would bother to claim a totally white ancestry. Legislators sit on both sides of the "lily-white" House of Assembly who would ride in the back of the bus in Biloxi.

One dark-skinned Nationalist legislator from the Transvaal, an ardent racist called behind his back Swartbooi ("Black Boy"), had difficulty in getting an apartment in Cape Town in his first legislative session.

Quips one South African who acknowledges the muffled beat of the tom-tom in his genetic orchestra: "If you chucked every M.P. with coloured blood out of the House of Assembly, you couldn't raise a quorum."

A study based on the 1921 census figures estimated that a third of the union's 1.5 million whites had some African blood. If this is correct—and there is reason to believe that it may be a conservative estimate — then there are at least 1 million vensterkies in today's "white" population of 3 million.

Off-Whites Factor in Policy

There are signs to indicate that these "off-whites" are a driving force behind South Africa's racial policies. Factors giving substance to this are:

1. The political and spiritual homeland of racism and baaskap ("white domination") is the North, the Transvaal and the Orange Free State.

2. In the Cape, where race relations have always been better, the known coloured community is half the size of the African population and about the same size as the white group.

3. In the Orange Free State and the Transvaal, in contrast, the acknowledged colored community amounts to only 7 per cent of the white population and 2 per cent of the African population.

While taking into consideration the fact that the Cape has been settled for three times as long as the North, it still appears likely that the mass of Northern coloreds have been absorbed by the two larger groups, the lighter individuals "passing" as white and the darker ones dropping back into the African population.

It is not unreasonable to assume that, to reinforce their whiteness, to assume a protective coloration, Northern vensterkies have become the most rabid Nationalists of all.

Curbed by Legislation

Since the Nationalists took over in 1948, two important legislative acts have been aimed directly at the coloureds. These are the Population Registration Act (1950) and the Separate Representation of Voters Act (1951).

The former sets up a national register establishing once and for all the racial identity of every South African, closing the door against future "passing." The latter removes coloured voters from the common electoral role which they shared with whites for more than a century.

Although the Population Registration Act has been on the books for a decade, the register is not yet complete. Classification is based primarily on appearance and repute rather than on descent.

Hearings take place behind closed doors and border-line cases are subjected to a number of tests not calculated to inhance their sense of human dignity: pencils are pushed through hair to determine degree of kinkiness, ear lobes are squeezed, fingernails are inspected and the applicant's entire family is made to line up so that any dark throw-backs can be spotted.

In 1957, 1,053 South Africans who claimed to be white were classified as coloured. Another 1,500 were classified as natives or Asiatics despite their objections.

Ease Up After Riots

During the recent riots here the coloureds refused to support the Africans. Since then the appeal boards have been going easier on those who claim they have been incorrectly classified.

But the coloureds are still understandably bitter about their treatment by the whites. Alienation of 1.4 million coloureds may in time prove to have been the one fatal mistake of the Afrikaners.

With the coloureds on their side in the rebellion to come, the whites would only be outnumbered 2-1 by the Africans. In addition, many Afrikaners realize that there can be no justice in sitting on the necks of the coloureds whose culture is theirs and who, like themselves, know no other home.

For the Piet van der Merwes, South Africa's stepchildren, the choice is a bitter one.

British Flag Trampled, Spat On in South Africa

The Washington Post Washington D.C.

Mon. 7-4-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, July 3 (AP)—The British flag was torn down, stamped on, spat on and thrown into the Indian Ocean at Durban yesterday by a group of South African Nationalist youths.

P. 5

The demonstration came as tempers rose in the battle over whether this country should become a republic divorced from the British Crown.

About 200 people at an outdoor meeting of the Jeugbond (National Party's youth organization) witnessed the flag incident on Durban Beach. The young Nationalists, in a mock ceremony, proclaimed "a republic" on the beach, then seized the Union Jack on the promenade and threw it into the sea.

The Durban Sunday Tribune called it "the first hostile act of young Nationalist Party toughs." Some bathers later recovered the flag and returned it to shore.

The leader of the opposition United Party, Sir De Villiers Graaf, called Verwoerd's speech misleading and damaging to the nation. Graaf denounced the government's domestic and foreign policies as mad and stupid and termed specious charges that Britain and the United States were playing into the hands of communism by bids for friendship with the emerging black states in Africa.

Verwoerd told a big "republican rally" the West is foolishly overbidding against the Communist East for the friendship of newly indepdent African states and was even prepared to sacrifice South Africa "for this purpose." He claimed that if South Africa voted for a republic it could still stay in the Commonwealth.

Graaf retorted that "should we become a republic the forces working to isolate South Africa economically and spiritually will be strengthened and our friends will be discouraged and confused."

Regarding Verwoerd's accusation that Britain and the United States were playing into the hands of communism in Africa, Graaf said the Prime Minister was "fiddling with specious arguments while South Africa's prestige and security are falling into ruin."

Vatican hits apartheid

The Afro-Am Baltimore Md.

ROME, — The Government of South Africa is placing increasing pressure on activities of the Roman Catholic Church there as the result of the Vatican's outspoken criticism of the government's racial policies.

Vatican sources said that the restrictions are most in evidence in the church's parish and missionary work among the non-white population.

As the Catholic hierarchy opposed the apartheid policy, the South African government moved to ease emergency restrictions that have been imposed since March 21.

* * *

SOUTH AFRICAN Justice Minister Francoise Erasmus said the government will lift "gradually" the emergency regulations and release some 1,200 persons held under the regulations.

Erasmus said after a cabinet meeting that all but 400 of the 1,200 political prisoners still held — Mainly Africans —have been investigated, permitting their release.

However, some 8,600 others will remain in custody.

The emergency, Erasmus said, already has been called off in 34 districts and a number of emergency regulations have been repealed.

The state of emergency was declared shortly after police fired on Africans at Sharpville, March 21, filling 67 of them and wounding some 125 others. fired upon were conducting a peaceful demonstration against laws requiring them to carry identity passes.

At the height of the disorders, the government suspended the pass laws, but clamped them on again when the situation seemed to be in hand.

South African Policies Stir Freedom Rights

P. A10

By SMITH HEMPSTONE
Contributing Writer

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Bishops and known Communists, white novelists and Indian physicians, African chiefs and colored teachers combine to present a strident, occasionally united and sometimes effective opposition to the racial policies of South Africa.

The "big battalions" are the two African nationalist organizations, the African National Congress and the Pan-African Congress.

Leading the A.N.C., is 61year-old Albert John Luthuli, square-set, graying ex-chief of the war-like Zulu tribe. Luthuli whose name means "dust" in

Zulu, grew up on the gentle banks of the placid Umvoti River, which snakes its way through swaying fields of sugar cane to the Indian Ocean.

Non-smoker, teetotaler Chief Luthuli, a vigorous Congregationalist, was educated by American missionaries and taught for several years in mission schools before being elected to the chieftaincy of his sub-tribe.

Ousted by Government

He joined the A.N.C. in 1946 and six years later, when he refused to give up his membership, was ousted from the chieftaincy by the Nationalist government. One month later he was elected president of the Congress.

The government quickly served him with writs confining him to his home reserve and forbidding him to address public meetings. In 1956, he was one of 156 South Africans of all races arrested and tried for treason, although charges against him later were dropped, as they were against all but 30 defendants.

He publicly burned his pass during the riots here this Spring and was one of 1,900 South Africans imprisoned by the government without charge. He is still in jail.

Chief Luthuli (no one in South Africa ever refers to him without his title, despite the government's action) has been deeply influenced by Gandhi and is regarded by many Africans as being too moderate. He will not countenance anything which smacks of violence and hopes through passive resistance and moral pressure to bring about a change of heart in the government.

Says Chief Luthuli to South Africa's whites: "You have nothing to fear from us if you treat us fairly. We do not want to kick you out of the country or marry your sisters. All we want is a fair deal in our own country."

Spurs Extremist

By not giving Chief Luthuli such a deal the government has virtually created a much more dangerous foe: Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe's Pan-African Congress, an extremist breakaway from the A.N.C.

It was Mr. Sobukwe, a 36-year-old instructor in Bantu Studies at Johannesburg's Witwatersrand University, who engineered the March demonstrations which ended in the Sharpeville massacre in which 69 were killed and 178 wounded.

Mr. Sobukwe resigned his teaching post as soon as the emergency was declared and last month drew a three-year jail sentence on charges of incitement.

Because Chief Luthuli's moderate policies have achieved nothing, there is a strong swing now toward the Pan-African Congress. Both organizations, however, are honeycombed with informers, their leaders have been jailed, and they lack both funds and organization.

Indian Group Is Ally

Allied with the African nationalist movement is the South African Indian Congress, voice of 500,000 brown-skinned South Africans. The police sweep which followed Sharpeville missed S.A.I.C. president G. M Naicker (who has also been jailed and banned in the past) and he is now in hiding. Dr. Yussuf Dadoo, banned president of the Transvaal branch of the Indian Congress, has fled the country.

The position of the Indians is particularly sensitive because their business practices and the unassimiliable nature of their culture has made them despised by both white and black, as demonstrated by the bloody Indian-Zulu riots in Natal a few years ago. But no Indian leader of consequence opposes the African nationalist movement.

Coloureds in 2 Groups

South Africa's 1.4 million coloureds are split. Despite the imposition by the Nationalist government of legislation which reduces them almost to the level of the Africans, many coloureds are hoping for a white change of heart and are cautious about associating themselves with the African cause.

Nevertheless, two coloured groups, the South African Coloured People's Organization and the Non-European Unity Movement (a Trotskyite association) have made strong attacks on the government. Several coloured leaders have been jailed under the emergency regulations.

White allies include novelist Alan, (Cry, the Beloved Country) Paton's small, nonracial Liberal Party, the Communists, and the Christian churches, with the exception of the three branches of the Dutch Reformed Church.

The Liberal Party is ineffective except that it gives moderate Africans a political home and serves as a reminder to other Africans that every white hand is not against them.

It is one of the tragedies of the South African situation that, generally speaking, the Communists are about the only whites most non-whites really trust.

Although few in number, the Communists have worked hard to organize the African nationalist movement, have held out the hand of friendship when few other whites would do so, and have shared the jail sentences and bannings.

Although other denominations such as the Methodists (who have the largest African membership) and the Roman Catholics have fought hard against apartheid, the two most vigorous and bitter clerical foes of Nationalist policies have been Anglican (Episcopalian) Archbishop Joost de Blank of Cape Town and Ambrose Reeves, Bishop of Johannesburg.

Archbishop de Blank, 52-year-old Dutch-born war hero educated at England's Cambridge University, has kept up a running battle with the Nationalists. He is no mincer of words when, as he says, "the honor of God is at stake."

Theses varied groups and individuals are all working to bring about a new deal in South Africa. But their financial resources are limited and their moves, with the exception of the Communists, are based on the hope of moral suasion.

Since the Nationalists do not accept the validity of their arguments, it is difficult to see how change can come about through non-violent methods.

Roundup In Africa Brings Calm

By Lynn Heinzerling

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 7 (AP)—Huge military, police and civilian reserve forces mobilized by the South African government appeared tonight to have stifled the no-work campaign of thousands of rebellious Africans.

Only in the sealed-off African township of Nyanga, outside Cape Town, was the situation uncertain and police said they had arrested most of the "agitators, terrorists and gangsters" there without resistance today.

From Cape Town, Durban and Port Elizabeth came reports that the situation was practically normal or more nearly so than at any time in he past 10 days.

Calm Undisturbed

In Johannesburg there was no incident to disturb the calm. Workers streamed in and out of the city without trouble.

With all the principal African leaders in jail and police rounding up lower echelons, it seemed that the longest demonstration in recent years against Souh Africa's aparheid (segregated) policy may be ended.

But the government continued to call up its forces. The Witwatersrand Rifles infantry regiment has just been mobilized and stationed at the airport near Germiston, east of Johannesburg, presumably for movement wherever needed.

Tonight the South African Broadcasting Corp. interrupted a play to read out a long list of names of reservists who were ordered to report for duty immediately.

Troops and police staged cleanup raids for arms and agitators today in Nyanga Township, stronghold of the no-work movement.

Nearly 200 men and women were arrested and sacks of weapons, including guns, clubs, crowbars, knives and meat axes, were confiscated in Nyanga East and Nyanga West.

A ring of infantrymen with fixed bayonets sealed off the settlements, the scene of bloody clashes Monday when troops and police struck with clubs, guns and whips in an effort to get the Africans back on their jobs. Scores were wounded then.

Col. I. P. Terblanche, deputy commissioner of Cape Town police, said there was no resistance today. In a drizzling rain, troops patrolled the streets while military and police squads conducted a house-to-house search.

Terblanche declared the cleanup was undertaken solely in the interest of Nyanga's law-abiding Negroes. He said they have been "living in a reign of terror" since the militant Pan Africanist Congress launched its campaign March 21 for destruction of the identity cards that South African law requires all nonwhites to carry as passes.

Agitators Caught

"It is hoped that, following this combined military and police action," he said, "the law-abiding residents will be able to follow their normal pursuits free from fear of gangsters who have been responsible for the terror . . .

"With few exceptions, police succeeded in rounding up the agitators, terrorists and gangsters who had been earmarked for arrest. All agitators arrested were found to be in possession of their reference books (passes).

"Some 2800 residents were permitted through the military cordon this morning in order to proceed to their work."

Police said similar operations had restored peace to Negro townships around Durban, an Indian Ocean port on the southeast coast, scene of violence last week. While many Africans remained away from work, Durban's industrial production was reported going at a good rate again.

Elsewhere, the economy of this nation of three million whites and 10 million Negroes was feeling the pinch of the crisis. Thousands of Africans upon whom the whites depend for manual labor, were reported to have fled back to their native reserves in the countryside.

C. F. Reginer, president of the Cape Chamber of Industries, said 2000 have returned to the reserves from Cape Town alone. The work boycott hit the Cape Peninsula meat supplies and sent prices up. Milk and bread deliveries were interrupted.

Evidence that the bitter conflict still smouldered came in the destruction of two churches by fire early today in the Walmer Negro settlement near Port Elizabeth, on the Indian Ocean. Police charged that Negro agitators set them afire as a form of intimidation.

Some influential Afrikaner businessmen, descendants of the country's early Dutch settlers, were reported considering an appeal to Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd to consult with nonwhite leaders in search of a compromise. Verwoerd, firm backer of apartheid to keep the races strictly segregated, so far has refused to treat with the Negro campaigners.

One aspect of the Nyanga raids today illustrated officials' belief that their emergency security measures are becoming effective.

Troops who had maintained a cordon around the nearby Langa settlement for a week were withdrawn to reinforce the raiders.

New Passes Sought

In Johannesburg, Durban and other cities hundreds of Africans lined up to apply for new passes. Justice Minister F. C. Erasmus announced yesterday that police are to resume enforcement of the pass law, which was suspended at the height of the disorders.

The fee for each applicant often paid by a white employer, was one pound ($2.80). Most said their old passes had been seized by agitators and burned.

The law was challenged before a Johannesburg court by Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe, leader of the Pan Africanist Congress, accused with 22 others of inciting Negroes to defy it.

Durban courts ground out sentences on scores of Africans arrested in the past week's disturbances, some on charges of being in Durban without permission, others for carrying weapons.

SOUTH AFRICA TO U. S.: MIND OWN BUSINESS

Attack Undeserved, Ambassador Told

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, March 23 (AP)—The government told the United States in effect Wednesday to keep out of South Africa's race troubles.

The government rapped back at state department denunciation of bloodshed as Negroes challenged the nation's white supremacy laws with work boycotts after two days of violent demonstrations.

The foreign ministry summoned American Ambassador Philip Crowe for a conference, then issued a statement.

No Concession Made

The statement said the discussion with Crowe does not mean that South Africa is "conceding the right of the United States government to concern itself with the domestic affairs of South Africa, just as the Union [of South Africa] government does not concern itself with riots or racial disturbances in other countries."

The statement said the department had criticized police violence here without knowing all the facts "regarding attacks by many thousands of Bantu [Negroes] on a small police force to whom was entrusted the duty of maintaining law and order."

Criticism of this week's police violence mounted in world capitals. Three of South Africa's partners in the British commonwealth, India, Australia and Canada, expressed concern.

Industries Periled

The Negroes' work boycotts threatened to paralyze some important industrial centers. The weapon could be a potent one for the Negroes, who supply the low-cost labor that keeps the nation's economy going.

Police charged militant Negro leaders "have created a reign of terror" in Negro settlements to keep people from returning to work.

The South African Press association reported this was the worst day for absenteeism in the Vereeniging area industries since the Pan-Africanists launched their campaign Monday. In some factories, the news service said, the entire Negro labor force failed to appear and many who attempted to return to their jobs were beaten by agitators.

Oppose Race Passes

The boycot was organized by the militant Pan-Africanist Congress as part of the campaign against the passes that all nonwhites in South Africa must carry at all times.

The campaign opened Monday with demonstrations crushed by police fire that killed 80 Africans and wounded 200.

Quiet was imposed by thousands of police guns and dozens of armored cars and riot trucks. The situation remained especially tense in in African locations around Capetown, where one police station was described as looking "like a forward battle station."

Sentenced to Caning

DURBAN, South Africa, March 23 [Reuters]—An African, 18, was sentenced Wednesday to receive three cuts of a light cane after being found guilty of failing to produce his pass on demand. He had taken part in demonstrations against the pass laws earlier this week.

Ernest Mpunzana, a member of the Pan-Africanist Congress, told the same court he would carry his pass only when "an African is sitting on the bench."

He and eight other congress members were fined $14 with an alternative of 21 days imprisonment. The fines were not paid.

Jagan "Manhandled"

LONDON, March 23 (AP)—Two members of an official delegation from British Guiana were arrested at a demonstration outside South Africa house Wednesday. Earlier, the chief minister of Guiana, Dr. Cheddi Jagan, complained he was manhandled by police when he walked past South Africa house.

The South African Prisoners

In the aftermath of the Sharpeville incident of March 21, when seventy-two black Africans were shot dead by white South African police near Johannesburg, 1,575 persons were arrested. On April 22 the figure was given to Parliament officially by the Minister of Justice, François C. Erasmus. His announcement brought gasps of astonishment at the large number of political prisoners involved.

The plight of the detainees has just been illuminated by the situation of Harry Bloom, a white novelist and attorney, whose literary work has been highly commended both here and in Europe.

Mr. Bloom had no connection with Sharpeville. He is of strong liberal sympathies but has belonged to no political party for sixteen years. In a cell at Worcester, near Capetown, he is unable to do a thing to effect his release. Under the regulations he may be held until next March. His situation depends wholly upon the attitude of the Minister of Justice. Private correspondence in connection with the case has just brought its details to the outside world.

Because of Mr. Bloom's literary reputation the case may attract considerable attention. But he would be the first to insist that it be regarded as simply one of 1,575. For the indefinite detention of so many persons, without explanation, without habeas corpus, without legal aid, is only the latest of the acts of the Nationalist Government of South Africa to cause the entire Western world to recoil.

SOUTH AFRICAN TALK BOYCOTTED IN I. L. O.

Special to The New York Times.

GENEVA, June 9—African nations boycotted a talk by a South African delegate today at the annual conference of the International Labor Organization.

Government, employer and worker delegations of the African bloc walked out and did not return until Louis A. Petersen of the South African Trade Union Council had left the rostrum.

Mr. Petersen, however, attacked the South African policies that led to racial disorders.

He said it was a "tragedy" that there were still governments that "resist the progress of mankind and resent the pressures and criticisms in favor of progress from mankind outside their borders."

He appealed to the eighty-two nation labor agency to undertake an investigation in his country.

In a second boycott, the employer delegates of the United States, Italy and Malaya gave up their committee seats to protest the persence of employer representatives from Communist countries.

Africa Hides Facts In Last Killing Of Natives

JOHANNESBURG, S. Afica—Is South Africa's race-conscious segregationist government hiding the true facts behind police bullets which ripped into a crowd of African natives killing an estimated 29 persons when cops clashed with some 400 demonstrators here?

There are three newspapers here that think so, despite the insistence of Justice Minister François Erasmus who claims only six natives were killed. The justice minister also contends that officers fired on the natives in self-defense.

Reporters counted 29 dead and 50 injured in the "horror story" that occurred in the African reserve near Cape Province and Natal. Newsmen said they had great difficulty geting into the area and that whites have been told by authorities to "keep their mouths shut" about the incident.

Writers said the demonstration was staged in protest of the government's plan to rule native Africans by the appointment of chiefs and headmen.

USE AIRCRAFT

One newspaper, the Johannesburg Sunday Times, reported that a task force of heavy armored cars, armed police and aircraft were brought in against the natives. The Durban Tribune reported that a "Harvard aircraft dive-bomber" dropped tear gas bombs in the gathering of 400 natives who allegedly were at a meeting to discuss their grievances.

The natives reportedly fired back at the plane. Some 6,000 natives in the territory are licensed to own firearms. The Golden City Post reported the estimated dead at 29 with many natives still in hiding and police trying to round up the wounded

South Africa To Restrict Rioters

Detainers To Be Released In Two Weeks

By LEONARD INGALLS

© New York Times News Service

Johannesburg, July 3.—The government has decided to impose severe restrictions on the 1,200 persons jailed during South Africa's emergency who are to be released in the next two weeks.

At the same time, world reaction to the racial situation here is causing deep concern in South Africa's business community. Boycotts of South African goods and the loss of confidence by foreign investors in this country have caused strong complaints to the Government.

So far, Prime Minister Hendrik, F. Verwoerd and his Administration have virtually ignored appeals for changes in policy by some of the country's leading industrialists, businessmen, and financiers. One Government spokesman has told them to "mind their own business' and leave the governing to the Government.

Although the Government has announced it plans to gradually lift the 3-month-old state of emergency it has become clear that the Verwoerd Administration would retain strong powers indefinitely. These include powers to restrict political activity and imprison without formal charge or trial anyone regarded by police as endangering the safety of the state or making what the Government regards as subversive statements.

The detainees to be released, although neither charged nor convicted of any offense, will be forced to observe a curfew that confines them to home daily from 8 p.m. to 7 a.m. They may not leave their magisterial districts nor attend gatherings or communicate with newspapers.

They must report daily to police and have permission of a magistrate to attend a motion-picture theater or a dance, take a vacation or visit friends they made while sharing their three months' imprisonment.

It also has become clear that the Government has in confinement 8,600 Africans officially classified as "idlers" who were among 21,000 arrested during the emergency period. A member of the Johannesburg City Council, Mrs. Kathleen Mitchell, has suggested that some of the 8,600 be made available to farmers as cheap labor. The Government has not commented on her statement.

Meanwhile, results of a survey by a business group show that in the past two months boycotts of South African goods have caused a loss of $1,000,000 to exporters. It is estimated that a further loss of $15,000,000, because of the refusal of South African products, will be suffered during the balance of the year.

Since January the value of shares traded on the Johannesburg stock exchange has fallen by $1,800,000,000. Most of the loss has been since the onset of grave racial disturbances March 21. Since the end of March South Africa's foreign-exchange reserves have fallen sharply.

U. S. to Admit South Africa Exile Leader

State Dept. Decides To Give Tambo Visa

The American Committee on Africa announced yesterday it had been informed by the State Department that a visitor's visa to enter the United States will be issued to Oliver Tambo, South African nationalist leader who, up to now, has been listed as "ineligible."

The State Department reversed its position on Mr. Tambo after George M. Houser, executive director of the A.C.A., made a strong protest to Secretary of State Christian A. Herter on Saturday.

Called 'Poor Policy'

In the protest, Mr. Houser said that it was poor policy for the United States to deny admission to "the one outstanding leader who has been able to escape" from the Union of South Africa.

The A. C. A., whihc had not thought there would be trouble about Mr. Tambo's visa, had arranged a twenty-seven-day speaking tour for him across the nation. It was to have started May 31. Yesterday the A. C. A. said it would get in touch with Mr. Tambo to arrange re-scheduling of the tour.

End to White Supremacy Policy Called For

New Orleans, La.

By MILTON BESSER

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. (AP) —The U.N. Security Council was asked late Thursday to approve a resolution taking South Africa to task for the mass shootings of Negroes, and calling for an end to her white supremacy policy.

Ecuador, a member of the 11-nation Council, presented the resolution which was agreed upon previously by representatives of the Asian-African nations.

4-1-60

DELEGATE RETURNS

The resolution came on the second day of Council debate on an Asian-African request that it consider the mass shooting of South African Negroes by white police.

In a last-minute change supporters of the resolution eliminated any reference to outright condemnation of South Africa. The change was aimed at winning British support. The word deplore was substituted for condemn.

This came as Bernardius G. Fourie, the South African delegate, returned Thursday afternoon to his seat at the horseshoe-shaped council table.

He had been listening to the proceedings in a chair at the side of the room. He quite the debate Wednesday after warning that any discussion here might incite further racial violence in his country.

The council adjourned at 6:20 p. m. EST until Friday morning, when Fourie will be the first speaker.

HAMMARSKJOLD ROLE

The resolution, worked out by the Asian-African nations in conference with Ecuador, proposed a key role for Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold in consultations with South Africa.

Ecuador and the Asian-African group were seeking a resolution that would speak out strongly on the mass shootings, but would not be killed by the veto of any of the Western powers.

Ambassador Alex Quaison-Sackey of Ghana told the Council it should apply economic or diplomatic penalties if South Africa refuses to abandon its racial segregation policies.

FIVE-PART ACTION

But the resolution did not go so far. It would have the council take these steps:

1. Recognize that the situation in South Africa is likely to endanger maintenance of international peace and security.

2. Deplore the loss of life in the shooting of Negro demonstrators, and convey sympathy to their survivors.

3. Deplore the policies and actions of the South African government which have given rise to the present situation.

4. Call upon that government to abandon its policies of apartheid and racial discrimination so that the present situation does not continue or recur.

5. Request Hammarskjold to report to the Council after consultations with the South African government on present and subsequent developments.

He said the Nationalist government "hates African freedom and must manufacture stories of African encirclement and a need to save so-called Western civilization in order to justify its suppression of Africans."

South African Forces Keep Violence Down

Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery, Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Demonstrations against South Africa's white supremacy rule rolled up Saturday by Cape Town and Paarl, but police and military forces kept them from erupting into new violence.

Paying no heed to the U. N. Security Council plea to abandon its segregation policy, the government tightened military control under a state of emergency decree in major cities and ports.

INFANT KILLED

Several thousand Negroes streamed out of their settlement of Nyanga and marched on Cape Town, South Africa's legislative capital, but were stopped by police who ordered them to disperse. and sailors tightened cordons around Nyanga and Cape Town's Langa. About 20,000 negroes live in each.

In halting a car trying to get through the cordon, white sailors shot and killed a Negro infant outside Nyanga, press reports said. The Negro boy was being taken to a hospital by his mother.

In Paarl, a wine center 40 miles northeast of Cape Town, several hundred Negro men and women gathered in front of the court building. They built bonfires and burned the pass books all nonwhites must carry for identification.

Opposition to the pass books is the major cause of the unrest sweeping South Africa. But most of the recent demonstrations have been attempts to free Negro leaders rounded up by police.

Police arrested several Negro leaders of the Paarl demonstration, and the crowd dispersed without further incident. But Paarl remained tense, and civilian defense units were on full-time duty. Close watch was kept on nearby Negro settlements where attempts were made during the night to set fire to white-owned buildings.

Durban on the east coast, where press reports listed 4 Negroes killed and 18 wounded in demonstrations Friday, remained quiet under a great show of police force.

Africans Keep Uneasy Peace Over Sabbath

Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery, Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—The guns of South Africa's soldiers and police enforced an uneasy peace Sunday. In the lull came realization that the nation is at a perilous crossroads in the struggle between white supremacy and the nationalism of the overwhelming Negro majority.

"All elements are present for the development not only of a crisis but of a national catastrophe," said the Affikaans — Dutch dialect—Sunday newspaper Dagbreek, adding: "We can put it out of our minds to suppress this awakening by violence. We shall have to make room for the political awakening of the black man."

Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd, the nation's leading exponent of apartheid, or segregation, is the chairman of the trust controlling the newspaper.

BUS STONED

Outside of the stoning of a bus at Cato Manor near Durban and the firing of a school near Paarl in the Cape Town area Saturday night, police reported quiet throughout the country.

Police blamed the stoning on tsotsis, or Negro hoodlums, who have preyed on residents of Cato Manor and other Negro settlements for years.

The Africans showed signs of ebbing back to jobs they ignored most of last week in protest against police killing of demonstrators and arrests of their leaders. Docks at Cape Town were only a few hundred short of the normal 1,700-man working force Saturday, even though it was a half-holiday.

Officials anxiously waited to see if the workers would show up in force Monday.

REJECT REQUEST

The Verwoerd government has not yet stated its reaction to the U.N. Security Council resolution of Friday calling for abandonment of apartheid. But it is expected to reject the request and restate the case for maintenance of white supremacy.

The newspaper Dagbreek expressed thanks to Britain and Australia for watering down what it called "the rather tame resolution which was finally adopted."

But it added, "We must clearly see that South Africa's enemies have totally succeeded in one part of their purpose. They have isolated us. Even our best friends have turned their backs on us or they are with few exceptions busy doing it. The critical attitude of recent years has been transformed into a worldwide enmity."

Dagbreek's analysis, written by its editor Willem Van Heerden, warned that, "The political consciousness of the Bantu population tribes including most of the natives is awakening and will never disappear but will grow."

His statement that this awakening of 10 million Negroes seeking economic and civil rights cannot be surpressed by arms, jails and emergency regulations apparently mirrors an apprehensive thinking of three million white people.

UNTHINKABLE STEP

But at the same time, the idea of the integration of the Negro into white society is unthinkable to the government and the vast majority of the white population.

"Pressure has accumulated on which no damper will stay put in the long run," said Van Heerden's article. "We have come to the point whence we shall have to take a great and dramatic stride into history to separate development or to integration."

A new dedication to separate development, or aparthied, would intail great sacrifices. South Africa depends on Negro labor at low wages for the industry and commerce that has made it outstanding in Africa.

The government already has the framework of a plan for such a dedication. It proposes to establish eight or nine "Bantustans" in rural areas where the mass of Negroes would be settled and eventually given self-government under government guidance.

SEGREGATION SCHEME

The Bantu Investment Corp., with an initial capital of about $1,400,000, already is established. In the current budget three million dollars have been appropriated for development of rural villages and resettlement in Bantustans.

But a commission report five years ago said 300 million dollars would be needed in the first 10 years to develop Bantu areas.

The commission also concluded that if Bantustans are not developed 17 million Negroes will be living in white areas by the end of this centry.

The 2½ million Negroes living in segregated settlements around the big cities have shown no enthusiasm for the scheme.

South Africa Calm Under Police Rule

The Atlanta Constitution
Atlanta, Ga.
Mon. 4-4-60

By RICHARD KASISCHKE

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Heavily armed police and soldiers enforced an uneasy Sabbath peace Sunday, hopeful that the storm of Negro rebellion against white supremacy laws has blown over.

A Negro work boycott that had crippled commerce and industry in major cities in South Africa showed signs of breaking.

Negroes who had stayed away all week began streaming back to their jobs in some areas Saturday, although it was only a half-workday. Docks at Cape Town said they were only a few hundred short of the 1,700-man work force needed for loading and unloading.

ONE INCIDENT

Officials anxiously waited to see if workers will show up Monday. That would indicate the crisis is really easing.

Only one incident was reported Saturday night. A gang of Negro youths stoned a municipal bus in Cato Manor, the huge Negro quarter outside Durban on the east coast. The Negroes fled before police arrived.

The campaign against the white supremacy laws began March 21 with bloody rioting at Sharpeville, where the militant Pan-Africanist Congress launched a drive to abolish the pass books that all nonwhites must carry in South Africa.

The government temporarily suspended arrests of Negroes who carried no passbooks but it has cracked down with a state of emergency permitting searches without warrants and banning public gatherings.

The press, pulpit and some political leaders have been urging the Nationalist government to seek a stable racial peace, including talks with Negro leaders to hear their grievances. But the government has given no indication of what its next step will be. It has arrested scores of opposition leaders, white as well as Negro. It has ignored, up to now, a resolution adopted Friday by the U.N. Security Council calling on the country to abandon its apartheid — or segregation — policies.

BISHOP LEAVES

One critic of the government, the Rt. Rev. Richard Ambrose Reeves, Anglican bishop of Johannesburg, has dropped out of sight. But his wife said he has not been arrested.

"My husband left suddenly for a destination unknown even to me," Mrs. Reeves said. "But I can definitely state he has not been arrested."

The bishop had charged white police never fired a warning shot before opening up on Negro demonstrators at Sharpeville, where scores of Negro men and women were killed.

The Johannesburg Sunday Times said the 60-year-old bishop had consulted lawyers to find out whether the government could prosecute him under the state of emergency.

The South African Press Assn. quoted the Rev. Ernst Walls, archdeacon of Johannesburg, as saying the bishop is "enjoying a few days rest in the country."

Despite signs the situation was easing, whites still were buying guns for protection. Most dealers in Johannesburg are sold out of rifles, shotguns and pistols and are rationing ammunition sales.

The Sunday Golden City Post, a weekly, said, "Boy thugs are taking over from the political leaders in the Negro townships and are terrorizing the black population." It said the young thugs were responsible for hundreds of assaults, scores of rapes and the killing of a Negro policeman.

Asks Scrapping of Strict Racial Policies

By MILTON BESSER

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y. (AP)—The U. N. security council Friday called upon South Africa's Nationalist government to scrap its strict racial policies in order to live in peace with its millions of Negroes.

By a vote of 9-0 with 3 abstentions the 11-nation council adopted a resolution blaming mass shootings of Negroes and other racial unrest on South Africa's white supremacy laws.

Britain and France abstained. There had been reports both Western powers might kill the resolution with a veto.

This would have aroused bitter reaction on the part of many U. N. members, particularly among the Asian-African nations who regarded the resolution adopted as extremely mild.

U. S. AND SOVIET OK MOVE

The British and French delegates explained after the vote that they had reservations on the legal competence of the council to deal with what South Africa regarded as a domestic issue.

The United States and the Soviet Union both endorsed the resolution, presented by Ecuador and worked out in conference with Asian-African nations.

South Africa's delegate Bernardus G. Fourie made known before the vote his government considered the entire three-day council debate illegal. It appeared his government would therefore ignore the resolution.

The resolution deplored the recent violence in South Africa and the actions by its government which it said "have given rise to the present situation."

HAMMARSKJOLD TO ACT

It asked Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold to consult with the South African government to see what could be done to carry out provisions of the U. N. charter dealing with racial discrimination. He was asked to report back to the council "whenever necessary and appropriate."

Diplomatic sources said Hammarskjold had requested Fourie to meet with him at 11:30 a. m. Saturday.

Ambassador Alex Quaison-Sackey of Ghana, one of the leaders in bringing the charges against South Africa, expressed satisfaction but added he would have liked a stronger resolution.

Another African leader, Caba Sory of Guinea, said that while the resolution contained positive elements, he would have preferred one calling for economic or diplomatic penalties against South Africa.

LODGE URGES 'BRIDGE'

U. S. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge told the 11-nation Council the resolution "points a constructive way" for it to proceed.

He mentioned the role envisaged for Hammarskjold.

"This, I think, is a constructive step. It seeks to build a bridge—and not a wall. That is what we should try to do," Lodge said.

He said it was clear that the present turmoil stems from South Africa's policy of apartheid which has been opposed so often before in the United Nations.

Fourie, permanent U. N. representative for South Africa, told the Council he had been instructed by his government to regard "in a serious light" any resolution that might be approved.

FOURIE REPEATS WARNING

"I am also to reiterate what I stated during the Council's first meeting, namely, that if any further bloodshed in South Africa should result from a decision that might be taken here, the Security Council would have to accept its full share of the responsibility," he said.

Fourie walked away from the table after making a similar statement on Wednesday, but he did not do so this time.

S. African Youths Rip British Flag

The Atlanta Journal
Mon. 7/4/60 15a

By RICHARD KASISCHKE

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—The British flag was torn down, stamped on, spat on and thrown into the Indian Ocean at Durban Saturday by a group of South African Nationalist youths.

The demonstration came as tempers rose in the battle over whether this country should become a republic divorced from the British crown.

Atlanta, Ga.

About 200 people at an outdoor meeting of the Jeugbond—National party's youth organization—witnessed the flag incident on Durban Beach. The young Nationalists, in a mock ceremony, proclaimed "a republic" on the beach, then seized the Union Jack on the promenade and threw it into the sea.

The Durban Sunday Tribune called it "the first hostile act of young Nationalist party toughs."

Some bathers later recovered the flag and returned it to shore.

Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd called for a republic before a big crowd in Groblersdal Saturday.

The leader of the opposition United party, Sir de Villiers Graaf called Verwoerd's speech misleading and damaging to the nation. Graaf denounced the government's domestic and foreign policies as mad and stupid and termed specious Verwoerd's charges that Britain and the United States were playing into the hands of communism by bids for friendship with the emerging black states in Africa.

Verwoerd told a big "republican rally" the West is foolishly overbidding against the Communist East for the friendship of newly independent African states and was even prepared to sacrifice South Africa "for this purpose."

The Nationalist leader claimed that if South Africa voted for a republic it could still stay in the Commonwealth. He postponed announcing boh the date of the referendum on a republic and a decision about staying in the Commonwealth until the National party's convention in August.

Racial Mills in South Africa Can Destroy Families' Futures

The Washington Post p. 4

Washington, D.C.

By Henderson Gall
Reuters

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Month by month, the slow mills of the South African government's racial classification authorities grind out decisions that may destroy a family's future—even if the members can prove that they are white.

Sun 9-4-60

Some "white" people have committed suicide. Some families have been broken up, others have fled the country. All concerned have been "shocked, heartbroken and humiliated," in the words of a local newspaper report, to find one day, unexpectedly, that they are no longer officially classed as white.

And in South Africa today, where a great gulf divides the white from the colored (mixed bloods) and Africans, such a change in status may seem like the end of the world. Jobs, social position, marriage, future prospects, even the right to live in certain areas, may all be wrecked overnight.

Mortified by Stigma

For legislation covers many of these things with a tight net. It covers job reservation, marriage under the Mixed Marriages Act, which forbids matrimony between members of different racial groups, and the zoning of residential areas. All these depend on color.

Most of the families involved are so mortified by the stigma attached to racial classification that they shun all publicity.

"It affects their children and grandchildren as well, you see," explained one lawyer. "I had one case some weeks ago which I personally thought very deserving of publicity. But my clients absolutely forbade me to divulge any details to the press.

"However, there is one good thing. All appeals, and there have been 33 or them in the last few months, against reclassification of people as non-whites have been upheld. The position seems to have been relaxed.

"They have watered down the relentless pursuit of this thing. It is all in the spirit in which the law is applied, you know. There has been a change in outlook. After all, classification is a thing which hurts people deeply, and the government seems to be taking the view that it was causing more trouble than it was worth.

All Appeals Upheld

"While these appeals have all been upheld, there are plently of cases, I imagine, where people have simply accepted their reclassification. A number have left the country. But I must say that they have been fair-minded and lenient at the appeals board here. It has been suspended at the moment, because most of the cases have been dealt with, but if a fresh lot occurs, it will probably be reconstituted again."

Other people take a different view. One Cape Town newspaperman told this correspondent: "The same vicious, dreadful business is still going on.

"One reason why people are so reluctant to talk is because even if they are officially reinstated as white, after an appeal, they can be reclassified at any time. There is no guarantee that the ordeal will not be repeated.

"A lot of these cases start with an anonymous letter from some malicious or vengeful person."

Origins of Others

Others begin when a small slip of paper in an official envelope advises the recipient that he or she has been struck off the voters' roll — which contains only the names of whites.

Other originate with the request by someone planning to get married for a copy of his or her birth certificate from the official records.

Because, by a strange quirk of history, ministers making out birth certificates in the past had the habit of writing down the word "mixed" when an infant's parents were of mixed European descent — say an English father and an Italian mother—they are suddenly today, years later, faced with the threat of being classed as non-white.

Two years ago, when racial classification first hit the headlines, it was estimated that there were about 50,000 "borderline" cases in Cape Province, the traditional home of the Cape coloreds, descendants of early English and Dutch settlers who had children by African women or indentured Malay workers.

Since then, many families here have lived in dread of that scrap of paper instructing them to report to the local representative of the population registrar for scrutiny.

Scrutiny Exhaustive

This scrutiny is reported to be exhaustive. Open a whole family is gathered together, including children, while their ancestry, social habits and associations, the color and texture of their hair, eyes, skin and bone structure are placed under the microscope.

In February, 1958, a blond young man with "Viking features" was advised by a government department in Pretoria that he appeared to be a colored. His engagement to an Afrikans girl was broken off. Her father declared: "God, you are the whitest colored man I have ever seen"—and told him never to come to the house again.

Finally, the young man succeeded in reinstating himself as white. But, he was reported as saying: "Although we did get married in spite of my father-in-law, he refused to have anything to do with me, and still thinks that there was something in it."

"We are hoping to leave the country. For who knows what will happen to my son. Will he get a letter like that one day, too?"

SOUTH AFRICANS SHUN BITTERNESS

The New York Times

Detention During Emergency Regarded by Many as Price of Achieving Liberty

p. 3

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Sept. 3. — The state of emergency in South Africa that was imposed on March 30 nine days after the Sharpeville demonstrations in which sixty-seven Africans were killed and 186 wounded by police bullets—has been lifted.

Sun. 9-4-60

During the five months the emergency was in force, nearly 2,000 men and women of all races were summarily arrested and detained as political prisoners without being charged. In some instances husbands and wives were arrested together and taken away, leaving up to four children to be cared for by friends or relatives.

During the state of emergency it was an offense to publish by any means the names of the people detained. In strict legal terms a mother could not disclose to her son that his father had been detained as a political prisoner. It was even an offense for a wife to telephone to a lawyer to tell him her husband had been arrested.

Release Undertaken Gradually

The release of those detained has been gradual over the past month or two and the last of them were freed Wednesday morning. A condition of release during the emergency was that there must be no communication with the press and no travel without permission. With the emergency at an end, these restrictions no longer apply.

Many of those detained had not been politically active for some years. Some of them were arrested because twenty years or more ago they had joined the Communist party, which although now illegal was legal then. Among the prisoners were 240 whites — doctors, lawyers and other professional men.

They have emerged from prison without bitterness. A white woman expressed the point of view of many. "We regard our detention as part of the price democrats must pay to achieve liberty in South Africa for all people," she said.

A Johannesburg white lawyer, who was among those detained, said, "I am prepared to concede that if there was a revolutionary movement afoot or contemplated, nothing could have been more effective in suppressing it than the arrest of vital and intelligent men and women with whom I shared detention."

Shortly after their arrest, the Johannesburg detainees were taken to old Johannesburg fort, which was built in the last century. They made frequent complaints about food, which they described as "filthy and uneatable."

Women had no doors on bathrooms or lavatories and the men at first were locked up all night four to a cell with a small sanitary pail for each cell.

Conditions Better in Prison

After about a month the detainees were transferred to Pretoria Central prison, where the accommodations were much better. They were lodged in dormitories, with beds, sheets, tablecloths and cutlery, as well as a stove for heating their food and cooking extras.

Even so, twenty women protested the move from Johannesburg fort by staging a sitdown strike. They had to be carried to trucks. At Pretoria the women staged an eight-day hunger strike as a protest against detention. They abandoned the hunger strike only on medical advice.

BLAMED FOR VIOLENCE

Police Action Stymie South African Groups

Montgomery Ala.

Wed. 9-16

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South African police action has apparently paralyzed, if not smashed, the two big Negro organizations the government blamed for the racial violence last March and April.

The African National Congress and the more militant Pan-Africanist Congress were officially declared illegal in April after the government declared a nationwide state of emergency March 30 to cope with racial violence and political unrest.

Then in huge roundups the government arrested most of the leaders of the ANC and PAC and thousands of their members who had participated in the rebellion against pass books and other white supremacy laws.

Both organizations went underground. But a recent survey made in Negro townships by the English-language newspaper Rand Daily Mail has indicated the underground movement is a flop. This was already apparent when the underground failed to pull off strikes and protest demonstrations several months ago.

LEADER LOST

What hit the ANC and PAC hardest was the loss of their leaders. ANC chief Albert Luthuli is still in jail and involved in a treson trial at Pretoria.

The young PAC leader, Mangaliso Sobukwe, was sentenced to three years' imprisonment in April for incitement. Many of Sobukwe's lieutenants went to jail with him, having voluntarily offered themselves for arrest. A few others went into exile and are working from Ghana.

Left leaderless and the constant victim of police reprisals, the rank and file of both organizations either disintegrated or declined into frightened apathy.

Nobody here believes that, under constant police surveillance as they are, either organization could stage any substantial revolt now.

Neither party was prepared for the mass police onslaught that followed the March 21 shootings of Negro rioters at Sharpeville and rican settlements outside Cape Town, Durban and other cities.

The ANC also had great weaknesses. Although it had a history of nearly 50 years of political work throughout Africa it had few if any major successes in the 12 years of the nationalist government's stern apartheid — racial segregationist—rule.

This caused a loss of confidence by the Negro masses. They had too often taken part in and supported strikes, demonstrations and protests that failed.

In the face of strong powers wielded by the white government under the state of emergency, the African masses became more and more reluctant to expose themselves without chance of success.

More and more young Africans, asking "What's it ever achieved" defected to the ANC's militant offshoot, the Pan-Africanists.

Sobukwe and his Pan-Africanists launched the no-pass campaign that exploded in Sharpeville, where on March 21 several hundred Africans were killed or wounded by white police fire.

This was started as a nonviolent campaign to force the abolition of laws requiring every Negro man to carry an identification pass to be produced at any time on police demand.

PUT IT DOWN

Violence spread through the country. The government moved in with armored cars, guns and planes and put it down.

When Pan-Africanist leaders voluntarily went to jail, virtually no organization was left and complete confusion set in. When Negroes saw this, their attitude towards the PAC changed. They said in effect, "What's the point of going to jail if nothing is achieved? It's all very well to be a political martyr but who will care for our wives and children?"

A group calling itself the "socialist League of Arfica" has published an underground newspaper called "Spark" and attempts to create a new movement for Negroes based on Socialist principles.

The South African government has announced the introduction on Dec. 1 of compulsory pass books for all Negro women as well as men. Some attempts may be made to protest this extension of the hated pass laws. This would reveal how much life is left in the new and old African organizations.

South Africa's Negroes Plan Pass Law Protest

By LYNN HEINZERLING

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—The Pan-Africanist party issued a call Friday for a nationwide campaign of nonviolence against South Africa's pass laws for Negroes.

Starting Monday, Negro men who heed the call will go to the nearest police station and declare they are not carrying the pass which every African by law must have with him, and invite arrest.

Mangaliso Sobukwe, president of the congress—who admitted he is risking a charge of sedition and treason under South African law—told a news conference the purpose of the campaign was to crowd the jails and courts and bring industry to a standstill.

Sobukwe said a door-to-door campaign soliciting support had received a favorable response from the union's 20 million Negroes.

"The pass laws of this country are a symbol of oppression, exploitation and degradation of Africans," Sobukwe said. "The position is untenable."

The Pan-Africanist party is a militant offshoot of the Union African National party, which believes in a United States of Africa along the lines proposed by Premier Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana.

Sobukwe, a scholarly African who is a lecturer in languages at Witwatersrand Univesity, said he would appear at his police station at Orlando Monday morning.

THOUSANDS JAILED

Thousands of Negroes are arrested annuall for not having passes. They are liable to a fine or ail term. The system was designed by the government to control movement and residence of the Negro population, which outnumbers whites three to one.

Sobukwe said he had advised the South African commissioner of police, Maj. Gen. C. I. Rademeyer of the campaign, asking him to instruct police to "refrain from actions that may lead to violence."

Sobukwe promised Africans would make no difficulty, would surrender for arrest, and disperse if ordered.

The Pan-Africanist party, in addition to the abolition of pass laws, demands a minimum wage of 35 pounds—$98 a month and an assurance no worker will be dismissed for participation in the campaign. Arrested Africans will seek no bail and will refuse to pay a fine.

Abattoir in the Making

Turmoil Shows PAC Speaks for African Thought

Pittsburgh, Pa.

By HAROLD L. KEITH
(Courier Managing Editor)

Events in South Africa, which will probably turn that hate-ridden nation into an abattoir, are proving the point that the Pan-Africanist Congress now represents the thinking of a considerable portion of the black population.

■ Courier readers may recall that this writer has predicted that the emergence of PAC as a new force in South Africa "could easily toss cold water over the efforts of certain leaders to effect a multi-racial society in the Union."

These words, written in the April 11, 1959, issue of The Courier, have now proven themselves prophetic. At that time we said, "It is the business of multi-racialism which seems to be rankling in the craws of the Africanists . . . they have grown strongest within the areas of Johannesburg's teeming slums.

"From such regions as Dube and Mofolo have arisen the names of Robert Sobukwe and Potlako Leballo.

■

BY THE TIME this article reaches print, the South African Government will have undoubtedly reacted with stern measures against all Negro organizations in the Union which are dedicated to the elimination of apartheid and attendant proscriptions.

■ Mr. Sobukwe, since his rise to influence, has become a little more moderate in his outlook. But this must not be construed as an indication that the new leadership in South Africa has been influenced to any extent by the drug of compromise.

In fact, the refusal to compromise on the part of Mr. Sobukwe and his lieutenants, such as Josias Madzunya, L. T. Mgweba, S. Motsile and T. Negwendu, has been a key factor in attracting adherents to the cause of PAC.

■

THE AFRICAN National Congress has not been idle. However, much of the militancy in Albert John Luthuli's organization went out the window when its leadership was put out of circulation via the infamous treason trials.

■ Although Mr. Sobukwe's organization reportedly has around 33,000 bona fide members, it is crystal clear that his gospel of "freedom in our time" for the Union's Negroes has found thousands of receptive ears in the warrens of the vast black "locations" and "reserves" which ring South Africa's principal cities.

In effect, this means that the Nationalist Government is walking on eggs these days and is just one step from precipitating the most bloody mass revolt since the Bolshevik Revolution.

PAC 'Total Boycotts' Were Prelude to Riot

Pittsburgh, Pa.

Sat 4-2-60

P. 9

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — prior to the recent bloody rioting the Pan-Africanist Congress had launched a total boycott to refute all South African racial practices against Africans.

The PAC had launched its "status campaign" warning five big Johannesburg firms to raise the minimum wage and to treat all Africans with complete courtesy.

Signed by the national secretary, Potlako Leballo, the PAC, in strongly worded letters, demanded "that the contemptuous manner of addressing Africans as "native," "Kaffir," "boy," "girl," "Jane," "John," etc. should be stopped at once.

■

PAC DEMANDED that Africans be addressed as "Sir," "Mr.," "Mrs.," etc.

The group also objected strongly to the use of the meaningless and derogatory terms such as Bantu, non-white, non-European, and demanded that only the term African be used.

Policemen in Johannesburg have been wary of the Africans since six of them went into a settlement recently to arrest a suspect. All six were slain.

South Africa Ending Pass Regulations

PRETORIA, South Africa — Bloody rioting has been climaxed in South Africa with an announcement that Africans will not be required to carry identification passes until further notice.

The revelation means that the Africans have at least won a temporary victory, although many of them paid with their lives fighting against the restriction.

Gen. Rademayer, chief of South Africa's police made the announcement, halting the restriction on Africans which touched off the recent outbreaks of violence.

■

IT HAD BEEN announced earlier that police had established round-the-clock patrols of African housing areas to head off possible violence by Africans protesting mass killings of their people in Ianga and Sharpeville.

In Johannesburg the government had banned all meetings until June 30 at the same time preparations were being made for a day of mourning during which South Africa's African labor force would be asked to stay at home out of respect for the victims of police bullets.

The ban on meetings was imposed under the Riotous Assemblies Act. It applies to whites as well as Africans and Asians. Only church services and funerals were exempted.

■

THE UNITED Nations Security Council, meanwhile, met this week to consider the riots in which at least 80 Africans have been killed.

New Interest In Africa Seen by U. S.

The Pittsburgh Courier

Pittsburgh, Pa.

LOS ANGELES — George Sevelle, member of the U. S. Department of Commerce Trade Mission, recently returned from Africa, says that as a direct result of the contact between some African countries and the United States, new interest and a greater participation for industrial expansion and business progress can be expected on the African continent.

Mr. Sevelle

Sat 4-2-60

P. 9

He said the African countries visited displayed an ability to tackle difficult problems in trade, and that an abundance of labor is available.

Conferences by the trade team took them before the Chamber of Commerce and economic ministers; conferences with business leaders as well as conferences with government officials.

Sevelle stated that America must meet the continuing challenge by Russia to provide essential aid and assistance to friendly nations with their backs to the wall. "They are endeavoring to stand alone," he said, "and we must be close at hand with arms out-stretched to help, less they stumble and fall."

'Wings of Change Are Blowing'

The Pittsburgh Courier

WHEN the British Prime Minister, Harold MacMillan, spoke before the South African Parliament recently, he warned that the "winds of change are blowing throughout the continent of Africa."

Mr. MacMillan could have, without exaggeration, extended the significance of his warning to include the entire world. The "winds of change are blowing" on every continent.

Pittsburgh Pa

This includes North America and the United States. It also includes "the land of cotton" where men, intoxicated by the past, resist any and all changes, resist anything new.

In their behalf, in the behalf of such men as Senators Talmadge and Russell of Georgia, of Senators Eastland and Stennis of Mississippi, of Senators Hill and Sparkman of Alabama and those other "tongue-in-cheek" defenders of "our way of life," it can only be said that although they fight a losing battle against "the winds of change," their behavior is historically logical.

Sat 14-2-60

THE ROMAN EMPERORS fought the "winds of change" when Christ's apostles carried the gospel to all parts of their empire. Centuries later, the Christian church itself, grown rich and aristocratic, was to fight the "winds of change."

The aristocracy and nobility of Europe fought the "winds of change" when feudal slaves sought to break their bonds. Entrenched power fought the "winds of change" in the American and French Revolutions.

The significant fact is that the "winds of change" have ALWAYS won. Emperors, Popes, Kings and Princes have gone down to defeat.

In our Southland today, young men and women (sometimes to the amazement of their parents) have been caught up by the "winds of change." They seek full freedom and full equality. They are demanding a freedom denied their fathers and their fathers' fathers. In far-off South Africa, scores of Africans, men, women and children, lay down their lives to purchase freedom. The "winds of change" have stirred them.

In the face of this world force, the American Congress proposes to enact a so-called civil rights bill which will mean exactly NOTHING—except to politicians on one side or the other.

THE WHITE and Negro students, South and North, will not be fooled. They know that court-appointed referees do not get at the heart of the matter of Negro voting. Intimidation does and they are prepared to challenge intimidation.

Thurgood Marshall, director of the NAACP's Legal Defense and Education Department, has sounded the tocsin. "We are going to contest every case, every conviction," pledges Mr. Marshall. "We shall go to the highest courts in the land." Sixty-two lawyers have joined him.

ARE YOU GOING TO HELP? Do you realize that these students, white and colored, are giving you your BIG CHANCE? Do you know that it takes MONEY to win this non-violent struggle? Has it come to you that it doesn't take money in little dribbles. The BIG CHANCE requires BIG MONEY.

That is why The Courier is trying to help. That is why The Courier is using itself as an intrument to help provide the MONEY Mr. Marshall is going to need. Every dollar sent to The Courier in its Dollars for Dignity campaign will be sent to Mr. Marshall. Dollars for Dignity doesn't mean ONE DOLLAR. It means as many DOLLARS as it HURTS you to give or as you can AFFORD to give. And DOLLARS FOR DIGNITY NEEDS DOLLARS NOW!

America Is Officially Outraged

The Pittsburgh Courier

Pittsburgh Pa

The U. S. Department of State has expressed official outrage over the shameless shambles in South Africa which the civilized world has generally decried.

Undoubtedly the State Department spoke only with President Eisenhower's approval, so we imagine the President was outraged also by the ruthless murder of unarmed protestants by the blood-Boer police.

Sat 14-2-60

What is most singular is that the Administration has expressed no official outrage over the wholesale arrest of peaceful student picketers of stores where they can spend money but can't eat, or over the massive Southern defiance of the 1954 U. S. Supreme Court school desegregation decision, or over the unashamed connivance of labor unions and employers to keep black workers ever on the outer economic fringes.

We feel sure that the whole nation and the entire world would welcome a tour of the President through the South to do a series of full-length radio talks there on what this nation, and particularly the South, must do about the race question if free citizenship is to have any real meaning in this land.

We abhor what has happened in South Africa, so many thousands of miles away but our first concern is with what is happening right here to our sons and daughters, our families and friends who remain the victims of racial insult, segregation and discrimination 97 years after Emancipation.

We would like to hear more officially expressed outrage over THAT.

South African 'Bridge'

Sir de Villiers Graaff

The New Yorker

FOR years Sir de Villiers Graaff, leader of the United party in South Africa, has been striving to hammer together a coalition of moderate Nationalists and members of the Opposition that might topple the National party Government. Now, according to some observers in Johannesburg, such a coalition may be in the making. If it is formed, it is likely to follow the middle-of-the-road program of Sir de Villiers. Without doubt he wil be a commanding figure in the coalition.

Man in the News

Phoenix 4-4-60

From his birth, Dec. 8, 1913, he has been a bridge between the Boer War foes, the Afrikaner and the Briton. His father, who came from old Afrikaner stock, was made a baronet by the British for his services in helping form the Union of South Africa.

The son was destined for politics from birth. Gen. Louis Batha, first Prime Minister of South Africa, was his godfather. His father, Sir David de Villiers Graaff, served in General Botha's Cabinet and guided his son toward government service.

Sir de Villiers failed in his first try for the South African Parliament in 1946, but won in 1948 in the face of the National party trend that swept Field Marshal Jan Christian Smuts, the United party Prime Minister, from power. From 1948 to 1958 he represented Hottentots Holland, a constituency just east of Capetown. Since then he has represented Rondebosch in the Cape Province.

When he became United party leader in November, 1956, Sir de Villiers warned that he would be "a hard taskmaster" for the organization. In fact, he put new energy into the party, largely by the example of his own hard campaigning.

He has promised to do his best to double family incomes within a generation, attract overseas capital, develop an African middle class and promote immigration. His policy is to "talk economics, not ideology."

Since the election of April, 1958, which was another Nationalist victory, Sir de Villiers has pursued a course of defending segregation but opposing what he called the Government's "stupid and impractical racial experimentation" in extreme apartheid.

Police Shouting Protested

Following the incident at Sharpeville two weeks ago in which policemen fired on an African crowd, killing seventy-two, he called for a judicial inquiry into the riots and their causes. However, he publicly endorsed the Government's move to ban the African National Congress and the Pan-African Congress, "because there is an emergency that has arisen out of Government policy."

At the same time, he called for "a change of attitude by all South Africans to our nonwhites" and for the Government, "if it can make no new approach, to get out and allow a new Government which could do so."

British Parliament Lashes South Africa Racial Policy

The Montgomery Advertiser

LONDON (AP)—Britain sharply rebuked South Africa Friday for its racial policies.

The House of Commons, without a dissent, voted to put its sister nation on the carpet at next month's conference of British Commonwealth prime ministers.

All parties voted a motion urging South Africa to come to terms with the situation before there are more blood baths.

The motion demanded that Prime Minister Harold Macmillan take the matter up in the Commonwealth meetings to show South Africa how Britons feel about apartheid. Prime Minister

The main objection of farmers is that the government's proposals will have no immediate effect on their tight budgets. They want the prices of farm products again tied to those of industrial products to give their incomes a rapid boost.

Demonstrations Thursday all over France showed the farmers mean business. Farm union leaders estimated the turnout at 400,000. Government officials set it at 200,000—a figure most independent sources judged far too low.

BANNERS MENACING

Although there was rioting at only two points—Sens, southeast of Paris, and Quimper in Brittany—the slogans on the farmers' banners were menacing.

"The peasants are well worth atom bomb," read one, referring to the large sums France is spending on nuclear development.

Another, addressing the chief of state familiarly in the second person singular, warned bluntly: "De Gaulle, behave yourself!"

BITTER HISTORY

Current Horrors Add To South Africa Story

The Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery, Ala.

Fri. 4-8-60

By ARTHUR EDSON

WASHINGTON (AP)—The killings, the brutalities, the horrors in the news from South Africa add one more terrible page to that country's bitter history.

Terror is no stranger there.

Seven years ago, in a book on his country's problems, David Marquard, a South African, was writing:

"For 150 years the history of South Africa has been a history of struggle and conflict, conflict between black man and black man, between white man and black man, between white man and white man, struggle of white and black against a not overgenerous nature."

Related Story, Page 1

Possibly we Americans, with our own Civil War, are best able to understand South Africa.

Yet if you'll join me on a trek to the library of the National Geographic Society you'll soon learn that the differences are greater than the similarities.

Here, even in most of the South, whites outnumber the blacks. In South Africa, the whites are a small minority.

Here the Negro has, at least in theory, legal equality. There the white man rules the roost, politically and economically, and he aims to stay there.

Or to quote from the South African official year book:

"South Africa is the only country in the world where a small, dominant white community has followed a definite policy of maintaining its purity of race in the midst of overwhelming numbers of non-European inhabitants."

The population breaks down like this:

White—2,957,000.

Bantu—9,460,000.

Asians—431,000, including about 250,000 Indians, descendants of untouchables who migrated to Africa 100 years ago.

Colored—or mixed races—1,319,000.

It's that top three million whites who count, and even here it pays to be among the elite of the elite. The Afrikaners—you may remember them by their former name, the Boers—have descended from Dutchmen, Germans, and French Hugenots.

Sixty per cent of the whites speak Afrikaan—it and English are the official languages. Since 1910, every prime minister has been an Afrikaner.

From this group comes apartheid, meaning apartness.

Each racial group is supposed to live apart, work apart, stay apart.

But these are days of great upheaval.

The Bantus have no vote, little schooling, and their income in some areas is so low there's no way to measure it. Eighty per cent of the skilled labor is white, and even in urban areas unskilled labor has been so plentiful and cheap that a Bantu may earn as little as a fifth as much as a white worker.

"Three-quarters of the population," Marquard writes, "is undereducated and underpaid."

South African history is dotted with such notes as these: The massacre of 1838, the Zulu rebellion of 1879, the Durban rioting of 1949.

And with all the combustible elements the conclusion has to be that not the whites, but terror, will all too often be the ruling force in troubled South Africa.

Riots Down After Show Of Force

South Africa Tries Emergency Powers To Subdue Negroes

Fri. 4-1-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa's white supremacy government tried to subdue the nation's rebellious Negroes Thursday with a show of force by troops and police acting under emergency powers just short of martial law.

Three Negroes—and possibly a fourth—were wounded by police gunfire in Negro townships surrounding this metropolis.

Negroes resumed stoning trains, buses and private cars Thursday night but not on a scale to match Monday night's fiery riots at the climax of mourning for Negroes killed by police last week. The emergency powers decreed by the government generally reduced Negro demonstrations to widespread waves of frustrated protest.

With the government turning to force for the solution of its racial problem, police were supported by emergency decrees. Reports of shootings had been rare since the first outbreak when police gunfire killed 72 Negroes March 21.

Except for a potentially explosive demonstration where several thousand Negroes gathered for several hours near Durban, the first day of the officially declared emergency passed without large scale violence.

CHINESE STOPPED

Three policemen were cornered in a car when they attempted to stop Negroes from stoning buses in the Johannesburg area. The police opened fire, wounding one Negro.

Negroes stopped an automobile occupied by two Chinese in the same region and tried to assault and rob them. Police intervened and wounded two Negroes.

A large group of Negroes attacked a native beer hall a Natalspruit. Police fired warning shots and wounded one Negro. This third report was issued by police as unconfirmed.

MILITIA MOBILIZED

Four more regiments of South Africa's white civilian militia were called up as part of the government's policy of trying to show the Negroes that their drive to upset the nation's white supremacy rule is doomed.

Four more regiments of the militia mobilized, bringing the total to 17 on active duty plus 3 signal and 2 ambulance units.

Three thousand white soldiers and sailors, some militiamen among them, surrounded the Negro settlements of Nyanga and Langa near Cape Town during the day in a tight cordon. They were armed with rifles and fixed bayonets, automatic weapons and armored cars.

Eighty-eight police were flown across country from the North Transvaal to beef up the Cape police force.

A loud-speaker helicopter flew over the Negro townships after sunup and told Negroes they could go to work if they wanted to provided they went by 7:30 a.m.

Apparently few took advantage of the opportunity, because Cape city's commerce and industry suffered from its worst stay-at-home boycott since Negro absenteeism began last week.

Negro towns were sealed off during the day, lest Negroes repeat their march of 30,000 demanding the release of their arrested leaders in Cape Town.

Resolution Asks African Reprimand

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. AP)—The U.N. Security Council was asked late Thursday to approve a resolution taking South Africa to task for the mass shootings of Negroes, and calling for an end to her white supremacy policy.

Ecuador, a member of the 11-nation Council, presented the resolution which was agreed upon previously by representatives of the Asian-African nations.

The resolution came on the second day of Council debate on an Asian-African request that it consider the mass shooting of South African Negroes by white police.

In a last-minute change supporters of the resolution eliminated any reference to outright condemnation of South Africa. The change was aimed at winning British support. The word deplore was substituted for condemn.

The Council adjourned at 6:20 p.m. until Friday morning, when Fourie will be the first speaker.

Mopping Up Job Pushed By Africans

The Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery, Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa's government, methodically mopping up foes of its white supremacy policies, banned by two big Negro political organizations today. Defiantly, the imprisoned leader of one declared "we are going underground."

Sat. 4-9-60

Afield, fresh reserve soldiers were mobilized for the battle the government appeared to have all but won. Predawn police raids in five cities netted more than 100 persons, including some white men and Indians suspected of backing the Negro fight against segregation.

Three hundred well-armed police, backed by armored cars, swept through the Negro settlement of Pimville, 15 miles southeast of Johannesburg, arresting several hundred persons and seizing battleaxes and other weapons.

Police said they had learned hoodlums were trying to take over the settlement. Not a shot was fired.

Outlawed for a year under the national emergency law were the militant Pan-Africanist Congress which claims 31,000 members, and the larger and more moderate African National Congress.

Their chiefs are under arrest for promotion of demonstrations and riots initially aimed against the South African law that requires nonwhites to carry identity papers at all times.

The vow to carry on in secret was voiced by PAC President Mangaliso Sobukwe, a former university instructor in languages, in a Johannesburg courtroom where he is on trial with 22 associates for incitement of Negroes in the antipass campaign.

SOLDIERS CALLED UP

"Are you now going underground?" Sobukwe was asked by a reporter or The Associated Press.

"Yes, we are going underground," he replied.

Soldiers called up Friday were a battalion or so of the South African Irish Regiment, a Johannesburg unit. They were ordered to duty at Bloemfontein, capital of the Orange Free State, 270 miles south of Johannesburg.

The Transvaal Scottish Regiment is already mobilized at a training ground near the heart of Johannesburg. The Witwatersrand Rifles are standing by at an airport east of the city.

The police raiders rounded up more than 50 persons in Johannesburg. Other arrests were made in Cape Town, Durban, Port Elizabeth and Pretoria. The raiders struck under emergency regulations rushed through Parliament after widespread Negro reaction to the killing of 72 African demonstrators by police gunfire March 21.

Justice Minister Francois Erasmus told Parliament in Cape Town he did not know how long the prisoners will be held without formal charges, but the investigations are extensive and may last a considerable time.

The situation throughout the nation was more nearly normal than at any time since the outbreak of the campaign.

The back-to-work movement swelled among the 10 million Africans who do most of the labor in this nation of three million whites.

Soldiers who have ringed the Negro settlements of Langa and Nyanga were withdrawn. A dispatch from Cape Town said police relaxed and played hop, skip and jump games with African children in the streets of Nyanga, the scene of two big police raids this week.

Temporary Leader Fills Africa Post

Government Hides White Farmer's Fate For Killing Attempt

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — The government Monday night hid the fate of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's would-be assassin behind state-of-emergency regulations. This left authorities free to try him anywhere and at any time they choose.

SAUER

With Verwoerd sidelined for an indefinite period, the Cabinet called on Paul Oliver Sauer, a Nationalist party elder statesman, to run the government while the Prime Minister recovers. Sauer promptly promised to carry on Verwoerd's white supremacy policies.

Police ordered the press to quit printing the name of David Pratt, 52, wealthy white farmer and English clubman who shot Verwoerd twice in the head Saturday. Friends have described Pratt as a foe of Verwoerd's apartheid — or race segregation—policy.

FUTURE DATE

A police spokesman said only that Pratt "will appear in court at some future date." There was press speculation that Pratt, whose arraignment had been expected Monday, will be charged with high treason. This charge carries a death penalty.

Sauer, 62, minister of lands, Nationalist party leader in Parliament, and senior member of the Cabinet, promptly informed Parliament there will be no deviation in Verwoerd's racial policies.

As if to underscore his words, police staged a roundup of Negro foes of white supremacy laws outside Johannesburg and in the Port Elizabeth area on the south coast.

The government also placed eight more of South Africa's 300 magisterial districts under a state of emergency. The total under a state of emergency is now 119.

Speaking to a tense session of Parliament in Cape Town, Sauer promised a thorough investigation of the shooting of Verwoerd at Johannesburg.

OFFICIAL STEP

While Sauer will preside at Cabinet meetings he will not be named acting prime minister, Foreign Minister Eric Louw said. Louw indicated Verwoerd's condition was not serious enough to warrant the official step of appointing and swearing in an acting prime minister. He also hinted that in serious policy matters Verwoerd would be able to give his counsel.

Medical bulletins from Pretoria where Verwoerd is hospitalized with two .22 caliber bullet wounds in his head, said the Prime Minister is weak but making satisfactory progress.

"Reassurance can be given that there is no sign of paralysis and, according to the progress made so far, paralysis is not expected," the bulletin added.

REMOVE BULLETS

Decision still was deferred on when to perform a delicate operation to remove the bullets that struck his face and right ear.

The opposition newspaper Rand Daily Mail said earlier Verwoerd doctors admit. It said the bullets "may have caused damage which could impair his speech, his sense of balance, his hearing and possibly his mental state for some time."

There was no medical confirmation.

Sauer told Parliament doctors were satisfied with Verwoerd's condition and "considered it to be a miracle that a permanent injury had not been caused."

ATTEMPT DEPLORED

With opposition parties joining, Parliament unanimously adopted a resolution deploring the assassination attempt and expressing hopes for Verwoerd's quick recovery.

"As far as Parliament is concerned, there will not be any deviations from the existing program as a result of what has happened," Sauer told Parliament.

"We don't know how long Dr. Verwoerd will be incapacitated and when he will be able to resume his duties, but Parliament will carry on its present program. The rest of the Cabinet will see that peace and order are maintained."

Nine Africans Killed In Clash With Police

DURBAN, South Africa (UPI) — Nine Africans were killed and 12 wounded in a clash with police in the Flagstaff district about 100 miles from Durban, officials said last week.

Natives in the area put the number of dead at 15, and estimated 24 others were wounded. They said some bodies may have been carried into the hills with more wounded.

TWELVE WOUNDED natives were admitted to the Holy Cross Hospital near Flagstaff.

A LARGE party of heavily-armed police, assisted by dogs and a spotter helicopter moved into the area. Police said the clash, including some hand-to-hand fighting, followed.

The incident was the first serious disorder reported in South Africa since the bloody clashes in March and April.

Debate Starts On South Africa

Delegate Fourie Leaves His Seat In Protest Of U. N. Council Issue

By The Associated Press

United Nations, N. Y., March 30.—South Africa's chief U. N. delegate walked away from the Security Council table Wednesday after warning that debate here might set off new and more widespread racial turmoil in his country.

Bernardus Gerhardus Fourie, permanent U. N. representative for South Africa, told members of the 11-nation council that if this occurs the blame will rest squarely on their shoulders.

His dramatic gesture did not amount to an outright boycott. He seated himself in a row of chairs at one side of the council chamber. A delegation spokesman said Fourie was awaiting instructions from his Government on his future course of action.

Fourie was the opening speaker as the council began debate on a request by 29 Asian-African nations that it consider the mass shooting of Negroes in South Africa by white police.

United States Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, president of the council for March, declared the council's agenda adopted without taking a formal vote.

That assured full-scale debate, with representatives of the Asian-African group denouncing the shootings and calling for council action aimed at halting additional violence.

Fourie said it must be clearly understood that his Government "fully intends to discharge its duties to maintain public order and safety, and to safeguard the internal security of the country, whoever may threaten it—white or nonwhite."

He asked on what grounds the U. N. proposed to single out South Africa for dealing with what his Government contends is purely an internal matter of no legal concern to the United Nations.

AFRICANS' PARTIES IN KENYA TO UNITE

Former Mau Mau Member to Head New National Body —Crowd Jeers Mboya

Special to The New York Times.

NAIROBI, Kenya, March 27—James Gichuru, 46-year-old Kikuyu schoolteacher and former Mau Mau member, was named chairman today of a new political party, the Kenya African National Union.

Dr. Mungai Njeroge, a Kikuyu who was educated in the United States, was chosen as secretary of the new group.

Delegates from thirty African political organizations attended the party's inaugural meeting at Kiambu, near Nairobi. They agreed in principle to a merger of their organizations. A nine-member committee was appointed to draw up a constitution.

Crowd Hostile to Mboya

The committee included Tom Mboya, African nationalist leader, who received one of the few hostile receptions of his political career when he arrived for the meeting. The crowd chanted: "You have sold us" and "We don't want American money." These were allusions to the outcome of the London Conference on Kenya and to allegations that Mr. Mboya had used funds from American labor organizations to further his political career. However, when Mr. Mboya left the meeting after a stormy five-hour session, his Nairobi People's Convention party supporters carried him on their shoulders to a near-by stadium where 25,000 Kikuyu were waiting to greet officers of the new organization.

Dr. Gikonyo Kiano, a Kikuyu, told the crowd the committee would draw up a constitution as soon as possible. He said the conference had also endorsed the action of African-elected members of the Legislative Council in accepting ministries in the Kenya Government. He said it had been explained that this was necessary to enable Africans to see that nothing slowed the progress toward complete independence.

Mr. Gichuru and Mr. Mboya also addressed the meeting and each whipped the crowd into a frenzy when he held up his fingers in a V sign and chanted "freedom and sweat" and "complete independence now."

1,000 Africans Greet Macleod

Dispatch of The Times, London.

LUSAKA, Northern Rhodesia, March 27—About 1,000 Africans greeted Iain Macleod, British Colonial Secretary, with a boisterous demonstration today as he arrived at Lusaka Airport.

Later the cars of several Europeans were stoned on the way to Government House, where Mr. Macleod is staying as the guest of Governor Sir Evelyn Hone. The stoning took place after Mr. Macleod and the Governor had driven into the grounds of Government House.

Fifteen Europeans reported that their cars had been stoned by groups of Africans standing by the road. No one was seriously injured.

The Africans who were waiting for Mr. Macleod when he arrived from Salisbury carried banners and sang political songs. The crowd surged toward the Colonial Secretary shouting "Freedom" and "One man, one vote." Mr. Macleod reached his car before being engulfed by the mob.

South Africa Tensely Awaits Today's Mourning for Riot Dead

The New York Times
Mon. 3-28-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, March 27—No racial incidents were reported on this quiet, sunny Sunday in South Africa.

But the country waited anxiously for tomorrow when the African population is scheduled to observe a day of mourning for those who were slain last Monday in clashes between demonstrators and the police.

On the heels of yesterday's announcement of the suspension of regulations requiring Africans to carry identity passes the African National Congress distributed 200,000 leaflets calling for a mass burning of the passes tomorrow.

Chief Albert Luthuli, president of the Congress, took the lead in this demonstration by burning his pass last night. He said that action by the Government to ban the Congress and other political organizations" has placed the obligation on us to take a last stand against the pass system."

Africans Seem Jubilant

Meanwhile, reports came from throughout the country of quiet jubilation among Africans at the news that they would not be arrested for failure to carry the documents, which have strictly governed their movements. A typical comment was that of Quintin Whyte, of the South African Institute of Race Relations. "The Government can never go back to the old arrangement without creating the most terrible trouble," he said.

However, there has been no amendment of the statement by François C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, that suspension of the pass laws was only a temporary measure to relieve tension among the Africans.

However, Africans here appeared to move about with a feeling of greater ease, smiling as they went. Some said they had already disposed of their passes.

Urged to Stay Home

Africans througout the country are being urged to stay away from their jobs tomorrow to observe the day of mourning. Indications are that almost all of them will do so. Some businesses that depend heavily on African labor are expected to close for the day.

Heavy police patrols have been operating in over the week-end and entire force of more than 20,000 will be on duty tomorrow. Public meetings have been banned throughout South Africa until June 30.

Meanwhile, there was much speculation about the effect of the events of the last week on the administration of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd and the future policy of the Nationalist party, which he leads.

Some observers believed that the violent turn of events would cost him his position as Prime Minister. It was also said that the threatened African work stoppages and serious weakness of the stock market had produced such economic uncertainty as to force a considerable softening of the harsh racial policies in this country of about 3,000,000 Europeans and 10,000,000 Africans.

Police Back Down

South Africans Ease Pass Rules

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — (AP) — South Africa backed down Saturday on its requirement that Negroes must carry passbooks and show them whenever police demand.

VERWOERD

National police headquarters in Pretoria announced police had been instructed not to ask black Africans to produce their reference books nor arrest them for nonpossession of these documents.

The statement explained the Negroes were afraid to carry such books "as a result of intimidation" and so "it has been decided to ease the tension." It said that as far as possible police would make use of warnings before hailing anybody to court.

The militant Pan Africanist Congress has been campaigning since Monday against the White-imposed system requiring nonwhites to carry pass reference books — somewhat like passports for internal use — day and night and present them on demand.

The campaign started with crowds of Negroes marching to police stations without passbooks in the hope of getting arrested and clogging the wheels of justice. Police fired into crowds at some points and scores were killed and more than 200 wounded.

The police announcement came as spreading strikes crippled sections of South Africa's Cape Peninsula and sullen, passive resistance, continued in the Vereeniging industrial area, where the most serious shooting occurred.

Anti-nationalist newspapers have been demanding that Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd's government make some "friendly" gesture toward Africans.

Mangaliso Sobukwe, 35-year-old president of the Pan Africanist Congress, charged in Johnnesburg Magistrates' Court that some of the men arrested with him had been assaulted by white police "both within and outside Johannesburg jail."

Sobukwe, who launched the antipass campaign, was arraigned with 23 others in his movement on charges of incitement and contravening a section of the pass laws.

They were held to appear in Johannesburg regional court April 4.

South African Police Nab 20 Children in Protest

Chicago Sunday Tribune
Sun. 5-15-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 14 [Reuters]—Police detained more than 20 children for questioning here Saturday as they appealed to the mayor of Johannesburg to work for the release of their parents, detained under South Africa's emergency laws.

Chicago Tribune

Police swooped down on the youngsters, while they were making their appeal to Mayor Alec Gorshel. They loaded the children aboard patrol cars and took them to police headquarters where they were questioned for 30 minutes before being released.

The children, none older than 17, lined up on the steps of the city hall holding up placards stating "We want our parents" and "Why are you keeping my mother and father."

A small deputation of white and Indian children was admitted to the city hall to give Gorshel a letter pleading with him to use all the powers at his disposal to secure the release of their parents.

"We cannot manage without them," the letter said.

Gorshel said the younger children were apparently suffering hardship but told them "these matters are not in my hands." He suggested a personal approach to Justice Minister Francois Erasmus.

Gorshel still was talking to the children when police arrived.

The youngsters entered the patrol cars quietly but a crowd in the street outside the city hall jeered at the policemen and were ordered to disperse.

As one white girl entered a patrol car she gave the thumbs-up Africa salute originated by the banned African National congress, the country's largest political organization.

To Aid South Africa

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The New York Times
Mon. 6-27-60

Cables from author Alan Paton, Liberal party leader Patrick Duncan, the Anglican Archbishop of Capetown and the Bishop of Johannesburg appealing for American help in the South African crisis have been received by the American Committee on Africa. At least $100,000 is urgently needed at the earliest possible date for legal aid and family welfare for the two thousand Africans of all races affected by the arrests, police shootings and clubbings of the past months.

Many people throughout the world —and South Africans themselves, although often anonymously—have responded generously to these needs. Americans have contributed hundreds of millions of dollars for other emergencies at home and abroad, but few are yet aware that they can be of direct help to those suffering in South Africa.

The Africa Defense and Aid Fund of the American Committee on Africa is helping to pay some of the overwhelming costs of medical care, food, clothing and legal aid. Over $10,000 has been sent in the last months by the fund, but much more is needed. This special appeal is part of a broader South Africa emergency campaign, which the undersigned support, to help mobilize American public opinion regarding the grave situation which exists in South Africa.

At this late hour in African history one fanatically racist Government holds out at the tip of the continent and threatens to upset the balance and progress of all the other newly emerging—and avowedly nonracial—Governments. If, as Alan Paton writes, the Afrikaner Nationalist "will change only when the pressure inside and outside the country becomes unendurable," it is up to all of us who believe in democracy and justice to help exert that pressure.

Macmillan, in South Africa, Censures Apartheid Policy

The New York Times
New York Times 2-4-60
p. 1, 18

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, Feb. 3 — Prime Minister Macmillan said today that South Africa could not expect support for its racial policies from Britain. Without referring to apartheid, the South African Government's policy of racial separation, Mr. Macmillan condemned it as contrary to Britain's belief "in a society in which individual merit and individual merit alone is the criterion for a man's advancement, whether political or economic."

Text of the Macmillan speech will be found on Page 6.

He emphasized the growth of national consciousness as a political fact in Africa and asserted that the West must "come to terms with it." He warned also that the way of life followed by the Western countries would influence the uncommitted peoples of Africa and Asia in deciding whether to cast their lot with the Western or Communist powers.

If the West failed to reach an understanding with African nationalism, Mr. Macmillan said, "we may imperil the precarious balance of East and West on which the peace of the world depends."

Spech Head in Silence

The British Prime Minister's hard-hitting speech was heard in almost complete silence by members of the South African House of Assembly and Senate. He addressed them in the House dining room after having morning tea with them.

There were murmurs of "Hear, hear!" when Mr. Macmillan said he was opposed to a threatened boycott of South African goods by persons who dislike the treatment accorded by the country's white minority to its African majority. At the end of the speech there were thirty seconds of polite applause.

Mr. Macmillan's address was the climax of his African tour, which has taken him also in little more than a month to Ghana, Nigeria and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. His visit to South Africa will end Friday, when he is scheduled to board a ship here bound for Britain.

In forty minutes, using few gestures and speaking with great deliberation, Mr. Macmillan told the South Africans diplomatically but firmly that they were out of step with the world.

"The most striking of all the impressions I have formed since I left London a month ago is of the strength of African national consciousness," he said. "The wind of change is blowing through this continent."

Noting that the world was divided into three main groups, the Western powers, including South Africa, the Communists and the uncommitted peoples, Prime Minister Macmillan said:

"As I see it, the great issue in this second half of the twentieth century is whether the uncommitted peoples of Asia and Africa will swing to the East or the West."

Turning to the often-repeated South African assertion that South Africa's internal policies are its own business, Mr. Macmillan said: "In these days I would myself expand the old saying so that it runs 'Mind your own business, of course, but mind how it affects my business too.'"

He asserted that in granting independence to India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya and Ghana, and soon to Nigeria, Britain had tried to establish the future of the British Commonwealth and the non-Communist world on sound foundations. Britain also is aware, he said, that what she does in West Central and East Africa will "become known to everyone in South Africa, whatever his language, color or traditions."

Britain's aim in the countries for which she has responsibility, Mr. Macmillan continued, is "not only to raise the material standards of life but to create a society which respects the rights of individuals —a society in which men are given the opportunity to grow to their full stature, and that must, in our view, include the opportunity to have an increasing share in political power and responsibility."

Mr. Macmillan recalled that Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd had made clear at the United Nations last September that Britain's policy was nonracial.

"As a fellow member of the Commonwealth, we always try to give South Africa our support and encouragement, but I hope you won't mind my saying frankly that there are some aspects of your policies which make it impossible for us to do this without being false to our own deep convictions about the political destinies of free men to which in our own territories we are trying to give effect," he said.

Mr. Macmillan stressed that he spoke "as a friend." He urged the South Africans to remember that it was impossible to "live in isolation."

In acknowledging Mr. Macmillan's speech, Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd of South Africa appealed for justice for the white man in Africa. He said his country recognized the importance of Africa as a balance between East and West, but that there "may be great dangers" in the British policy on the continent. He urged greater understanding of South Africa's policies.

South Africa Boycott Spurs Street Fights

The Montgomery Advertiser
Montgomery, Ala.

LONDON (AP) — Street fighting broke out in London Sunday night after a Trafalgar Square rally against racial segregation in the Union of South Africa.

Labor party leader Hugh Gaitskell kicked off a nationwide boycott of South African products before a cheering, banner-waving crowd of more than 7,000 leftwing demonstrators. Prime Minister Harold Macmillan has emphasized the government does not support the boycott.

Part of the crowd charged toward South Africa House, near Trafalgar Square, at the rally's end. With shouts of "Fascist swine" they attacked counter-demonstrators in trucks covered with pro-South African posters.

Police swarmed down on the mob, scuffling with demonstrators of both sides. They arrested nine persons who were charged with using insulting words and behavior. Police reinforcements managed to disperse the mob by nightfall.

Many West Indians and Africans, young couples, priests and party unshaven Bohemians in duffle coats and thick sweaters, were at the rally.

"I pledge the full support of the British labor movement to this cause," shouted Gaitskell over the crowd's cheers. "The boycott is our passionate protest against a repulsive doctrine."

Whites to Remain Guardian of Negro—Premier

Pittsburgh Press

BLOEMFONTEIN, South Africa (AP) — Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd Tuesday told a celebration commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Union of South Africa that "a great white nation must be developed here." The architect of apartheid predicted the white man will remain "the guardian of the black man" in South Africa.

Throngs in this judicial capital of South Africa cheered the Prime Minister's first public speech since he was wounded by a white would-be assassin April 9.

Elsewhere in South Africa, demonstrations took place against the nationalist government's racial segregation policies.

'BLACK DICTATORS'

In Cape Town thousands of persons of all races marched through the streets. In Durban, a statue of Gen. Louis Botha, South Africa's first prime minister, was plastered with posters saying "Fifty years of oppression."

Verwoerd warned his frequently applauding audience, against a "black dictatorship" and declared that a prosperous future can be attained only if two conditions are met:

"The first is that white South Africa must continue to rule. The second is that we as whites must be prepared to work and work hard."

Verwoerd pleaded for a "union of hearts" between citizens of English and Dutch blood to insure their survival. He also promised that his proposal to make South Africa a republic would bring prosperity and no estrangement from Britain or the British Commonwealth.

'PEACE' DOVE DUD

The Prime Minister held up a dove which he said he was sending "out into space as a symbol of the peace and prosperity which we wish all peoples on earth." But the bird refused to fly and plummeted to earth as Verwverd declared "I release our dove of peace." Despite coaxing, the dove refused to move. It was finally carried out of sight.

The release of the dove was Verwoerd's symbolic answer to international criticism of his regime's racial laws, blamed abroad for the recent racial violence.

"There are many who want to kill us with their hatred," he declared, but "the only solution to our racial problem is to live as good neighbors."

NATION, NOT REGIME

President Eisenhower and Queen Elizabeth sent congratulatory telegrams to Gov. Gen. Charles Swart. There was no official comment on the fact that neither telegram congratulated Verwoerd's government.

The government announced that as a gesture of good will it has released 154 persons held as political subversives under South Africa's emergency regulations. They were among 1,900 people of all races detained as political suspects since the state of emergency was proclaimed March 30 to stamp out racial violence.

The Johannesburg Rand Daily Mail said David Pratt, English-speaking farmer who shot Verwoerd, would not stand trial until the state of emergency ends. Pratt has been transferred from the Johannesburg jail to a prison in Pretoria, the paper said.

Something Good From South Africa

The Pittsburgh Courier
Pittsburgh, Pa. 18a

The dominant South African Boers deservedly have a bad name because of their rabid racism, but nevertheless American Negroes can learn something good from them.

While the Boers regard themselves as superior to non-whites, and also better than the whites of English extraction, until well after the end of World War II, practically every economic enterprise in the country was controlled by the Anglo-Saxons, and the Boers were little better off than the despised blacks.

Since then the Boers have organized themselves economically to push Boer-owned businesses and industries, and today they control a surprisingly large share of the economy dealing with consumption and distribution, although billion-dollar basic economy remains in the hands of the English.

Eighteen million American colored people can learn a lot that is good from the two million Boers who had less to work with than they.

Says Time Running Out For Peace In S. Africa

Chicago Defender

NEW YORK — Time has almost run out for a peaceful solution of South Africa's racial struggle, a Johannesburg rabbi expelled for his opposition to the government's apartheid policy declared here recently.

In an address before the national biennial convention of the American Jewish Congress, Rabbi Andre Ungar of Newark said, "the rising demand, the discipline, organization and leadership of South Africa's 11,000,000 non-white inhabitants guarantees the prospect that within the next decade or two South Africa will be a free democratic country, in which all citizens enjoy full rights."

The only issue still in doubt, Rabbi Ungar declared, is "whether the transformation from the present murderous tyranny to a free society will come about peacefully or through revolution. This depends above all on the country's 3,000,000 white masters. They could forestall disaster by modifying their repressive policies. But time has almost run out.

Sat. 6-11-60

TIME IS NOW

"The opportunity is still there today. Tomorrow — even tonight — might be too late," he said.

P. 3

In a major address before the American Jewish Congress convention, Rabbi Ungar said that the non-white population is "rapidly developing into an irresistible force.

"Needless to say, they are not howling savages. They never were that," Rabbi Ungar declared. "If three centuries ago Bantu civilization was different from the white man's, today that is not the case. The African is thoroughly westernized now. If anything, he is more loyal to the teachings of western democracy and the Judeo-Christian civilization than the white man."

Rabbi Ungar described the history of South Africa in terms of two trends: "the de-tribalization of the Negro people and the retribalization of the whites.

"By now, both processes are almost complete, and the original roles have been neatly reversed," he declared.

S. Africa Clamps On Pass Law

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (UPI)—The South African government revived Wednesday night the controversial pass book law which plunged the nation into racial strife.

Thurs. 4-7-60

The government took the drastic action despite growing anger by South African businessmen who called Wednesday night for a showdown with Premier Hendrik F. Verwoerd on the government's racial policies.

17-DAY WAVE

P. 2

The current wave of racial violence began 17 days ago when police fired on Africans demonstrating against the pass book law. Seventy-two Negroes were killed and nearly 200 others wounded in the March 21 shooting.

The government suspended the pass book law on March 26. Some Africans publicly burned their pass books after the suspension was announced.

Justice Minister F. C. Erasmus Wednesday said that starting this week arrangements would be made to supply those Negroes who had destroyed their pass books with temporary substitute documents of identification.

UNEASY HOLIDAY

The surprise government announcement came at the end of an uneasy national holiday which interrupted the days of racial violence.

But extremist Negro leaders warned that anti - white feeling was reaching dangerous levels.

Two groups of South African businessmen, angered by enormous stock market losses, Wednesday demanded a showdown interview with the premier in search of a radical change in government handling of the racial crisis.

General feeling among businessmen controlling the nation's economy was reported to be: "We are sick of being told by the government what is good for us. It is time the government listened to us about the subject of our own needs."

The South African Side

Headlines continue to tell of thousands of African Negroes massing in public areas of Johannesburg and other cities in the Union of South Africa. The claim is that they are protesting so-called "pass books" which the government has required them to carry on their persons at all times.

But the pass book enforcement has been cancelled at least for a time and the demonstrations go on. African Negroes are clearly protesting white rule down the line.

Tragic shootings have followed some of the demonstrations. The most serious incident occurred at Johannesburg Monday, March 21. There some 20,000 Bantu tribesmen, shouting, in a state of high emotion, egged on by women who challenged their courage, surrounded a police station. They advanced on the station, the South African prime minister, Dr. Verwoerd, told parliament in a report and police fired into the mob in what is claimed to be self-defense. Some 65 or more were killed and more than 190 were injured.

Dr. Verwoerd says that the station would have been overrun had the police not fired. Previously there had been open attacks on police. Additionally, during the demonstrations automobiles were overturned and some public buildings had been set afire.

The South Africans have been handling the racial situation with severity, probably all but inviting trouble. But they have a case and it needs to be heard the world over.

First, of course, is the fact that they have their roots in South Africa, going back over 300 years. Secondly, the cities are where the money is, where the jobs are, and the Bantu tribes people all, apparently, want to become city dwellers. There simply isn't room for them, despite growing industry and growing numbers of houses for them to occupy.

In Johannesburg, for example, between 1927 and 1959 the Bantu population climbed from 137,000 to 555,000. The government has spent millions trying to construct housing for them—from 9,958 houses built by 1946 to 44,273 built by 1959. Present plans will see a total of 74,000 units built. But the many thousands of Bantu wanting to be city dwellers would require more than that.

The government points out that the pass system is essential to keep Bantu tribesmen from flooding the cities. That is why the Africans are required to leave the city, and to have pass books with information as to residence, job and so on. If all such restrictions were lifted, says the government, the overflow of workers would drive wage rates down and cause economic chaos.

The present drive to overpower the whites in the Union is being directed by the Pan-Africanist National Congress. This organization broke off from the African National Congress in April, 1959. It is said by the government to be led by unusually extreme activists and its aim is said to be the complete overthrow of white rule in South Africa.

Experience already has shown in some other African national countries, newly freed, that the people are far from equipped for full self-government. Even so, in such countries, liberation was from a clear colonial rule. In the Union of South Africa there is no question of colonial rule; the whites of that country have not been "colonizers" in the customary sense. They were settlers, as they point out, in exactly the same sense that the original white Americans were settlers.

The government stands on the historical record and on the principle that it cannot yield in the face of direct challenge to government authority. This is a principle on which any government must stand if it is to exist.

Some Homecoming!

Macmillan Faces 'Test' on Africa

The Miami Herald
Miami, Fla.

LONDON —(UPI)— Prime Minister Harold Macmillan returned home from his Camp David talks Thursday to find himself faced with the greatest crisis in the British commonwealth since the 1956 Suez war.

Fri. 4-1-60

The exploding situation in the commonwealth country of South Africa overshadowed his talks with President Eisenhower. The outcome of the Washington talks was taken here as a personal triumph for the British premier, since he had wanted the West to accept the major points of Russia's nuclear test ban offer.

But it was South Africa, and not Geneva, that occupied Macmillan's mind Thursday.

The upheaval in South Africa inevitably affects the entire commonwealth, including as it does such countries as the Afro-Asian nations of Ghana and India, who bitterly condemn South African racism.

The problem facing Macmillan is delicate. Although he personally condemns apartheid, he must tread carefully to avoid disrupting the commonwealth, or having South Africa withdraw. Not since the 1956 British invasion of Suez have the commonwealth members been so up in arms over the action of a fellow member.

The Prime Minister will speak in Parliament today, but his talk will mostly be concerned with his Washington negotiations. In an airport statement Thursday, he said "a real step forward" had been taken in his talks with President Eisenhower.

Police Kill 3 Marchers In Africa

Government Takes Steps To Prevent Spreading Uprisings

DURBAN, South Africa (AP) — Hundreds of Negroes brandishing homemade weapons marched on Durban's city jail Friday, setting off a clash that left three marchers dead and three wounded from police gunfire.

The white supremacy government meanwhile tock steps in many parts of the country to combat the spreading uprisings of Africans.

The Durban demonstration was launched to demand the release of leading opponents of the government's apartheid— segregation policies jailed earlier this week. The gunfire and charges with clubs sent the marchers streaming back to their settlement.

'ENSURE SAFETY'

While fresh blood was spilled here, the government in Johannesburg extended the state of emergency to 31 more magisterial districts. The emergency regulations, providing sweeping powers just short of martial law, previously had been in force in 11 of the nation's 300 magisterial areas.

A government proclamation said the "ordinary law of the land is inadequate" to "ensure the safety of the public and maintain order."

The new districts covered in the extension of the emergency regulations are in all four provinces of South Africa—Transvaal, Cape of Good Hope, Natal and Orange Free State.

Within less than two weeks racial violence has spread to all the nation's great urban areas:

Johannesburg, the mile-high skyscraper capital of the diamond, gold and financial interests in the Transvaal province and nearby Pretoria, the country's executive capital.

Cape Town, the legislative capital and port in Cape Province.

Durban, Indian Ocean port and Riviera-style playground in Natal province where people of British descent play a dominant role and where people of Indian origin struggle—but not openly at present—against special government restrictions designed for Asians.

Security Council Asks End To Race Policy

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., (AP) — The U.N. Security Council Friday called upon South Africa's nationalist government to scrap its strict racial policies in order to live in peace with its millions of Negroes.

By a vote of 9-0 with 2 abstentions the 11-nation council adopted a resolution blaming mass shootings of Negores and other racial unrest on South Africa's white supremacy laws.

Britain and France abstained. There had been reports both might kill the resolution with a veto.

This would have aroused bitter reaction on the part of many U.N. members, particularly among the Asian-African nations who regarded the resolution as extremely mild.

The British and French delegates explained after the vote that they had reservations on the egal competence of the council to deal with what South Africa regarded as a domestic issue.

The United States and the Soviet Union both endorsed the resolution, presented by Ecuador and worked out in conference with Asian-African nations.

South Africa's delegate Bernardus G. Fourie made known before the vote his government considered the entire three-day council debate illegal. It appeared his government would therefore ignore the resolution.

The resolution deplored the recent violence in South Africa and the actions by its government which it said "have given rise to the present situation."

It asked Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold to consult with the South African government to see what could be done to carry out provisions of the U.N. charter dealing with racial discrimination. He was asked to report back to the council "whenever necessary and appropriate."

Diplomatic sources said Hammarskjold had requested Fourie to meet with him at 11:30 a.m. Saturday.

Ambassador Alex Quaison Sackey of Ghana, one of the leaders in bringing the charges against South Africa, expressed satisfaction but added he would have liked a stronger resolution.

South Africa Cops Halt Negro March

JOHANNESBURG, April 2 (AP)— Demonstrations against South Africa's white supremacy rule rolled up today at Cape Town and Paarl but police and military forces kept them from erupting into new violence.

Paying no heed to the U.N. Security Council plea to abandon its segregation policy, the government tightened military control under a state of emergency decree in major cities and ports.

Several thousand Negroes streamed out of their settlement of Nyanga and marched on Cape Town, South Africa's legislative capital, but were stopped by police who ordered them to disperse.

Thousands of police, soldiers and sailors tightened cordons around Nyanga and Cape Town's other major Negro settlement, Langa. About 20,000 Negroes live in each.

In halting a car trying to get through the cordon white sailors shot and killed a Negro infant outside Nyanga, press reports said. The Negro boy was being taken to a hospital by his mother.

In Paarl, a wine center 40 miles northeast of Cape Town, several hundred Negro men and women gathered in front of the court building. They built bonfires and burned the pass books all nonwhites were required to carry for identification.

Opposition to the pass books is the major cause of the unrest sweeping South Africa. But most of the recent demonstrations have been attempts to free Negro leaders rounded up by police.

Police arrested several Negro leaders of the Paarl demonstration and the crowd dispersed without further incident. But Paarl remained tense and civilian defense units were on fulltime duty. Close watch was kept on nearby Negro settlements, where attempts were made during the night to set fire to white-owned buildings.

Durban on the east coast, where press reports listed four Negroes killed and 18 wounded in demonstrations Friday, remained quiet under a great show of police force.

The big Cato Manor Negro settlement of Durban, from where the demonstrators came, was ringed by strong forces of armed police supported by armored cars. Searchlights swept the settlement by night. An air force spotter plane circled overhead by day.

All roads out of Cato Manor were heavily guarded. All cars and buses were stopped and passengers searched for weapons.

In Johannesburg, troop units stood by on the outskirts to reinforce police. Civilian defense units were under alert. The only incident reported overnight was the stoning of two reporters of a Negro newspaper by young Negroes.

PRETORIA, South Africa—(ANP)—Chief Albert Luthuli, 51, president-general of the African National Congress, is in the Pretoria central prison hospital suffering from "heart trouble."

When he was arrested last March for "pass violations", Chief Luthuli was severely beaten about the face.

Africans Fight Back Against Guns Of Cops

By HENRI SCHOUP

SHARPEVILE, South Africa — (UPI) — African Nationalists want to fight back against the police who killed at least 80 of their number Monday but have no weapons.

They debated holding another mass protest meeting against the law that forces them to carry identity passes, which are not required of whites. Monday's meeting turned into a stone-throwing riot which police suppressed with machine guns.

The shooting left nearly 300 Africans dead or wounded and prompted the United States to take the unusual step of deploring the violence. The incident, and another shooting in Langa, near Capetown, caused similar protests from London to Moscow and turned world attention to Prime Minister H. F. Verwoerd's "apartheid" — a policy of strict racial segregation.

Tension Still High

Africans here were reluctant to speak to reporters on the street because of the tension still present two days after the killings.

It was believed they would abandon their plans for a new meeting because of the danger of police action.

But although they asked for arms to fight back, Africans were beginning to make use of another weapon potentially more powerful.

Between 30,000 and 40,000 African workers stayed home from plants in the Vanderbijl Park and Vereeniging areas near here Tuesday. Production was slowed or halted. Europeans had to shovel coal to keep the Icor foundry blast furnaces going.

In Capetown, African organizers passed out leaflets urging a strike to protest the killing of 12 demonstrators at Langa. It was estimated that 68 per cent of Capetown's African work force was off the job.

The Pan Africanist Congress (PAC), which led the protest against the passes here, planned to send groups of five and ten Africans to police stations without passes to invite arrest. A mass march on the station brought on Monday's riots. PAC leaders said the smaller groups would avoid trouble but would be as effective a protest.

In Capetown, Verwoerd Tuesday night refused to appoint a judicial commission to investigate the mass killings. He told parliament such a commission would serve as a platform for agitators. The opposition United party, which takes a more liberal line on segregation, had demanded the commission.

Verwoerd blamed the rioting on "things that had nothing specific to do with South Africa" and pointed out recent cases of African unrest in the Belgian Congo, the Cameroons, Nyasaland, and other countries.

He said the more moderate African national congress had created the background of the trouble, even though it disassociated itself from the PAC.

"Both the ANC and the PAC have a definite aim," he said. "They are not concerned with the ostensible purpose of their demonstrations, but want to bring about in South Africa the changes that are taking place elsewhere on the continent."

In Johannesburg, Anglican Bishop Ambrose Reeves condemned police tactics in the Sharpeville shooting.

"Most of those in the hospital were wounded in the lower part of the body or legs," he said. "This is evidence of the deliberate intention of those responsible to maim or kill."

AMSAC Publish Negro Writers Papers

NEW YORK. — Selected papers from the first conference of Negro writers held recently have been made available in booklet form by the American Society of African Culture, with offices located at 15 East 40th Street.

The 70-page booklet contains writings by eleven outstanding Negro writers and photographs of some of them. Its title is "The American Negro Writer and His Roots."

The Society decided to reproduce those papers read at the conference which together covered most of what had been said. They point out the Negro writer's difficulty in writing for a non-Negro market, which is, in the words of the preface, "often the object of his protest."

The problem is complex, the preface states, for the writers are "concerned basically with the problems involved in being true to their rootes, accomplished and universal in their art, socially useful, and appreciated by a significant public."

Authors whose papers appear in the booklet are Saunders Redding, Samuel W. Allen, John Henrick Clarke, Julian Mayfield, Arthur P. Davis, Langston Hughes, William Branch, Arna Bontemps, Lofton Mitchell, Sarah E. Wright and John O. Killens. A number of them have had plays produced on Broadway.

The American Society of African Culture (AMSAC) was organized to help broaden knowledge of African culture and to define more clearly the cultural contributions of Africans and people of African descent to Western civilization.

The officers of AMSAC are Horace [illegible]nd, president; Mercer Cook, chairman of executive council; William T. Fontaine, secretary; James W. Ivy, treasurer; and John A. Davis, executive secretary.

It was incorporated in Delaware and the regular membership is open to Americans of African descent. Americans not of African descent and Africans resident in the United States may become associate members.

The work of the non-profit organization has grown rapidly since its formation three years ago. It publishes a newsletter, has published four books, distributes "Presence Africaine," a periodical published in France, and is building a library at its headquarters to provide research facilities in the fields of African history, literature, and art.

The Society has also conducted conferences, seminars, tours and exchanges designed to increase communication and understanding between Africans of culture and their American counterparts.

VERWOERD INSISTS ON RULE BY WHITES

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 31—The Union of South Africa celebrated its fiftieth anniversary Tuesday.

Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, in his first public speech since he was wounded by an assassin April 9, appealed to the English and Afrikaans-speaking people of the nation to work to establish a republic that would be acceptable to all. He spoke in Bloemfontein, judicial capital of South Africa, where the principal anniversary celebrations were held.

For the good of both whites and Africans, Dr. Verwoerd insisted, the Government must remain in the hands of the whites.

A Union Day amnesty ended the imprisonment of four white persons, six of mixed race, twenty-one Asians and 123 Africans who were arrested under the emergency regulations imposed to halt racial violence.

BLOEMFONTEIN, South Africa, May 31 (AP)—During his speech, Prime Minister Verwoerd held up a dove that he said he was senting "out into space as a symbol of the peace and prosperity which we wish all peoples on earth."

The bird refused to fly, and plummeted to earth as Dr. Verwoerd declared: "I release our dove of peace." Despite coaxing, the bird refused to move. It was finally carried away.

1,000 Kenya Settlers Turn to S. Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—The chairman of the privately operated South African immigration organization, John Foggitt, reports he has had 1,000 inquiries within 10 days from white settlers in Kenya asking about prospects for myoing to this country. He says they fear the future if Kenya attains independence from British colonial rule.

Time Almost Out For Peaceful End In South Africa

NEW YORK—Time has almost run out for a peaceful solution of South Africa's racial struggle, a Johannesburg rabbi expelled for his opposition to the government's apartheid policy, declared here.

In an address before the national biennial convention of the American Jewish Congress, Rabbi Andre Ungar of Newark, said that "The rising demand, the discipline, the organization and the leadership of South Africa's 11,000,000 non-white inhibitants guarantees the prospect that within the next decade or two, South Africa will be a free democratic country, in which all citizens enjoy full rights."

SOUTH AFRICA TRIES TO SEE RACE IS PURE

Probes Family Trees for 'Taints'

(N. Y. Times-Chicago Tribune Service)

DURBAN, South Africa, May 9 — A drive to purge white neighborhoods of persons whose blood is "sullied" is under way here.

Family trees are being inspected by an agency that decides where people of different color may live. The crude manner of interrogation by the more fanatic agents of this board has outraged even some Afrikanders, who always have accepted apartheid as a normal condition of life.

Sensitive About Color

An acute sensitivity about color has prevailed among Afrikaners almost from the start of Dutch settlement on the Cape. Jan van Riebeeck, the founding father, allowed one of his men to marry a Hottentot and ever since it has required almost superhuman courage for old families to scrutinize their ancestors.

The mixing of races has produced 1½ million half castes called Cade Colored.

Nowhere in South Africa is the uprooting of communities more drastic than in Durban. Eighty thousand nonwhites, mostly Negroes and Indians, are being transplanted from Cato Manor and other slums to remoter districts.

Nonwhites Are Barred

This is no great hardship for the Africans, who are quitting one of world's most forbidding slums for housing that is appreciably better. But the Indians, who have accumulated considerable land, will lose heavily in forced sales. Durban's Roman Catholic archibishop, the most Rev. Denis Hurley, has called the government action "an enormous act of piracy."

In lower middle class areas such as Greenwood Park, families of mixed racial origin have lived peaceably alongside whites for many years. Now Greenwood Park has been zoned for "pure whites" only.

Suspecting some light skinned Cape Coloreds may attempt to pass as whites, government agents have been working overtime. In their zeal, they have acted on tips of spiteful neighbors and interrogated Afrikaners whose backgrounds seemed beyond question.

Thus, when Johannes Jacobus Botha, a Durban mailman, returned to his home one evening, he found his wife, Linda, waiting in the garden in tears.

Two investigators had called. They demanded identity cards, birth certificates, her marriage license, and had asked whether her husband was white.

"Then they started questioning our 4 year old son, Jannie, asking him how old he was and where he went to school, she said. They wanted to know who visited us on two previous Sundays."

This particular line of questioning mystified the Bothas until Johannes, who buys old automobiles for scrap, realized that a Colored Apparently some busybody man who wanted to sell a car had called on both Sundays. had witnessed these visits and concluded that the Bothas had Cape Colored kin.

"I thought apartheid was right," Botha said. "But this hit us like a blooming bomb. It struck me: This can happen to anyone!"

Press Says South Africa Hiding Slaughter of Natives

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, June 12 (AP) — Press reports today claimed South Africa's white supremacy government is hiding the true dimensions of a "bloody story" that developed when police clashed with 20 Negro demonstrators in Pondoland last Monday.

At least three newspapers said police bullets killed 29 Negroes and injured 50 in the troubled African reserve bordering Cape Province and Natal. The Ministry of Justice insists only six were killed. It claimed police fired in self-defense and blamed the unrest on the outlawed African National Congress.

Reporters for the papers said they had trouble getting into the area and that "whites living there say openly they have been told by the authorities to keep their mouths shut."

The reporters said the demonstration was the biggest of a series staged to protest the government's plan to rule the Negroes through appointment of chiefs and headmen. Some of the opposition took the form of attacks on huts and kraals (native enclosures).

The Johannesburg Sunday Times reported a heavy force of armed police, backed by armored cars and aircraft, have been assigned to the area to maintain order.

Two accounts of Monday's clash, attributed to eyewitnesses, were published today in the Durban Tribune and the Johannesburg Golden City Post, an African weekly. Both differed sharply from the official version given by Justice Minister Francois Erasmus.

The Tribune said more than 400 Negroes had assembled when a "Harvard aircraft dive-bombed them with tear gas bombs.

"The natives are said to have fired back at the plane (more than 6,000 licensed firearms are owned by natives in the territory).

"Helicopters then reportedly landed men armed with Sten guns, who stepped out and fired at the natives.

Police Club and Shoot Freedom-Bent Africans

By HENRI SCHOUP

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — (UPI) — Heavily armed police, swinging clubs and firing shots, charged into groups of defiant natives in the township of Nyanga before dawn Tuesday with troops and armored cars covering them.

Reports telephoned from inside the township said "quite a number of persons" were injured but police said they had no reports of casualties.

Africans making their way out of Nyanga told United Press International that police, supported by troops of armored cars, moved into the township about 6 a.m.

The Africans said the government forces smashed doors and windows and dragged blacks from their houses into the streets.

"Police used batons, home-made sjamboks (whips made of rubber strips) and fists on African men," one African said.

UPI Correspondent Ray Moloney, watching from outside, said some Africans ran out toward bus stops looking back over their shoulders at police following them.

The police action began the second day of a new "get tough" policy designed to halt a "stay-home" demonstration by blacks protesting the government's white supremacy laws.

Monday night police went into Nyanga, near Cape Town, with loudspeakers announcing that any natives who wanted to return to work would get full protection.

Helicopters hovered over the town Tuesday morning repeating the message and dropping 6,000 leaflets.

Acting deputy Police Commissioner Col. J. E. Reay said that "because of the fear of victimization (by fellow blacks) not many natives took advantage of this offer."

Large gatherings formed before dawn Tuesday inside the location and police were forced to make three or four baton charges and fire some warning shots in order to break them up," Reay said.

"To the best of my knowledge there were no casualties."

The new violence coincided with a report that the Anglican bishop of Johannesburg, Ambrose Reeves, had fled to Swaziland to avoid possible arrest for denouncing shootings of South African blacks.

In preparation for Tuesday morning's action, government forces sealed off a main road along Nyanga, apparently in expectation of major trouble.

By HENRI SCHOUP

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa. — (UPI) — The South African government announced yesterday it had assumed powers to make arbitrary arrests, suppress newspapers and break up public meetings with firearms to contend with a wave of racial violence.

The extraordinary measures, replacing civil law in close to one quarter of the country's 300 judicial districts, were taken under the state of emergency proclaimed Wednesday by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd and published Thursday in the government Gazette.

Troop reinforcements from the northern Transvaal moved toward Johannesburg and other major population centers in a night-long operation aimed at translating the paper powers into action if necessary.

Follows Mass Arrests

The move was the latest in the government's campaign to smash spreading demonstrations, work boycotts and political agitation against its policies of racial segregation.

It followed the mass arrests Wednesday of more than 150 opposition political leaders, including white members of the Liberal party which is represented in Parliament.

About 30,000 blacks staged a spectacular march on the Parliament building in Cape Town Wednesday to protest the arrests but left without satisfaction as armored cars blocked access to the building. At Stellenbosch, 20 miles from Cape Town, a much smaller crowd of Africans was dispersed by baton-swinging police when it attempted to protest the law requiring all non-whites to carry special passbooks.

The emergency powers assumed by the government allowed it to intervene against work boycotts such as the native "stay-at-home" which began Monday and still was taking an estimated 50,000 to 60,000 natives from their jobs with serious repercussions on the South African stock exchange.

Hits Work Boycott

The specific language of the new law made it illegal to incite people, through inducements or threats, to stay home from work "with intent to thwart the government."

The government also was empowered:

- To arrest people arbitrarily and detain them for up to 30 days without the usual legal protection.
- To disperse any public gathering, even one lawfully convened, if it seems likely to endanger public safety. To use firearms or other weapons in this task if the police officer in charge deems necessary.
- To close down all newspapers, magazines and other publications which contain statements considered "subversive." To confiscate such material.
- To close any private organization judged to be subversive by the Justice ministry.
- To question under oath any persons associated with suspected groups.

"Subversive" Talk Outlawed

The declaration also made it a crime to speak or otherwise circulate any statement deemed subversive. Violators were threatened with five-year jail sentences and fines up to $1,400.

The Gazette announcement said the governor general, Charles R. Swart, had ruled these measures necessary because of circumstances arising in some areas of South Africa which seriously threaten public safety.

Eighty-six magisterial districts were affected, including most of the heavy population areas.

These same districts were the scene of increased military activity. The government said regular troops would be ready to act within two hours of any outbreak of violence.

Negro Labor Group Pickets South African Consulate

NEW YORK CITY — Officers and members of the New York Council of the Negro American Labor Council, led by A. Philip Randolph and Cleveland Robinson, picketed the South African Consulate here in protest against the moves of the South African Government to suppress the mass work stoppage in Johannesburg.

"These outrageous actions," said Mr. Randolph, who presented a protest statement to the consulate, "coming after the inhuman massacre of unarmed Africans at Vereeniging, March 21, and following the banning of all public gatherings of Africans, once again demonstrates the determination of the South African Government to continue and to intensify its brutal oppression of the African people."

The statement concluded with the warning that: "They who sow the wind, shall reap the whirlwind. This is the time of Africa's emancipation, and no dictatorial laws, decrees or massacres ordered by the government of South Africa can stop the rising tide of freedom."

The Negro American Labor Council which includes Negro trade unionists from more than a score of unions in this area, will join with similar units of other cities to establish the Council at a founding convention, May 27-29, in Detroit.

Apartheid Head Believes Segregation Lot Of Negro

The Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery, Ala.

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd of South Africa is a trained sociologist who believes in improving the lot of the Negro—but keeping him segregated.

Jan. 4-10-60

A six footer with blue eyes and gray hair, Verwoerd is an active man who smiles easily.

P. 2-A

Despite the ready smile however, he has built a record in government service as one of the strongest advocates of apartheid—or separation of the races—in all South Africa.

In the 18 months that he has served as prime minister, Verwoerd has driven ahead with his policy of apartheid despite the resistance of South Africa's Negroes and condemnation from the outside world.

When the U. N. Security Council recently urged South Africa to abandon apartheid, Verwoerd brushed the U. N. resolution aside as interference in South Africa's internal affairs in violation of the charter of the United Nations.

And he had just reiterated that there would be no retreat from his policy in a speech at a Johannesburg agricultural exposition when an assassin wounded him Saturday.

Verwoerd was born Sept. 8, 1901, in the Netherlands, the son of a missionary of the Dutch Reformed Church. He arrived in South Africa at the age of 2. He has remained in South Africa since except for study in German universities at Hamburg, Leipzig and Berlin.

He returned in 1923 from his studies to become a lecturer in logic and psychology at the University of Stellenbosch in the city of the same name. He was professor of applied psychology and sociology there from 1927 to 1936.

In 1937 he helped to found the newspaper Die Transvaler and

HENDRIK VERWOERD

Verwoerd became well known in South Africa for his political and social theories and as a theorist of the dominant Nationalist party. He became a leader in the South African Senate in 1948 and two years later was handed the post of minister of native affairs.

It was in this post that Verwoerd set out to improve the lot of the Negro, the chief reliance for common labor in South Africa.

The Negroes had flocked to the cities in search of jobs and congregated in miserable slums near the white residential areas. Verwoerd moved them out to better and more spacious living quarters outside the cities. But at the same time he began introducing various suppression race laws.

With the death of Prime Minister Johannes Strijdom in September of 1958, Verwoerd took over as chief of the government and at once adopted rigid measures to strengthen segregation.

A member of the Dutch Reformed Church, he likes to cite the Old Testament as justification for his racial policies.

He argued that South Africa's 10 million nonwhites and 3 million whites must live apart, as do the elephant and the lion. Married in 1926, he once boasted that none of his seven children was cared for by a Negro nurse.

Sierra Leone Talks Open in London

The New York Times

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 20—A conference to chart eventual independence for Sierra Leone opened here today.

Iain Macleod, Secretary of State for the Colonies and the conference host, cautioned against letting the "swiftly changing African scene" blind the conference to "the very real and special problems of Sierra Leone."

New York

Sir Milton Margai, Sierra Leone's Prime Minister, said the country would "need help in various ways" to assure development of its natural resources.

Jan. 4-24-60

Mr. Macleod made it clear that eventual independence and self-government were not in doubt. He said he recognized the "strength of your aspirations on the attainment of independence at an early date.

P. 5

Mr. Macleod said that there were "a number of important carefully examined," but that issues which would have to be the main task of the conference was to "see whether we can agree on the date [for independence] and the measures that must be taken beforehand."

The New York Times April 21, 1960

The Colonial Secretary noted that Sierra Leone would "have to husband its resources and manpower as carefully as possible if it is to play a worthy role as a fully independent state."

VERWOERD MEETS WITH CABINET AIDE

The New York Times

Spokesman Who Called for Apartheid Changes Talks With Chief in Hospital

New York

Jan. 4-24-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 23—Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd met with a member of his Cabinet today for the first time since the attempt on his life two weeks ago.

P. 1

For an hour the Prime Minister talked in his room at the Pretoria General Hospital with Paul O. Sauer, Minister of Lands and leader of the House of Assembly, the lower chamber of Parliament.

Mr. Sauer flew here from Capetown, where Parliament is in session. He said at the Jan Smuts Airport, about fifteen miles from Pretoria, that he was making a "courtesy" visit and that there was no political significance to it.

Asked after the meeting if Dr. Verwoerd had discussed any political matters, Mr. Sauer replied, "Not at all." He said the Prime Minister was "in good spirits, calm and talked nicely."

Nevertheless Mr. Sauer's visit to Dr. Verwoerd led to considerable speculation. In the absence of an acting Prime Minister while Dr. Verwoerd is recovering from his wounds, Mr. Sauer has been serving as chairman of the Cabinet and sharing the role of spokesman for the Government with Eric H. Louw, Minister for External Affairs.

What gave significance to today's hour-long discussion was a speech Mr. Sauer made Tuesday calling for modifications in the Government's racial segregation policy.

The Sauer speech and subsequent statements from other Cabinet members that basically the Government's apartheid policy of racial separation remained unchanged set off reports of a possible split in the Cabinet.

New York Times

New York

Mr. Sauer was seen as attracting the backing of Mr. Louw, Theophilus E. Donges, Minister of Finance; Dr. Nicholas Diedrichs, Minister of Economic Affairs, and Jozua François Naudé, Minister of the Interior.

Jan. 4-24-60

There is little doubt that Dr. Verwoerd has been informed of the Capetown developments and that he probably summoned Mr. Sauer to today's meeting. Thus far there has been no indication that the Prime Minister has changed his views on apartheid.

Dr. Verwoerd is viewed as an astute politician who would deal personally with any possible threat to his control. It was stressed by Mr. Louw, after the Saued speech, that "if any statement is to be made in regard to basic policy that statement will be made by the Prime Minister."

Dr. Verwoerd has been attending to an increasing amount of Government business in his hospital room. His Secretary, Fred Barnard, was reported today to have said that within a week the Prime Minister will be doing much more work.

Mr. Sauer said after his visit that it would be "some weeks" before Dr. Verwoerd would be able to resume his full duties as head of a Government. Mr. Barnard left with Mr. Sauer for Capetown.

Others To Visit Verwoerd

Mr. Sauer said other members of the cabinet would be traveling to Pretoria in the next few weeks to discuss various matters with Dr. Verwoerd. Mr. Louw is expected to see the Prime Minister in the next few days. He has been named to represent South Africa in place of Dr. Verwoerd at nevt month's conference of British Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London.

In his call Tuesday for reconsideration of the Government's policy on the Africans, Mr. Sauer said that "the old book" of South African history had been closed at Sharpeville last month.

More than 250 Africans were shot down there by the police during a demonstration against laws requiring Africans to carr yidentity passes to move about. The Sharpeville shootings led to the events that plunged the country into the present state of emergency.

Change in Policy Urged

Mr. Sauer said there should be "an important change in the practical application of Government policy." He called for modification of the pass laws and laws prohibiting Africans from drinking strong alcoholic liquor and for higher wages for the Africans.

Significant support for a more flexible approach to the solution of South Africa's racial problems was voiced at the annual conference of the South African Bureau of Racial Affairs which ended yesterday at Stellenbosch near Capetown.

The bureau is made up of Afrikaner intellectuals who also are influential members of governing National party. The bureau decided also to investigate points of friction between whites and nonwhites.

Republic Bill Pushed

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 23 (Reuters)—The Government prepared today to rush a bill through Parliament aimed at making South Africa a republic.

It calls for a referendum among the nation's 3,000,000 white citizens asking: Do you favor the creation of a South African republic or not?"

Government leaders said they would try to speed up the legislative process next week so that the bill would become law shortly. A motion, limiting debate on the bill, was approved Friday.

The creation of an independent republic has long been the dream of Afrikaners and a cardinal aim of the National party since it was formed nearly half a century ago.

According to informed Nationalist quarters, the Government plans on a referendum in October.

The United party, chief opposition party, opposes the bill mainly because it gives no guarantee that South Africa will remain in the British Commonwealth.

In his last public speech before an assassination attempt April 9, Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd said the question of becoming a republic was "a matter of sentiment" and the question of remaining in the Commonwealth "a matter of economics."

"Undoubtedly in the present circumstances it is in the best interests of South Africa to remain in the Commonwealth," he added.

Vote Called Distraction Move

Poltical commentators here refused to predict the result of a referendum. Although the Nationalists have a majority in Parliament, the United Arab party claims to have more than half the nation's vote.

Several opposition speakers argued that the Government was bringing up the referendum issue to distract attention from racial troubles.

Three hundred thirty-two Africans appeared in court today following a raid on the Langa African township near here Friday. They were charged with illegal presence in the area.

CAPE TOWN, April 23.—What does the black man (Bantu) want in South Africa, leaving out those who support organized political movements?

New York

The Cape Town newspaper Cape Argus sent a team to the native locations of Nyanga and Langa, scene of disturbances after the attempts to defy the pass laws, to see how the ordinary Bantu reacted after the shouting had died down.

Sept. 4-23-60

Ministers' View.

The paper quoted a Bantu Presbyterian minister, the Rev. Elliott Thethiwe, of Langa, as saying:

"For the vast majority of Africans the pass laws are the major grievance. Not so much the laws as the way they are administered.

"Some policemen are friendly and sympathetic in their dealings with Africans. But many are not. Summary arrest in the street and midnight raids on people's homes cause great resentment.

"One of the worst features of these middle-of-the-night raids is the way in which parents are humiliated by police in front of their children. Some police are courteous and knock on the door first. Others just kick the door and walk in."

Curbs Demanded.

Influx control, by which the authorities regulate the number of natives allowed into locations near the cities, had some good in it, the minister was quoted as saying.

He said it would not be good to allow more natives into a town than could find employment.

The clergyman expressed the view that if an end could be made to midnight raids and the pass-laws revised, a great deal would have been done to improve race relations.

A native widow was quoted as saying that her son, who is deaf and dumb, was arrested a week earlier and she did not know why. The police were very polite and did not ill-treat him.

Another native who makes a living selling vegetables got nearer to the crux of the problem:

"Why cannot I buy a small house for myself at Langa so that I can have something to leave to my son?" he asked.

Frozen on Job.

Said another: "If I have a job and am offered a better job elsewhere, I cannot take it. I would have to resign and put my name down at the labor exchange and take my turn for the next job that came along.

"Unless you have been discharged by your former employer it is very difficult to seek work and you are very likely to be 'indorsed out' (ordered out) of town."

Six young Catholic men from Langa were quoted as telling the story of a native who went from his home to a bus stop 20 yards away to see his friends off on a bus.

Police asked for his pass. He explained that it was only 20 yards away at his home. He asked permission to send a child to get it, but was arrested, spent the night in prison and had to pay a fine the next day.

The Tragedy at Sharpeville

The New York Times

The evil policy of apartheid—the separation of blacks from whites in South Africa—cannot help bearing evil fruits. There is a sense of tragedy hanging over that country. Yesterday saw the horror of dozens of Africans being mowed down and killed by rifles and machine guns as the result of a protest against one phase of apartheid—the requirement for nonwhites to possess and show a pass.

South Africans are wrong to think that nobody in the world understands the complexity and delicacy of their color problem. Along with the injustice of apartheid, there has gone a genuine effort to better the lot of the African, and this is realized. No one thinks that South Africans are wicked men in the sense that they would deliberately plan, or feel anything but distress over, an incident that brings such appalling results.

However, the fact remains that a policy which degrades the great majority of the people of a nation is certain to lead to tragedy. True enough, the South African authorities can suppress a mob such as the one that gathered in Sharpeville, thirty miles south of Johannesburg. The African men and women were armed—those who were armed—with stones. The police used tear gas and then rifles, machine guns, tanks and jet fighters. It was easy to kill nearly fifty men and women and to wound scores more.

But how often can this be done? Does it really settle anything? Do the South Africans think that the rest of the world will ignore such a massacre? Perhaps it takes a horror like the slaughter at Sharpeville to bring home to the white South Africans themselves the evil that the policy of apartheid represents.

Passbook Law Is Suspended For Negroes in South Africa

The Fla. Times-Union

Jacksonville, Fla.

PRETORIA, South Africa, March 26 (UPI)—South Africa's native Negro population won a victory today when the government suspended a 151-year-old law requiring them to carry passbooks at all times and in all places.

Native resentment at the law—which applied only to blacks—touched off widespread massive resistance and violence last Monday when police opened fire on a peaceful native demonstration and killed at least 80.

The government said it was taking the action to ease tension. The announcement followed world wide protests against the shooting and a demand in the United Nations that the Security Council meet Tuesday to consider the killings.

(In Washington today South Africa strongly protested to the United States against the calling of the Security Council meeting. The protest was delivered personally to Secretary of State Christian A. Herter by South African Ambassador W. C. duPlessis.)

Tension still was high and police were patrolling African townships to maintain order. Many Africans stayed away from work and deliveries of milk, bread and newspapers were disrupted. Ships were held up in Cape Town Harbor where only skeleton crews reported for work.

There still were fears of violence Monday when natives announced they would stay at home to mourn their dead in Langa and Sharpeville where most of the deaths occurred.

National police Chief Gen. J. Rademeyer announced suspension of the passbook law which can be repealed only by Parliament.

He said henceforth Africans will not be asked to show their passes and will "not be arrested for nonpossession of these documents."

The pass laws have been in force in South Africa since 1809 when they were first applied to nomadic hottentots in the Cape province. Those without passes were treated as vagrants. The system gradually was extended with expansion of white occupation, mainly to prevent the blacks from entering white areas. By 1867 the passbook law covered all of the Union of South Africa.

There has been no violence since Monday but the Union has remained tense. There have been these developments:

On the government side:

All public meetings in main cities and big towns were banned. Most sporting events, however, were held as scheduled today.

All army and police leaves were canceled this morning.

The government asked permission to introduce a bill in Parliament banning the extremist African National Congress (ANC) and all allied native organizations.

On the native side:

Further peaceful demonstrations against the pass laws were held during the week.

Native leaders promised to "continue their struggle for complete abolition" of the pass law. Duma Nokwe, general secretary of the African National Congress, said the pass law was "obnoxious and degrading" and must go.

S. Africa Bans All Meetings

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

Aimed at Blocking Racial Protests

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd's government has banned all public meetings in large towns throughout the nation in an effort to cripple a growing protest movement against racial laws.

Large police squads carried out swift raids at dawn Thursday against leading Negro, Indian and leftist organizations, seizing papers and arresting some leftist white persons as well as Negroes.

The ban on meetings and the raids is designed to break up organization of massive demonstrations for next Monday and Thursday, set down as days of mourning for about 86 persons killed in clashes with police earlier this week.

200 INJURED

About 200 other persons were wounded in the clashes when police opened fire on about 20,000 Africans. The Africans had approached the Sharpeville police station outside Johannesburg demanding that they be arrested for defying the law that requires all nonwhites to carry identification passes.

The pass system is used to control the movement of nonwhites outside the town of their residence or employment.

The African National Congress (ANC), which remained aloof from the earlier demonstrations called by the less powerful but more militant Pan-Africanist Congress (Pac), joined Thursday in the movement for a day of mourning next Monday.

URGES PROTEST

Albert Luthuli, president of ANC urged every Negro man, woman and child to stay home Monday to "protest against police killings and against the pass laws."

The stay-home movement has produced a creeping paralysis, particularly at the important coal and steel center of Vereeniging, 30 miles south of Johannesburg, one of the trouble spots last Monday.

South Africa Bars Meetings Till July

The New York Times

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, March 24—The Government banned all meetings today until June 30 in the heavily populated areas of South Africa.

In an atmosphere of continuing tension this and other actions, including police raids against critics of the Government, were taken during the day to discourage more anti-Government demonstrations by Africans and their sympathizers.

At the same time preparations were being made for a day of mourning next Monday during which South Africa's African labor force would be asked to stay at home out of respect for the victims of this week's clashes.

Chief Albert Luthuli, president of the African National Congress, South Africa's principal African political organization, issued the call for the observance.

He said that he believed a series of strikes by African workers would force the Nationalist party Government headed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd to negotiate with African political leaders. The South African economy depends heavily on the relatively cheap African labor.

Chief Luthuli, whose freedom is restricted by a government ban against him, testified in Pretoria at the trial of government opponents accused of treason.

"From sheer self-interest I think the white public would persuade the Government to enter into negotiations with us to see if our demands could be accommodated," said Chief Luthuli. He suggested also that a series of African strikes could influence the white electorate to change the Government.

Church Services Exempted

The ban on meetings was imposed under the Riotous Assembles Act. It applies to whites as well as to South Africa's Africans and Asians. Only church services and funerals are exempted. The permission to hold any other meeting must be obtained from a magistrate.

The ban applies to Johannesburg and an area within approximately forty miles of the city and to Capetown and Durban. Demonstrators were shot by the police Monday and Tuesday at the African dwelling area of Sharpeville near Vereeniging and Vanderbeil Park south of Johannesburg and at another African dwelling area near Capetown. The official toll was seventy-two dead and 184 injured.

The demonstrations were organized by the Pan-Africanist Congress, a rival to the African National Congress, to protest laws restricting the movements of Africans and requiring them to carry passes at all times.

Thousands Still Shun Jobs

Thousands of Africans employed in factories at Vereeniging and Vanderbijl Park continued to stay away from their jobs. The two towns are ten miles apart and form one of great industrial complexes of South Africa. The Vereeniging Association of Industries has called a special meeting tomorrow to discuss the situation.

Meanwhile, highly paid technicians joined clerks and typists to move materials and do other jobs normally done by African laborers.

Men and women formed long lines at magistrates courts in Vereeniging and Vnderbijl Park today to obtain permits to carry guns. Gunsmiths in the area have been selling firearms to whites at a rate of 100 a day since Monday. About 50,000 whites and about four times as many Africans live in or near the two towns.

Starting before dawn today, the police raided homes and offices in many parts of South Africa. Some arrests were made, but the police would not say how many. Many documents were taken.

The raids took place in Johannesburg, Pretoria, Durban, Capetown, Bloemfontein, Port Elizabeth, Pietermaritzburg and Ladysmith.

In Johannesburg the police searched the offices of the African National Congress, the Indian National Congress and the Congress of Democrats, which is an organization of whites sympathetic to the Africans and Asians.

In Pretoria, four women missionaries at the Tumelong Anglican mission were roused from their beds before dawn. The mission's premises were searched and various papers confiscated.

Five Sentenced to Caning

Five supporters of the Pan-Africanist campaign against passes were sentenced in a Johannesburg African commissioner's court to be caned.

At Capetown ninety Africans gathered at the entrance to a police station and demanded to be arrested for not carrying passes. The police took their names and sent them away.

Representatives of the Canadian and Australian governments reported that since Monday they had been "flooded with inquiries" from white persons about emigrating from South Africa.

The Australian representatives said that they had received up to ten times the normal number of inquiries. The Canadian Trade Commissioner's office said that normally two or three persons a day asked about moving to Canada. Since Monday about seventy a day have requested information.

Africans Set Fires, Stone Firemen

New Riots Erupt At Cape Town

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Negro rioting against South Africa's white supremacy laws erupted again Tuesday. Negroes burned buildings near Cape Town, then stoned firemen who fought the blazes. Police fired on the mobs for the second day in a row.

New casualty figures were coming in, but there was no firm estimate of how far they would rise above Monday's toll of at least 66 dead. This is a police figure admittedly incomplete.

There were also several hundred injured.

WHITES SPARED

None of the reports mentioned any whites killed in the outbreaks that erupted during what had been planned as a nonviolent protest against the passes Negroes must carry day and night.

Thousands of police enforced an uneasy truce on the Negro quarter of Sharpeville in the coal mining district south of Johannesburg. Sharpeville was the scene of Monday's major riot where at least 50 Negroes died.

The new outbreaks centered around the black settlement of Langa, outside Cape Town, where at least six Negroes were killed Monday.

POLICE AMBUSHED

Resentful Africans hid in the bush around their villages. One police patrol near Langa was ambushed by a number of Negroes.

South Africa Segregation Doomed, Graham Says

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga. Wed. 3-23-60

NEW YORK (AP)—Evangelist Billy Graham, who skirted South Africa during a tour of the African continent, said Tuesday segregation is doomed there.

Back from a 2½-month missionary journey, Graham declared he plans no crusade in South Africa as long as apartheid, or segregation of the races, is the practice.

"In no period of history has apartheid worked," he added. "It has never worked. I think the people of South Africa have realized it."

Speaking of Africa in general, Graham said: "There is more good will toward the United States in Africa than in any other part of the world I have ever visited."

Questioned about segregation in the Southern United States, Graham—himself a Southerner from North Carolina — told newsmen he'd rather wait until he gets home to discuss that.

"I don't think Southerners appreciate people sitting in New York and pointing the finger at them," he said.

He described the U.S. racial problem as an embarrassment to Americans in Africa.

In S. Africa Or Ga. Ku Klux Klan's Same

Afro-American, Baltimore Md.

Sat. 6/11/60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — (ANP)—The "Broederbond" is the "Ku Klux Klan" of the Union of South Africa.

The Broederbond, a 42-year-old organization of Dutch-descended Afrikaners, had its beginnings as a purely cultural group in 1918. Then its purpose was to "fight for the welfare of Afrikaners."

* * *

NOW IT fights for the protection of "those who belong," while those who do not are treated as second - class Afrikaners.

The existence of this KKK-like group has been pretty much of a secret throughout the years.

Although it was known to exist, not too much was known of the tremendous influence it wielded until recently.

* * *

IT WASN'T until the demonstrations by Africans against the hated pass laws that the real and full weight of the organization's power over the nation's political, business and religious life become evident.

More than 50 per cent of the elders of the Dutch Reformed Church are said to claim membership in the organization. The Broederbond is captained by the "12 Apostles" — Prime Minister Verwoerd claims to be one of the 12.

However, the society is finding its program of "gaining control of everything it can lay its hand on" meeting mounting opposition by non-members.

A move is currently afoot among shareholders of an Afrikaner firm with $2.8 million annual turnover to rid its board of directors of three Broederbond members.

At a recent meeting of the Rand Branch of the new National Union Party, speakers called for open warfare against the society. The party is headed by Japie Basson, rebel Nationalist member of parliament.

A prominent minister of the Dutch Reformed Church labeled the group "a cancer in the body of the church (which) undermines the independence of the church from party politics."

Dove takes a dive as high-flying oratory falls flat

BLOEMFONTEIN, South Africa — Addressing a huge rally here, South Africa's Prime Minister Verwoerd sought an extra - dramatic effect. He had recently been released from the hospital after treatment for a bullet wound in the face inflicted by a white would-be assassin.

The attempt on Verwoerd's life came as a climax of unrest over his administration's rigid insistence that native Africans carry passes. Hundreds were killed and wounded by government policemen as they demonstrated against the pass laws.

So, to show is benevolent attitude, Verwoerd produced a dove and said he was sending it "into space as a symbol of the peace and prosperity which we wish all peoples on earth."

The gesture was superb but the dove hadn't read the script.

He plummeted to earth and just sat there, a mute critic of South Africa's apostle of apartheid.

SO CALLED "imperial wizard" of the national Ku Klux Klan, E. L. Edward is shown addressing a small crowd on the courthouse lawn at Decatur, Ga.

Shots by Police in Sharpeville Began the South African Crisis

The New York Times

Violence Is Traced From Riot March 21 —World Protests Followed Incident —Hammarskjold Action Set

New York

Sun 4-10-60

P. 2

The South African violence was begun with bursts of small-arms fire by the police at Sharpeville last March 21. The shots killed at least seventy-two Africans.

As thousands of Africans besieged a police station at Sharpeville, thirty miles south of Johannesburg, the police fired into the crowd. The Africans were demonstrating against laws requiring them to carry passes at all times.

Rioting in protest against South Africa's racial laws continued in other locations. The slaughter at Sharpeville brought world-wide protest. In Washington, the State Department expressed regret over the violent police suppression. The United States acknowledged that its statement was an intrusion into the domestic affairs of South Africa.

The United Nations Security Council placed on its agenda late last month an Asian-African charge that the South African Government was responsible for "large-scale killings" of unarmed demonstrators.

South Africa in Warning

Bernard G. Fourie, the South African representative, warned against statements that might incite rioting against "the mass of peaceful citizens of all races trying to carry on a normal life."

Meanwhile, the rioting continued and three Africans were wounded and taken to a hospital at Langa, outside Capetown, on March 22.

Two days later the Government banned all meetings in heavily populated areas until the end of June. Plans were made to outlaw African political organizations.

On March 26 Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's Government suspended a requirement of many years' standing that Africans must carry identity passes. The police were told not to arrest Africans for trival offenses.

But in new violence March 29, fifteen were killed and scores were injured in African dwelling areas within a few miles of the center of Johannesberg. Rioters attacked persons returning from work and set fire to churches and Government offices.

Violence in Capetown

Violence flared also in Capetown and in Worcester, sixty miles to the north. Churches, schools and administrative offices were destroyed by fire.

A state of emergency was declared March 31 and 234 white, African and Asian opponents of the Government were imprisoned. Parliament buildings were guarded as 30,000 Africans marched on Capetown.

The arrests rose to 300 as violence continued. Three persons were killed April 1 by the police in Durban.

Meanwhile, the Security Council asked Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold to consult with the South African Government with a view to curbing racial violence.

Sentiment appeared to be growing among South Africans for a softening of the harsh racial policies. Two business leaders and an important member of the Opposition United party warned of consequences of the present state of emergency. Fourteen ministers of the Anglican Church in Capetown appealed to the Government to end the "methods of violence against individuals now openly adopted by the police."

Pass Laws Enforced

Last Wednesday, South Africa announced that it was reintroducing the enforcement of laws requiring Africans to carry identity passes. Arrests for failure to produce passes had been suspended by the Government March 26.

FEAR ENVELOPING CAPETOWN AGAIN

The New York Times

News of Verwoerd Shooting Dismays City—Cabinet Minister Calls for Calm

New York

Sun 4-10-60

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 9—Dismay fell like a mist over Capetown this afternoon when the first news of the attempted assassination of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd reached the administrative capital of the Union.

P. 6

Tension and dread, which had lifted remarkably in the last few days of relief from racial violence, again settled on the city. Fortunately for public order, the South African Broadcasting Corporation emphasized in each newscast that the assailant was "a white man."

An appeal for calm was broadcast at 8 P. M. by Paul Sauer, Minister of Lands and Forests and leader of the Assembly. He observed that the assassination attempt might stir turbulent passions but added: "Our police are on hand to maintain law and order. We should leave everything to them."

Parliament in Recess

Parliament was in recess and the week-end found only a few Cabinet members, including Foreign Minister Eric Louw, in the city. They withheld comment. An emergency Cabinet meeting was called late tonight.

There was general agreement among observers that today's outrage would strengthen the Right wing of the Nationalist party in its determination to yield nothing to the foes of apartheid.

"We shall fight for our existence," Dr. Verwoerd had declared in a speech a few minutes before he was shot. This theme—of a white minority fighting desperately for survival in Bantu Africa—always has been attractive for whites and it may derive irresistible appeal for many after today's incident.

Earlier this week Dr. Verwoerd listened to all factions of his party. The party was in ferment. The influential newspaper Die Burger of Capetown, organ of the party moderates, warned that South Africa faced catastrophe in its growing isolation from the world and proposed a drastic reassessment of policy. Some liberal Afrikaners even proposed the early partitioning of South Africa into white and black republics.

Visitors found Dr. Verwoerd politely attentive. But he told them that a policy statement would have to await the return of national calm. He said he was preoccupied with the problem of restoring order for although the country seemed quieter there was no assurance of peace.

New York

Sun. 4-10-60

He was reported most concerned about the native locations at Johannesburg. These had been suspiciously quiet.

Concessions Hoped For

P. 20

The moderates still hoped that Dr. Verwoerd would conduct his "agonizing reappraisal" and announce some concessions to the Bantu peoples before departing late this month for the British Commonwealth Conference in London.

The prevailing opinion among moderate Nationalists in Parliament was that at least there should be a marked speed-up in the development of the Bantu reserves—those areas set aside for Africans.

Thus the "positive aspects" of apartheid would be stressed: the whites were giving the Africans a greater opportunity to develop in their own areas where they would enjoy "full rights."

As a further concession the moderates proposed that the Department of Bantu Administration and Development, be given much more than the £500,000 ($1,400,000) allotted.

Faster economic development of the Bantu areas was urged today by the Minister for Bantu Education, W. A. Maree.

He observed that making the Bantu reserves more attractive would check the flood of Africans to urban areas and thus ease racial friction in the cities.

Other Nationalists have been calling for enforcement of the so-called Eiselen line, marking an area eighty miles deep behind Capetown in which no Bantu would be allowed.

This would eliminate a 40,000-man Bantu labor force in this city, but its advocates say the temporary shortage of labor would be a small price to pay for apartheid peace. Moreover, they contend, jobs held by the Bantu in building construction and on the docks could be readily filled by the Cape Colored (half-castes).

Currently the Bantu are still barred from owning land even in the Bantu reserves. The moderate nationalists have been saying that it is time to let them buy land in the reserves.

Tonight Sir de Villiers Graaff, leader of the Opposition United party and H. G. Lawrence, leader of the Progressive party expressed shock at the assassination attempt. Special prayers were said at Temple Israel by Rabbi Michael Elton for Dr. Verwoerd's recovery.

African Areas Are Quiet

CAPETOWN, April 9 (Reuters)—The police reported that all was quiet today in the African townships of Langa and Nyanga, trouble spots near Capetown, and in other African areas around Durban and Johannesburg.

The district police commissioner in the Nyanga and Langa area said the police were "patrolling the townships intensively so any trouble that may occur can be nipped in the bud."

In Pretoria, the Assistant Police Commissioner, Brigadier C. J. Els, said the police in future would again demand identity passes from Africans. He said "steps" would be taken against those who could not produce them.

The Government announced after the original anti-pass campaign had ended in the killing of seventy-one Africans by police gunfire that for an unstated time passes would be abolished.

Last Wednesday it announced that the passes would be required and that the hundreds of Africans who had burned theirs would have to buy new ones at ($2.50) each.

BRITAIN DEPLORES AFRICAN SHOOTING

The New York Times

Queen and Macmillan Send Wishes for Verwoerd's Speedy Recovery

New York

Sun. 4-10-60

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 9 — Queen Elizabeth II and Prime Minister Macmillan sent messages of sympathy to Dr. Hendrik F. Verwoerd, South African Prime Minister, after the attempt on his life today.

P. 20.

From Sandringham Palace the Queen sent a message saying she was shocked to learn of this attempt and hoped he would make a speedy recovery.

Mr. Macmillan said he was deeply grieved to learn of the attack and sent his best wishes for Dr. Verwoerd's complete recovery. He and his wife sent a second message of sympathy to Mrs. Verwoerd.

Since the outbreak of racial violence in South Africa, Dr. Verwoerd has been the target of bitter criticism from many quarters in Britain.

Demands have been voiced in the House of Commons and elsewhere that the invitation to him to attend next month's Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference in London be withdrawn because of his advocacy of apartheid, or racial separation, and because of the suppression of African Negro in his country.

This the Government had firmly refused to do. R. A. Butler, Home Secretary and leader of the House of Commons, told Parliament that, by a long-standing agreement, "internal policy" was excluded from the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting.

Liberals Ask Action

Ignoring this view, the Liberal party council, at a meeting here today, called on the Government to renounce the "repressive" policies of the South African Government publicly at the Commonwealth conference.

It said Britain should also make her position on these policies known at "every other appropriate international meeting."

The resolution, approved by a large majority, urged Britain to embargo the supply of arms to South Africa.

Another resolution, asking the British Government to take the initiative in bringing about the expulsion of South Africa from the Commonwealth, was rejected.

Gaitskell Voices Regret

LONDON, April 9 (Reuters) —Hugh Gaitskell, leader of the Labor party, said tonight: "Whatever the circumstances, and despite the labor party's strong disapproval of the South African Government's racial policies, I deeply regret that this attack should have been made upon Dr. Verwoerd."

Canon John Collins, precentor of St. Paul's Cathedral and chairman of the Christian Action, said "it is hardly surprising" that someone should make an attempt on the life of Dr. Verwoerd.

In a statement issued here, he said: "I am very sorry that anyone should try the method of violence to get rid of Dr. Verwoerd, but unhappily both he and his Government have let loose such an appalling wave of brutality, it is hardly surprising that such a thing should happen."

CAPETOWN CLERIC ASSAILS ANGLICAN

Dutch Reformed Moderator Denounces Bid to Oust His Church From World Unit

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 9—The Most Rev. Joost de Blank, Anglican Archbishop of Capetown, came under bitter attack today for seeking expulsion of the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa from the World Council of Churches.

He was accused of "very offensive" behavior by the Rev. Dr. Abraham Johannes Van Der Merwe, moderator of Cape Province and minister of Groote Kerk, the oldest church in South Africa.

Recalling that the Archbishop, during a visit to the United States two years ago, assailed the Dutch Reformed Church for not having spoken out against apartheid, Dr. Van Der Merwe added: "I still feel he owes our church an apology for what he said from American pulpits and platforms."

In the consistory of Groote Kerk, the moderator, a husky, bald man, drummed the table with powerful fingers as he spoke. "We don't mind frank, outspoken criticism," he said. "Dr. de Blank's predecessor, Archbishop Clayton, was very outspoken on the racial question. But he remained a friend of the Dutch Reformed Church.

"Archbishop Clayton addressed my synod," Dr. Van Der Merwe went on. "He was very well received. I cannot imagine de Blank addressing my synod. Why de Blank isn't a friend of our church I don't know. But he prefers to express his views in a very offensive way.

"Immediately after his arrival here three years ago, de Blank began expressing himself unreservedly about something he didn't know anything about.

View on Apartheid Defined

"He started talking about what he called the 'stark, old-fashioned Calvinism' of our church, saying we held a Calvinistic belief that the colored man was a descendant of Ham and should be kept forever in an inferior position. Of course this isn't true.

"We as a Dutch Reformed Church have so far supported in principle the policy of apartheid on one condition: it should be applied in such a way that it is fair to every section and involves no infringement of human dignity.

"We realize that in the beginning certain measures will have to be taken which seem to curb the liberty of the individual and in fact will curb it. But we do hope this will only be temporary."

The clergyman acknowledged that his denomination separated its churches on racial lines.

"For more than 100 years we have accepted the policy of separate churches," he remarked. "There was no theological principle involved in this. It was a practical matter from beginning to end. Our ancestors considered it would be better for the colored as well as Europeans if they worshiped apart.

Nonwhite 'Autonomy' Cited

"And history has proved they were right. The colored people have received a degree of autonomy in their churches which they could never have received in ours.

"But now this doesn't mean a colored person won't be permitted to attend service in a white church on the condition he behaves himself in the manner we expect from any European.

"Only last December we had an organ recital of a Bach oratorium to which we invited quite a number of colored people. We still have in the Cape Province one colored church belonging to the mother synod. This church is represented by a colored elder every four years when the synod is in session."

"Any colored man who wants to come to my church is welcome," Dr. Van Der Merwe declared.

He pointed out that none of the schools run by the Anglican Church had been integrated. "They will never integrate those schools," he said. "The Archbishop dare not do it. He would meet terrible opposition from his own people."

Need of Contact Acknowledged

The moderator said his own church was fully aware of the need for additional contact with nonwhite churches. But it is necessary to go slow, he added.

It simply is not true, he said, that the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa had given the Nationalist Government free reign in enforcing apartheid policies.

"Perhaps we have spoken to the Government more forcibly than the Archbishop," he said. "But it has been done quietly, without publicity, because we have approached the Government as friends trying to help."

"If the world would only let us alone," the moderator implored. "The outside world is absolutely cruel to us.

"We have proved in the past that we can be trusted with colored people. We have educated them. We have given them hospitals. We have lifted them up."

Verwoerd Urges Fight For 'White' S. Africa

Sees Role Of Guardian Unchanged

BLOEMFONTEIN, South Africa, May 31 (AP).—Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd told a celebration commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Union of South Africa Tuesday that "a great white nation must be developed here."

The architect of apartheid predicted the white man will remain "the guardian of the black man" in South Africa.

Throngs in this judicial capital of South Africa cheered the Prime Minister's first public speech since he was wounded by a white assassin April 9.

THOUSANDS PROTEST

Elsewhere in South Africa, demonstrations took place against the Nationalist Government's racial segregation policies.

In Cape Town, thousands of persons of all races marched through the streets. In Durban, a statue of Gen. Louis Botha, South Africa's first Prime Minister, was plastered with posters saying "Fifty Years of Oppression."

Verwoerd warned his frequently applauding audience against a "black dictatorship" and declared that a prosperous future can only be attained if two conditions are met:

"The first is that white South Africa must continue to rule. The second is that we as whites must be prepared to work and work hard."

'UNION OF HEARTS'

Verwoerd pleaded for a "union of hearts" between citizens of English and Dutch blood to insure their survival. He also promised that his proposal to make South Africa a republic would bring prosperity and no estrangement from Britain or the British Commonwealth.

The Prime Minister held up a dove, which he said he was sending "out into space as a symbol of the peace and prosperity which we wish all peoples on earth." But the bird refused to fly and plummeted to earth as Verwoerd declared "I release our dove of peace."

Despite coaxing, the dove refused to move. It was finally carried out of sight.

President Eisenhower and Queen Elizabeth sent congratulatory telegrams to Gov. Gen. Charles Swart. There was no official comment on the fact that neither telegram congratulated Verwoerd's Government.

Oliver Tambo, South African Negro leader who fled that country after protesting its segregation, will make a speaking tour of the United States. The American Committee on Africa in New York said his visa will be approved. Earlier, the State Department had listed him as ineligible.—AP Wirephoto.

'BLUEPRINT FOR DISASTER'

Cape Town Apartheid Failed in Colonial Era

By SMITH HEMPSTONE
Contributing Writer

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa.—The 17th Century father of white South Africa, Jan van Riebeeck, made a fruitless attempt to segregate Cape Town's white burghers from their Hottentot and Bushmen neighbors by planting a bitter-almond hedge around the struggling colony.

But men (or women) of purpose found gaps in the hedge, produced the Cape Colored community and, within a century of the bitter-almond's blossoming, Afrikaners were trekking deep into the interior in search of a free life and ample land.

This is the fourth of nine articles on the sources of the racial conflict in South Africa.

By the beginning of the 19th century, these voortrekkers had crossed the Great Fish River and clashed with the southward-moving Bantu tribes. The nine Kaffir Wars followed and it became patently obvious that, if there was to be peace on the frontier, zones of black and white influence had to be established. The system of native reserves which has been transformed by Dr. Verwoerd's magic wand into the theory of apartheid ("separateness") was born.

The reserve system as a solution to South Africa's racial problem became an illusion when diamonds were discovered at Kimberley in 1870. Sixteen years later, gold was found on the Rand and the illusion became a farce. Ever since then the real problem has been not to keep the African on the reserve but to lure him into overalls and use his labor to exploit the Union's vast mineral wealth.

Paradoxically, legislation since the Act of Union (1910) has been aimed at strengthening the reserve system at the same time that a developing economy has been destroying it. The present Nationalist government yields to none in its enthusiasm to maintain the bitter-almond hedge illusion.

Native Area Set Aside

Today, 60,000 square miles are designated as native reserves, land set aside for the exclusive use of the Bantu. Here, according to Nationalist theory, Africans may aspire to any level of economic or political development of which they are capable. Outside these reserves they have no rights whatsoever.

This is not an overly generous division: 13 per cent of the Union's area for 70 per cent of its total population. And some of South Africa's important mineral products—gold, diamonds, uranium, coal and copper—are found in economic quantities within the reserves. The hydroelectric potential is low and transportation facilities are minimal.

Although the reserves get as much or more rainfall as white-owned lands, they are heavily overstocked with animals and with human beings. The agricultural picture is marked by soil erosion, poor farming methods and low yields.

The result has been hunger, low standards of living and a mass movement of Africans from the reserves into white areas.

3.5 Million in Reserves

At present the population of the reserves is estimated to be 3.5 million. Roughly the same number of Africans live and work on white farms and another 3 million are more or less permanently settled in urban areas.

Africans now supply 90 per cent of the labor in the mines, 80 per cent in the construction trade, 53 per cent in manufacturing and 48 per cent in transport. The chief source of income for the reserves has become the export of black labor to white areas.

Despite their reduced population, the reserves are not self-supporting. South African historian Leo Marquard, who has called the reserves a "vast rural slum," estimates that practically all' able - bodied African males are employed outside the reserves at some time in their lives and that 40 per cent of the men between the ages of 15 and 64 are absent at any given time.

Remedy Costly

The Tomlinson Commission, established by the South African government to investigate the prospects for racial segregation and Bantu development, has estimated it would take 245 years and the expenditure of $300 millilon over a 10-year period merely to stabilize (not to reclaim) the soil of the reserves and to diversify their economies to the point where they would have some chance of being self-supporting.

Even if all this were done, the commission has estimated that by the year 2000, 6 million Africans would still be living in White areas. But the Nationalist government has rejected the basic tenet of the commission's report and is proceeding on the assumption that urban Africans are just sojourners in the cities who will eventually return to their "homes" in the reserves.

Improvement Sought

As a logical corollary, the government has made some efforts to improve conditions in the reserves although the investment has been paltry ($9 million) in camparison to the commission's recommendations.

At the same time, through the implementation of the Bantu Authorities Act (1951), it has bolstered the chiefs and headsmen in the reserves by delegating to them greater executive and judicial authority to be "exercised according to Bantu law and custom."

In other words, it is seeking to reconstitute tribalism at the expense of democracy. To turn the eyes of young Africans away from the White world and back upon their tribes, the Bantu Education Act provides a special syllabus. It has been called "education for helotry."

The government has also forced South Africa's two multi-racial universities to close their doors to nonwhites, who will attend tribal universities under construction in rural areas.

In the cities the Nationalists have denied Africans the right to own property and now are attempting to extend tribal authority onto the municipal level.

Best Non-white Housing

In the process of its attempted de-Westernization of urban Africans, it should be noted that the Nationalist government has constructed the best non-white public housing prospects on the continent.

But despite the fact that South Africa has made some noteworthy material achievements for and with the Bantu, Nationalist dogma is doomed to failure if only because of its inability to see (or to admit) that the urban African has no roots in the reserves and no interest in the tribal system.

Ever since the 1886 gold rush, generations of Africans have grown up in the cities who have no knowledge of or interest in tribalism. Their goal is and can only be the betterment of their economic, political and social position within the only frame of reference they know: the cities.

Ignore Industrial Shift

The Nationalist government is trying to ignore the basic fact that South Africa, once an agricultural nation, is now an industrial one with the urban African woven inextricably into the fabric of the industrialization. It is attempting to apply a 19th Century solution to a 20th Century problem.

What the Afrikaner's political theories forbid him to admit is that the black population is now composed of two distinct groups with widely differing accomplishments and aspirations: the rural tribal Bantu and urban, detribalized African. Policies admirable when applied to one group become both tragic and ludicrous when imposed upon the other.

Three hundred years after Mr. van Riebeeck, his bitter-almond hedge, even more of an illusion today than it was then, still plays a major role in the South African mystique.

But today the Nationalists are tinkering clumsily with an ethnic time-bomb and the ticking is becoming more insistent.

Tomorrow: How white is white South Africa?

OCT. 5 VOTE IS SET FOR SOUTH AFRICA

Verwoerd Announces Poll on Change to Republic Within Commonwealth

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Aug. 3—South Africa will vote Oct. 5 on whether it will become a republic, Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd announced today.

He said that if the referendum was in favor of a republic he would ask the other British Commonwealth countries to allow South Africa to remain in the Commonwealth.

If this is refused he added, the Government will proceed with the establishment of a republic outside the Commonwealth, but will maintain the existing friendly relations toward other Commonwealth countries. Dr. Verwoerd said:

"Although the Government does not rely on any previous assurances, their firm conviction is that mutual interests will secure permission to remain within the Commonwealth notwithstanding mutual differences. The refusal of leave to remain within the Commonwealth would not be because of our becoming a republic, but because we would not accede to the demands on and the interference in matters of domestic policy."

Dr. Verwoerd's announcement means that after next week South Africa will find itself in the throes of one of the most heated and controversial political battles in its history.

The political parties will appoint agents in each constituency. Since all Opposition forces have joined in an anti-republican stand, the preliminaries will be bitter.

The Opposition parties will fight against a "Verwoerd republic" and the Nationalists will fight the "Monarchists." The results are expected to be close as there are about an equal number of voters for and against the republic.

Only the white population is eligible to vote. The selection of the date seems to indicate that the Nationalists are confident of proclaiming a republic on Kruger day, a national holiday.

The Congo and Southern Rhodesia disturbances will help the Nationalists, as they have made much of these events to back their claim that separate development in separate areas is the only way to prevent the whites from being swamped by Africans and to preserve the supremacy of the whites in South Africa.

Afrikaners Back Republic

South Africa has been under heavy pressure from Commonwealth members to change her restrictive racial policies. At the Commonwealth Conference in London in May South Africa was unable to obtain guarantees that it could remain in the Commonwealth following its transformation into a republic.

A republic dominated by Afrikaners, South Africans of Dutch ancestry, has been the goal of Nationalists since the party was formed a half-century ago.

Criticism has been turned into action by two Commonwealth nations, Ghana and Malaya, which instituted boycotts of South African goods at the beginning of the week. South Africa protested this was a "flagrant breach" of trade agreements.

The failure to remain in the Commonwealth would have a serious economic effect on South Africa. It would mean the loss of a preferred trade status in the Commonwealth market.

The South African Opposition United party fought the referendum legislation on the ground that there were no guarantees that South Africa would remain in the Commonwealth.

Last month Prime Minister John Diefenbaker of Canada indicated that South Africa could not count on automatic Commonwealth membership.

Boycott Emblazons World Racial Issue

Despite Soviet outbursts and the ebb and flow of the cold war, it is the question of color and racial discrimination which remains the most burning international issue for many nonwhite millions in Africa and Asia.

This is the lesson once again of the international boycott of South Africa launched Aug. 1 by Malaya and Ghana.

These are two of the world's smaller states only newly independent. Yet, on account of South Africa's policy of racial discrimination, they have taken international action which could provoke delicate complications in the foreign affairs of much larger powers deeply sensitive to the present rise toward political power of the nonwhite man.

All three countries involved—Ghana, Malaya, and South Africa—are members of the British Commonwealth, and other commonwealth members may be forced to state their standpoints on the issue.

However, there is also the question of whether the boycott flouts the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). Ghana has stated it would welcome South Africa's taking the matter up internationally, presumably in the belief that such South African action would precipitate a showdown, with a wide range of countries compelled to take a stand.

The Ghana boycott stems from resolutions taken at the recent conference of independent African states at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, calling virtually for economic war against South Africa.

Ports Closed

Ghana is not only boycotting South African goods, but also is barring entry or transit through Ghanaian territory of all South Africans except those who declare their opposition to their government's apartheid (race separateness) policy. This presumably poses certain problems for Pan American Airways, the only airline operating a direct service between the United States and South Africa, using Ghana as a stopping point.

The Ghana Government also has announced it will close Ghanaian sea and airports to ships and aircraft owned by South African companies except in cases of distress.

In itself, all this action is not too critical for South Africa at the present time. South African exports to Ghana and Malaya are relatively small. Last year, for example, South African exports to Ghana were less than $7,000,000. Although specific industries such as the fish canning trade may be hard hit, the great foreign currency earners like the diamond and gold mining industries and the wool farming industry, which are the pillars of the South African economy, will be unaffected.

As far as planes are concerned, no South African airlines put down in Ghana at the present time. However, the state-run South African Airways does use such stopping points as Nigeria in West Africa and Kenya in East Africa for refueling points on flights between Europe and South Africa.

Nigerians Warn

Although Kenya presumably will remain under British control for some while yet, the Nigerians already have warned that they will refuse landing facilities to the South Africans once Nigeria becomes independent in October.

It is true that the South African airline, shortly to be equipped with Boeing 707 jets, conceivably could overfly all African points and make its first stopping point in some capital on the European continent. Yet whatever improvisations may be made, the South African Government can hardly escape the sense of isolation in as an African continent to the north of it, predominantly hostile to South Africas' race policies, marches steadily toward independence.

Although South African apartheid has set the government of that country virtually alone in the world on this particular issue, the boycott launched by Malaya and Ghana has not been observed without mixed feelings in various non-African circles.

Opposition Voiced

During his South African tour earlier this year, British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan, whose country heads the list of exporters to South Africa as well as buying more South African goods than any other country, voiced his opposition to boycott moves.

However, as the London Daily Telegraph editorialized Aug. 1, in the boycott against South Africa we "see the repercussions far outside Africa of racial policy. These are emotional facts of life not cancelled by deploring them. Racial discrimination has become a political issue, even in countries which have no such problem of their own. South Africa must recognize that her problem has become internationalized."

With its decision to hold a nationwide republican referendum Oct. 5, the South African Government is putting itself to an interesting test of its popularity with the white electorate.

At the general elections held once every five years since the present government won power in 1948 a number of electoral seats outside strongholds of one or the other of the major parties have been left uncontested. Voters in these constituencies thus have had no opportunity to express their preference, and only estimates of the relative strength of the parties in these constituencies have been available.

Thus, while the government has by various means secured a mighty majority of seats in Parliament the opposition has continued to charge that in fact the government enjoys the support of about half the white electorate and perhaps even less than half.

Only Whites to Vote

In the referendum, which will decide whether South Africa shall become a republic, only the country's 3,000,000 whites will get the chance to vote. Some 12,000,000 nonwhites will have no say.

Of course, the central issue is the republic, an ideal particularly dear to the Afrikaners (of Dutch origin), many of whom feel no particular loyalties to the British crown.

It may be that to achieve this longed-for ideal, some Afrikaners will vote for the republic although they are not particularly enamored of Prime Minister Hendrick F. Verwoerd's leadership of the present government.

There are numbers of Afrikaners who differ with Dr. Verwoerd and various aspects of his policy, although they agree with the broad direction of the government's plans.

Gamble Indicated

It is probable that Dr. Verwoerd is gambling on the republican issue's drawing together the governing Nationalist Party, in which new rifts have lately appeared, particularly since the African unrest to the north and the declaration of a state of emergency throughout most of South Africa earlier this year.

At the same time the referendum results probably will be close. Defeat for the government's republican campaign might well do irreparable political harm to Dr. Verwoerd within his own party.

There seems little prospect that the government could win the two-third's majority in favor of a republic which some South Africans believe is essential if a republic is to be established with any degree of permanency and harmony.

Simple Majority

However, Dr. Verwoerd already had declared that a simple majority will be sufficient in his eyes for the declaration of a republic. This means that if more than 50 per cent of the white electorate votes in favor of a republic, such a republic will be declared.

The referendum will bring to a head the question of South Africa's continued membership in the British Commonwealth. Dr. Verwoerd has announced that South Africa will sound out other Commonwealth members for their views on continued Commonwealth membership for South Africa. But African nations, such as Ghana, bitterly opposed to South Africa's racial policies, are not expected to view with much enthusiasm the prospect of a republican South Africa under its present administration within the Commonwealth.

Dr. Verwoerd has announced his government will go ahead with republican plans if the referendum gives them a mandate whether it means surrendering Commonwealth membership or not.

'Apartheid's' Latest Fruits

South Africa's policy of segregating and suppressing its large Bantu population has borne fruit during the past week in the death of at least fourscore Bantus and injury to at least twice as many. Now the South African Government has done two things: first, it proposes to dissolve the Bantu political groups which have organized to defend what they take to be their rights; second, it has decided to suspend temporarily the requirement that every Negro carry a pass and other identifying papers. The requirement is humiliating and is intended to be so. The protest against it has been not only in demonstrations originally intended to be peaceable but also in labor strikes. It will be hard for any Government in South Africa to break such strikes without going backward into the darkness of chattel slavery.

The question will come before the U. N. Security Council in this city Tuesday morning. The Council can do nothing further than to pass resolutions or to offer good offices. The South African Government will say that this is an internal matter and therefore outside the scope of the U. N. It is not an internal matter. It threatens the peace and security of most of Africa south of the Sahara. We hope and believe the United States Government will make its position clear on this point.

RIGID CURBS FIXED BY SOUTH AFRICA

Africans' Groups Face Ban —Police Leaves Canceled

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, March 25—Political organizations of Africans are to be outlawed in this country.

Plans for this drastic step were announced today by the Government. Legislation giving Governor General Charles R. Swart, former Minister of Justice, power to impose the ban is to be introduced Monday in Parliament, now sitting in Capetown. The bill is to be enacted with the utmost speed.

This was the latest development in a momentous week that has seen South Africa stiffening in her determination to stifle political expression by Africans while elsewhere in the continent Africans are gaining greater political rights.

Meanwhile, preparations were made to cope with further outbreaks of violence over the week-end. All leaves for the more than 20,000 and members of the south African police force were canceled.

The nearly 7,000 and members of the defense force and thousands of members of the white civilian force were contined on a stand-by alert. This was ordered Monday after fatal clashes between African political demonstrators and the police near Johannesburg and Capetown.

A bill to amend the Riotous Assemblies Act and "make watertight" the ban imposed yesterday on public meetings also is to be submitted Monday. Indoor and outdoor gatherings of more than twelve persons were made illegal until June 30 in twenty-four major cities and towns.

Africans in Sharpeville, the dwelling area near Vereeniging south of Johannesburg where the worst violence occurred Monday, remained away from work again today, crippling local industries. There are 26,000 Africans in Sharpeville.

A decline on the Johannesburg Stock Exchange that started four days ago continued today. There has been a massive move to sell. The drop in share values this week was estimated at a total of $252,000,000. Gold mining stocks particularly were affected.

Several Groups Affected

The new legislation will give the Governor General power to ban the African National Congress, the Pan-Africanist Congress and other organizations that were not identified. It is understood that these include the Indian National Congress and the Congress of Democrats, an organization of whites sympathetic to African and Asian causes.

The African National Congress is nearly fifty years old. Although its members have frequently been harassed by the police and other government authorities it has been permitted to continue to operate under strict controls because of its value as a safety valve to relieve the pressure of unfulfilled African political aspirations.

The Pan-Africanist Congress was established last April 6 by young Africans who were dissatisfied with the African National Congress. The Pan-Afgricanists organized the demonstrations earlier this week against laws restricting the movements of Africans. The protests led to the death from police bullets of seventy-two Africans and the wounding of 184.

Representatives of the African National Congress said they were not surprised by the Government's move. The organization is understood to have plans for continuing its activities underground.

Africans Offer Proposals

A deputation from the African National Congress conferred today in Capetown with the three white members of Parliament elected to represent the Africans. The congress representatives made two requests, which they said would ease the present situation.

They asked that there be some relief from the stringent pass laws. They suggested that channels be created between the Africans and Government authorities and between the Africans and industry for negotiation about wages. Although a number of African trade unions exist in South Africa they are not officially recognized.

About 2,000 Africans defied the ban on meetings today when they assembled in Capetown outside a police station to demonstrate against the laws requiring them to carry passes.

An African leader addressed them through a police loudspeaker, however, and they dispersed peacefully. No arrests were reported.

In a sharp reaction to the week's events The Rand Daily Mail, a Johannesburg morning newspaper, called today in a front-page editorial for the resignation of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd. The newspaper has long been a critic of Dr. Verwoerd. This morning it said he was "inept and confused, looking merely for justification of his own ruinous policies."

The newspaper declared also "What is now urgently necessary is for someone to step down and show the African people that their cause is not without sympathy among the white population."

LONDON, March 25 (AP)—The South African Government charged tonight that Monday's riot at Sharpeville "resulted from a planned demonstration of about 20,000 natives in which demonstrators attacked the police with assorted weapons, including firearms."

It said "the demonstrators shot first and the police were forced to fire in self-defense and avoid even more tragic results."

U. N. Council to Meet

Special to The New York Times.

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y. March 25—Twenty-eight nations of the Asian and African group formally requested the Security Council today to meet for consideration of recent violence in South Africa.

In a letter to Henry Cabot Lodge of the United States, president of the Council this month, they charged that the police violence in South Africa had given rise to a situation endangering international peace and security. The Council will meet Tuesday at 10:30 A. M.

The letter, signed by the Asian and African delegations this morning, asked for the Council meeting under Article 35 of the United Nations Charter.

Council Must Decide

This provides that any member may call to the Council's attention any situation deemed a danger to international peace. The Council must then decide whether to place the item on its agenda.

Laos was the one member of the twenty-nine-nation group that did not sign the letter.

The group asked that the Council session be called on an urgent basis to consider what it called a situation "arising out of the large-scale killing of unarmed and peaceful demonstrators against racial discrimination and segregation in the Union of South Africa."

South African sources said that the South African delegation was waiting for instructions from its Government on whether to appear before the Council if an invitation were issued. South Africa has contended that its policy of apartheid—racial separation—was an internal matter.

The letter to the Council was signed by Omar Abdel Hamid Adeel of the Sudan as chairman of the group.

U. S. Favors Council Meeting

WASHINGTON, March 25 (UPI) — Secretary of State Christian A. Herter said today that the United States favored calling the special United Nations Security Council meeting to consider racial violence in South Africa.

South Africa held that the incidents in which white police forces opened fire on Negroes demonstrating against racial laws were a domestic matter that could be aggravated by a United Nations discussion.

Wentzel C. du Plessis, the South African Ambassador, observed that the United Nations discussion could provide a precedent for discussion of "racial and other disturbances in any other country." This appeared to refer to racial difficulties in the United States.

The Security Council meeting has been set for Tuesday. The United States did not call the session. However, it was ordered by Henry Cabot Lodge, chief United States delegate to the United Nations, as this month's Council chairman.

29 Nations Asked Session

Mr. Lodge took the action at the request of twenty-nine Asian-African countries. In addition, Secretary of State Christian A. Herter said at a news conference yesterday that the United States favored United Nations discussions of the South African rioting.

Earlier this week the State Department, in an unusual action, publicly deplored the fatal clashes between African political demonstrators and white police forces near Johannesburg and Capetown.

Following Ambassador du Plessis' meeting with Mr. Herter the State Department issued a brief statement. It said merely that the Secretary "undertook to give consideration" to the protest and would discuss it with Mr. Lodge.

U. S. Seen Backing Session

State Department sources added, however, that the United States would stand by its support for the Security Council meeting.

The South African Ambassador did not say whether his Government, as is assumed here, would also protest to the United Nations.

When newsmen asked him to comment on his Government's protest, Ambassador du Plessis handed them a written statement, which appeared to have been drafted on the basis of anticipated questions. It said:

"The question of the discussion by the Security Council of the recent riots in South Africa is a domestic one and South Africa protests strongly against calling a council meeting to discuss it."

"I emphasized to Mr. Herter that by calling such a meeting for the purpose of discussing the domestic affairs of a member state a precedent will undoubtedly be created which would enable the council to discuss racial and other disturbances in any other country.

"I also stressed that a council debate—even a debate on inscription — could have serious consequences in emboldening agitators; it could even be an incident to further rioting."

Would Debate Agenda

A debate of inscription would deal with whether the subject might be placed on the agenda for discussion.

The Ambassador said he had not taken up with Mr. Herter the Cabinet officer's comment criticizing the police action. But he made a plea to the newsmen for understanding the "dangerous and delicate" job the police had in his country.

According to official figures, seventy-two Africans were killed and 184 wounded in the most recent incident.

Lodge Accused of Intrusion in Calling U. N. Security Council to Study Riots

SOUTH AFRICA 'KLAN' DRAWS FIRE IN PRESS

Chicago Daily Tribune

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 22 (AP)—A South African secret society of Dutch-descended Afrikaners which has been described abroad as a sort of Ku Klux Klan drew a newspaper's criticism at home Sunday.

The English-language Sunday Times said in a banner-lined front page story that the society, Broederbond, holds a tight grip on the nation's political, business and religious life.

"There is growing resentment," it said, "among influential Afrikaners. Most of the Broederbond's opponents, however, are afraid to voice their critivisms openly because they fear the power of this secret society, whose influence is tremendous.

Tell Stand Privately

"But—in private conversations—Afrikaner businessmen, Dutch reformed church ministers, civil servants and National [government] party rank and file are expressing their opposition to Broederbond domination."

The newspaper, which usually opposes the government, raised the issue at a time when English speaking and Afrikaans speaking white people here are openly feuding about the wisdom of the racial segregation policies of Premier Hendrik F. Verwoerd's nationalist regime.

Many English speaking politicians, business men and newspapers have been demanding drastic revision of these policies to prevent a recurrence of the recent racial violence and repair the damage done to this country politically and economically by foreign condemnation of these events.

Call for Suppression

On the other side, some leading Afrikaner Nationalists have been publicly accusing English speaking South Africans of shirking their responsibilities. They have called for suppression of some English language newspapers for "making South Africa look bad in the eyes of the world."

The Broederbond is a mysterious organization to which many influential Afrikaners reportedly belong. Reputable history books report it was founded in 1918 as a cultural association, then spread its influence progressively to where it would wield tremendous hidden power—on the side of uncompromising white supremacy.

Some foreign reporters have said it represents the essence of racialism. Foreign Editor Norman Phillips of the Toronto Star, jailed for three days in Durban last April, said on returning home he believed he was arrested because he had started investigating the Broederbond. He reported the society has cells in every leading South African community.

Criticism Unchallenged

Since Broederbond officials do not give press statements, they have never challenged the adverse descriptions.

The Sunday Times said some influential Afrikaners are in revolt against the Broederbond because, "as a Transvaal nationalist said privately: 'The Broederbond no longer fights for the welfare of the whole Afrikaner people. Today it discriminates between Afrikaner and Afrikaner. Those who belong are protected but those who do not are treated as second grade Afrikaners.'"

Government Supporters for Business Move on Talks on South African Crisis

New York

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 7—The demand by South Africa's business and industrial community for modification of the country's harsh racial policies received important new support today.

The move for consultations on the vital subject between Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd and commercial leaders attracted backing from the Afrikaner business community. Afrikaners are the descendants of the early Dutch settlers of South Africa. They constitute about 55 per cent of South Africa's 3,000,000 whites and it is from their ranks that the governing National party led by Dr. Verwoerd draws its major support.

Afrikaners Entering Business

In the last ten years Afrikaners, formerly engaged mainly in agriculture, have moved into business. They now control large banks, insurance companies, building societies, mines and factories.

Moves by Afrikane rbusiness men to join the proposed discussions with Dr. Verwoerd were reported both in Capetown and Johannesburg.

It was reported here that Dr. Verwoerd had asked for a memorandum of suggestions from representatives of industry, commerce and mines who had approached him about discussing measures for ending the present state of emergency.

It was said that the Prime Minister would study the memorandum and, if necessary, arrange for a deputation from various Chambers of Commerce and from industry to discuss the matter with Cabinet members.

Verwoerd to Speak

Observers here believed that Dr. Verwoerd might comment on the business men's proposals Saturday when he is scheduled to speak at the Union Exposition in Johannesburg that commemorates the fiftieth anniversary of the Union of South Africa.

The depressing effect of the present emergency on South Africa.

The depressing effect of the present emergency on South Africa's economy has caused great concern in the business community. Its members propose that the Government relax many restrictions on Africans and consult African leaders in an effort to achieve racial harmony.

Hannes van Zyl, chairman of the Johannesburg Sakekamer, the chamber of commerce of 200 businesses owned by Afrikaners, said, "A big percentage of Afrikaner business men believe that better contact between white and Negro is essential so that commerce and industry can know in which direction we are moving."

Joint Delegation Predicted

He sai dhe would not be surprised if Afrikaner business organizations took the lead in seeking a common ground with other chambers of commerce and industry so that a joint deputation could approach Prime Minister Verwoerd.

"In a week there will probably be less confusion of thought and we will be better able to talk," he said.

The existence of separate chambers of commerce for English-speaking and Afrikaans-speaking business men demonstrates one of the difficulties of the South African situation.

Distrust and ill feeling exists between the two elements of the white population. This situation has its origins in the Boer War, which ended early in this century in the defeat of the Afrikaners by the British. There is strong political and business rivalry between two white groups.

These factors make the support of Afrikaner business men for an appeal to Dr. Verwoerd doubly important.

The sensitivity of the South African economy to the present emergency was indicated again today by the Johannesburg Stock Exchange. The statement late yesterday by Francois C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, that regulations on identity passes, restricting the movements of Africans would be enforced again caused prices of mining and financial shares to fall today.

Checkpoints manned by police and military personnel still were being maintained outside African townships near Durban. Passengers in taxicabs and buses were being searched for weapons.

The Witwatersrand Rifles, an infantry regiment of the active citizens' force, was mobilized today. The approximately 2,500 members of the regiment were stationed at the Rand airport near Germiston, about twelve miles east of Johannesburg.

Africans Line Up for Passes

Several hundred Africans lined up at Government offices in Johannesburg and Durban today to replace documents that had been burned or lost during the protest demonstrations of the last three weeks.

The attitude of the Pan-Africanist Congress, the militant African political group that instigated the recent demonstrations against the pass laws, was restated today in the Johannesburg Bantu [African] Commissioners Court. Eighteen Africans, arrested for working in concord against the passes and for failure to carry them, refused to enter a plea. One speaking for theg roup, said:

"We decline to plead on the grounds that we fail to see how there can be justice in laws made by a foreign white minority in South Africa without the consent of the African people and hence we are under no moral obligation whatever to obey the laws of this country."

Similar statements have been made by Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe, president of the Pan-Africanist Congress, who is on trial in another court on charges of inciting Africans to support the anti-pass campaign.

POLICE SEIZE 1,500 IN CAPETOWN RAID

The New York Times

All African Homes Searched as Troops Guard Suburb—All but 162 Released

New York

Thu. 4-8-60

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 7 (Reuters)—The police arrested more than 1,500 African men and women at Nyanga township near here today in what was probably the biggest roundup in South African history.

A police official said tonight 1,525 persons had been arrested—not 200, as originally reported. All but 162 of the Africans were released after screening at a police station, he said.

The police contended after the raid that they had broken a major stronghold of African defiance of the white Government.

Police Search All Homes

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 7—Military and police units swept into the suburb of Nyanga today in a joint operation against African "terrorists, intimidators and criminals."

Searching every building in the African township, the police, armed with revolvers and truncheons, herded men and women into riot vans. Troops, with bayonets fixed, surrounded the area.

Eight vanloads of prisoners were taken to the Philippi police station and jailed. The police said they had found an arsenal of machetes, clubs and lengths of sharpened metal tubing.

Nyanga's 25,000 Africans had been under police and military guard for seventeen days. Today the cold, drizzly dawn found the township sealed off completely.

2,800 Permitted to Leave

Military units entered the streets of the settlement at 8 A. M. after about 2,800 Africans had been allowed through the military cordon. All had their passbooks, which they were required to show to the police.

Apparently the police were looking for remnants of leadership of the Pan-Africanist Congress. Almost all of the group's leaders of the first and second rank already had been seized but other "leadership layers" remained.

However, the deputy police commissioner, Col. I. P. S. Terblanche, said the main reason for the operation had been to round up terrorists who had been assaulting Africans returning to their jobs in defiance of a work boycott called by the Pan-Africanist group.

"I want to emphasize," he said, "that this clean-up was undertaken in the sole interests of law-abiding citizens in the location who have been living in a reign of terror."

"With few exceptions, the police succeeded in rounding up the agitators, terrorists and gangsters who had been earmarked for arrest," he said. "No resistance was encountered. All agitators arrested were found to be in possession of their reference [pass] books."

Colonel Terblanche quoted a letter, which he said had been written by a Nyanga worker to his employer, describing terrorism in the settlement. The letter was smuggled out by the worker's wife, he said.

In the letter, dated Monday, the writer said he had been attacked that morning by intimidators as he left for work. He said he had been robbed of his coat and wallet. Although troops maintained a guard around the settlement, there was no protection inside.

The letter said, "There isn't even one policeman or soldier inside the location at 6 A. M."

The letter was said to have continued:

"We are, at the moment, penniless and have no paraffin, no bread, no butter, etc. Our future in the location is uncertain and the location life is miserable.

"When I came home for the first time on Saturday, March 26, I was visited by three groups of gangsters. They asked me why I was still working and when I denied this they told me they had information from someone that I was.

Threat to Life Reported

"The second group just warned me that if I insisted on going to work I would lose my life and they would set fire to my furniture.

"It's difficult for me to leave the house because leaders of the intimidators are just next door. Luckily, three were arrested Sunday, but one is still around.

"At 10 P. M. last night the gangsters set a house on fire, but luckily the fire was put out before any damage was done. Life in the location is fearful."

Colonel Terblanche said the police could confirm that the letter was not exaggerated.

Meanwhile, the near-by African settlement of Langa was free of a military cordon for the first time in seventeen days. Colonel Terblanche said the troops had been withdrawn because the situation in Langa had returned to normal. He warned, however, that "many terrorists and intimidators" were still at large in Langa and that the cordon would be reimposed if terrorism broke out anew.

Asians and Africans Would Ask Council to Meet Again if Resolution Is Snubbed

New York

By THOMAS J. HAMILTON

Special to The New York Times.

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., April 7—Members of the Asian-African group plan to ask for another meeting of the Security Council unless the Souht African Government promptly indicates it is willing to consult with Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold.

Reliable sources said today that Mr. Hammarskjold, as a follow-up to his informal talks Saturday with Bernardus G. Fourie, the South African representative, had cabled the text of the Security Council's resolution on racial strife in South Africa to the latter's Government.

It was learned that Mr. Hammarskjold"s brief accompanying message let it be understood he was at the disposition o fthe South African Government for consultation.

he resolution adopted Friday by the Security Council requested South Africa to abandon its policy of racial discrimination. It asked Mr. Hammarskjold, in consultation with the Union Government, to "make such arrangements as would adequately help in upholding the purposes and principles of the [United Nations] Charter and to report to the Security Council whenever necessary and appropriate."

No Word From South Africa

According to reliable sources, the South African Government has not yet informed Mr. Hammarskjold whether it will agree to the consultations. Mr. Fourie gave no commitment on this point when he talked with Mr. Hammarskjold Saturday.

South African sources said today they believed the Government's official answer would coincide with a statement to be made in the Union Parliament by Eric H. Louw, Minister of External Affairs. Earlier this week Mr. Louw, in a speech outside Parliament, repeated the South African contention that the United Nations had no jurisdiction in the matter. However, South African sources said the Government's definitive position would be made known in Parliament.

Last week a number of Asian-African delegates were encouraged by South Africa's decision to suspend the enforcement of laws compelling native Africans to carry passes and from the fact that Mr. Fourie refrained from denouncing the Security Council resolution.

Threat of Sanctions Revived

However, the reinstatement of the pass laws, followed by the serious disorders today, has produced skepticism about the effectiveness of the Security Council resolution.

Mongi Slim of Tunisia, the African representative on the Security Council, yesterday revived the threat of sanctions against South Africa. Most Asian-African delegates, however, do not believe the time is ripe for such a resolution. Discussions center on the making of a final appeal to South Africa to comply with the previous resolution.

If South Africa were to disregard a second resolution, it is understood, the Asian-African group is likely to ask for the mildest sanction authorized by the Charter—the breaking off of diplomatic relations with South Africa—rather than for an economic boycott.

It was learned the Asian-African bloc hopes neither Britain nor France would veto a resolution to break off diplomatic relations. In the event of a veto, however, the bloc is expected to ask for a special emergency session of the General Assembly.

Several Western delegates said today they saw no possibility of an about-face by the present South African Government. There seems to be no question of South Africa's willingness to receive Hr. Hammarskjold—but not for the consultations requested by the Security Council.

Censure Is Sought

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 7—Members of the Conservative and Labor parties in the House of Commons introduced motions seeking to put the Government on record as deploring the race policies of South Africa and pledging to raise the issue at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers conference here in May.

The motion also urged that the Commonwealth Prime Ministers "define and adopt a code of behavior below which no Commonwealth member state shall fall in the regulation of its internal affairs."

JEWS DEBATE BIAS IN SOUTH AFRICA

They Differ on the Extent of Anti-Semitism—Some Fear It Is Latent

189

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (NANA)—South Africa's 105,000 Jews—about 3 per cent of the white population—appear divided on the extent of South African anti-Semitism.

Last January and again in April anti-Jewish pamphlets and leaflets appeared in some shop windows and were scattered along the streets—mainly in Durban.

In both instances, Government officials promptly denounced those responsible and ordered a police investigation. However, those responsible were not apprehended.

One leading member of the Johannesburg Jewish community of about 50,000—the largest in the country—said there had been less anti-Semitism since the present Nationanst Government came to power in 1948.

The N. Y. Times, N. Y. City, N. Y. Wed. 4/22/60

REPLACEMENT: Geraine Richards in role of Cecily in "Ernest in Love." She took over part from Gerrianne Raphael at the Cherry Lane Theatre last night.

"Before they came to power, some of the Nationalists were known as 'Jew baiters'," he said. "But all that has stopped since 1948. Nowadays it is easier for a Jew to immigrate to South Africa than for almost anybody else."

But some Jews insist there is "latent anti-Semitism" in the Nationalist party and thus they cling to the Opposition United party, which is composed chiefly of South Africans of British extraction.

A few clubs and societies still are closed to Jews, but on the whole there is little social discrimination. And on newsstands throughout South Africa one can buy copies of The South African Jewish Times and The Zionist Record, whose front pages are largely devoted to attacks on President Gamal Abdel Nasser of the United Arab Republic.

These newspapers "rejoiced" editorially that the April 9 attempt on the life of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd was unsuccessful and that he was spared to "carry on."

While relations with Cairo have been deteriorating over the apartheid, or racial separation, issue, the South African Government has been strengthening economic and diplomatic relations with Israel.

Many South African Jews maintain close relations with Israel and are ardent Zionists.

One non-Jewish South African newspaper editor said:

"Jews in this country have risen everywhere. They are prominent in business, shopkeeping, the professions, education and even politics. In Johannesburg especially they are largely responsible for the spirit of intellectual emancipation and the earnest desire for cultural values that have distinguished this South African metropolis in the past."

Yet in South Africa one can hear anti-Semitic remarks by Afrikaners, the South Africans of Dutch, German or Huguenot descent.

And a Professor of Law and Economics in Capetown said heatedly: "The Jews have done nothing during the past 6,000 years except get themselves thoroughly hated throughout the world. Just wait and see. The Jews here, sooner or later, will become as much a problem for this country as the black Africans."

U. N. Stand on Apartheid

The New York Times

Reply Made to Comments on Action by World Body on South Africa

The writer of the following letter, a member of the United States Delegation to the Fourteenth General Assembly, was the United States spokesman in that Assembly on the subject of racial conflict in the Union of South Africa.

New York Times 5-19-60

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Prof. Edward A. Tiryakian's protest in your May 2 column against United Nations action on apartheid in the Union of South Africa rests on three points: First, the claim that apartheid is an internal domestic problem with which the U. N. has no proper concern. Second, the U. N. failed to act in relation to the Hungarian and other repressions, such as in Algeria and in Soviet Russia, in relation to its Jewish population. Third, apartheid is socially and morally justified.

Taking these points in order: First: Articles 55(c) and 56 of the U. N. Charter provide a mutual pledge to work for the observance of certain basic rights and freedoms for all peoples regardless of race, sex, language or religion.

Universal Rights

While it is true that Article 2, paragraph 7, reserves to each member state the regulation of its own affairs, human rights are universal and matters of international impact and effect. This is peculiarly true in Africa, the cradle of many new sovereign states, members or soon to be members of the family of nations. Reprisals by them, imminent or already in effect, can seriously increase international tensions and jeopardize world peace. The United States Government has recognized that in these circumstances apartheid is not a purely domestic problem in the Union of South Africa, and the General Assembly overwhelmingly concurred in this judgment. It voted a condemnation of apartheid.

Secondly, it is not true that the U. N. remained silent in the case of Hungary or other comparable situations, including also Tibet. Especially in the Hungarian case, it was unsparing in its denunciation of the outrages perpetrated upon the Hungarian people. So far as I know, Soviet policies regarding Jewish culture were not offered for the agenda of the fourteenth General Assembly nor were facts given which might have warranted condemnation of the Soviet Union. The General Assembly's action in expressing the conscience of mankind on apartheid was consistent with precedent in comparable cases.

Inhuman Solution

Thirdly, while the professor is entitled to his opinion that physical and forced separation of a weaker racial group from a stronger racial group in the same country, and systematic repression of the former by the latter, are a solution of interracial problems, there is a vast body of world opinion (and a not inconsiderable body of opinion among the South African whites) that such a solution cannot succeed and that it is inhuman, violative of elementary human dignity and human rights and encourages international friction and strife. The situation is bad enough when sanctioned by custom and tradition. It is infinitely worse when sanctioned by statute and government policy and imposed by the police and the military.

Naturally, significant progress toward equality of opportunity of all men involves adjustments. It faces obstacles which are difficult. We in America have never attempted to conceal our difficulties in this area from the rest of the world. Certainly the onward march which began with the abolition of slavery less than a century ago has not reached its ultimate destination. But it is notable that the advances we have made are fostered by our Government. The majority of our citizens believe that equal opportunity is right morally. It is also the only sensible course when one considers the increasingly close link between respect for human rights and international goodwill.

THE WORLD

The New York Times

South African Ferment

This week the whites of South Africa face a new challenge from the black population. Africans (Negroes) of Johannesburg, South Africa's largest city, have called a strike in protest against the Government's apartheid or racial separation policy. In the face of that challenge, the Government is not merely maintaining apartheid; it is intensifying the policy.

New York Times 5-22-60

These are the main forces involved in the crisis:

Whites: The white population of European origin numbers more than 3,000,000. About 1,700,000 are Afrikaners—descendants of the Dutch who settled South Africa; more than 1,300,000 whites are of British stock. Both groups are dedicated to white supremacy, but the more extreme Afrikaners, represented by the majority Nationalist party, initiated the strict apartheid policy.

Economic Importance

Blacks: There are about 10,000,000 Africans. They make up roughly 30 per cent of the work force in South African business and finance, more than 50 per cent in manufactures, about 90 per cent in mining and even more in agriculture. Thus the South African economy depends heavily upon them. One-third of the Africans live in "locations"—segregated areas in the cities. The remainder live on white men's farms or in tribal reserves. It is mainly from among the urban Africans, aware of the tide of nationalism sweeping over Africa, that the resistance to apartheid has come.

Coloreds: These are mulattoes and they number roughly 1,500,000, mainly in Cape Province. They have refused, by and large, to join the African demonstrations against apartheid, largely because they consider themselves a step above the Africans. Yet many of the apartheid restrictions apply to them, and to the 350,000 Indians who also live in South Africa.

The current crisis began on March 21 when South African police fired on Africans demonstrating against apartheid and killed seventy-two. The explosion of fear and violence that ensued reached a climax last week-end with the attempted assassination of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd.

Last week, although the violence abated, the sense of foreboding deepened. Dr. Verwoerd recovered sufficiently to give orders about Cabinet affairs and the government toughened its policy.

Police Stage Raids

The South African police force was enlarged and police staged daily and nightly raids on African areas, searching for "dangerous" or "treasonable" persons and weapons. Hundreds of Africans were detained. On Tuesday, in an attempt to isolate South Africa from its more liberal neighbors, the Government said it would bar foreign African labor. The step will hurt South African farms and mining enterprises which normally import thousands of African workers.

Wednesday the Government went further. Police began a drive to uproot "many thousands" of Africans now in cities and towns and send them to the tribal reserves. Francois C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, said the system of cheap African labor on which the country's economy is based must be revised and the whites must learn to do more work. In Capetown, many employers fired their African workers and replaced them with Cape coloreds.

In Johannesburg, leaders of the African protest demonstrations went on trial, accused of "terrible crimes on the white people of South Africa." Robert Mangalise Sobukwe, head of the outlawed Pan-Africanist Congress, told the court: "We stand for government of the African, by the African, for the African, with everybody owing his allegiance to Africa and prepared also to accept the rule of the African majority."

Call for Strike

The Africans' response to the Government's repression last week was the call for a strike. On Thursday and Friday the African National Congress, which takes a more moderate position than Mr. Sobukwe's group but which has also been outlawed, distributed leaflets urging all workers to stay away from their jobs for one week. The strike will be "our answer to the savage attack the Government has made on us," said the leaflets. According to the reports, Africans reluctant to strike were ordered to stay away from work under threat of force from those who backed the strike.

Yesterday the Government threatened to banish strikers to the native reserves in the interior. A government statement announced that unemployed Africans were being sent "back to their homelands" and added: "[African] workers are therefore, in their own interests, warned not to pay any attention to pamphlets or other forms of encouragement for them to stay away from work." Thus the prospect is for increasing violence in South Africa.

So far as international action is concerned, the United Nations Security Council has already deplored the violence, with no result. The issue is expected to be raised in London next month at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference. While the conferees may not take any official action, the expectation is that pressure will be brought to bear on South African representatives in private meetings.

The intensity of feeling engendered by South Africa's stand was underscored last week in Conakry, Guinea. There, the fifty-nation African-Asian Solidarity Conference, which includes Russia and Communist China, called on African and Asian countries to campaign for the "total isolation" of South Africa, beginning with a boycott of her goods.

NEW STRIKE SET IN SOUTH AFRICA

New York

Week-Long Stoppage Called in Johannesburg Area by Banned African Group

Fri. 4-15-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 14—A new threat of racial unrest developed today in South Africa.

Mimeographed sheets calling for a week-long work stoppage next week were distributed last night in African townships around Johannesburg. About 230,000 African men and 116,000 African women are employed in Johannesburg.

The circulars were signed by the Emergency Committee of the African National Congress, which, with the Pan-Africanist Congress, has been banned. Officers of the African National Congress said their organization would function underground.

A one-day work stoppage called March 28 by the group was 90 per cent effective in Johannesburg and it crippled many businesses in the area.

Leaflets Slipped Under Doors

The leaflets, most of which were slipped under the doors of African dwellings, said the work stoppage would be "our answer to the savage attack the Government has made on us and our leaders."

They called for an end to the system under which Africans must carry Government-issued identity passes in order to move about.

The leaflets demanded also the release of African leaders, the end of the state of emergency and the removal of the ban on African political organizations.

"Because of demanding and speaking for our rights hundreds of our leaders are today in prison," the leaflet said. "For fighting for freedom and justice our organizations have been outlawed, for protesting against pass laws many of our men, women and children have been killed, wounded and thrown in prison."

New York Times

Although the strike is scheduled to start Monday its effectiveness could not be measured until Tuesday because Monday is a national holiday and most persons will not be working.

Meanwhile, the Department of Bantu (African) Education reported that "intimidators" were trying to persuade teachers in African schools not to report for work next Tuesday. Willem Maree, Minister of Bantu Education, warned that if teachers did not appear he would have to consider closing the African schools.

In the Johannesburg regional court today Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe, president of Pan-Africanist Congress, said the major aim of his organization was to establish "a non-racial democracy in South Africa as well as throughout the whole of Africa."

Mr. Sobukwe and twenty-two other officials of the organization are on trial for inciting Africans to violate the pass laws.

"We stand for government of the African by the African, for the African, with everybody owing his allegiance to Africa and prepared also to accept the rule of the African majority," Mr. Sobukwe told the court.

He said that the membership in South Africa of the Pan-Africanist group, a militant offshoot of the African National Congress, was 200,000.

Goal Is African Union

"We regard it as our historic role to contribute toward a United States of Africa from the Cape to Cairo, from Morocco to Madagascar," Mr. Sobukwe said.

He testified that his organization hoped to achieve "complete freedom" for Africans in South Africa by 1963 and a democratic government.

"This means democracy as we have been taught it by the West," he said.

It was a call of the Pan-Africanist Congress for demonstrations against the pass system, in which the African National Congres joined, that led to the present state of emergency in South Africa. Extreme racial tension followed the shooting by the police of demonstrators March 21 at Sharpeville, an African township at Vereeniging, thirty-six miles south of Johannesburg.

The South African State Information Office said today that eighty-six Africans had been killed in racial strife between March 21 and April 9 throughout the country. It said the injured totaled 391 Africans and sixty-two whites.

Unofficial estimates place the numbers of dead and injured considerably higher. The information office said that the figures it reported might not reflect the totals because some casualties probably were not reported.

The agency estimated that damage by fire during the disturbances of the last few weeks in the Capetown area had been $280,000, mostly to churches and Government buildings in African townships.

Africans Shout in Court

In another Johannesburg court today Africans cried "rubbish" when a Government prosecutor said that nowhere in Africa had such an under-developed and primitive class of people attained so much in the last fifty years.

The 144 Africans, standing shoulder to shoulder in the tiny courtroom, were appearing on charges arising from their participation in the anti-pass campaign. Court orderlies had to shout for silence when the defendants cried out as the prosecutor, R. L. van Wezel, was summing up the case against them.

"Are you oblivious of the perpetration by members of your race of terrible crimes on the white people of South Africa?" he asked. He charged also that "the serious loss of life and damage to property in various parts of the country since the launching of the Pan-Africanist campaign pales into insignificance compared with what would happen in the country if the campaign is allowed to be intensified."

South Africa Parliament Is Forced to Adjourn

P. A 8 The Washington Post

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 21 (AP)—Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd's Nationalist Government today packed parliament off on an eight-month vacation despite bitter protests from opposition deputies.

Sun. 5-22-60

Parliament was officially adjourned until Jan. 20, 1961, after a stormy session in the House of Assembly at Cape Town last night.

Verwoerd's dominant Nationalist Party forced the adjournment. The Government still holds the powers of the state of emergency it proclaimed March 30 to cope with racial and political unrest. It also holds nearly 20,000 persons in jail without trial under these emergency regulations. The prisoners include 18,000 blacks.

Verwoerd's proposed reforms for restive Africans still have not been debated.

Liberal politicians and the press say Verwoerd's proposals, which were presented to Parliament only on its final night, are inadequate to ensure racial peace and the restoration of confidence in this country's future.

Opposition leaders also accused the Government of planning to use the emergency powers for political purposes, such as ramming through its popular referendum to make South Africa a Republic divorced from the British Crown, while Parliament is adjourned.

Washington Post

Parliament ended in acrimonious rows between English-speaking and Afrikaans-speaking deputies which some members termed the "renewal of war between Briton and Boer."

Children Arrested In Africa

Protested Jailing Of Their Parents

P. 1-8-A

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — (AP) — More than 20 white and black youngsters were arrested Saturday while demonstrating outside Johannesburg's city hall against the jailing of their parents under South Africa's emergency laws.

The children were bundled into police vans and taken to Marshall Square jail for questioning.

They ranged from small children to 17-year-olds. Later they were released separately and told to go home.

They had lined up on the steps of the city hall holding up placards declaring: "We want our parents" and "Why are you keeping my mother and father?"

The youngsters' parents are among 1,700 adults of all races jailed in South Africa as suspected political subversives. Emergency regulations proclaimed to combat racial violence allow them to be detained indefinitely without trial.

After the protest had begun a small deputation of white and Asian children were admitted to city hall for an audience with Mayor Alec Gorshel.

They handed the mayor a letter appealing to him to ask Justice Minister Francois Erasmus to obtain their parents' release.

The mayor and the children were still talking when a squad of police arrived outside the city hall and marched up to the children who were left outside to continue the silent demonstrations.

The South African Press Association reported that as the police led the children across the street, a large crowd of people gathered. Some shouted abuse at the police. The police ordered the crowd to disperse.

South Africa Natives Seek Boycott by All of Africa

New York Herald Tribune New York

By Joe Alex Morris Jr.

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

CAIRO, May 25.—Four South African nationalists said this week they would ask independent African countries to impose an economic boycott on South Africa at the African foreign ministers' conference in Addis Abeaba next month.

They called upon the people of Africa to take the lead in bringing pressure to bear upon South Africa to end its policy of white superiority. "We no longer expect the outside world to do anything for us," said Jariretundu Kozonguisi, of the Southwest Africa National Union.

Thurs. 5-26-60

Offers 3 Approaches

He suggested three approaches: economic sanctions, legal action, "military action." The latter he said was "always the last" and that the specific recommendation at Addis Abeaba would be for economic sanctions.

Oliver Tambo, vice-president of the African National Congress, added: "If there is to be any peaceful resolution to the South African impasse, it can only result from immediate and forceful action."

P. 13

Y. M. Dadoo, of the Indian National Congress, said 500,000 South African Indians were "allied completely with the freedom struggle." He accused the government of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd of genocide and declared "our task is to break the back of this mad regime."

The three men, plus Nana Mahomo, of the Pan-African Congress are touring Africa to rally support. They arrived here from Ghana and said they hoped to cover all independent African states and those due to become independent soon to "co-ordinate our force against the South African government."

EXPLOSION POINT NEAR?

Africa Stirs World Crisis

BY WILLIAM R. FRYE

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y.

IN THE BROAD SWEEP of history, the Johannesburg Massacre of March 21, 1960, may prove to have been as significant a turning point for the African continent as the Boston Massacre of March 5, 1770, was for North America.

On that winter day nearly 200 years ago, British Redcoats fired into a group of New England patriots agitating against colonial grievances. Five were killed. By this act, the British solidified and gave impetus to the American independence movement, providing an emotional issue of great force and discrediting the Tory cause. They virtually made the American Revolution inevitable.

LAST MONTH, just outside Johannesburg, South Africa, a modern revolution was similarly galvanized into blazing fury. Police opened fire on a crowd of 20,000 Africans protesting the compulsory carrying of hated "reference books" (passes). At least 72 were killed, and more than 250 wounded.

In many respects, the two events, 200 years apart, are comparable—and the result of the Johannesburg massacre could be to sweep the white man off the African continent as the British were swept from America.

UN Heard Reaction Of The Colored Areas

UNITED NATIONS diplomats, anxious to avoid the mass bloodletting which could accompany such an upheaval, sought to make of the UN this past week a safety valve. They summoned the UN Security Council into session and invited Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, Ethiopia, India and Pakistan to give voice to the Africans' anguish.

Representatives of these countries came and told their story—sometimes in the halting words of a man new to Western education, sometimes with eloquence and polish, always with deep emotion.

The South African delegate contended that the whole process of UN consideration would inflame, rather than relieve, tensions. He argued that the UN's eight previous airings of apartheid (racial segregation) in the General Assembly—each year since 1952—had had that effect. He dismissed the events of March 21 as "purely a local disturbance."

THE NIGERIANS who voted at a mass rally to demand the ouster of all white South Africans from their country did not consider it "local." Neither did the Indian parliament.

The Johannesburg Massacre may not have been the direct and immediate threat to world peace which Afro-Asian delegates, partly to meet legal and procedural requirements, sought to make of it; but it was obviously not a purely local problem.

All over the world, nonwhite peoples—and they constitute an overwhelming majority of the earth's population—are rising up to demand what they regard as their legitimate rights.

Explosion Expected If Pace 'Too Slow'

A SERIOUS STIR is abroad in the world, and the only solution UN people can see is a general recognition and acceptance of the fundamental fact that all men are created equal in the eyes of their common Heavenly Father.

Even in countries such as the Unied States where efforts are being made to translate this proposition into practical reality, the pace is too slow for the process to be wholly peaceful.

What has happened and is happening in South Africa, UN people say, is a warning that if the pace is too slow, or if no progress at all is made, there will be an explosion.

THE UN has done much, and attempted more, to ease the adjustment. The UN Trusteeship Council has supervised and spurred the progress toward independence of tens of millions. The Economic and Social Council has helped provide education, houses, clothing, and food—necessary or desirable preliminaries to self-government. The General Assembly has proclaimed a charter of human rights and sought to prod nations into complying.

The story is by no means a seamless robe of consistency. As United States delegate Henry Cabot Lodge indirectly reminded the Afro-Asians this past week, many of them tried to look the other way when Red China committed its bloody suppression of human rights in Tibet.

BUT THE UN'S influence, in general, has been toward a nonviolent solution of this most elementary and impelling of human problems: the demand of nonwhite peoples for political, economic, and social equality—now, regardless of the consequences.

"It is not five minutes to midnight; the midnight toll has already begun to ring," one UN diplomat said this past week. The voices of his colleagues in the Security Council chamber underlined the warning.

CAPETOWN DROPS AFRICAN PASSES IN WAKE OF RIOTS

Suspension of Hated Curb Indicates Major Change in Strict Racial Policies

MEETING BAN IS WIDENED

49 More Districts Included —South Africa Protests to U.S. on U.N. Session

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, March 26—Prime Minister Hendrick F. Verwoerd's Government suspended today a requirement of many years' standing that Africans carry passes.

The suspension came less than a week after rioting against the passes that resulted in the killing of seventy-two Africans and the wounding of 184.

The action came in the form of an announcement by the police that Africans would not be arrested for failure to carry the passes heretofore required for moving about in South Africa. Policemen were also instructed not to arrest Africans for trivial offenses.

The two steps were an effort to recognize and eliminate some of the Africans' major grievances. It appeared that a major change of policy might be in the making to give the Africans at least some formal voice in the affairs of a country where strict racial segregation is maintained.

Situation Is Troubled

[In Washington, South Africa protested to the United States against the scheduled United Nations Security Council meeting on the rioting. The meeting was postponed from Tuesday to Wednesday at the South Africans' request.

Meanwhile, the situation continued to be potentially explosive. This was indicated by the banning by Frahçois C. Erasmus, Minister of Defense, of public meetings until June 30 in forty-nine more magisterial districts in South Africa. Meetings in twenty-four major cities and towns were banned Thursday. Government announced plans yesterday to outlaw political organizations of Africans.

Mr. Erasmus insisted in a statement in Capetown that the suspension of pass requirements was temporary. However, observers, including many South Africans, believed it would be impossible to reimpose the hated requirements without generating a violent reaction.

The instructions to policemen said that, instead of making aetrrests for trivial offenses, they should warn the Africans involved or issue summonses.

Such offenses include violations of laws barring Africans from drinking strong alcoholic liquor and requiring them to observe curfews.

The announcement was a big victory for the Pan-Africanist Congress, organized about a year ago as political organization, and for the older African National Congress. Both have been campaigning for abolition of the pass laws and the Pan-Africanists led the demonstrations this week.

Since then South Africa has been in a state of extreme racial tension. Many Africans, who comprise the bulk of the labor force have stayed away from work in anger at police violence as well as to demonstrate the strength of their complaints. On the Johannesburg Stock Exchange share values have plummeted with losses at week's end about $300,000,000.

In announcing that there would be no arrests for pass violations Maj. Gen. C. I. Rademeyer, Commissioner of Police, implied that the move was necessary because some Africans were being intimidated by others into not carrying the papers. He referred to the passes as reference books, the official euphemism by which thye have been described in the last few years.

"In view of the fact that the Bantus [Africans], as a result of intimidation, are so gripped by fear to carry reference books or other documents and are even afraid to carry any monney, I have decided to relieve this tremendous tension and to prevent innocent and law-abiding Bantus from landing in trouble," he said. "I have instructed that no Bantu, male or female, is to be asked for his or her reference book or any other documents. No Bantu will be taken into custody because he is not repeat not in possession of his reference book.

"Bantus must not be arrested and detained for all sorts of petty offenses. They must be warned or summoned to appear."

One important effect of the order is that it will end the notorious farm-labor system. This provided that Africans found guilty, at the rate of hundreds weekly, of violations of the pass laws or other minor offenses were given the alternative of paying cash fines or serving several months working on private farms designated by the Minister of Justice. Most could not pay the fines.

The pass system was adopted many years ago to control movements of Africans and to confine them to various areas unless permissio nwas granted for them to go elsewhere. For example, passes have been used to limit the number of Africans moving from rural to urban areas to seek work.

Passes at present in use contain about fifty pages in which are recorded such information as employment, arrests and tax payments, as well as vital statistics and the photograph and home address of the holder. Each month the employer of an individual African must sign his pass or the African can be arrested and, in many cases, sent to an African reserve.

21 Children Jailed Briefly in Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 14 (AP).—Police carted off to jail 21 white and black children who were demonstrating at City Hall today against the imprisonment of their parents under South Africa's emergency laws.

The children, who ranged from toddlers to 17-year-olds, were questioned at Marshall Square Jail and then told to go home.

Mayor Alec Gorshel said he was astonished at the police action and had asked for an explanation from the police chief.

"I knew nothing about it until much later," said the mayor. "It seems the children were taken away while I was still having a talk with the deputation they sent up to me. I was so completely astonished and puzzled I did not know what to think.

The youngsters' parents are among 1,900 persons of all races jailed as suspected subversives since emergency regulations were proclaimed during racial violence that started March 21. Under the laws detained persons may be held indefinitely.

Children Carry Signs

The children lined up on the steps of City Hall, holding placards saying, "We Want Our Parents" and "Why Are You Keeping My Mother and Father?"

A small group of white and Asian children was admitted to City Hall to see the mayor. In a letter they asked him to persuade Justice Minister Francois Erasmus to free their parents.

While the group was inside a police squad arrived and began leading those on the steps into police vans. A large crowd gathered and some shouted abuse at the police. The crowd was forced to disperse.

Church Aid Banned

One of the child demonstrators raised her thumb in the "Africa freedom" salute.

Adult relatives of some of the 1,900 detainees planned 24 hours of prayer and fasting in Johannesburg's Anglican churches. However, Anglican authorities, fearing they would be prosecuted under the emergency laws, forbade use of the churches for the vigil on the grounds it was a political demonstration.

Justice Minister Erasmus declared tonight secret underground organizations were working to overthrow the government "with all the tested revolutionary methods of communism."

He spoke shortly after two defense department officials proposed arming the white population.

Bloody Clash Reported In South Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, June 12 (AP)—Press reports today claimed South Africa's government is hiding the true dimensions of a "horror story" that developed when police clashed with 400 Negro demonstrators in Pondoland last Monday.

At least three newspapers said police bullets killed 29 Negroes and injured 50 in the troubled African reserve bordering Cape Province and Natal.

The Ministry of Justice insists only six were killed. It claimed police fired in self-defense and blamed the unrest on the outlawed African National Congress.

Reporters for the papers said they had trouble getting into the area and that "whites living there say openly they have been told by the authorities to keep their mouths shut."

The reporters said the demonstration was the biggest of a series staged to protest the government's plan to rule the Negroes through appointment of chiefs and headmen. Some of the opposition took the form of attacks on huts and kraals (native enclosures).

The Johannesburg Sunday Times reported a heavy force of armed police, backed by armored cars and aircraft, have been assigned to the area to maintain order.

Two accounts of Monday's clash, attributed to eyewitnesses, were published today in the Durban Tribune and the Johannesburg Golden City Post, an African weekly.

The Tribune said more than 400 Negroes had assembled when a "Harvard aircraft dive-bombed them with tear gas bombs.

"The natives are said to have fired back at the plane (more than 6000 licensed firearms are owned by natives in the territory).

"Helicopters then reportedly landed men armed with Sten guns, who stepped out and fired at the natives.

"There has been a complete clampdown on news from Pondoland and whites living there have been told to keep their mouths shut."

Thirty Reported Killed In South African Clash

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, June 7 (Reuters)—Thirty Africans were reported to have been killed tonight in clashes between the police and tribesmen in the remote Pondoland African reserves of Southeast Cape Province.

An official silence covered activity in the area, where the police with armored cars and planes were said to be dealing with a "serious disturbance."

But the Durban newspaper Natal Mercury quoted unconfirmed reports as having said twenty-five tribesmen and five African police officers had been killed in clashes. Eight persons were reported to have been wounded.

Twelve Pondoland villages have been burned in tribal clashes in the last few weeks, ported today.

Africans Defying Work Ban Are Attacked by Mobs With Stones and Axes

Tues. 3-29-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Tuesday, March 29—Fifteen Africans are feared dead and scores have been injured in a new outbreak of violence in South Africa.

The casualties occurred last night in African dwelling areas within a few miles of the center of Johannesburg. They resulted from clashes between Africans and policemen and between Africans who went to work and those who remained home to observe a day of mourning for the seventy-two persons killed by the police in last week's riots.

Rioters in seven African townships southwest of the city attacked persons returning from work with stones, clubs, axes and guns. They set fire to churches and Government offices and tried to destroy three railway stations.

One Policeman Killed

The police were unable to provide a casualty list. They said an accurate assessment of the number of dead and injured was impossible before daybreak because the lights in the townships had been smashed. They reported one African policeman killed and two injured. The violence was reported to have subsided a short time before midnight.

The Government announced yesterday that it was prepared to use the army and air force to quell riots with which the police could not cope.

Jacobus J. Fouche, Minister of Defense, said in Parliament that both branches of service had been reorganized to deal with riots. He said mobile units equipped with armored cars would be stationed in the main cities.

The rioting last night was not confined to Johannesburg. Violence flared in Capetown and in an African dwelling area in Worcester, sixty miles north of Capetown. At Worcester several churches, schools, a clinic and administrative offices were destroyed by fire.

The Capetown police used tear gas and made charges, with batons swinging, to break up crowds of rioting Africans and colored persons (mulattoes).

Much of South Africa's African labor force stayed away from work yesterday. This provided a dramatic affirmation of African sentiment and served to emphasize the dependence of the country on African workers.

Only 10 per cent in Johannesburg reported for work in the morning. In many parts of the country, factories were closed, construction projects were halted and delivery services were drastically reduced. White housewives who depend on African help did their own housework.

The violence started in the evening when Africans who had worked were met as they returned home by those who had participated in the work stoppage. Trains and buses were stoned and taxis were overturned and burned.

Masses of angry Africans blocked roads and railroad lines into the townships. Many had been drinking.

After one train was reported derailed, railway service to the troubled areas was suspended.

Another report was that a Dutch Reformed Church in the African township of Dube had been set on fire and burned to the ground.

Systematic attacks on the police stations weer reported. The police were said to be powerless to control the fighting in the townships and were deployed at borders to prevent the violence from spreading to the white-inhabited areas.

Policemen used tear gas to disperse a crowd of 2,000 Africans who had gathered to demonstrate at Kliptown. Earlier in the day the offices of the African National Congress and the Indian National Congress were raided for the second time in four days by the police, who took away a number of documents.

One African was killed at New Brighton, near Port Elizabeth, in a clash between African railway workers who were on the job and an African gang supporting the stay-at-home protest.

Ban Submitted to Parliament

In Capetown, the Minister of Justice, François C. Erasmus, introduced in Parliament a bill to outlaw the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress. These organizations called for yesterday's demonstration and organized last week's demonstrations against the identity passes Africans were required to carry. Seventy-two Africans were killed in the rioting a week ago.

Mr. Erasmus said that the ban against the congresses and other organizations supporting African and Asian political action was necessary to preserve public order and safety.

Dr. Jan Steytler, leader of the anti-Government Progressive party, warned in reply that the solution of South Africa's problems did not lie in banning organizations but in consultation with moderate African leaders.

Introduction of the Government's bill was approved by a vote of 81 to 51. The legislation is to be rushed through Parliament and is expected to be enacted by the week's end.

Although the Government of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd yielded Saturday to African political pressure by suspending indefinitely the pass system against which the African congresses had been campaigning, the impression given yesterday was that the Government's attitude had hardened over the week-end.

The police warned that the burning of passes was a criminal offense. Persons who urge others to destroy their passes also will be prosecuted, the police said.

The New York Times March 29, 1960

ERUPTION OF RIOTING: The underlined places in South Africa were locales of the renewed violence.

The African National Congress had called for the mass burning of passes, but there were only a few token burnings by congress officials. Public gatherings for any common purpose except church services and funerals have been banned in South Africa until June 30.

The police said that many Africans who stayed away from work yesterday had done so because they were intimidated by Afrfican politicians. However, those questioned during a tour of African dwelling areas near Johannesburg said they were in complete sympathy with the observance.

In another development, the Mayor of Johannesburg, Alec Gorshel, said it would be impossible to govern the city without some control of the movement of Africans into Johannesburg. He said complete elimination of the pass system would mean that the 600,000 Africans here would be swamped by work-seekers from outside areas.

Policeman Killed in Attack

JOHANNESBURG, March 28 (AP)—Col. J. C. Lemmer, Deputy Commission of Police in Johannesburg, said tonight that a police constable was killed when he and two others were attacked between the townships of Orlando and Meadowlands as they were returning from work.

In Worcester township, northeast of Capetown, the police said all churches were burned by mobs.

NEW DELHI, India, March 28—The Indian Parliament formally deplored today the police shootings in South Africa last week in which seventy-two Africans were killed.

It extended "deep sympathy to the Africans who have suffered from this firing and from the policy of racial discrimination and the suppression of the African people in their own homeland."

Masked Negro Bands Defy Segregation

Chicago, Ill. Sun. 4-3-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 2 (AP)—Demonstrations against South Africa's white supremacy rule rolled up Saturday at Capetown and Paarl but police and military forces kept them from erupting into violence.

Paying no heed to the United Nations security council plea to abandon its segregation policy, the government tightened military control under a state of emergency decree in major cities and ports.

March on Capetown

Several thousand Negroes streamed out of their settlement of Nyanga and marched on Capetown, South Africa's legislative capital, but were stopped by police who ordered them to disperse.

Thousands of police, soldiers, and sailors tightened cordons around Nyanga and Capetown's other major Negro settlement, Langa. About 20,000 Negroes live in each.

In halting a car trying to get thru the cordon, white sailors shot and killed a Negro infant outside Nyanga, press reports said. The Negro boy was being taken to a hospital by his mother.

Burn Pass Books

In Paarl, a wine center 40 miles northeast of Capetown, several hundred Negro men and women gathered in front of the court building. They built bonfires and burned the pass books all nonwhites must carry for identification.

Opposition to the pass books is the major cause of the unrest sweeping South Africa. But most of the recent demonstrations have been attempts to free Negro leaders rounded up by police.

Police arrested several Negro leaders of the Paarl demonstration and the crowd dispersed without further incident. But Paarl remained tense and civilian defense units were kept on fulltime duty. Close watch was kept on nearby Negro settlements, where attempts were made during the night to set fire to white-owned buildings.

Police Quiet Durban

Durban on the east coast, where press reports listed four Negroes killed and 18 wounded in demonstrations Friday, remained quiet under a great show of police force.

The big Cato Manor Negro settlement of Durban, from where the demonstrators came, was ringed by strong forces of armed police supported by armored cars. Searchlights swept the settlement by night. An air force spotter plane circled overhead by day.

All roads out of Cato Manor were heavily guarded. All cars and buses were stopped and passengers searched for weapons.

Commonwealth Conference

The New York Times

The meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers which begins in London today is being characterized as crucial. This is because of the South African problem. Just about all the other countries of the Commonwealth are critical of apartheid and sensitive to the stigma that it could bring to the association as a whole. Yet the chances are strongly in favor of this extraordinary and unique world organization absorbing the shock (or "poison" if one wants to call it that) and carrying on as before.

The strength of the Commonwealth lies to a considerable extent in its weakness. It is so nebulous, so loose, so indefinable and so completely voluntary that it would be hard to figure out any method of destroying it. There is even no mechanism to expel South Africa if the other members wished to do so.

As a matter of fact, it is doubtful that even the new African member, Ghana, would want to take such drastic action. India and Malaya, as well as Ghana, would like to see apartheid condemned, but since the issue will certainly not appear on the formal agenda, no official censure is possible. The persecuted African of South Africa will be sitting like the ghost of Banquo at the conference table, but he cannot vote or speak at the London meeting.

The racial policy of South Africa will nevertheless be a weakening factor. As the Indian statesman, K. M. Panikkar, wrote in last Sunday's Observer of London, there are only two principles which are implied in Commonwealth membership. These are democracy as a form of government and racial nondiscrimination. South Africa violates both. However, it seems generally agreed that the Africans would not be helped if South Africa were forced to resign. Their plight might be worsened.

So the Commonwealth will go on. It has many advantages for its members and that, of course, is why it survives, as The Times of London has just pointed out in a series of three editorials. "Common to all members," it wrote, "is the benefit of the vast network of lines of communication—cultural, strategic, juridical, linguistic and economic—on which the Commonwealth rests." One might say that the members have nothing to lose and a good deal to gain by holding the Commonwealth together and that is sufficient excuse for carrying on.

JURIST CRITICAL OF SOUTH AFRICA

Observer Says Police State May Develop From Bills to Curb Press and Bar

New York Times

Special to The New York Times.

GENEVA, June 6 — Government bills on the press and the bar threaten to make South Africa a police state, an observer of the International Commission of Jurists said here today.

Frederick Elwyn Jones, British lawyer and Labor Member of Parliament, made the charge in his report on an eleven-day study he had just completed in South Africa on behalf of the commission, a nongovernmental organization representing more than 30,000 jurists and lawyers.

Mr. Jones said freedom of the press was "under very great peril" in South Africa from a Government bill that would impose a "far-reaching measure of censorship on all forms of reading matter and visual entertainment."

Curb on Lawyers Sought

Another bill would establish a Government-dominated board to regulate admission to the bar and suspension and removal of lawyers from practice, he said.

"The Nationalists regard the rule of law, as interpreted by an independent judiciary, as an unfortunate legacy of British colonial rule of the nineteenth century," he said.

Mr. Jones said that if the two bills became law, "the twelve years of Nationalist rule will have finally deprived all non-whites of almost all the human rights and fundamental freedoms set out in the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights."

"And the whites in South Africa will have suffered the grievous impairment of those same rights and freedoms," he continued. "South Africa will then be a police state."

Canadian Bids I. L. O. Act

GENEVA, June 6 (Reuters) — A Canadian delegate called on the International Labor Organization today to redouble its efforts to end South Africa's racial segregation policy.

Stanley Knowles, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, described apartheid as "an example of the blind obstinacy of a white minority trying to impose a system of slavery on a native majority."

E. K. Dadson, a representative of Ghana, called for a standing committee to be set up to discuss discrimination in South Africa and elsewhere in the world.

Johannesburg Students Riot

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, June 6 (AP) — Students clashed at Witwatersraand University today in a series of fist fights.

Trouble broke out when about 250 white and nonwhite students assembled to sit in a silent demonstration against the detention of political prisoners without trial.

A large crowd of students jeered the demonstrators, then hurled pepper bags, stench bombs, rolls of toilet paper and tomatoes at them. Fights broke out. The demonstrators called the other students "barbarians." The rival group responded with yells of "Communists."

SOUTH AFRICA BREAKS OFF RACIAL TALKS

LONDON, May 9 [Reuters] — Discussions by British commonwealth leaders with Eric Louw, South African External affairs minister about his country's racial segregation policies bogged down completely Monday.

Following a two hour private session, Louw ended his informal discussions of racial segregation with other ministers, informed sources said. At the same time it was announced Ghana had withdrawn an invitation for Louw to visit the West African nation.

Informed sources said Monday's session, at which advisers were barred, came on Louw's request and he protested about a press statement issued by Tunku Abdul Rahman, Malayan prime minister, last week attacking him. Rahman retorted that he issued his statement after Louw made it clear that there would be no change in his government's racial policy.

Granted Visa

South African Negro leader Oliver Tambo has been granted a U. S. visa for a speaking tour here, according to his sponsoring organization, the American Committee on Africa. The State Department had earlier listed Tambo as ineligible. He fled South Africa during the March rioting in Bechuanaland and filed from Cairo for permission to address the United Nations. His visa was held up a week and a half at the State Department because of what officials there called "red tape."

New leader takes over—

Foes say premier in poor condition

Birmingham, Ala.

BY RICHARD KASISCHKE

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 11—(AP)—Paul Oliver Sauer, chief of the Nationalist Party in Parliament, took over today as government leader in place of wounded Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd.

Mon. 4-11-60

Sauer promptly pledged to carry on Verwoerd's apartheid policies.

Sauer, 62, is minister of lands in the cabinet. He takes over the helm as senior member of the cabinet, but will not serve as acting prime minister, Foreign Minister Eric Louw said. But Sauer will preside at cabinet meetings.

Sauer told parliament the government will continue on its regular program and Verwoerd's course, adding "the rest of the cabinet will see that peace and order are maintained."

"As far as Parliament is concerned there will not be any deviations from the existing program as a result of what has happened," Sauer declared.

"We don't know how long Dr. Verwoerd will be incapacitated and when he will be able to resume his duties but Parliament will carry on its present program."

P. 1.

EVEN AS SAUER spoke South Africa's white police and courts continued to take sharp action to quell racial strife and continuing Negro work boycotts against white supremacy laws.

Verwoerd continued to show progress in a Pretoria hospital from two head wounds inflicted Saturday by a wealthy white farmer. An anti-government newspaper suggested he may have been injured more severely than his doctors admit.

The Rand Daily Mail said the two bullets "may have caused damage which could impair his speech, his sense of balance, his hearing and possibly his mental state for some time."

A medical bulletin said Verwoerd is still weak but making progress, adding: "Reassurance can be given that there is no sign of paralysis and, according to the progress made so far, paralysis is not expected."

VERWOERD'S ASSAILANT, David Pratt, 52, had not appeared for arraignment in Johannesburg magistrate's court by late afternoon. Legal authorities were reported to be debating what charges should be brought.

Teams of detectives revisited the scene of the shooting—Johannesburg's Union Exposition Trade and Agricultural Fair.

The decision not to appoint an acting prime minister followed discussions at a special cabinet meeting Saturday night.

The cabinet also held a meeting this afternoon after a parliamentary caucus meeting of Verwoerd's Nationalist Party.

Authorities in the midst of the crisis pressed their crackdown on Negro resistance to South Africa's segregation policy.

A LARGE FORCE of armed police, supported by armored cars, staged big door-to-door raids on a sprawling Negro settlement five miles outside Johannesburg.

Scores of Africans were hauled away in police trucks. Many weapons were reported taken in what Col. J. C. Lemmer, deputy commissioner of police described as "a cleanup operation."

Lemmer said the arrested Negroes will be screened to sort out tsotsis (young hooligans) and illegal residents. A check also will be made on Negroes who burned their passbooks which police now are again demanding. The Africans' campaign for abolition of the passbook system launched the current racial strife March 21.

Mon. 4-11-60

Reports from Port Elizabeth on the south coast said 26 Negroes were arrested there on charges of incitement and intimidation.

The South African Press Assn. said leaders of the outlawed Pan Africanist Congress tried to organize a "stay at home" demonstration for today in Negro settlements outside Johannesburg but it failed. Most Negro workers were on the job.

AT PRETORIA, a deputy commissioner of police warned white employers they would be held more responsible than Negroes for seeing passbook regulations are observed.

Government Hides White Farmer's Fate For Killing Attempt

Tues. 4-12-60

Montgomery, Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — The government Monday night hid the fate of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's would-be assassin behind state-of-emergency regulations. This left authorities free to try him anywhere and at any time they choose.

SAUER

With Verwoerd sidelined for an indefinite period, the Cabinet called on Paul Oliver Sauer, a Nationalist party elder statesman, to run the government while the Prime Minister recovers. Sauer promptly promised to carry on Verwoerd's white supremacy policies.

Police ordered the press to quit printing the name of David Pratt, 52, wealthy white farmer and English clubman who shot Verwoerd twice in the head Saturday. Friends have described Pratt as a foe of Verwoerd's apartheid — or race segregation—policy.

FUTURE DATE

A police spokesman said only that Pratt "will appear in court at some future date." There was press speculation that Pratt, whose arraignment had been expected Monday, will be charged with high treason. This charge carries a death penalty.

Sauer, 62, minister of lands, Nationalist party leader in Parliament, and senior member of the Cabinet, promptly informed Parliament there will be no deviation in Verwoerd's racial policies.

As if to underscore his words, police staged a roundup of Negro foes of white supremacy laws outside Johannesburg and in the Port Elizabeth area on the south coast.

The government also placed eight more of South Africa's 300 magisterial districts under a state of emergency. The total under a state of emergency is now 119.

Speaking to a tense session of Parliament in Cape Town, Sauer promised a thorough investigation of the shooting of Verwoerd at Johannesburg.

OFFICIAL STEP

While Sauer will preside at Cabinet meetings he will not be named acting prime minister, Foreign Minister Eric Louw said. Louw indicated Verwoerd's condition was not serious enough to warrant the official step of appointing and swearing in an acting prime minister. He also hinted that in serious policy matters Verwoerd would be able to give his counsel.

Medical bulletins from Pretoria, where Verwoerd is hospitalized with two .22 caliber bullet wounds in his head, said the Prime Minister is weak but making satisfactory progress.

"Reassurance can be given that there is no sign of paralysis and, according to the progress made so far, paralysis is not expected," the bulletin added.

REMOVE BULLETS

Decision still was deferred on when to perform a delicate operation to remove the bullets that struck his face and right ear.

The opposition newspaper Rand Daily Mail said earlier Verwoerd doctors admit. It said the bullets "may have caused damage which could impair his speech, his sense of balance, his hearing and possibly his mental state for some time."

Tue. 4-12-60

There was no medical confirmation.

Sauer told Parliament doctors were satisfied with Verwoerd's condition and "considered it to be a miracle that a permanent injury had not been caused."

ATTEMPT DEPLORED

With opposition parties joining, Parliament unanimously adopted a resolution deploring the assassination attempt and expressing hopes for Verwoerd's quick recovery.

"As far as Parliament is concerned, there will not be any deviations from the existing program as a result of what has happened," Sauer told Parliament.

"We don't know how long Dr. Verwoerd will be incapacitated and when he will be able to resume his duties, but Parliament will carry on its present program. The rest of the Cabinet will see that peace and order are maintained."

Arraignment May Be Secret; Cabinet to Meet

Washington, D.C.

Mon. 4-11-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 10 (AP) Officials were reported today preparing a quick and possibly secret arraignment of the debonair white farmer who shot down Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd in an assassination attempt.

the Cabinet prepared to meet Monday to discuss South Africa's deepening racial crisis and the situation arising from the shooting.

The 58-year-old Verwoerd, unbending champion of white supremacy and racial segregation, was brushed from the helm of the nation's affairs yesterday as South Africa faced its most fearsome challenge from 10 million Negroes.

With two small caliber bullets still in his head, Verwoerd was well enough today to be removed from Johannesburg to a Pretoria hospital, where he was reported in satisfactory condition. Doctors said he was resting well and there was no need for an immediate operation to remove the bullets.

Cato Manor Raided

As an ambulance sped the wounded Prime Minister to Pretoria, 600 police and 1000 troops moved into the troubled Negro settlement of Cato Manor, outside the east coast city of Durban, and made a shack-to-shack search.

They arrested more than 300 Negroes, holding 143 of them, and seized a truckload of spears, knives, axes and seven sticks of dynamite.

The 8-hour raid beginning at dawn, was one of the largest ever carried out in Natal Province.

The segregated settlement is a hotbed of resistance to Verwoerd's white supremacy laws.

Informed sources said David Pratt, the wealthy 52-year-old man who fired the two bullets into Verwoerd's head at the Johannesburg agricultural exposition, will be arraigned before a magistrate Monday in some small town to avoid the violence that might erupt in a large city.

He was examined by medical experts today and was visited at the Marshall Square jail in Johannesburg by his daughter by his first marriage.

A friend said Pratt "hates Nationalists and Verwoerd is Nationalist No. 1."

The daughter said her father was "perfectly contented" nad "not upset by his situation."

The assailant and his second wife are estranged and he has been seeking a reconciliation, informants said. She is in Hollnad.

A friend said Pratt had been having psychological troubles. The operator of a large farm 30 miles outside Johannesbur, Pratt also has been interested in a Johannesburg candy factory and was well-known in local society.

He has largely withdrawn from management of the candy factory, which last Christmas made large donations for the poor. Police said he came to South Africa from England when he was four years old.

He was nattily dressed in green sports jacket and slacks when he made his way to Verwoerd's box at the farm fair, spoke the Prime Minister's name softly and then began shooting.

Detectives and security police today searched several homes in the Johannesburg area in connection with the shooting, but did not disclose what they were looking for. So far there has been no indication of any accomplices.

Pratt was roughly handled by those in the crowd who could reach him at the shooting scene, and later there were some shouts against English-speaking journalists.

But despite the British background of the assailant, only a limited amount of anti-British sentiment has welled up among extremely nationalistic Dutch-descended Afrikaners.

Leading English-speaking South Africans were among the first to express their shock over the assassination attempt.

It was noted with some uneasiness, however, that such communications centers as the post office and government radio stations still were under police guard.

[Police also guarded the offices of the English-language newspapers, The Star and the Rand Daily Mail, United Press International reported.]

The agricultural exposition, which Verwoerd opened yesterday to commemorate the 50-year existence of the Union of South Africa, is to reopen Monday. It was ordered closed after the shooting.

South African Rioting Controlled After Police Fire Kills 6 Persons

The Montgomery Advertiser

By RICHARD KASISCHKE

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Justice Minister Francois Erasmus said Wednesday rioting among thousands of Negroes in native lands south of Durban has been brought under control after a clash in which police fire killed six.

Thurs. 6-9-60

Twenty-one natives were arrested after that clash Monday.

Erasmus made his report in a statement issued at Pretoria, South Africa's administrative capital. Police used helicopter, spotter planes and armored cars in the operation against the rioters. Reinforcements have moved into the area.

A senior officer, speaking from police "combat" headquarters in the small village of Bizana, said the situation has "quieted down nicely, but we are standing by in case of further trouble."

Only the official side of the story can be obtained at present, but a correspondent of the Johannesburg Star, reported from the tribal center of Lusikisiki that natives claim at least 15 tribesmen were shot dead and others wounded.

The unrest is being played down by the government, but the situation generally is believed serious by high police officials. Several have made personal inspection trips.

The outbreak was the worst since rioting erupted in South Africa's urban Negro settlements in March against the white government's racial segregation policies. But the recent clashes took place in the Transkei native reserve, a rural area set aside for Negroes. The government claims the black man is happiest there surrounded by his native, tribal element.

TRIBAL WARFARE

Erasmus said the tribesmen's actions did not seem to be directed at the area's few white people, most of them government administrators. He characterized the outbreaks as tribal warfare and blamed them on the murder of two native headmen and the burning of a number of their huts.

Of the Monday incident, he said: "during police action organized bands resisted police and fired on them. The police were forced in self-defense to return the fire."

The unrest appears mainly due to native resentment of the government's efforts to force changes in traditional patterns of agriculture. Some of the trouble stems from fencing off grazing lands and setting up enclosures.

The outbreaks took place in the Bizana, Flagstaff and Lusikisiki areas of Pondoland, part of the Indian Ocean. Pondoland lies about 170 miles south of Durban on a plateau of 2,000 to 4,000 feet. The land is mainly used for diarying and stock-raising.

SET ASIDE

It now has about 350,000 inhabitants and has been set aside for native farmers for years.

Brig H. J. Duplooy, the acting commissioner of police, made a special inspection trip to the area. He reported that the government's Bantu—native — administration is trying to iron out the quarrels.

The Justice Minister said his department is considering confiscation of at least some firearms until law and order are restored. Natives in the Transkei are allowed to buy firearms for self-protection, and Erasmus said about 6,000 gun permits have been issued there.

HUNGER STRIKE

Meanwhile, A. Forbes Robinson, the only white man still held in Port Elizabeth jail under emergency regulations prompted by the nation's racial crisis, entered the ninth day of a hunger strike. He told visitors he is protesting his detention without trial. A salesman, he is known for his relief work among Port Elizabeth's poor of all races.

The Nationalist newspaper Transvaler reported that the government is seeking white immigrants from the Belgian Congo, due to become independent June 30. Whites have been leaving the Congo by the thousands in fear of their future under native rule.

South Africans Urged To Change Racial Policies

The Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta, Ga.

Thur. 6/9/60

JOHANNESBURG (UPI)—The pro-government newspapers Die Transvaler Wednesday urged South African whites to "undergo a great change of heart" and reappraise race relations.

Commenting on the white exodus from some parts of Africa, the newspaper said in an editorial that 25,000 whites already have left the Belgian Congo "because life there for them is becoming intolerable."

Die Transvaler, once edited by Premier Hendrik Verwoerd, said: "it is obvious that more whites from other parts of the continent will follow. Soon there will be less than 5 million whites in the whole continent. The exodus of so many whites is tragic . . . equally tragic is that so few white South Africans do not know or care about developments in 'Africa.'"

Police Fire On Armed South African Negroes

DURBAN, South Africa, April 1 (UPI)—Police fired into a crowd of several thousand club and hatchet-waving Negroes marching on the heart of this city today and killed three of them.

Three other Africans, including one woman, were hospitalized with gunshot wounds in the worst flareup of racial violence since the government declared a national state of emergency on Wednesday.

Yesterday, police halted without bloodshed a march from Cato Manor by 5000 Negroes. Today, several thousand Negroes, carrying clubs, hatchets and pieces of wire, stormed from their reserve into the city.

As the crowd surged toward the downtown business district, it dragged Africans from shops and of the silewalks to swell the throng.

Police with armored cars and soldiers with bayonets fixed on their rifles lined up across West Street, the main thoroughfare of the city, and shouted warnings to disperse.

Warning shots were fired in the air. As Negroes kept surging forward, shots were fired into the crowd.

Witnesses saw six Africans fall to the ground. Three of them writhed and clutched their legs. Three others lay still. The dead were removed to a city morgue, the wounded to a hospital.

The firing stopped the crowd. It dispersed into side streets and the city subsided into tense watchfulness.

In Johannesburg, police reported all quiet during the daylight hours after a flareup last night in which one person was killed and seven wounded.

South Africa Gets Threat of Total Work Boycott

Abolition of Pass Laws for Nonwhites Asked

New Orleans La

By LYNN HEINZERLING

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Militant Negro leaders warned Tuesday they will call a total work boycott unless South Africa's government abolishes pass laws for nonwhites.

"We have said before and we repeat that there can be no peace in this country until the demands of the African (nonwhite) people are fully met," said a statement from William Jolobe, spokesman for the Pan-Africanist Congress.

The one-day boycott that erupted in bloody violence Monday gave an inkling of what such a total boycott could do to the South African economy. It was declared about 90 per cent effective. Negro labor forms the broad base for South African production.

CAPE TOWN CRIPPLED

Negroes streamed back to work in Johannesburg after the night of violence but Cape Town still was crippled. Police ranged through the Negro quarters of Johannesburg looking for riot leaders.

The rules forcing nonwhites to show their passes to police were suspended last weekend following a campaign by the Pan-Africanists. But the government declared the suspension is temporary. The government has threatened to arrest anyone burning his passbook, long a symbol of the Negro's inferior status in jobs, homes and political power.

At Cape Town, Justice Minister F. C. Erasmus told Parliament the acts of the Pan-Africanists were close to revolution.

TO HIKE PENALTIES

"They want our country," he declared. "They want to bring the white government to its knees."

He announced that penalties for victimization and intimidation will be increased 10 times to a maximum of $1,400, five years in prison, 10 lashes, or a combination of all these. He said even stiffer sentences will be imposed if necessary.

The African National Congress, the dominant and more moderate Negro organization, called the stay-at-home boycott Monday as a day of mourning for 72 Negroes slain by police in antipass violence March 21.

But the Pan-Africanists announced they could not guarantee the safety of any Negro who insisted on going to work. Negroes fought with members of their own race to enforce the work ban, touching off the second wave of violence.

OUTBREAKS REGRETTED

A Negro policeman and a Negro civilian were killed. Negroes burned churches, schools and other buildings. Roads were barricaded, trains stoned and rail service halted.

Police began rounding up tsotsis—young toughs—they blame for the boycott riots.

Wilkins hits massacre in South Africa

The Afro-Am, Baltimore, Md
Sat 4-2-60

WASHINGTON — The U. S. The text of Mr. Wilkins' letter to the U.S. State Department follows:

"The shockingly brutal slaughter of more than 100 men, women and children by the police of the Union of South Africa in the past twenty - four hours warrants, we believe, a re-examination of the relations of the United States of America with that nation.

"The butchery reported when Africans invited arrest in protest against the law requiring the carrying of passes, is unmatched except by the wholesale killings of the Hitler regime in Nazi Germany.

"Conservative and usually dispassionate news dispatches use the phrase "mowed down" to describe the police action with automatic weapons against unarmed men and women.

* * *

"THE UNITED STATES cannot remain inactive in the face of mass murder perpetrated by a state against unarmed civilians. Just a few days ago the State Department expressed its concern over pre-election violence and other alleged irregularities in connection with an election in the Republic of Korea. We have deplored policies and practices in Communist China.

"It is a matter of pride to every American that our country has continued to condemn in the strongest terms the ruthless murder of Hungarian citizens by troops and tanks of the Soviet Union.

"The Government of the Union of South Africa was not content with using automatic weapons and armored cars against Africans, but all reports state that diving jet plans were also employed to frighten the civilians and force them to disperse.

"It is altogether possible that either the armored cars or the jet planes, or both, were purchased with funds made available to the Union of South Africa by the United States under its international aid program.

* * *

"IN OUR OPINION, never has there been a more justifiable reason than this massacre for withdrawing recognition of a country. The Union of South Africa, through this callous and murderous action against its own citizens has forfeited its right to recognition by the leader of the Free World nations. The dark action of the past two days places that country outside the pale of western democratic society.

"The diplomatic representatives of the United States should be recalled at once and all economic aid and commercial relations with this government of barbarity should be cut off.

"We are not unaware that the steps we urge constitute a grave breach in relations between nations, and demand the most thoughtful attention on the highest level.

"Nevertheless, we urge prompt severance to avoid any conclusion in the minds of the people of the world that the United Sates of America, itself born of protest against tyranny and oppression, condones wanton slaughter as an instrument of state power."

So. Africa yields on pass law

The Afro-Am
Baltimore, Md.
Sat 4-2-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Yielding to mounting pressure from 12 million nonwhites, the South African government announced that no more colored persons would be arrested for failing to carry their pass books.

The announcement came from Pretoria police headquarters as a fast spreading work stoppage crippled the nation's industry. The strike was called by the Pan - Africanist Congress which urged non - whites to invite arrest by leaving their passes at home and "fill the jails."

Earlier last week the desperate South African government took desperate action to cripple a growing protest movement against racial laws. But the government measures backfired as 12 million non - whites joined into a solid bloc of resistance.

Spurred by the government action, the Afrian National Congress (ANC), which remained aloof from the earlier demonstrations called by the less powerful but more militant Pan - Africanist Congress (PAC), joined in the movement for a day of mourning next Monday.

Albert Luthuli, president of ANC, urged every non-white man, woman and child to stay home Monday to "protest against police kilings and against the pass laws."

The stay - at - home movement has produced a creeping paralysis, particularly at the important coal and steel center of Vereeniging, 30 miles south of Johannesburg, one of the trouble spots Monday.

* * *

SOME FACTORIES there were closed. Others carried on with white technicians and clerks doing the work of laborers. Industrialists estimated 80 percent of the work force was absent.

The government's ban on public meetings applies to meetings of more than 12 persons, but will not affect a rally scheduled by Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd set for Saturday. The ban applies to all races and will last until June 30.

Police said the ban would not prevent religious services or funerals, but even these would require a chief magistrate's written consent.

The government's stern actions are designed to break up organizations of demonstrations for next Monday and Thursday, set down as days of mourning for nearly 100 persons killed by police early last week.

At the United Nations, U.S

Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, current president of the U.N. Security Council, said he will call a meeting of the Council early next week to deal with the "distressing" South African racial conflict. The announcement came after 29 Asian and African nations decided to bring the issue before the Council.

BY SAUL PETT, AP newsfeatures writer

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 31—(AP)—This may be the Armageddon of the white man in Africa

News. 5-31-60

Here in the Union of South Africa, the most highly developed, most prosperous nation on the continent the white man is strongest most deeply entrenched and outnumbered by blacks only 3 to 1.

Here, he is most determined to hold on to his way of life. While the "wind of change" may sweep the rest of Africa, the white man here, particularly the Afrikaner or man of Dutch extraction, is ready to fight to the end rather than share his rule or be ruled by the black man.

To a visitor, it is a strange, tortured country full of natural beauty and human ugliness. But the broad sweep of the veld, the clear, vivid air of the high interior, the lush rolling hills and graceful blue gum trees along the Indian Ocean coast do not quite make up for the oppressive atmosphere.

P. 30

This is a melting pot, where the human ingredients never melted. A land of mutual distrust, where the Afrikaner still resents the Englishman (who beat him in a war 60 years ago), and both groups of whites distrust the black man, the mixed breeds and the Indians, and all the non-white groups dislike each other, and the white man's dog barks only at the natives.

IN SOUTH AFRICA, there is a ghetto for almost everyone, real or imagined, voluntary or enforced, for rich, for poor, for Afrikaner, for Englishman, for black, brown, tan and off-white.

This is a country of tension and fear, where some whites are selling out and moving abroad, where many (especially the English) are talking about leaving, where property values have tumbled because the white man isn't buying and the black man can't.

This is a taut country in a state of emergency, where armored cars stand ready to move out against renewed rioting, where political prisoners remain in jail without charge, where a world-famous novelist, Alan Paton, feels he must choose his words carefully lest he be arrested for undefined subversion.

Where many people sleep with guns near their beds because the native crime rate is high, where a departing housewife locks up her refrigerator, clothes and liquor cabinet and leaves the lights on and the radio blaring in an empty house. Where the white man is told by police to shoot first and ask question later if he comes on a black prowler.

Where in periods of unrest, country people have moved their wives and children into the cities or a village hospital for protection, the way American pioneers used to race for the nearest cavalry fort in an Indian attack.

THIS IS ONE of the world's last and strongest outposts of Kipling-esque empire, where even a middle class white can still live like a 19th century colonial. Almost everyone has one or two servants who live in the little house in the back because you can get a domestic from $12 to $20 a month, plus food and lodging. The black man is called "boy" whether he's 6 or 60, and the black man calls the white man 'boss" or "master."

This is a painfully color-conscious country, where the government is trying to classify people by their complexions, where they are examined full face and in profile and asked the most personal questions. Where a man thought to be white may lose his job, his wife and his home if his color or history proves less than pure white.

A black is stopped by a policeman and asked for his pass book. The native says the book is in the house where he works across the street or in that garage 10 yards away. But he is arrested anyway without a chance to get the book—not always but often.

THE GOVERNMENT says such things either don't occur or if they do they are the fault of an overzealous policeman. South Africa has many overzealous policemen.

On a pass-book sweep, a policeman handcuffs one black to his left wrist and another to his right and if business is especially brisk he handcuffs other natives to a street post or fence until the police van comes for the day's catch.

Police sweep into a native area in the middle of the night and wake people out of bed asking for pass books.

At home, a black pregnant woman cries her time has come. Her husband runs out on the street headed for the doctor. On the way police stop him, No pass book; it's home. He goes to jail, to disappear for days or even months without word to his wife.

This also happens, not often, but often enough:

Arrested natives are herded before a court or native affairs commissioner. While they're waiting to be charged, a farm labor recruiter approaches a frightened black man. He says the punishment will be severe but the black man can go free if he only agrees to work on a farm.

THE FRIGHTENED native agrees. The farm recruiter goes before the presiding officer, announces numbers 24, 305 and 408 are ready to work for him and away they go to distant farms.

The native has no chance to inform his family. He just disappears, sometimes for months, and only a lawyer armed with a habeas corpus might find him. Lawyers cost money. Blacks don't have money.

Many whites, both Afrikaners and English, are outraged by these abuses of the pass book system. But many are not, or are afraid to do anything about it.

"We're not normal people here," says Alan Paton, who seeks complete equality for the natives. "Either you abandon your values or you have to dilute them.

"CHILDREN ARE GIVEN a double standard of morality. Love, justice, truth apply only to whites, not blacks or Indians. Many people refrain from ordinary acts of mercy because they're afraid of what other people may think.

"If a black woman falls in the street, it takes some courage for a white man to pick her up."

C. W. Prinsloo, chief information officer for the Department of Native Affairs, complains that the foreign press cites only the abuses of the pass system. "Why," he asks, 'don't you also mention the thousands of Bantus (natives) who are helped by the pass books?"

All right: Thousands are helped, because only 38 per cent are literate, and frequently, if a native is sick and dying, the only way to determine where he came from or where he worked is by his pass book.

Tomorrow: A blind revolution?

SECURITY COUNCIL MEET

The Florida Times Union Jacksonville, Fla. Thurs. 3-31-60

South African U.N. Delegate Walks Out

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., March 30 (AP)—South Africa's chief U.N. delegate walked away from the Security Council table today after warning that debate here might spark new and more widespread racial turmoil in his country.

Bernardus Gehardus Fourie, permanent U.N. representative for South Africa, told members of the 11-nation council that if new turmoil occurs the blame will rest squarely on their shoulders.

His dramatic gesture did not amount to an all-out boycott. He seated himself in a row of chairs at one side of the council chamber, after his walkout. A delegation spokesman said Fourie was awaiting instructions from his government on future course of action.

Opening Speaker

Fourie was the opening speaker as the council began debate on a request by 29 Asian-African nations that it consider the mass shooting of Negroes in South Africa by white police.

U.S. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, president of the council for March, declared the council's agenda adopted without taking a formal vote.

That assured full-scale debate with representatives of the Asian-African group denouncing the shootings and calling for council action aimed at halting additional violence.

Fourie said it must be clearly understood that his government "fully intends to discharge its duties to maintain public order and safety, and to safeguard the internal security of the country, whoever may threaten it — white or nonwhite."

Grounds Asked

He asked on what grounds the U.N. proposed to single out South Africa for dealing with what his government contends is purely an internal matter of no legal concern to the United Nations.

He said that if other nations were not prepared to submit to similar U.N. handling of their domestic affairs "must one then assume that it is a case of South Africa being made the whipping boy?"

He asserted the situation would grow more serious if the present debate incites attacks not only on police, but on masses of peaceful citizens trying to carry on a normal life.

"I am instructed to say," he added, "that if this were to be the result, the blame will rest squarely on the shoulders of the Security Council."

New Wave Of Violence Hits Africa

Non-Whites Battle With Negro Workers; Fires Hit Churches

JOHANNESBURG (AP)—Great fires set by mobs raged northeast of Cape Town Monday night as white police battled with Negroes and militant Negroes fought both police and other Negroes. It was the fiery, violent climax to South Africa's "day of mourning."

Widespread violence and arson erupted when the militant leaders sought to enforce a work boycott against other Negroes in protest against the killing of 72 persons shot down by white police a week ago.

One Negro policeman was reported killed and two others injured in clashes outside Johannesburg.

At least one white policemar was killed, the first reported death of a white person since the campaign started against the government's white supremacy laws last Monday.

ALL CHURCHES BURNED

In Worcester Township, northeast of Cape Town, police said all the churches, including the Dutch Reformed church — which generally has supported racial segregation—Catholic schools and administrative offices were burned by mobs.

All kinds of weapons were reported used in mob fights. How many casualties resulted was not known.

In Cape Town police threw tear gas and made three baton charges to break up an unruly crowd after a volley fired into the air had failed.

Col. J. C. Lemmer, deputy commissioner of police in Johannesburg confirming the death of a white constable, said he and two others were attacked between the townships of Orlando and Meadowlands as they were returning from work.

CONSTABLE STABBED

The dead constable was stabbed. One of the injured was stabbed, the other shot.

Buildings in Meadowlands were damaged by fire.

Trains and station buildings in Negro townships southwest of Johannesburg were damaged as Negroes surrounded them to cut off the few who went to Johannesburg to work during the day.

The National African Congress and Pan-Africanist Congress had called for a stay-at-home observance out of respect for the dead.

The stay-at-home was a success in Johannesburg and Cape Town and some other cities where it was observed by 90 to 95 per cent of the Negro workers. In other areas it was not observed so widely.

The area in which violence centered southwest of Johannesburg is about 30 square miles and contains 24 townships with a population of 350,000.

Negroes in townships waited for the trains bringing workers back from Johannesburg and then showered them with barrages of stones.

A railway spokesman said there was bedlam in stations, with women passengers lying on the floor and glass falling around them.

All roads leading into the townships were blocked by rioters.

Stones, an old cement mixer, logs — anything available —were used to stop traffic.

One group of policemen, cornered near an overhead bridge at one station, could not be rescued until after armored cars arrived and a baton charge was ordered.

Taxis trying to run the road blockades were reported set afire. Trouble in Cape Town flared with a crowd of nonwhite demonstrators near midcity.

Buses and passing automobiles were stoned and a shop window in Darling street was broken.

A white motorist whose car struck a nonwhite woman in the crowd was attacked when he went to assist her. He was rescued.

Police made three baton charges into the crowd but it was not quelled until two hours later after police, some wearing steel helmets and carrying rifles, used tear-gas bombs.

At Kliptown near Johannesburg police used tear gas to break up a mob of Negroes trying to enforce the work bcycott.

ANOTHER CLASH

Another clash between Negroes occurred at Alexandria Township as workers returned from Johannesburg. Here demonstrators set taxis of returning workers on fire and beat up the occupants.

From other townships came further reports of African workers being stoned as they returned home. Some were reportedly threatened with reprisals if they return to work Tuesday.

W. J. P. Carr, a Johannesburg municipal official, described the situation as serious in Negro townships scuthwest of here. His entire staff had been evacuated from the townships, he said.

A municipal tool building at Orlando West was burned down. Unconfirmed reports of arson were received from other areas as bands of Africans roamed about.

The main municipal office at Zola was attacked by mobs, Carr said, and one main rcad was blocked at several points.

VAST AMBUSH

Orlando Township was described as "one vast ambush." All railway stations on a 15-mile stretch between Canada and Nelegi were surrounded and stoned, it was reported.

Negroes spent the day piling up stones for the attacks. Police sent in to stop the attacks were cornered and stoned, and reinforcements had tc be sent.

Police said they saw battle axes in the hands of some of the crowd, and heard Negro women giving the traditional war cry, "Le-e—le."

Police said members of the Pan-Africanist Congress led in trying to keep other Negroes home from work.

Mourning Day Slated By Africans

Negro Workers Plan To Honor 72 Killed Before Police Guns

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Nervous and shaken by a week of racial turmoil, white South Africans awaited anxiously Sunday night for Monday's day of mourning for the 72 black dead of Sharpeville and Langa.

Albert Luthuli, president of the African National Congress and probably the most respected African leader in South Africa among the black population, has spread word from big city locations to country kraals that Monday is the day of the dead.

Negro workers were told to stay home out of respect for those who fell before police guns last Monday and for the nearly 200 wounded.

FATEFUL DAY

The former Zulu chief, who Saturday night burned his government-issued pass, urged all other Negroes also to stay in their homes Monday and to avoid demonstrations. With all leaves canceled and special dispositions ordered, police stood ready for any eventuality.

But if Monday looms as a fateful day, it was not apparent in Johannesburg and most other cities in the union. Under a bright sun and blue sky whites and blacks relaxed as on any other Sunday.

Quiet lay over the whole Johannesburg area, where some 650,000 blacks and 350,000 whites live. It was quiet too at the focus of the nation's troubles—Vereeniging and Capetown — but the nervousness and shock which swept the entire nation last Monday was more intense there. Many householders lingered newly bought guns.

RECENT DAYS

A series of drastic emergency measures, announced by the government in recent days, added reality to the general uneasiness.

Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd raised the fever a few notches Saturday night when he referred to "revolutionary elements" threatening the white government here. The Prime Minister has contended that last Monday's bloody events related to riots farther north in the Belgian Congo and Nyasaland, where outright independence is the objective.

Minister of Finance T. E. Donges speaking at Calvinia Saturday night, followed the same theme: "These riots are not limited to South Africa alone. There were riots in Algeria, the Belgian Congo, Nyasaland and Kenya. In South American blood baths occur every day.

"You can determine a person by his friends, and if you note the foreign organizations and foreign countries which sympathisize with these rioters and congratulate them the link of communism is easily determinable."

Tension in the nation has been appreciably heightened by government measures taken to meet what Verwoerd described as "a massive revolt."

South Africa bitterly protests UN debate

Birmingham News

Wed. 3-30-60

The South African delegate, Bernardus Gerhardus Fourie, remained in the council chamber but declared pointedly that he was asking his government for new instructions.

A spokesman said that whether South Africa would boycott the discussions depended upon these instructions.

FOURIE PROTESTED bitterly that the racial clashes in South Africa were purely a domestic matter. He said his government would continue to take whatever measures necessary to preserve order whether it be against whites or non-whites.

He declared police had been attacked first by Negro demonstrators and had been forced to fire in self-defense, resulting in large-scale killings.

Fourie spoke shortly after the 11-nation council agreed to plunge immediately into a full debate on the South African racial turmoil.

HE SAID THE annual discussions of the South African racial problem in the General Assembly "has helped to inflame the situation there." Any new debate, he asserted, might lead to attacks not only on the police but on peaceful citizens.

"I am instructed to say that if this were to be the result the blame will rest squarely on the shoulders of the Security Council," he said.

Fourie asked whether the UN was now prepared to take up all cases of violence in member countries or must it be assumed "that it is simply a case of South Africa being made the whipping boy?"

The South African problem was placed on the council agenda without a formal vote, but Britain, France and Italy declared for the record they had some reservations as to the UN's jurisdiction.

SOUTH AFRICA has taken the position throughout that the racial problem is purely a domestic matter.

Both U. S. Delegate Henry Cabot Lodge and Soviet Delegate Arkady A. Sobolev argued the council's right to take up the problem.

"The United States regrets profoundly the loss of life in South Africa," Lodge said.

He said the United States approached the issue "with no false pride" in its own record on racial matters.

Seeks More White Immigrants To Shift Racial Balance

Atlanta, Ga.

By LYNN HEINZERLING

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa is closing its gates against migratory Negro labor and is seeking to swell the influx of white immigrants, the government announced Tuesday.

A long-range plan to improve the balance of three million whites against 10 million blacks was outlined by Interior Minister J. F. Naude before Parliament in Cape Town.

Speaking in his fourth week of a crisis capped Saturday by a white man's attempt to assassinate Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, Naude said the government now considers immigration of the utmost importance and specially wants white skilled workers.

He mentioned the Netherlands, Belgium and Germany as likely sources to improve the flow, which has been running only about 16,000 annually. He told Parliament he has already asked chambers of commerce, the agricultural union and other organizations to help bring in white settlers.

Coupled with this was a warning to the nation's farmers that they will soon have to do without the cheap help of Negroes who have been imported for farm work by the thousands from other African territories.

"With all the trouble the country has experienced," Naude said, the government will no longer be able to allow migratory Bantu labor from outside to be brought into the Union of South Africa indiscriminately.

Naude denied allegations that the dominant Nationalists, largely men of Dutch descent, have impeded immigration by English-speaking people to this member of the Commonwealth in fear that they would vote against the Nationalist government.

Criticism of the government developed in spots while physicians built up Verwoerd's strength at a Pretoria hospital for an eventual operation to remove two bullets fired into his head by David Pratt, 52, a wealthy English-born farmer. Pratt is being held but no charges against him have been announced.

South Africa Rioting Quelled With 6 Dead

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

By RICHARD KASISCHKE

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Justice Minister Francois Erasmus said Wednesday rioting among thousands of Negroes in native lands south of Durham has been brought under control after a clash in which police fire killed six.

Twenty-one natives were arrested after that clash Monday.

Wed. 4-6-60

Erasmus made his report in a statement issued at Pretoria, South Africa's administrative capital. Police used helicopters, spotter planes and armored cars in the operation against the rioters. Reinforcements have moved into the area.

P. 26

A senior officer, speaking from police "combat" headquarters in the small village of Bizana, said the situation has "quieted down nicely, but we are standing by in case of further trouble."

Only the official side of the story can be obtained at present, but a correspondent of the Johannesburg Star, reported from the tribal center of Lusikisiki that natives claim at least 15 tribesmen were shot dead and others wounded.

The unrest is being played down by the government, but the situation generally is believed serious by high police officials. Several have made personal inspection trips.

The outbreak was the worst since rioting erupted in South Africa's urban Negro settlements in March against the white government's racial segregation policies. But the recent clashes took place in the Transkei native reserve, a rural area set aside for Negroes. The government claims the black man is happiest there surrounded by his native, tribal element.

Erasmus said the tribesmen's actions did not seem to be directed at the area's few white people, most of them government administrators. He characterized the outbreaks as tribal warfare and blamed them on the murder of two native headmen and the burning of a number of their huts.

Of the Monday incident, he said: "During police action organized bands resisted police and fired on them. The police were forced in self-defense to return the fire."

Famed athlete flees S. Africa

Afro American, Baltimore, Md.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (ANP)—Meshack Nkosi, famous African tennis champion and former school principal, has reportedly fled the union for asylum in the British Protectorate of Swaziland.

He is credited with warning Anglican Bishop Ambrose Reeves to flee the country to escape arrest by South African police. Nkosi's flight came after he spent 11 days in jail and reportedly suffered continual harassment by police because of "suspected subversive activities."

Sat. 6-25-60

The charges stemmed from his having shown a group of newsmen from the Canadian and British Broadcasting Companies through the slums of Johannesburg.

* * *

ON ONE TOUR, he and the cameramen were arrested for questioning because photographs had been taken of more than 22 handcuffed and heavily-guarded African prisoners who were being taken to jail for violation of the pass laws.

Later, Nkosi was rearrested. In jail, he was not allowed to contact his wife or his attorney.

Although in this and a subsequent arrest, he was found not guilty of subversive activity, the magistrate told him that he was releasing him "only to give you a chance to mend your ways since you are a young man of 30 and a sportsman with a good record."

South's View of Apartheid

To THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Surely the white people of the South are looking on with regret at the United Nations delegation to the United Nations intruding itself into South Africa's apartheid policy.

The Southern states also have a tradition of segregation, of which they are not at all ashamed. The Southerners feel and I am sure the white South Africans do also, that the preservation of the white race can best be assured by such a policy. We do not wish in a few generations to become a race of mulattoes.

The elements of segregation assure us that integration will not result in such race-mixing, but would we be very wise simply to accept their beliefs in such a momentous matter? After all, suppose they were wrong? And even the Supreme Court could be wrong.

SOUTH AFRICA ASKS WHITE IMMIGRANTS

Nation's Farmers Counseled to Do Without Workers of Near-By Countries

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 12—The South African Government announced today that it would embark on a large-scale program to attract white immigrants.

In making this public, Thomas Naude, Minister of the Interior, also warned South Africa's farmers they would have to do without African labor imported from outside South Africa.

Each year thousands of Africans from the Rhodesias, Mozambique and Nyasaland come to South Africa to work on farms, in homes and mines. Mr. Naude said farmers must give up their foreign Africans in the near future.

These were among the day's developments in the latest racial strife that has embroiled the country. Other developments included the following:

¶A statement by François C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, that the police force would be enlarged and many Africans now in cities and towns would be sent back to rural reserves.

¶A new appeal by Governor General Charles R. Swart for South Africa to remain "calm and sensible" during the present crisis.

¶Medical bulletins that Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, in the Pretoria General Hospital following an assassination attempt Saturday, was making satisfactory progress toward recovery and that his pain and discomfort were abating gradually.

¶An appeal by the Capetown Chamber of Commerce for an official inquiry into the grievances of the Africans and an effort to correct them before more damage occurs to South Africa's economy.

Violence Disavowed

Mr. Swart said, "The way of the assassin is not our way, the method of physical violence against one's opponent is not our method."

"Perhaps a new and fuller measure of goodwill between sections of our population hitherto comparatively estranged will come about," he added.

Meanwhile the Phime Minister's physicians reported that "after a satisfactory night the Prime Minister's condition is a fine step forward."

Telegrams deploring the attack on Dr. Verwoerd continued to be received by the hundreds. Among those today was one from Chancellor Adenauer of West Germany.

The whereabouts of David David Pratt, gentleman farmer held for shooting Dr. Verwoerd, were unknown. He is in police custody and, under emergency regulations, may be detained indefiniteely without appearing in court. The Government is understood to want to avoid a trial at a time when the publicity could stimulate strong feelings.

Immigration Rules Revised

Mr. Naude said the Interior Department was busy reorganizing immigration machinery. The aid of chambers of commerce, industrial councils and agricultural unions is being sought to offer employment to prospective immigrants, he said, adding that it was hoped that more whites from the Netherlands, Belgium and Germany could be induced to come to South Africa.

In recent years about 16,000 immigrants have entered South Africa annually but this has been offset by an annual departure of about 11,000. Since the present emergency was declared March 30 Canadian, Australian and New Zealand representatives here have reported hundreds of inquiries about emigration compared with only three or four weekly before.

The Minister of Justice said the police force would have to be enlarged to protect peace-loving Africans from "the reign of terror by the terrorists who embitter their lives and make life unbearable." He said 80 per cent of the Africans in or near South African cities were peace-loving.

Mr. Erasmus warned that "many thousands" of African idlers would have to be sent back to African reserves.

Mr. Erasmus called for a speed-up in the government's program for the development of African reserves so that more Africans might be moved to them. He also warned that the system of cheap African labor upon which the country's economy is based must be revised if whites are to retain superiority and leadership. He said the whites must learn to do more work.

Police Continue Raids

In Johannesburg today 150 policemen with the aid of three armored cars raided ten African townships southwest of the city in new searches for suspects and dangerous weapons.

Many hundreds of Africans accused of intimidation and other violations of emergency regulations have been detained as a result of similar police actions in the last week.

In an Easter message published today the Right Rev. Ambrose Reeves, Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg, said, "As Christians we dare not pretend that we have no responsibility for all that is happening in South Africa in consequence of the policy of apartheid. To do that would make us absentees from history and cut us off completely from the realities of out situation."

The message was published in a diocesan paper, The Watchman. Bishop Reeves fled to Swaziland in fear of arrest under emergency regulations and is still there. He has been a sharp critic of Prime Minister Verwoerd's Government.

Leaflets Assail Government

JOHANNESBURG, April 12 (AP)—Unsigned leaflets addressed to "white South Africans" fluttered down today from tall buildings in Johannesburg declaring that the Government was leading the nation to ruin.

They demanded an end to the emergency regulations, the abolition of laws requiring non-whites to carry passes, the release of political prisoners and consultation between the Government and African leaders.

"Act before it is too late," the leaflets urged.

Opposition Would Resist U. N.

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 12—Sir de Villiers Graaff, leader of the Opposition United party, said today he would strongly resist any United Nations intervention in the South African racial crisis.

The United party shares the ruling National party's belief in white supremacy but would scrap the strict apartheid policy of segregation and modify the pass laws.

Sir de Villiers thought his party's program would be "not unacceptable" to world opinion. Yet, in any case, he wanted no United Nations interference.

"I would resist it strongly," he said. "This is our trouble and we hope to settle it ourselves in our own way."

He said at a press conference that he believed there was "a great deal of latent goodwill toward South Africa abroad."

He suggested that foreign opinion could change if the press made it clear that "there is a virile opposition in South Africa representing a majority of the electorate standing for a policy which I believe would not be unacceptable to people overseas and consisting largely of those who played a big part with our allies in two world wars."

3 RABBIS LAMENT NEGROES' PLIGHT

They Cite Passover Theme of Liberation in Sermons at Synagogues Here

The plight of Negroes in South Africa and the Southern United States was related by three rabbis yesterday to that of the ancient Israelites in Egyptian bondage.

The rabbis stressed the Passover theme of liberation from bondage — both ancient and modern — in sermons for the first morning of the week-long holiday. And they cited the ancient record of Exodus, which tells how Moses led the Jews out of Egypt to freedom 3,200 years ago.

"Today freedom is the burning issue for millions of people throughout the world, particularly for people of color," the Rev. Dr. Judah Nadich said at the Park Avenue Synagogue, 50 East Eighty-seventh Street.

"New colored nations in Africa are forging their independence, while others among them are desperately seeking it," he declared. "In the Union of South Africa the cry of the natives rises from their oppression to reach the hearts of sensitive people everywhere. In parts of our own country people are denied their full freedom because of their color."

"Freedom is color-blind and the yearning for it is God-implanted within the breast of every human being," he continued. "To help those who seek it and who have the right to it is our sacred obligation."

Plea For South Made

The Rev. Dr. Israel Goldstein of Congregation B'Nai Jeshurun, 257 West Eighty-eighth Street, urged American Jews to turn their minds and hearts to the South, "where millions of Negroes remain underprivileged," and South Africa, "where Negroes, though in the majority, suffer brutal oppression."

The Rev. Dr. William F. Rosenblum of Temple Israel, 210 West Ninety-first Street, said it would be well to remember on Passover that "all of us are descended from people who were enslaved."

Although the events of South Africa seem far off, he said, people who live in freedom must remember that if human bondage is allowed to remain it might become the law of other lands.

When Negroes sit down at Southern lunch counters, he said, the issue is more than whether they will be served a sandwich and coffee.

"The issue," he said, "is whether or not in today's world the color of a man's skin makes him either a first or a second-class citizen."

"If a Negro is deprived of his rights in the South today there is little doubt that all of us will be deprived of some of our rights in the future," he declared.

THREAT TO BANISH STRIKERS IS MADE BY SOUTH AFRICA

Regime Warns of Reprisals Against Week's Stoppage Called in Johannesburg

POLICE ACTION PLEDGED

Absent Workers Will Face Dismissal, Then Shipment to Distant Reserves

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 16—The Government issued a stern warning against work stoppages to Africans today.

A statement by the Department of Bantu (African) Affairs and Development said that those who stayed away from their jobs faced dismissal and those not employed would be banished to African reserves in remote parts of South Africa.

The warning was given in the face of a threatened one-week strike by Africans in Johannesburg, scheduled to start Monday. The stoppage has been called by an emergency committee of the African National Congress as a protest against the treatment of Africans by the Government. The African National Congress was recently banned, along with the other major African political group the Pan-Africanist Congress.

African Dismissals Cited

Colonel J. C. Lemmer, Deputy Commissioner of Police, reiterated today that the police would be out in force next week "to protect natives who ignore pamphlets that have been distributed among them calling for a stay-at-home week."

The Government statement said: "The Bantu public are reminded that a considerable number of Bantu workers were dismissed from their employment as a result of the recent stay-away-from-work campaign ployed. Unless they find work and have since been unemsoon, they will have to go back to their homelands.

"Bantu workers are, therefore, in their own interests, warned not to pay any attention to pamphlets or other forms of encouragement for them to stay away from work."

Turning Point Foreseen

A one-day work stoppage March 28 in Johannesburg, the country's commercial center and largest city, was 90 per cent effective, crippling the operations of many businesses and industries. The degree of effectiveness of the new strike call will not be apparent until Tuesday, when the nation returns to work after a four-day Easter holiday.

Observers here believe that the success or failure of the strike next week could mark a turning point in the violent course of events in South Africa. Should it succeed, more violence is likely to follow. If it fails, it will indicate that the Government has succeeded in breaking organized African resistance to its policies and in restoring a sullen peace in the country.

The question in many minds is what steps the Government will take to deal with the serious problems left by the last four weeks of racial strife.

First in the matter of leadership. Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, still convalessing from the attempt on his life last Saturday, is reported to be resuming his function in a limited way as head of the Government. But he is not likely to be back to normal for many weeks.

What effect this will have on the operation of the Government is not yet clear.

Meanwhile his cabinet colleagues have pledged to continue his policies without change.

Continuing Gains Reported

One of the bullets fired at Dr. Verwoerd by David Pratt, a white farmer, entered his head next to the right ear, fracturing the lower jaw, breaking the palate and coming to rest in the left side of the neck. A second bullet struck his upper right jawbone below the right eye, shattering the bone into bits that pierced the sinus. None of the lead has been removed.

Dr. Verwoerd was reported in a medical bulletin today to be "constantly making excellent progress." The bulletin also said that "the Prime Minister's condition generally and locally is satisfactory."

Another important problem for the country is the economic effect of the emergency. One measure of the severity of its impact was a drop of nearly $1,000,000,000 since March 1 in the value of shares traded on the Johannesburg Stock Exchange.

Some observers believe that the repercussions will increase rather than diminish, as overseas withdrawal of investments continues and economic uncertainty accumulates.

The Government has been under strong pressure to modify its policies from business, financial and industrial leaders. But thus far the only response has been in official statements that the authorities intend to continue strict racial segregation and carry forward their policy of separate economic and political development of areas to be set aside exclusively for Africans.

There is also the problem of foreign pressure on South Africa. It is felt here by many that this pressure, both moral and material, is certain to be intensified.

U. N. Reprisal Feared

There is fear that the United Nations Security Council may feel moved to invoke sanction against South Africa unless the country's racial policies are changed. South Africans also are afraid that boycotts of their export products may grow to serious proportions.

Not least of the Government's problems is the enforcement of cpeace within South Africa. It is estimated that 100,000 men either are under arms or can be pressed intoactive service within a few hours. Many are civilian reservists. Their support, and their withdrawal from the nation's economy, are costing their small nation a lot of money.

At least 400 opponents of the Government are known to be in prison under emergency regulattion and can be kept there until the emergency ends. At the same time, the emergency regulations hame given the government sweeping powers over individual liberty, have deprived arrested persons of the protection of the courts, have whittled away the right of assembly and have inpinged on the freedom of speech and the press.

Many South Africans concede that force is not the answer to their country's basic problems, that the African majority cannot be permanently dominated by the white minority of 3,000,000, and that South Africa still must reckon with the aspirations of its 10,000,000 Africans.

What concerns them is whether Prime Minister Verwoerd and the National party he leads will recognize these things.

PRELATE STRESSES AFRICAN EQUALITY

Anglican Offers to Quit in Capetown if Act Will Spur Joint Denial of Apartheid

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 16—The Most Rev. Joost de Blank, Anglican Archbishop of Capetown, said today he was "prepared to step down" from his archepiscopal throne if that would win the cooperation of the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa in repudiating apartheid.

He was replying, in an Easter Eve interview, to a bitter personal attack on him by the moderature of the Dutch Reformed synod of Cape Province.

The moderature accused him Wednesday of pointing an "unclean finger of accusation," noting that some of the churches and all the church schools of Archbishop de Blank's See observed racial segregation. The moderature concluded that future cooperation with the Archbishop had become impossible.

"My only concern," Archbishop de Blank said today, "is the future of the Christian faith in Africa as a whole and in South Africa in particular. My own career matters little.

"I am prepared to cooperate with all churches as long as we are agreed on the basic Christian policy that all men are equal before God.

"If effective agreement between churches on the basis of this equality is held up by my presence, then of course I would be only too happy to retire from the scene and let someone else take over."

Race Policy Called Key Issue

Archbishop de Blank said he regretted that the recriminations and accusations of the last two weeks had obscured the main issue. The crucial question, he said, is whether racial discrimination in church and state has been repudiated.

"Where it still persists, it persists against the declared mind of the church, resolved in synod after synod, both of the dioceses separately and of the province as a whole."

Anglican sources pointed out that under the Bantu [African] Education Act, adopted several months before Archbishop de Blank came to Capetown, it is illegal to start a new multiracial church school or to desegregate existing church schools.

The moderature had blamed the Archbishop for breaking an agremeent between the Anglican and Dutch Reformed Churches reached last May in which both bodies promised to "do everything in their power to obviate unfounded conclusions which may be injurious to the interests of the churches." It cited "unworthy" criticism.

As for the accusation by the Dutch Reformed moderature, the Archbishop commented: "We don't make out that we are perfect by any means.

"In my statement of April 1, I made it clear that all churches stood condemned and the Church of the Province of South Africa [the legal name of the Anglican Church here] is no exception.

"I know that the Anglicans have failed again and again in putting fundamental Christian principles into practice," he remarked. "We have no illusions and are deeply penitent for our failures. The service in St. George's Cathedral on April 11 was called as a service of penitence.

"But as a church we have repudiated apartheid at the highest level and are seeking to eradicate it in all our churches and institutions.

To the moderature's complaint that the Archbishop had aired "accusations and threats against the church in the world press," he replied:

"My statements were given direct to the press because on April 1 the Dutch Reformed Church issued a statement in which a gratuitous attack was made on other church leaders, who were accused of lying deliberately and shockingly misrepresenting the South African situation at home and overseas."

"I hold that this statement was a flagrant breach of the agreement," he declared, "and the fact that it was made by the heads of the Dutch Reformed Church themselves, together with its tone and content, precluded any posibility of direct consultation."

"But attacks on me and my church, however warranted or unwarranted, are irrelevant," the archbishop asserted. "What is needed is an official rejection of the policies of compulsory apartheid which have brought the nation to the brink of disaster and have put the continuing progress of the Christian Church in Africa in greatest jeopardy. It is for this repudiation that the whole of Africa waits."

South Africa Stifles No-Work Campaign

Police Seal Off Nyanga, Raid Settlement for Agitators

Fri. 4-8-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Huge military, police and civilian reserve forces mobilized by the South African government appeared Thursday night to have stifled the no-work campaign of thousands of rebellious Africans.

Only in the sealed-off African township of Nyanga, near Cape Town, was the situation uncertain and police said they had arrested most of the "agitators, terrorists and gangsters" there without resistance.

From Cape Town, Durban and Port Elizabeth came reports that the situation was practically normal or more nearly so than at any time in the past 10 days.

In Johannesburg there was no incident to disturb the calm. Workers streamed in and out of the city without trouble.

With all the principal African leaders in jail and police rounding up lower echelons, it seemed that the longest demonstration in recent years against the government's apartheid — segregation —policy may be ended.

But the government continued to call up its forces. The Witwatersrand Rifles infantry regiment has just been mobilized and stationed at the airport near Germiston, east of Johannesburg presumably for movement wherever needed.

S. Africa's New Premier Stands Firm

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

By RICHARD KASISCHKE

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — The government Monday night hid the fate of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's would-be assassin behind state-of-emergency regulations. This left authorities free to try him anywhere and at any time they chose.

Sat. 4-12-60

With Verwoerd sidelined for an indefinite period, the Cabinet called on Paul Oliver Sauer, a Nationalist party elder statesman, to run the government while the Prime Minister recovers. Sauer promptly promised to carry on Verwoerd's white supremacy policies.

P. 1.

Police ordered the press to quit printing the name of David Pratt, 52, wealthy white farmer and English clubman who shot Verwoerd twice in the head Saturday. Friends have described Pratt as a foe of Verwoerd's apartheid — or race segregation—policy.

A police spokesman said only that Pratt "will appear in court at some future date." There was press speculation that Pratt, whose arraignment had been expected Monday, will be charged with high treason. This charge carries a death penalty.

The Atlanta Constitution

Sauer, 62, minister of lands, Nationalist party leader in Parliament and senior member of the Cabinet, promptly informed Parliament there will be no deviation in Verwoerd's racial policies.

NEW ROUNDUP

Atlanta, Ga.

As if to underscore his words police staged a roundup of Negro foes of white supremacy laws outside Johannesburg and in the Port Elizabeth area on the south coast.

Sat. 4-12-60

The government also placed eight more of South Africa's 300 magisterial districts under a state of emergency. The total under a state of emergency is now 119.

Speaking to a tense session of Parliament in Cape Town, Sauer promised a thorough investigation of the shooting of Verwoerd at Johannesburg.

P. 9.

PREMIER TO ADVISE

While Sauer will preside at Cabinet meetings he will not be named acting prime minister. Foreign Minister Eric Louw said Louw indicated Verwoerd's condition was not serious enough to warrant the official step of appointing and swearing in an acting prime minister. He also hinted that in serious policy matters Verwoerd would be able to give his counsel.

Medical bulletins from Pretoria, where Verwoerd is hospitalized with two .22 caliber bullet wounds in his head, said the Prime Minister is weak but making satisfactory progress.

"Reassurance can be given that there is no sign of paralysis and, according to the progress made so far, paralysis is not expected," the bulletin added.

Swift Hearing Set For Verwoerd Foe

PREMIER, SHOT, HOLDS HIS HEAD

Verwoerd Fell Into Arms of Wife

As the plans went forward the Cabinet prepared to meet Monday to discuss South Africa's deepening racial crisis and the situation arising from the shooting.

The 58-year-old Verwoerd, unbending champion of white supremacy and racial segregation, was brushed from the helm of the nation's affairs Saturday as South Africa faced its most fearsome challenge from 10 million Negroes.

With two small-caliber bullets still in his head, Verwoerd was still well enough Sunday to be removed from Johannesburg to a Pretoria hospital where he was reported in satisfactory condition. Doctors said he was resting well and there was no need for an immediate operation to remove the bullets.

As the ambulance sped the wounded Prime Minister to Pretoria, 600 police and 1,000 troops moved into the troubled Negro settlement of Cato Manor, outside the east coast city of Durban, and made a shack-to-shack search.

They arrested more than 300 Africans, holding 143 of them, and seized a truckload of spears, knives, axes and seven sticks of dynamite.

Informed sources said David Pratt, the wealthy 52-year-old man who fired the two bullets into Verwoerd's head at the Johannesburg agricultural exposition, will be arraigned before a magistrate Monday in some small town to avoid the violence that might erupt in a large city.

Pratt was nattily dressed in a green sports jacket and slacks when he made his way to Verwoerd's box at the farm fair, spoke the Prime Minister's name softly and then began shooting.

Detectives and security police searched several homes in the Johannesburg area in connection with the shooting, but did not disclose what they were looking for. So far there has been no indication of any accomplices.

Pratt was roughly handled by those in the crowd who could reach him at the shooting scene, and later there were some shouts against English-speaking journalists.

The Witwatersrand Agricultural Society, of which the assailant was a member, issued a statement deploring the attack on Verwoerd.

Congregations in churches throughout South Africa prayed for Verwoerd's recovery. Johannesburg, a metropolis of more than a million people, was unusually quiet, even for a Sunday.

But many sections of the population, white as well as nonwhite, feared the shooting would fan new flames in this country's burning conflict over segregation.

Two bullets are still lodged in Verwoerd's head. One struck the right ear. The other penetrated the right cheek and roof of the mouth, fracturing the jawbone.

South Africa Calls State Of Emergency After 30,000 March

The Montgomery Advertiser
Montgomery, Ala.
Thurs. 3-31-60

Envoy Exits U.N. Table Over Debate

UNITED NATIONS N.Y. (AP) —South Africa's chief U.N. delegate walked away from the Security Council table Wednesday after warning that debate here might spark new and more widespread racial turmoil in his country.

Bernardus Gerhardus Fourie, permanent U.N. representative for South Africa, told members of the 11-nation Council that if this occurs the blame will rest squarely on their shoulders.

His dramatic gesture did not amount to an outright boycott. He seated hmiself in a row of chairs at one side of the chamber. A delegation spokesman said Fourie was awaiting instructions from his government.

Fourie was the opening speaker as the Council began debate on a request by 29 Asian-African nations that it consider the mass shooting of Negroes in South Africa by white police.

NO FORMAL VOTE

U.S. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, president of the Council for March, declared the agenda adopted without taking a formal vote.

That assured full-scale debate with representatives of the Asian-African group denouncing the shootings and calling for Council action aimed at halting additional violence.

Fourie said it must be clearly understood that his government "fully intends to discharge its duties to maintain public order and safety, and to safeguard the internal security of the country, whoever may threaten it — white or nonwhite."

PRIME MINISTER VERWOERD
Issues Emergency Order

A state of emergency has been proclaimed by his government to deal with racial violence.

He asked on what grounds the U.N. proposed to single out South Africa for dealing with what his government contends is purely an internal matter of no legal concern to the United Nations.

'WHIPPING BOY'

He said that if other nations were not prepared to submit to similar U.N. handling of their domestic affairs, "Must one then assume that it is a case of South Africa being made the whipping boy?"

Tunisia's Mongi Slim, a member of the Council, interpreted Fourie's walk from the table as a sign that he "has deserted us and is refusing to cooperate in this debate."

Slim, speaking as one of the Asian - African group, accused South Africa of following a "blind repression" of Negroes. He denounced the shooting of Negroes as brutal police suppression of peaceful demonstrations.

Lodge said that the United States supported putting the issue before the Council on the grounds that it constituted a case involving violation of human rights.

He said the United States approached the question "with no false pride at all."

Order Given As Violence Builds Up

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa's government, beset by demonstrations against its segregation policies, declared a state of emergency Wednesday and alerted its citizen defense force for mobilization.

The orders went out as more than 30,000 Negro demonstrators jamming the streets of Cape Town, the seat of South Africa's Parliament, emphasized the build-up of racial tension. Scattered violence flared in the countryside.

With armored cars circling the Parliament building, police with rifles guarding the entrances and street corners and a police helicopter circling overhead, Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd declared the situation was under control.

REGULAR ARMY

If 18 regiments of the citizens force now alerted cannot handle any disorders, he said, the regular army will be called in.

The Cape Town Negroes finally dispersed peacefully, but their sheer numbers made profound impressions.

Three million whites control 10 million Negroes, nearly half a million Indians and more than a million coloreds — mixed bloods—in this nation, rigidly segregated according to racial complexion.

The dramatic events in Parliament came only a few hours after police had rounded up some white liberals and Negro, Indian and colored leaders to ward off what Verwoerd described earlier as "a massive revolt." More than 150 were reported arrested.

One report put the number arrested at 196, but some of those picked up at various points later were released. In Johannesburg, the Supreme Court granted applications for a writ of habeas corpus for seven persons, holding the police had acted prematurely in arresting them before the state of emergency had been declared.

They were detained under provisions of the Public Safety Act.

Later accounts said 234 persons were arrested and that some of those released by courts were rearrested immediately.

Relations between blacks and whites in this anxious country probably haven't been as bad since the Zulu rebellion of 1879.

Scattered violence, threats and outright intimidation in Cape province and Johannesburg indicated that relations may get even worse under the emergency regulations to come.

Vague rumors circulated that militant Negroes wanted to make a demonstration of their strength in the white area of Johannesburg South Africa's chief city.

Verwoerd's proclamation of the state of emergency invokes near martial law in 80 of South Africa's 300 magisterial districts. It came nine tumultuous days after 72 Africans fell dead under police fire in Sharpeville and Langa while demonstrating against the government's requirements that nonwhite carry identity cards as passes.

Verwoerd, a firm exponent of apartheid to keep the races apart, told Parliament that the internal situation was in hand at "all places were information is available."

More strikes and riots, however, were evident:

1. Officers used clubs and gunshots in the air to disperse a Negro throng trying to break though a police cordon at Waterkloof. This is a Negro settlement outside Somerset West, 10 miles east of Cape Town. The throng was broken up. Two Africans were hospitalized.

2. About 100 shouting, singing Negro women marched on the police station in Langa. Police scattered them with tear gas after they refused orders to disperse.

UNDER GUNS

3. About 40 African women gathered at the foot of Government Avenue near the houses of Parliament, screaming and wailing. They attracted a large crowd of whites and dislocated traffic for a while.

4. Northeast of Cape Town, Worcester police used tear gas and an armored car to break up a throng of Negroes who gathered near a factory.

5. At the university town of Stellenbosch, masses of Negroes rioted in their settlement after police used clubs and shots in the air to keep them from marching into the city. The Negroes set fire to buildings and stoned passing cars.

6. In Pieter Maritzburg, white students of Natal University stood on street corners in silent protest against the arrest of two of the school's lecturers, Derek Marsh and Dr. Hans Meidner.

Most spectacular of all was the Cape Town march.

Massive Negro columns paraded to the Caldeon Square police station. There, under the guns of armored cars and a ring of armed helmeted white and Negro policemen, they demanded the release of local leaders.

But the police—with truckloads of constables and troops pouring into town—held fast.

The demonstrators finally broke up after a police officer agreed to arrange a meeting between Philip Kgosana, a Pan-Africanist leader, and Justice Minister F. C. Erasmus.

Negro workers were on a general strike throughout virtually all the populous Cape Peninsula. The strike was expected to spread Thursday.

Meanwhile, funeral services at Sharpeville for 34 of the Negroes killed in the March 21 riots went virtually unnoticed.

SEGREGATION FOE CURBED IN AFRICA

Salesman Loses Job When the Government Confines Him to Johannesburg

New York

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Jan. 8—Peter Nthite is a young African salesman whose life and livelihood have been seriously disrupted because he has engaged in political activity. His story is a common one in South Africa.

A few days ago he received notice from the Minister of Justice, Francois C. Erasmus, that under the Suppression of Communism Act he could no longer attend public gatherings and that he could not leave Johannesburg for five years.

Mr. Nthite denies that he is a Communist. He has challenged the Government to take him into court and prove otherwise.

He is the national secretary of the African National Congress Youth League. The Congress is the major African political organization in South Africa.

The Suppression of Communism Act authorizes curbs to be placed on persons whose activities, in the opinion of the Minister of Justice, promote the furtherance of communism.

Educated by Americans

Mr. Nthite was born in Johannesburg thirty-one years ago, the son of a laborer. He received a high school education at Adams College, a school run by the American Board of Missions at Amanzimtoti, Natal.

The travel restrictions on Mr. Nthite have caused him to lose his job. He was a traveling salesman for a grocery company. Since he cannot travel outside Johannesburg his usefulness to his employer is ended.

The African National Congress estimates that about 100 of its officials and members have been placed under similar restrictions. Among these is its president, Chief Albert J. Luthuli, who has been confined to an area within a few miles of his home.

Chief Luthuli and Mr. Nthite were both among the original defendants in a South African treason trial that is still in progress. Charges of high treason against them were quashed and they were released.

Mr. Nthite is short and slight. He dresses neatly and talks expressively. His wife died while he was a defendant in the treason trial, leaving him with a young daughter and son. His parents, who live in the crowded African dwelling area of Alexandra outside Johannesburg, care for the children.

Before he lost his job Mr. Nthite earned about $34 weekly. He hopes to get a new job with an African cooperative society in Johannesburg but he says the most he could earn there would be about $14 weekly.

"I don't know what I'm going to do, really; I'm completely lost," he said in an interview.

"With this confinement the Government tries to build a prison without walls around you," he said.

Mr. Nthite said he believed the South African Government wanted to muzzle him because he had openly opposed its racial segregation policies. He has publicly assailed laws requiring Africans to carry passes to move about, the forced removals of Africans from one dwelling place to another and the Bantu education laws that many Africans feel provide them with inferior schooling.

The restriction orders have had an effect opposite to that sought by the Government, Mr. Nthite said.

"The Government is trying to destroy our morale and discipline with all these bans but it isn't succeeding," he said.

As for his international political attitude, Mr. Nthite said:

"I feel more to the Left than I do to the Right because we've had more sympathy from the Left than from the Right—more from China and the Soviet Union than from the West.

"They make it clear they do not support race prejudice and that is the issue that hits us hard. We are not interested in whether communism is good or bad. We are interested in recognition as human beings."

"We have no lessons to teach the United States, nor does the United States have a lesson to teach us.

BISHOP ROY COWDREY

"We can look at you (U.S.) and say 'Look how they have solved their problem.'"

This was the statement made Tuesday by the Rt. Rev. Roy Cowrey, assistant Bishop of Cape Town, as he compared racial segregation in the United States and the Union of South African before members of the Frontiers Club.

In this Tuesday address at the YMCA, Bishop Cowdrey, who is chairman of the Cape Town branch of the Social Service Association of Africa, told of the segregation pattern of South Africa.

"South Africa has three million whites, who are in origin from Holland and England. their home country and have the right to vote.

"...a million and a half colored people, who are of mixed blood and have the right to vote for four white Assembly members to represent their interest.

"...ten million Bantu, indigenous S. African inhabitants who have been assimilated in the tribes of the Union; they have no voting privileges.

"...450,000 Asiatics which consist of Chinese and Indians who also have no voting privileges."

BISHOP COWDREY continued, "Every non - white inhabitant of the community must carry a pass at all time.

"It identifies his district of origin, his employer, his address and the monthly signature of his employer.

"Failure to have this card results in a jail sentence."

The purpose of the Social Service Associaton is to keep a liasian between the prisoner and his family, and to help him find work when he is released.

Struggle in South Africa Is Against Forces of History

Atlanta, Ga. 1960

Sun. 4-26-60 P. 4.

Other nations have gone through convulsions comparable to South Africa's but in that country the outlook seems hopeless indeed. For there a small white minority and particularly a small white Afrikaner minority, is struggling to remain supreme over a black majority and trying to do it on the basis of force.

There is no apparent willingness to compromise, to let the Bantus develop to the point of sharing economic and political power. Such a struggle is a struggle against the forces of history.

We do not say that the tide which is sweeping independence into Africa and Asia is necessarily good. Indeed the prospects for real democracy are dim as some of the newly independent states are already proving; an independent native government can be just as tyrannical as the worst colonial regime and is likely to be tyrannical when the majority is poor and illiterate.

The point is simply that this nationalist sweep is happening and at an accelerating rate—who would have believed a few years ago that the Belgian Congo would be independent by the summer of 1960? And as a generalization the white nations or groups that have come out best are those that have made their peace with the realities. Britain's departure from India and its high esteem in that nation today is a notable example; in contrast is the mess in Algeria.

In South Africa, of course, there is no external rule; the white minority and the black majority are both natives and that makes it worse for if the whites are forced out they are forced out of their homeland. It may be possible for the extreme nationalist Afrikaners to hang on for quite a while yet if they resort to total repression such as the Communists used in Hungary.

But even if they are temperamentally capable of doing that, they will run into still another force—the not so nebulous force of world opinion. It is one of the stupefying ironies of our time that the Communists, whose whole purpose is the destruction of liberty, can be treated like respectable people, while any nation in what is loosely called the West is the object of unlimited abuse when it errs.

Conceivably the force of nationalism and international opinion will serve to moderate the policies of the white extremists in South Africa and the United States is not out of line in deploring the violence. But there is a limit to what this or any other country can do. The real tragedy is that the outlook is likely to remain hopeless until the Afrikaners themselves realize that they are struggling against history.

Gandhi Tried—And Failed—In South Africa

The Courier Journal Louisville, Ky. Wed. 4-27-60

Campaign Waged For 20 Years By Apostle Of Passive Resistance

Americans thinks of Mahatma Gandhi as a patron saint of India's independence. But long before that Gandhi had made his mark in South Africa. His life there is reported in this article, third of a series.

By LYNN HEINZERLING
Associated Press Writer

Johannesburg, April 26.—Mohandas K. Gandhi, the Indian apostle of passive resistance, spent 20 years trying to break down South Africa's "white-supremacy" fixation. He failed.

Gandhi, a young and not very successful lawyer, arrived from Bombay in 1893.

He was taking a job as a junior counsel in an Indian commercial firm at Durban at about $500 a year. He dressed in Western clothes of impeccable English cut.

Brought In By Regime

Thousands of Indians had been pouring into Durban and the Natal colony since 1860. They were brought by the colonial Government in an agreement with the Indian Government, to work on sugar plantations.

The agreement said that after serving a five-year contract, the Indians could pursue whatever callings they desired. After 10 years' residence, if they did not wish to return to India, they were entitled to buy land.

The Indians, escaping poverty in one British territory, hoped they had found a promised land in another. They built up a flourishing sugar production in Natal and also worked on railroads and in the mines.

But in 1891 the British colony of Natal abruptly withdrew its promise of land and consigned thousands of Indians to the third-class citizenship they have endured since that time.

There are now some 450,000 Indians in South Africa, most of them in Natal and Transvaal provinces. The Orange Free State, first as a Republic and later as a Province, never admitted Indians.

Gandhi arrived two years after repeal of the land law. What he saw in Durban made him start his protest almost immediately.

Indians were known to British colonists as coolies. A schoolteacher was a coolie teacher. A clerk was a coolie clerk, and Gandhi was a coolie lawyer.

Is Attacked By Mob

They could not walk the streets at night without a permit. They were shut out from the white man's life as much as possible.

Soon after his arrival Gandhi went to Pretoria on a legal matter. On the train he was ordered out of a first-class section and made to journey in a baggage car. When he rode a stagecoach he had to sit with the white driver, who was so annoyed that he beat up the astonished young lawyer.

Gandhi decided to fight and went to India to get his family, returning in 1897. He was attacked by a mob soon after his return, and there were threats to burn down the house where he was staying.

In 1902 Gandhi set up offices in Johannesburg and began a campaign against the Transvaal registration laws. Every Indian man, woman, and child over 8 was obliged to register and give fingerprints.

Gandhi's "satyagraha" ("firmness in truth") program was born. He formed a passive-resistance association to boycott the registration office. He surrendered to arrest freely and went to jail for two months.

In 1907 he organized a pass-burning bonfire, the forerunner of many pass bonfires in South Africa in recent weeks. Under his leadership Indians were prepared to fill the prisons.

Deportation Ruled Out

He backed an illegal strike of Indian miners.

After 1910 Gandhi was often negotiating with General Jan Christiaan Smuts, Minister of The Interior in the first Union Government of Prime Minister Louis Botha.

But even the slim, soldierly Smuts, an internationally minded statesman, was not prepared to welcome Indians into full membership in the human race of South Africa. At this time Indians outnumbered whites in Natal, 98,000 to 13,000. There were 962,000 Negroes in the province.

Gandhi obtained some concessions. Educated Indians were excused from the fingerprint obligation. But an immigration act let the Government refuse entrance to anyone on economic or social grounds. This meant Indians.

Gandhi renewed his passive-resistance campaign. That led to strikes, new arrests, and violence in Natal but brought minor concessions.

Gandhi, apparently seeing the handwriting on the wall, sailed in 1913 for India, urging his followers to keep up the fight.

No major concession has been made to Indians since.

So. African Police Raid More Negro Villages

The Washington Post Washington, DC

Reuters

PRETORIA, South Africa, April 26—Police raided more Negro towns today while the 4-year-old mass treason trial stumbled to a halt when defendants withdrew their lawyers.

Wed. 4-27-60

In Parliament, Justice Minister Francois Erasmus said emergency regulations — imposed when racial violence followed police killing of 67 Negroes at Sharpeville March 21—will remain, as long as "speedy action" was necessary.

The Minister said the regulations were being used to round up "large numbers of vagrant" Negroes in the cities and ship them to tehir homes.

Two hundred police raided Nyanga, outside Cape Town. Troops formed a cordon around the township, preventing anyone from entering or leaving. Fifty-seven persons were arrested on various charges.

In Pretoria, the mass treason trial took a new turn when the defendants told their lawyers to withdraw from the case after the court overruled protests that the current emergency law might endanger the freedom of defense witnesses.

Originally 156 persons were accused four years ago when the trial began. Thirty now are still on trial, although one defendant disappeared on April 1.

Today's developments hinged on the emergency laws. On April 1 the defense claimed, and judges agreed, that defense witnesses could put themselves in danger of arrest if they testified.

The government claimed today that an amendment to the emergency laws now made it possible for witnesses to testify because they would be protected.

Leading defense lawyer Israel Maisels said the amendment made no difference since police could find reasons other than their evidence to arrest witnesses. The court overruled his objections and said the trial would continue. The defendants then told their lawyers to withdraw.

Africa Imprisons 1,600, Including 94 Whites

The Evening Star Washington

CAPE TOWN, South Africa, April 22 (AP).—Nearly 1,600 persons—including 94 whites—have been jailed in the government's drive to quell racial strife in South Africa, Justice Minister Francois Erasmus told Parliament today.

This figure does not include the thousands of Africans arrested on various charges in the continuing raids on Negro settlements around major cities.

The "political' detentions were made under the broad powers of the nationalist government's March 30 state of emergency proclamation invoked after bloody Negro riots against the white government's race laws.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Hendrick Van Verwoerd's ruling nationalist party was reported split over the government's strong racial segregation policy.

Some press reports claimed these divisions are so deep that the wounded Verwoerd himself will have to act soon to repair them. Mr. Verwoerd is in a Pretoria hospital recovering from two bullet wounds in the head suffered in an assissination attempt on April 9.

Party differences were exposed Tuesday when Lands Minister Paul Sauer called for a new approach to the enforcement of South Africa's strict racial segregation laws.

Eric Louw, minister of external affairs, promptly rebuked Mr. Sauer and insisted "the basic policy of the government is unchanged."

B. J. Vorster, deputy minister of education and social welfare, in a speech last night, rejected the change-of-course proposal. He said:

"Recently doubts have arisen even among nationalists as to whether we are on the right road but there is no reason for panic. I believe Providence stands behind South Africa and will not leave her in the lurch."

"There's no emergency in South Africa," Mr. Vorster said. "There have been local disturbances because the Bantu overseas press and were led to believe that Europeans would riot from the pulpit and by the (blacks) have been incited to support them."

South Africa Woos Skilled White Labor

The Montgomery Advertiser Mon. Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—South Africa is closing its gates against migratory Negro labor and seeking to swell the influx of white immigrants, the government announced Tuesday.

A long-range plan to improve the balance of three million whites against 10 million blacks was outlined by Interior Minister J. F. Naude before Parliament in Cape Town.

Wed. 4-13-60

Speaking in his fourth week of a crisis capped Saturday by a white man's attempt to assassinate Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, Naude said the government now considers immigration of the utmost importance and specially wants white skilled workers.

LIKELY SOURCES

He mentioned the Netherlands, Belgium and Germany as likely sources to improve the flow, which has been running only about 16,000 annually. He told Parliament he has already asked chambers of commerce, the agricultural union and other organizations to help bring in white settlers.

Coupled with this was a warning to the nation's farmers that they will soon have to do without the cheap help of Negroes who have been imported for farm work by the thousands from other African territories.

"With all the trouble the country has experienced," Naude said, the government will no longer be able to allow migratory Bantu labor from outside to be brought into the Union of South Africa indiscriminately.

Naude denied allegations that the dominant Nationalists, largely men of Dutch descent, have impeded immigration by English-speaking people to this member of the Commonwealth in fear that they would vote against the Nationalist government.

Criticism of the government developed in spots while physicians built up Verwoerd's strength at a Pretoria hospital for an eventual operation to remove two bullets fired into his head by David Pratt, 52, a wealthy English-born farmer. Pratt is being held but no charges against him have been announced.

Unsigned leaflets addressed to "White South Africans" fluttered from tall buildings in Johannesburg. Declaring the government was leading the nation to ruin, they demanded an end to the state of emergency regulations, abolition of the laws requiring nonwhites to carry passes, the release of political prisoners and consultation between government and African leaders.

Strife-Torn Africa Finds Shaky Calm

The Montgomery Advertiser Mon. Ala. Fri. 4-8-60

No-Work Campaign Apparently Stifled; Resistance Spotty

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Huge military, police and civilian reserve forces mobilized by the South African government appeared Thursday night to have stifled the no-work campaign of thousands of rebellious Africans.

Only in the sealed-off African township of Nyanga, near Cape Town, was the situation uncertain and police said they had arrested most of the "agitators, terrorists and gangsters" there without resistance.

From Cape Town, Durban and Port Elizabeth came reports that the situation was practically normal or more nearly so than at any time in the past 10 days.

In Johannesburg there was no incident to disturb the calm. Workers streamed in and out of the city without trouble.

INFANTRY MOBILIZED

With all the principal African leaders in jail and police rounding up lower echelons, it seemed that the longest demonstration in recent years against the government's apartheid—segregation—policy may be ended.

But the government continued to call up its forces. The Witwatersrand Rifles infantry regiment has just been mobilized and stationed at the airport near Germiston, east of Johannesburg, presumably for movement wherever needed.

Thursday night, the South African Broadcasting Corp. interrupted a play to read out a long list of names of reservists who were ordered to report for duty immediately.

WEAPONS CONFISCATED

Troops and police staged clean-up raids for arms and agitators Thursday in the settlements of Nyanga township, stronghold of the African no-work movement.

Nearly 200 men and women were arrested and sacks of weapons—guns, clubs, crowbars, knives and cleavers—were confiscated in Nyanga East and Nyanga West outside Cape Town, an Atlantic port 900 miles southwest of Johannesburg.

Police said similar operations had restored peace to Negro townships around Durban, an Indian Ocean port on the southeast coast, which were the scenes of violence last week. While many Africans remained away from work in Durban, its industrial production was reported going at a good rate again.

COMPROMISE SOUGHT

Elsewhere, however, the economy of this nation of three million whites and 10 million Negroes was feeling the pinch of the crisis. Thousands of Africans, upon whom the whites depend for manual labor, were reported to have fled back to their native reserves in the countryside.

C. F. Regnier, president of the Cape Town Chamber of Industries, said 2,000 have returned to the reserves from Cape Town alone. The work boycott hit meat supplies and sent prices up. Milk and bread deliveries were interrupted.

South Africa Revives Negro Pass System

The Montgomery Advertiser Montgomery

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Despite rising appeals for moderation, the government announced Wednesday it will revive South Africa's pass system for nonwhites. Police vowed to crush Negroes trying to prolong the work boycott against white supremacy rule.

Wed. 4-7-60

The pass system touched off the current outbreak of racial turmoil. Negroes demonstrated against it on March 21 and police fired into their ranks, killing 72. The pass laws were then suspended.

The violence abated at least temporarily. An annual holiday kept people off the streets. But police and troops staged a strong show of force around native townships.

Justice Minister F. C. Erasmus said in a statement that the police again will be ordered to demand that all Negroes show their passes any time of the day or night. He did not say when the system will go back into force.

NO PASS, NO WORK

He added that the government might look into the possibility of applying the pass laws "in such a way as to put more stress upon the advantage they hold for Negroes."

Erasmus explained that without a pass a Negro could not work in the city or in any other area reserved for whites.

After the passes were suspended many Negroes jubilantly burned their passes—a hated symbol of their second-class status in jobs, housing, education and civil rights.

Erasmus said police will help Negroes without passes to obtain temporary documents until they can receive duplicates.

The police pressed their campaign against the boycott which had cripped much of the nation's industry. They charged the movement had been taken over by hoodlums.

Police Fight Wild Mob In Africa

Montgomery Advertiser Ala.

2 Killed, Many Hurt As Boycotters Beat Working Negroes

Wed. 4-6-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Police used clubs and guns at Cape Town again Tuesday and fought a wild battle with a mob outside Durban in new efforts to break up the Negro work boycott.

The casualties included two dead and many beaten and injured. Some of the casualties were police.

Some Negroes joined the police in a wild melee with a mob of about 1,000 at Lamontville, 10 miles outside Durban.

The fight occurred when Negroes returning from work encountered a crowd waiting to beat them. Some Negroes were caught and beaten and others cut sticks and flailed at the mob before police arrived.

2 WOUNDED

One Negro was killed and two were wounded by police in the fight. One white and several Negro policemen were clubbed, and an unknown number of Negroes injured.

Police, with armored cars, for the second day swooped upon the big Negro settlement of Nyanga near Cape Town in an effort to stamp out the work boycott.

A Negro policeman was hacked to death after emptying his pistol into a crowd there. Two white policemen were beaten.

These casualties were reported by police, who did not give out any figures on Negro injured. But eyewitnesses said many Negroes were hurt.

QUIT BOYCOTT

About 60 per cent of Cape Town's Negro workers were reported to have quit the work boycott Monday, but Maj. J. J. Rheeder, a district police commandant, said Nyanga was again "alive with defiant stay-ways."

The township is a stronghold of the Pan Africanist Congress, militant Negro organization that ordered the boycott as a protest against the white supremacy laws of South Africa's Nationalist government, particularly the carrying of passbooks.

The government came under new pressure from some political, church and business leaders to negotiate instead of using force to end the racial strife.

NEGRO LEADERS

But the government indicated it would ignore the pleas to talk with responsible Negro leaders. It put on a drive for swift Senate action on a bill outlawing the Pan Africanist Congress and the more moderate African National Congress.

Even the opposition United party joined in supporting the bill and the only voices raised against it in Parliament came from the small Progressive party and the few members representing the Negroes.

An official of the African National Congress said the organization already has gone underground.

Police said they entered Cape Town's Negro settlement at Nyanga to protect those who want to work from terrorists attempting to prolong the boycott.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPORT

Police Whip Hundreds In Move Against Boycott

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) — Squads of police used clubs, whips and gunfire Monday in an effort to drive rebelliously idling Negroes back to work and clear the streets of alleged troublemakers.

Witnesses said hundreds of Negroes apparently were beaten.

One witness told of police using sjamboks—whips made of strips of rubber—on Negroes near Caledon Square in the center of the city.

Unofficial reports said 35 persons were wounded by gunfire when police cordoned off Nyanga east and west townships and made a methodical house to house search in some areas for Africans who had not gone back to work.

Police denied many were wounded by gunfire. Hospitals confirmed four were wounded by the first gunfire.

The townships are strongholds of the Pan Africanist Congress. It organized a work boycott last week in protest against police shootings of demonstrators who defied South Africa's white supremacy laws requiring nonwhites to carry passbooks.

Five out of six Negro workers observed the boycott at its height last week, but about 60 per cent of the labor force returned to work Monday.

The police action began in the morning after the start of regular work hours.

Some desperate Negroes in the settlements finally made a stand on a hill. At this time the police were reported to have fired on them. By 5 p.m. the police had withdrawn.

Negroes phoning from the townships described the scene as police, backed by armored cars, swept through the settlements.

The witnesses, including a nurse and a priest, said hundreds were beaten with whips and clubs.

Warning the Negroes not to "laze around," police went into one house and beat a man lying in bed, the witnesses said.

A nurse at a hospital in Nyanga said she ran out of bandages binding up wounds.

Dr. C. K. Madikiza turned his house into a field hospital and treated the injured as fast as they arrived, it was reported.

Some Negroes, ordered to get out of the settlement and back to work, tried to do so but were stopped by a military cordon and ordered back.

Violence elsewhere in South Africa resulted in at least one death near Durban, where about 20 per cent of the labor force remained away from work. A Negro was killed in the suburb of Claremont when police charged 3,000 demonstrators. The crowd assembled again and police scattered it a second time.

Seventeen persons were injured at Welkom, Orange Free State in the first reported racial disturbance among gold miners. Police there charged about 60 Negroes who refused to disperse.

There were isolated outbreaks in several other places such as vehicles stoned, roadblocks thrown up, a school burned at Port Elizabeth.

LIBERAL PARTY

Patrick Duncan, editor of the Liberal party magazine Contact, reported police using whips on Negroes near Cape Town's Caledon Square. The Liberal party, made up of Negroes and whites, favors conciliation between the races.

Soon other residents telephoned newspapers details of similar actions in their areas of the city.

Col. I. P. S. Terblanche, deputy commissioner of police, acknowledged a crackdown had been ordered under government emergency regulations against Negroes "who can't account for themselves in the city streets and other areas."

He said these were to be dealt with on the spot in an effort to get "potential intimidators and troublemakers off the streets."

RULE OF JUNGLE

Police claim much of the effectiveness of the work boycott was due to intimidators threatening those who wanted to return to their jobs.

As news of the police handling of Negroes reached Parliament, Harry Lawrence, chairman of the Progressive party, protested and called on the government to act under "law rather than the rule of the jungle."

A government bill outlawing the Pan Africanist Congress and the more moderate Negro organization, the African National Congress, was passed on the third and final reading. The measure now goes to the Senate where prompt passage is assured.

Liberal party headquarters received a stream of reports on the police raid in the Negro settlements.

Chaplain describes racial situation in South Africa

CANTWELL, An ANP SPECIALA

(Msgr. Daniel M. Cantwell chaplain of the Catholic Interracial Council of Chicago was in South Africa prior to Sharpsville massacres.)

CHICAGO — The South African Government policy is one of keeping rule and power for the white man by the simple process of "divide and conquer" applied to men of color —whether Africans or those of mixed blood. The policy aims at keeping Africans separated in tribal groups — mistrusting each other — and thus easy subjects for white control.

With Africans divided tribally — Zulus, Basutos, Xockis, etc.—white men will really be the great largest minority.

The policy can not succeed. The repressive measures necesary to keep it alive get more insupportable daily. Economically, it is unrealistic and expensive. It will be overthrown —the only question is with how much violence and with how much injury to white people. The intransigence of the present policy only breeds extreme positions among the Africans.

For the political aspirations of the African people I have found little sympathy among white Catholics. Of many I have asked the question: what has the Church to lose by identifying itself more with the African nationalist movement? Only one priest answered "absolutely nothing." That is my opinion, too — because in the long run the (African) nationalist movement must prevail. Moreover, it will take extreme positions in the measure that it meets such universal rejection.

The Church has been courageous, daring, strong on the racial issue here. One can have nothing but admiration for the statements on racial justice issued by the bishops.

But Africans are not likely to accept merely these statements — as good as they are. The African world is moving with unbelieveable rapidity. It wants freedom passionately. Its leaders will accept nothing less.

* * *

"EFFICIENCY" is on the minds of many whites when they consider moving Africans into positions of responsibility in the Church or in the socio-political system.

But Africans are not worried about efficiency. A decrease in efficiency is a small price to be paid for freedom. Moreover, the Africans are not too sure that the present system is so efficient anyway. I think they are right.

The other day I visited Cato Manor, scene of a riot last June when eight policemen were killed. There was some kind of disturbance when we were there. I could hardly believe my eyes to see police pull up in armored tanks. How "efficient" is a system that must be maintained by armored tanks.

Using the same tanks, the police with Government sanction, recently shot down in cold blood more than 86 helpless African natives who were demonstrating against the "pass book rule" and other oppressive measures.

NEGROES URGE SOUTH AFRICAN WORK BOYCOTT

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 14 (AP)—Underground leaders of the outlawed African National congress called on Negroes Thursday to boycott work again next week in the fight against the government's racial policies.

South Africa's 10 million Negroes provide most of the labor for the farms, factories, and homes of 3 million whites.

The first phases of the work boycott crushed by police raids on Negro settlements last week, showed the nation's vulnerability. Industry slowed and meat supplies dwindled.

Week's Boycott Urged

Mimeographed pamphlets [illegible] committee of the African National congress and circulated thruout the Negro settlements of Johannesburg asked all Negroes to join in a one-week work boycott starting Monday.

The pamphlets made four major demands as "our answer to the savage attack the government has made on us and our leaders" in efforts to quell the racial turmoil.

The demands were:

1. Down the passes which the law requires that all Negroes carry.
2. Free our leaders.
3. End the state of emergency.
4. Lift the ban on our organization.

Seeks Rule by Negroes

This defiance of the government came amid these other developments.

1. President Mangaliso Sobukwe of the militant Pan-Africanist congress, which also is outlawed, told a Johannesburg court his organization aims at "the complete overthrow of white domination" and "government of the majority, irrespective of color or creed, with loyalty to Africa. This means democracy as we have been taught it by the west." Sobukwe and 22 aids are on trial on a charge of inciting Negroes to disobey the pass law.

2. The government's information office in Capetown announced that 86 Negroes—83 civilians and 3 Negro policemen—were killed in the racial strife between March 21 and April 9. That covers the period between the Sharpeville shooting and the unsuccessful attempt of a white farmer last Saturday to kill Prime Minister Hendriek F. Verwoerd. The office said 391 Africans and 62 whites were wounded.

3. Verwoerd, with two .22 caliber bullets still in his head, was reported progressing well in a Pretoria hospital.

The John Brown Of South Africa

It is astonishing that the first violence in South Africa since the appalling massacre at Sharpville should come, not from oppressed Africans, but from white people. The Afro-American

In this case it came from one Dave Pratt, a wealthy farmer of British descent. p. 4 Sat 4-23-60

The terroristic and brutal acts of the South African government preyed upon his conscience so that he couldn't take it any longer.

He saw in steely-eye Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd the symbol of all that was hateful, unChristian and uncivilized in race relations. He believed that by eliminating Verwoerd he would be striking a telling blow for freedom. Baltimore, Md.

His thinking was no different from that of John Brown, our great abolitionist martyr of 1858, who was executed and thus became the first man to die for the emancipation of the slaves.

If Dave Pratt is excuted, as seems likely, his death undoubtedly will become the rallying event that might well trigger the South African revolution.

Ten African governments have been able to win their independence by peaceful means, but in others like Algeria, Kenya, Egypt and Ethiopia, there had to be violence and terrorism and revolution.

If South Africa's stubborn Dutchmen will not yield to passive resistance, then violence is inevitable and it won't make much difference whether opposition leaders like Verwoerd are eliminated by bullets fired by white hands or spears hurled by black ones.

More importantly, it should not be overlooked that the free African states, as soon as they are able, will come to the rescue of their oppressed brethren in South African with arms and military personnel.

These African states have already complained that the United States has sold automatic guns and planes and tanks to the French and white South Africans, but have consistently refused them to independent African nations.

If Africa is to be armed, it must turn to the Czechs and Russians for needed weapons.

It is also more than significant that Prime Minister Nkrumah of Ghana, addressing delegates of all independent African states last week, demanded that the continent be purged of all forms of colonialism, racial oppression and denial of human dignity.

African slaughter 'shame of history'

By DR. G. B. HANCOCK
For ANP

The current slaughter in South Africa is easily one of the great shames and tragedies of history. The tragic news that has "leaked" out is bad enough, but the untold story of what is transpiring must, in the final analysis, be revolting. Baltimore Md.

The things that should immediately concern us are the ways and means of white supremacy. What is actual in South Africa is potential wherever the notion of white supremacy exists. Sat. 4-23-60

What is happening in South Africa is a grim reminder that the same thing could happen here, for there are thousands and thousands, if not millions and millions of whites in this country who feel toward its non-white citizens as the whites feel toward those of South Africa, people whose only crime is reaching for the liberty and equality that South Africa and the world are dangling before their eyes.

Brutality cannot be more brutish than to kindle the desire for freedom and then slaughter humans for desiring it. Only faith in God can assuage the gloomy forebodings aroused by the tragic enactments of the hour.

Baltimore

THEY ARE currently doing in South Africa what they feel like doing in Mississippi and for the same reason—white supremacy. P. 8

What is transpiring in South Africa must not be charged against the white race as there is such great temptation to do. It must only be charged against the advocates of white supremacy predicated upon the degredation of human beings.

There are millions and millions of whites who have not bowed the knee of the Baal of white supremacy which is committed to the suppression and oppression and depression of all non-whites. There are still some whites committed to the ideals of Christianity and democracy and human decency.

ALL OF the whites in South Africa do not condone Malanism and the current slaughter of defenseless Africans who want to live in decency and freedom.

The current danger is that the recent upsurge of white supremacy with its concomitant human degredation and slaughter may undermine and destroy civilization and mankind itself.

The one ray of sunshine in the dark clouds that brutality in South Africa has cast over the earth is the assurance that what is transpiring there has not the unanimous approbation of the white world.

Although the powers that be in South Africa hurl into the teeth of some protesting nations the irritating truth that they themselves must get right before trying to right what is wrong with South Africa. South Africa is disgraced in the eyes of history. The accusations against the guilty by the guilty make for a weak case.

If colored Americans do not catch this tide at its crest and and cause it to roll on to freedom now, we may wake up to find that even our great-grandchildren won't know what freedom is because we muffed the ball.

Dr. Banda says, 'Things will get worse in South Africa'

By EDWARD PEEKS
WASHINGTON

"Things will get worse in South Africa before they get better," declared Dr. Hastings K. Banda, president of the Maliwa Congress Party of Nyasaland. Sat 4-30-60

"The struggle in Nyasaland is the same general struggle that goes on in South Africa," he said Friday, during an interview at Africa House, 1600 T St., NW, where he and Kenneth Kaunda of Northern Rhodesia were guests. P. 5

Both African leaders were released from British jails this year after serving sentences growing out of the struggle for independence in their respective countries.

* * *

"WE DON'T have any special ambition to shake the Queen's hand, but we do have ambition to be free," said Mr. Kaunda.

He made the remark after observing that it has become the practice for leaders of subject people to go to jail and then end up shaking hands with British royalty as heads of new nations.

"We are dedicated to the cause of Africa's freedom," said Mr. Kaunda, president of the United National Independence Party of Northern Rhodesia. "The wind of freedom is blowing across Africa.

"We have served our sentences in various British prisons," he added. "We plan to go forward and do what we think is right.

"Many of your great - grandfathers lost their lives in the defense of democracy. We intend to follow their example.

He spoke to an interracial audience that included Englishmen, of whose government he was critical concerning African affair.

DR. BANDA said in an earlier talk that the United States should boycott South African goods and impose other economic sanctions in an effort to make the country change its racial policy.

Dr. Homer Jack of the American Committee on Africa, sponsor of the visit by Dr. Banda and Mr. Kaunda, said the committee is pushing the boycott against South African goods.

The committee invited the visitors to the country to observe "African Freedom Day" sponored in New York City on April 13.

"We are going to raise $200,000 as part of the South African emergency campaign," said Dr. Jack, former Unitarian minister in Evanston, Ill., now associate director of the interracial committee.

He said $10,000 was raised in New York for the emergency fund to assist Africans jailed and wounded during the recent massacre.

Dr. Banda spoke Friday night at All Soul's Unitarian Church here.

Johannesburg, U.S.A.

The Washington Post

At first glance, the U.S. State Department's mild protest against the brutalities being committed by the racist government of South Africa appears a step in the right direction.

A second look, however, raises grave doubts as to the State Department's sincerity. p 4

This is because of the strange posture the Federal Government has assumed toward similar brutalities and violation of citizens' rights in Birmingham, Ala.

Birmingham, with considerable justification, is becoming popularly known as "the Johannesburg of the United States."

The difference, as some residents wryly observe, is only one of degree: "Here (in Birmingham) they have not yet opened fire with tanks and big guns."

All the violations of personal, human and constitutional rights rampant in South Africa exist in Birmingham, as was tacitly admitted by Police Commissioner Eugene (Bull) Connor when he told the AFRO:

"Damn the law — down here we make our own law."

4-23-60

If the Federal Government feels called upon to censure racism and violence in South Africa, thousands of miles away, the least it could do is to crack down on the same type of evil which exists only a few hundreds miles from the nation's capital.

ARRESTS AT 4,500 IN SOUTH AFRICA

The New York Times

Police Report Total Seized in Raids on Dwelling Sites of Africans in Month

By United Press International.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 25—More than 4,500 Africans have been arrested during raids on their dwelling areas in the last month, the police said today.

Of those arrested, it was reported, 1,771 were released after questioning. Many of those arrested have been convicted and jailed on charges of incitement, trespassing, loitering and violation of laws requiring Africans to carry identity passes.

At the same time, the Department of Justice said today that the number of persons jailed under the emergency regulations since March 30 was 1,650 instead of 1,575, as announced Friday.

The new figure includes seventy-five more Asians than were included in the former figure. Most of those detained indefinitely have been outspoken critics of the Government's racial segregation policies.

Labor Rationing Studied

Meanwhile, sources close to the governing National party have reported a plan being considered to ration African labor. Measures would be taken to reduce the number of African workers in industry. Free access to African labor would be denied and only urgently needed workers would be permitted.

A mint on Government thinking was given over the week-end by Francois C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice. He said the "mass of natives who gathered around cities and towns" had become "a fruitful field for agitators."

In a statement today in Parliament at Capetown Mr. Erasmus said, "Calm and order are again returning to all quarters due to the firm action of the Government, and in particular throug hthe army and police." Mr. Erasmus said also:

"Serious crime has become a cancer in the national life and to combat that the police will have to concentrate more and more on preventive duties.

"The crime should never have taken place, the disturbances should not have come into being and the safety of the state should not have been endangered."

1,575 HELD IN JAIL BY SOUTH AFRICA

The New York Times

Justice Minister Accounts for Political Prisoners—340 More Arrested

Sat. 4-23-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 22—The Government said today that 1,575 persons had been jailed under emergency regulations.

The announcement, which dealt with political prisoners, was made by Francois C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, in Parliament at Capetown. It brought gasps of astonishment. Arrests of opponents of the Government's racial policies and their supporters began March 30, the day the state of emergency was declared.

Mr. Erasmus said those detained included ninety-four whites, twenty-four persons of mixed white and African blood, known as Coloreds, six Asians and 1,451 Africans.

Seventeen Lawyers Held

Among those held are seventeen lawyers. Mr. Erasmus said that as far as he knew, none were engaged in work connected with the emergency.

However, the Right Rev. Ambrose Reeves, Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg, now in London, has said that two of the lawyers held had been participating in an investigation of shooting by the police of more than 250 Africans as Sharpeville March 21. The events at Sharpeville plunged South Africa into racial strife last month.

Meanwhile, arrests of Africans continued. One thousand policemen and troops raided the African township of Langa outside Capetown today and arrested 340 Africans, according to reports. They also were said to have confiscated 20,000 weapons, including clubs, iron bars and knives. Large quantities of illegal liquor were destroyed.

The Africans seized were said to have been without identity passes or permits to be in the township. Among them were some women.

The raid took five hours. The entire area was cordoned off by steel-helmeted soldiers armed with rifles and machine guns. While the police made house-to-house searches, armored cars patrolled the streets.

Under the emergency regulations the Government may intern any person without a warrant or a trial for the duration of the emergency. The names of persons jailed for more than thirty days must be published. Mr. Erasmus said a list was being prepared and would be presented soon in the House of Assembly, the lower chamber of Parliament.

In replying to questions about the plight of prisoners, Mr. Erasmus denied that any were being kept in isolation or in solitary confinement. He said all were allowed selected reading matter, opportunity for exercise and visits from relatives and friends, who were allowed to provide the prisoners with additional food.

Restrictions on Visits

V. R. Verster, Commissioner of Prisons, later said the prisoners were permitted two visits a week by not more than two relatives or friends at a time and two visits a week by not more than two persons at a time, including a legal adviser, in connection with urgent business or financial matters.

Mr. Verster said visits were limited to thirty minutes, but could be extended in exceptional circumstances with permission of the officer in charge. He also said the prisoner could write and receive two letters a week.

In Johannesburg, Leslie Lulofs, president of the South African Federated Chamber of Industries, said his organization soon would be presenting its views to the Government on ways to improve South Africa's race relations.

He said that as far as his organization was concerned most problems revolved around the basic question of whether Africans living and working in white areas were to be regarded "as part of the permanent structure of the country's economy."

Discusses Policy Need

In discussing the question, he said:

"If the answer is in the affirmative—and I cannot conceive of any other having regard to the tens of millions of pounds that are being spent actually at Government and local levels to provide them with urban accommodation and facilities—then we should acknowledge that fact unequivocally.

"Once we have acknowledged that conclusion, the issue resolves into one of adapting national and municipal policies to recognize and accommodate the permanence of the law-abiding section of the completely urbanized native [African]."

S. Africa Faces Boycott Again By Negro Group

The Philadelphia Inquirer

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 14 (AP).—The outlawed African National Congress called on Negroes Thursday to boycott work again next week in the fight against the Government's racial policies.

Big trouble could come from revival of the work boycott, a powerful economic weapon in this land where 10,000,000 Negroes provide most of the labor for the farms, factories and homes of 3,000,000 whites.

INDUSTRY VULNERABLE

The first phases of the stay-at-home movement, crushed by police raids on African settlements last week, showed the nation's vulnerability. Industry slowed. Meat supplies dwindled. House work suffered.

Mimeographed pamphlets signed by the Emergency Committee of the African National Congress and circulated throughout the African settlements of Johannesburg asked all Negroes to join in a one-week work boycott starting next Monday.

The pamphlets made four major demands as "our answer to the savage attack the Government has made on us and our leaders" in efforts to quell the racial turmoil.

DEMANDS LISTED

The demands were listed as follows:

1. Abolish the passes which the law requires that all Negroes carry.
2. Free our leaders.
3. End the state of emergency.
4. Lift the ban on our organization.

This defiance of the Government of the wounded Prime Minister, Hendrik F. Verwoerd, came amid these other developments:

AFRICA FOR AFRICANS

President Mangaliso Sobukwe of the militant Pan Africanist Congress, which is also outlawed, told a Johannesburg court his organization aims at Government of Africans by the Africans for the Africans and "the complete overthrow of white domination." Sobukwe and 22 aides are on trial on a charge of inciting Africans to disobey the pass law.

The Government's information office in Cape Town announced that 86 Africans—83 civilians and three Negro policemen—were killed in the racial strife between March 21 and April 9. That covers the period between the controversial Sharpeville shooting and the unsuccessful attempt of a white farmer last Saturday to kill Prime Minister Verwoerd. The office said 391 Africans and 62 white persons were wounded.

Verwoerd, with two .22-caliber bullets still in his head, was reported progressing well at a Pretoria hospital. A medical bulletin said: "The condition of the injured area is satisfactory. Breathing and swallowing movements are getting easier, with the result that his feeding can be extended."

South African Calls British Policy Dangerous

Accept Africa, Macmillan Urges Whites

The Minneapolis Tribune

CAPETOWN, South Africa —(AP)— British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan told the white lawmakers of this racially segregated country Wednesday that Africa's national consciousness is growing and "we must all accept this as a political fact."

Thurs. 2-4-60

The touring British leader addressed the Parliament of this British commonwealth nation without directly mentioning its policy of strict racial segregation (apartheid) that bars African Negroes from almost all political life.

"I hope you won't mind my saying frankly there are some aspects of your policies which make it impossible for us to support you without being false to our own deep convictions about the political destinies of free men to which,

Harold Macmillan

...'a political fact'

in our own territories, we are trying to give effect," Macmillan said.

Replying to Macmillan, Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd said British government policies in Africa could prove dangerous. He declared that white men in Africa must also get justice as well as black men.

"We are representatives of white men," Verwoerd said. "We made it possible by bringing benefits to Africa for African nationalism to develop. We have nowhere else to go."

Macmillan predicted the West would meet and accept African nationalism, adding: "If we cannot do that, we may imperil the precarious balance of East and West on which the peace of the world depends."

Britain's policy of self-government for Africans, he said, gives "an opportunity for these societies to have an increasing share in political power and responsbility; a society in which individual merit alone is the criterion for a man's advancement."

South Africa's apartheid policy, along with longstanding hostility to the British by South African settlers of Dutch descent, has strained relations with Britain.

South Africa plans to declare itself a republic and refuse to accept Queen Elizabeth II as head of state. There has been some talk of the nation withdrawing from the commonwealth.

Can't Back Segregation Policy, Macmillan Tells South Africa

The Washington Post Washington, D. C.

Thurs. 2-4-60.

Reuters

CAPETOWN, Feb. 3—British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan bluntly told the South African Parliament today that Britain could not support its policy of racial segregation.

P. 4.

Macmillan said that to do so would be "false to our own deep convictions about the political destinies of free men."

He also warned the white legislators that the most striking impression he received on his 17,000-mile African tour is that "the wind of change is blowing through the continent."

"Whether we like it or not, this growth of national consciousness is a political fact . . . Our national policies must take account of it."

By refusing to do so, he added, "we may imperil the precarious balance of East and West, on which the peace of the world depends."

Notes Great Issue

Macmillan said he thought the great issues in the second half of the 20th Century "is whether the uncommitted peoples of Asia and Africa will swing to the East or to the West."

"Will they be drawn into the Communist camp, or will the great experiments in self-government that are now being made in Asia and Africa . . . prove so successful and by their examples so compelling that the balance will come down in favor of freedom and order and justice?"

"The struggle is joined and it is a struggle for the minds of men," he declared.

In reply, Nationalist Prime Minister Hendrix Verwoerd said that, speaking frankly, "We can say we differ from you."

He brought applause when he said: "There must not only be justice to the black man in Africa but also to the white man.

"We see ourselves as part of the Western world—a true white state in southern Africa, with a possibility of granting a full future to the black man in our midst."

Aware of Problems

After Macmillan's speech, a prominent member of the opposition United Party said he thought Verwoerd was taken aback and embarrassed by some of Macmillan's talk.

Macmillan had said that it was a basic principle of the modern Commonwealth to respect each other's sovereignty in internal affairs. But in the "shrinking world" of today, internal policies might have effects outside, he pointed out.

He said he was well aware of the peculiar nature of the problems, with which "you are faced here in the Union of South Africa . . .

"As a fellow member of the Commonwealth, it is our earnest desire to give South Africa our support and encouragement.

"But I hope you will not mind my saying frankly that there are some aspects of your policies which make it impossible for us to do this without being false to our own deep convictions about the political destinies of free men, to which in our own territories we are trying to give effect."

In London, British politicians welcomed Macmillan's speech.

James Callaghan, chief spokesman on colonial affairs for the oppostion Labor Party, commented: "This is splendid news. Mr. Macmillan has said more or less what the Labor Party asked him to do before he left on his African tour."

Macmillan Hits Africa Racial Bars

The Atlanta Constitution Atlanta, Ga.

CAPETOWN, South Africa (UPI) — British Prime Minister Macmillan delivered a stinging attack against segregation Thursday before the race-conscious South African Parliament.

Thurs. 2-4-60.

In a table-pounding speech before a joint parliamentary session, Macmillan said bluntly that Britain rejected any idea of racial superiority. He said some aspects of South Africa's "policies" made it impossible for Britain to support the Commonwealth country.

P. 1.

Macmillan is winding up a 17,000-mile swing through Africa that has alternately brought him brick-bats and cheers from Africans.

The Prime Minister told Parliament Britain realized South Africa's problem in having a large mixed population and reaffirmed his government's intent to give the country its "support and encouragement."

"But I hope you won't mind my saying frankly that there are some aspects of your policies which make it impossible for us to do this without being false to our own deep convictions and about political destinies of free men," Macmillan added.

He explained that South Africa's racial segregation conflicted with a freedom policy that Britain was trying to extend into all its African colonies.

He said the strength of the British Commonwealth lay largely in the fact that it was a free association of independent sovereign states, each responsible for ordering its own affairs but cooperating in pursuit of common aims and purposes in world affairs.

Macmillan, pounding the table for emphasis, said he hoped that in another 50 years "we shall look back on the differences between us as matters of historical interest."

South African Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd replied:

"Our ways may be different but let's try to understand each other. You wish to be our friend. We wish to be yours.

"I hope you in Britain will have less problems than we have here."

MACMILLAN WARY IN SOUTH AFRICA

Withholds Comment as He Begins Visit—Will Give a Statement in Parliament

Dispatch of The Times, London.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Jan. 27—A red carpet was put down to welcome Prime Minister Macmillan today to South Africa. He arrived by plane on the final stage of his journey through Africa.

The Prime Minister made it clear both at the airport and at a news conference tonight that he intended to be careful about committing himself at this stage to any opinions about South African affairs. He promised that he would deliver "a considered statement" to members of Parliament in Capetown before he leaves for home.

Mr. Macmillan made this promise in reply to the question, "Is the white man's future safe in the African continent?" He said he would like to deal with the wider issues this question involved not when he had been in the Union only a few hours, but later, when he had had time to see something of the country and talk with its people.

At the airport the Prime Minister and his wife were met on behalf of the South African Government by Eric Louw, Minister of External Affairs, and Mrs. Louw. A small crowd greeted Mr. Macmillan enthusiastically.

Verwoerd Receives Visitor

Mr. Macmillan and his party drove to Pretoria, the administrative capital, where he was met by the Prime Minister, Dr. Hendrik F. Verwoerd.

Foremost among the topics the two Prime Ministers are likely to discuss will be South Africa's decision to form itself into a republic.

Mr. Macmillan comes here with the knowledge that there is in Britain a considerable swing of opinion against the South African Government's racial policies. In the frank exchanges that are conducted privately between leaders of countries in the Commonwealth, such concern must be expressed.

The African National Congress has planned to stage small and silent demonstrations on every occasion that Mr. Macmillan appears in public.

Riot Stirs Parliament

By DREW MIDDLETON

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, Jan. 27—A riot in Africa found an angry echo in the House of Commons today.

Iain Macleod, Colonial Secretary, told the Commons that "everyone" would regret the riot that took place in Blantyre, Nyasaland, yesterday, while Prime Minister Macmillan was there. He added that he would consider whether an inquiry should be held.

This did not satisfy either the Labor or the Liberal party. John Dugdale, speaking for Labor as the debate over colonial policy was resumed, asserted that newspaper reports showed that the Nyasaland police had behaved with "truculence and stupidity." The riot, he said, demonstrates the wisdom of Labor's decision not to participate in the work of the Monckton Commission, which will visit the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland next month to discuss its political development.

Camera Press-Pix

DECRIES AFRICA RIOT: John Dugdale, Labor party member of British Parliament. He criticized police work in riot in Nyasaland.

The Liberal party presented a motion calling for an "immediate inquiry" into the riot and noting the harmful effect it would have on Britain's reputation in Africa. African men and women were "beaten, injured and arrested by the police," the motion said.

Anxiety over the affair, which took place outside where the Prime Minister was lunching, has been fed by detailed accounts appearing in Britain's popular newspapers.

Police Brutality Reported

One policeman, according to an eyewitness account in The Daily Mail, struck men and women with his stock, kneed Africans who were "pleading for symbolic arrest" and deliberately stamped on women's bare feet.

The Labor and Liberal parties generally support the Africans' demands for political equality and, in the case of Nyasaland, their right to secede from the Federation once its independence is achieved. Successive Conservative Governments have sought to reconcile the aims of the European settlers with those of the Africans.

There are some influential Conservatives who believe that the Prime Minister has been troubled by the rigidity of the Europeans' position on African development. He learned, these sources said, that the Federation Government wanted to delay the introduction of political equality for ten or fifteen years, during which time the Africans would be educated for the role they would have to play in a self-governing democracy.

The difficulty the British see in this program is that with African nationalism on the move, it may prove impossible to keep peace for so long.

SOUTH AFRICA UNIT SEEKS RACE AMITY

Afrikaner Intellectuals Back Drive to Improve Relations Within Apartheid Frame

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, Jan. 30—An effort to work out a pattern of racial cooperation in South Africa is being made by the Bureau of Racial Affairs.

The undertaking is important because the bureau draws its support from the 60 per cent of the white population who call themselves Afrikaners. They are descendants of early Dutch settlers and it is from their ranks that the governing Nationalist party receives its strength.

In its search for a resolution in South Africa's racial conflicts, the bureau has organized an extensive program of contacts with leaders of the African majority to get their opinion on what needs to be done.

A conference of white and African leaders, to include representatives from the highest level of government, is foreseen as a possibility. Should such a conference materialize, it would be a milestone in South African racial relations.

SABRA, as the bureau is known here, was organized twelve years ago at the University of Stellenbosch, which is the center of Afrikaner intellectualism. Its basic function is to propagate the idea of separate development of the races, which is known as apartheid and is the government's basic racial policy.

The bureau is the Afrikaners' answer to the older Institute of Race Relations, which is critical of Government policy.

The bureau has numbered among its 4,000 members Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd and the Minister of Bantu Administrration and Development, M. D. C. de Wet Nel, as well as two former Prime Ministers, the late Johannes G. Strijdom and Daniel F. Malan.

Government Gives No Aid

However, SABRA receives no grant or subsidy from the Government. It is financed from membership fees and donations. Most Afrikaner civic, cultural and religious organizations are affiliated with it.

Two members of the executive committee, J. L. Sadie, Professor of Economics, and S. P. Cilliers, Professor of Sociology, both of the University of Stellenbosch, explained the bureau's activities.

"Time is our most limiting factor," Professor Cilliers said in an interview in discussing the search for a social and political orderr in which all races could live harmoniously.

"The South African problem is not one of race but one of political power," he said. "It is essentially a question of finding ways of preventing factors such as numbers leading to a situation where one group was swamped or dominated by another. At present, because of the historical situation, the whites are in power."

He added: "We in Sabra are interested in finding a way in which the whites would not dominate the Africans, but not in a way of asking the whites to surrender their freedom or self-determination.

Professor Sadie joined in to explain:

"Separate development does not mean a completely rigid conception. You have to know how they, the Africans, or the Bantu as we call them, think and what their grievances are before you can know how separate development can be set up."

Possible Political Set-up

He said one possibility was confederation of white and African States. Representation in South African parliament has not been discussed, he said, but "if that develops there probably would have to be a super-government with some kind of representation for all the states."

The fact-finding project is to continue at least for another year beforre a report is submitted.

"One thing that impressed me," Professor Cilliers said of his participation in the project, "was that I was more optimistic about the possibilities of the future than I had been before because I felt the Bantu to be responsible citizens who were eager to find solutions to our problems which would leave scope for the development of all population groups. I did not find that animosity was so great that they were beyond reason."

Professor Sadie noted: "They are amenable and open to discussion. Beyond the extremists they do feel their dependence on the white community."

Soviet Medical Group Elects

MMOSCOW, Jan. 30 (AP)—Prof. Nikolai Bolkhin, a specialist in the study of Cancer, has been elected president of the Soviet Medical Academy of Sciences, Tass said today.

Total Apartheid

A sweeping defense of the South African Nationalist policy of apartheid — enforced "apartness" of the different races — has just been written by Dr. Piet J. Meyer, chairman of the board of the South African Broadcasting Company. In his new book, Further Journey: The Afrikaner in Africa, Dr. Meyer calls for not only the strictest kind of apartheid in South Africa itself, but "extension" of the system throughout the continent. According to The New York Times, Dr. Meyer is bitter toward fellow South Africans who may hold some reservations about apartheid:

> He asserts that even without domestic intellectuals to contend with, South Africa's Afrikaners have a horde of enemies. He lists Soviet and Chinese communism, Indian imperialism, the Moslem world, Western European liberalism, American capitalist sentimentalism, and inflamed anti-white African animism.

Congratulations, Dr. Meyer! By your own reckoning you have achieved apartheid from practically everybody except John Kasper and maybe Orval Faubus.

VERWOERD POLICY TO BE CARRIED ON

The New York Times

South African Cabinet Will Continue Strict Measures —Police Drive Pressed

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 11—Members of the Government emphasized today that the policies of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd would continue unchanged despite the attempt on his life.

Dr. Verwoerd, a champion of apartheid, had taken a strong stand in dealing with the racial strife that has torn South Africa in the last month. He was shot twice by a white farmer at an exposition here Saturday.

The Prime Minister, now in a Pretoria hospital, was reported to be "still weak but making progress." Two bullets remained lodged in his head.

Paul O. Sauer, Minister of Lands, Forestry and Public Works, declared in the House of Assembly after a caucus of parliamentary members of the Government National party:

"As far as Parliament is concerned, there will not be any deviations from existing programs as a result of what has happened."

No formal charges had been brought against David Pratt, the gentleman farmer who shot Dr. Verwoerd, up to a late hour today. It was speculated that the state might ask the death penalty for him on a charge of high treason.

The police are continuing their drive against African hooligans and agitators who have been blamed by the Government for the recent racial unrest. For three hours heavily armed policemen, supported by three armored cars, made a house-to-house search of Johannesburg's western African township. About 100 Africans were detained for further questioning.

Associated Press Radiophoto

RAID: Helmeted South African police forming cordon Sunday around Cato Manor, on outskirts of Durban. Government defended police measures used in suppressing agitation.

Mr. Sauer said no decision had been reached by the National party caucus about a possible request to Governor General Charles R. Swart for the appointment of an Acting Prime Minister. The caucus lasted for nearly three hours in a tense and expectant atmosphere.

Sauer Pledges Firmness

In his statement in the lower house, Mr. Sauer, who is leader of the Assembly, said: "We do not know how long Dr. Verwoerd will be incapacitated and when he will be able to resume his duties, but Parliament will carry on its present program."

"I also want to give an assurance that the rest of the Cabinet will see to it that peace and order shall be maintained," he added.

Similar assertions that Prime Minister Verwoerd's policies and principles would be carried out were made by Dr. Theophilus E. Donges, Minister of Finance, and Benjamin Schoeman, Minister of Transport. Mr. Schoeman declared the Nationalists would not be diverted "one inch" from the course Dr. Verwoerd had set for them.

These statements followed the unanimous adoption of a resolution expressing deep shock and deploring the attack on the Prime Minister. Mr. Sauer said he knew there would be "revulsion and condemnation" at the shooting of Dr. Verwoerd, but he appealed again for calm.

"What happened here on Saturday is something so strange to our public in South Africa that I thing all South Africans will hang their heads in shame," he asserted.

Physicians attending Dr. Verwoerd at the Pretoria General Hospital said in a bulletin: "Naturally, he is still weak and fatigued, but is continuing to make progress. The reassurance can be given that there is no sign of paralysis and according to the progress made so far paralysis is not expected."

Earlier reports about Dr. Verwoerd's injuries had said that although one bullet was lodged below his right ear and another in the roof of his mouth, there had been no damage to the brain.

A late bulletin tonight said Dr. Verwoerd's "pain and discomfort was less than yesterday but his condition still is causing a great amount of anguish." His general condition was described as "satisfactory and up to expectations." He was reported to be "taking liquid food for the first time."

The police warned again today that Africans must carry identity passes and that none could be employed without them. Demonstrations against the requirement that Africans must have these documents to be permitted to move about precipitated the recent racial violence.

An inquiry into the shooting by the police of 258 Africans, seventy-two of whom were killed, at Sharpeville on March 21 opened today at Vereeniging, an industrial town south of Johannesburg. Sharpeville is the African quarter of Vereeniging.

The disorder occurred when the police fired into a crowd of Africans after thousands of demonstrators had besieged the police station in a protest against the pass laws.

The hearing today was taken up mainly with discussions of a suggestion that the inquiry be postponed because of the state of emergency in South Africa and the consequent reluctance of some witnesses to give evidence. The inquiry was adjourned until tomorrow, when a decision on postponement will be made.

Louw Defends Apartheid

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 11—Eric H. Louw Minister of External Affairs, defended apartheid today as well as the drastic police measure employed in suppressing agitation among Africans.

He scolded foreign journalists for what he said was biased reporting of the racial crisis. But he did not threaten any further action against them.

Mr. Loum was in a rather benign mood as he revealed at a news conference that Norman Phillips, foreign news editor of The Toronto Star, was about to be released from a Durban jail on condition that he leave South Africa immediately. Before the news conference ended, however, Mr. Louw was informed by journalists that another reported had been picked up by the police.

This was Mrs. Myrna Blumberg Mackenzie, who writes under the name of Myrna Blumberg for The New York Post and The Daily Herald of London. Mrs. Mackenzie was taken from her home by four policemen and held for questioning under emmergency regulations.

"She's only a stringer," explained Mr. Louw, meaning that Mrs. Mackenzie, a South African, was not a staff member of a foreign newspaper. "There are three of four stringers I'd like to see jailed," he added with a smile.

Mr. Louw told about twenty foreign reporters that the police would again shoot down Africans if necessary to preserve order.

They should remember, he said, that the shooting at Sharpeville was preceded by the hacking to death of nine policemen at Cato Manor, near Durban. He termed it significant that "not much fuss was made in the foreign press" over the murder of the nine policemen.

"You cannot handle gangsters with kid gloves," Mr. Louw declared. He said he had seen the New York and Paris police deal with mobs and they were not gentle. It is "gross misrepresentation" to suggest that police brutality here is a Government policy, he said.

Press Silence on Pratt Ordered

JOHANNESBURG, April 11 (AP)—The South African police ordered the press today to stop printing the name of David Pratt, the wealthy 52-year-old farmer and British clubman who shot Dr. Verwoerd. Friends have decribed Pratt as a foe of Dr. Verwoerd's race-segregation policy.

A police spokesman said only that Dr. Verwoerd's assailant "will appear in court at some future date." His arraignment had been expected today.

Enigmatic Assassin

David Pratt

THE man who stepped up to South Africa's Prime Minister on Saturday, called his name softly and then fired two bullets into the head of Hendrik F. Verwoerd does not fit the stereotype of the wild-eyed assassin.

David Pratt, now awaiting arraignment for his crime in a Johannesburg jail, is rich, good-looking and cultivated. He was born in the "stockbroker belt" of Surrey, near London. He attended Cambridge University. At his exclusive London club he was known as a quiet man—"a gentleman in every way."

Man in the News

Pratt is 52 years old, 5 feet 8 inches tall and sturdily built. He owns the finest Ayrshire cattle herd in the Transvaal, a Johannesburg candy factory, the largest trout hatchery in South Africa and a twenty-five-room luxury farmhouse about thirty miles from Johannesburg.

When his father died six years ago, he received an inheritance reputedly worth $750,000.

His daughter by a first marriage, Susan, was among the last debutantes to be presented to Queen Elizabeth II before royal patronage of wealthy teen-agers ended in 1958.

This is one side of David Pratt. But a more somber side is emerging slowly, pieced together from acquaintances and friends in Johannesburg and in London, where he was a frequent visitor.

'Small and Aggressive'

Pratt belonged to the National Liberal Club in London's West End, which he made his second home. Although a fellow clubman said he was "a reserved chap—the last sort of fellow you would expect to pull a gun on anyone," a Liberal party acquaintance described him as "small and aggressive, with an immense sense of his own importance."

In Johannesburg, The Rand Daily Mail called him "an enigma to his friends" and said he was subject to fits of depression.

The newspaper said one of Pratt's greatest interests was the "Boy's Town" at Magaliesberg. The director, the Rev. R. R. Orsmond, said Pratt had visited him several times during the last two weeks.

"I gained the impression he was emotionally very upset and seemed to be seeking for something to restore his self-confidence, which—it seemed to me—he had lost," Father Orsmond said. "At no time was politics discussed between us."

Pratt, who was taken from Britain to South Africa at the age of four by his stockbroker father, has been married twice. His first wife, whom he married in 1935, divorced him.

Associated Press

"An immense sense of his own importance."

He is estranged from his present wife, the former Patty Van Heyningen, Dutch artist and architect, whom he met on a sea voyage to South Africa.

The second Mrs. Pratt took their two small children to the Netherlands with her in 1956 on a vacation. They did not return. Pratt went to the Netherlands twice in attempts at reconciliation.

After the last visit from which he is said to have returned only six weeks ago, friends in Johannesburg called him "a changed man"—moody and depressed.

He was also described by an intimate there the day after his assassination attempt as a man who "hates Nationalists." The friend added: "Verwoerd is the No. 1 Nationalist."

A Critic of Apartheid

This attitude was confirmed by friends in London. Last autumn, Pratt told Mrs. Bute Hewes, wife of a Liberal party official:

"A lot of us don't like what is going on in South Africa. But what is the alternative? It's our country and we just can't run out on it. It's our home. But some of us want to see things put straight out there. Apartheid can't last."

Pratt was a member of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society, cosponsor of the Union Exposition Exposition that opened officially in Johannesburg last Saturday. A well-known figure in agricultural circles, he was able to enter the Prime Minister's box without challenge and fire his pistol point-blank at Dr. Verwoerd.

Last Sunday, Pratt's daughter Susan, a strikingly beautiful woman who was once a photographic model in London, visited her father in his prison cell. She described him as "perfectly contented" and "not at all upset by his situation."

RACE ISSUES SEEN FOR LONDON TALKS

Nash Says Commonwealth's Chiefs May Discuss South African Policy Informally

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 11—Walter Nash, Prime Minister of New Zealand, said today it was probable that South Africa's race policies would be discussed informally by Commonwealth leaders, when they met here next month, but not within the conference itself.

Upon his arrival at London Airport and again at a news conference at New Zealand House Mr. Nash emphasized that major controversial issues of that nature, involving the internal affairs of a Commonwealth country, were regarded as outside the competence of Commonwealth meetings.

Asked about New Zealand's attitude toward the South African question, he replied that it was a matter of record that he did not think there were any "racially superior people."

"But I won't say anything to make things worse than they are," he added.

Worsening Feared

"It does seem at the present time that if some superstatesmanship is not used by someone we may have a worse condition [in South Africa] than has yet been known in the conflict between the races," Mr. Nash said.

Asked whether he would raise the question of South Africa "in view of the danger to a multiracial group like the British Commonwealth," the Prime Minister answered:

"I do not think it will be raised at the conference. But I do not think whoever represents South Africa would object to a discussion on the subject."

Earlier, he remarked that the conference would "give the people responsible for the policy a chance to discuss why they are doing certain things."

Full Schedule Ahead

The Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference is scheduled from May 3 to 11. Before it opens, Mr. Nash has a heavy schedule of visits to the Soviet Union and to France, West Germany and other members of the six-nation European Economic Community.

His primary interest with the latter countries, and with the members of the British-sponsored European Free Trade Association, is trade. He said he would "try to persuade them to buy as much from New Zealand as they can."

After the Commonwealth meeting, Prime Minister Nash intends to attend the United Nations Trusteeship Council debate on Western Samoa, which, he said, "should get its independence" next year, and the conference of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization from May 31 to June 4 in Washington.

Diefenbaker Asks Restraint

Special to The New York Times.

OTTAWA, April 11—Prime Minister John Diefenbaker cautioned Canadians today against doing anything that might jeopardize the Commonwealth meeting in London.

Faced with an Opposition demand for debate on a resolution on South African racial policies, Mr. Diefenbaker said that, while the Canadian Government deplored the situation in South Africa, it was vital that nothing be done that might endanger the London meeting.

He said he feared for the Commonwealth meeting if it appeared that the conference members were going to be "both a judge and a jury" in the case of South Africa.

ARRESTS MOUNT IN SOUTH AFRICA

500 Seized in New Raids as Regime Presses Tightening of Controls on Africans

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 27—Arrests of Africans mounted today as the Government continued the reimposition of strict controls on their lives.

The police were particularly active in Johannesburg, Capetown and the Indian Ocean port of East London. They said they were rounding up vagrants, loafers, unemployed persons and potential criminals. More than 500 Africans were arrested.

Today was the second day of sweeps through the downtown streets in Johannesburg. Africans were stopped by teams of policemen and made to explain their presence in the city. If their explanations were not satisfactory or if they did not possess identity papers, they were arrested. The police did not disclose the number seized here.

In East London, troops and policemen surrounded the East Bank African dwelling are at dawn. They arrested 312 person, bringing to 1,183 the total of Africans arrested in the area in four dawn raids in the last ten days.

In the Nyanga and Langa African townships outside Capetown, Africans were arrested early today. In the diamond-mining center of Kimberley twenty were seized, and in Henneman and Ventersburg, small towns in the Orange Free State, forty-four were placed under arrest.

Permits and Passes Required

Africans without permits to be in urban areas or to be visiting or residing in African townships, those who had not paid their taxes and those without Government-issued identity passes weer seized. They face fines or imprisonment ranging from $2.80 or eight days in jail to $14 or five weeks in jail. Most Africans are unable to pay cash fines.

A hundred policemen and 100 soldiers of the Active Citizens Force, the South African equivalent of the United States National Guard, participated in the East London operation. They were aided by six armored cars.

In Johannesburg, the Department of Bantu (African) Administration and Development explained the procedure followed in the case of an arrested African.

"He may be fined by the native commissioner or a magistrate and then after obtaining a duplicate reference book be allowed to enter and work again in the urban area concerned," a spokesman said.

"If he is found to be an idle or disorderly person in terms of the Natives Urban Areas Act, he may be removed to his home or a place indicated by the native commissioner or a magistrate, or be sent to a work colony for a period not exceeding two years.

"Vagrants who unlawfully enter an urban area may after being convicted by repatriated to their home territory."

Macmillan Asks Forbearance

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 27—Prime Minister Macmillan called today for honesty and courtesy in dealing with such "stresses" in the British Commonwealth as those caused by South Africa's racial problems.

He told the Commonwealth Correspondents Association he did not believe anything was gained "by trying to attack the good faith or the goodwill of someone who disagrees with you."

'Our association of the commonwealth is very flexible," he declared. "We have no rules. We can only succeed if on both sides, whether the South African side or those who criticize her policy, we are honest with ourselves."

SOUTH AFRICA IN SLUMP

Stocks Down $1,500,000,000 Since Racial Crisis Began

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 13 (AP)—The president of the Johannesburg Stock Exchange, A. J. F. Ferguson, announced today a big drop in the capital value of listed companies. He warned the South African Nationalist party Government that continuation of its policies could do irreparable harm to the country's economy.

According to quarterly statistics of the stock exchange, capital value of companies had fallen £501,000,000 (nearly $1,500,000,000) ten days after the outbreak of South Africa's recent racial unrest.

During the last six weeks there has been a further substantial deterioration on the stock exchange, Mr. Ferguson said.

Criticism of Racial Curbs Increasing in South Africa

The New York Times
New York Wed. 4-6-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 5—Sentiment appeared to be growing among South Africans today for a softening of their country's harsh racial policies. Violence brought on by these policies continues.

Two business leaders and an important member of the Opposition United party warned of the consequences of the present state of emergency caused by racial unrest.

They called on the Government to consult African leaders and to give South Africa policies that would win her respect rather than condemnation throughout the world.

Fourteen ministers of the Anglican Church in Capetown appealed today to the Government of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd to bring to an end the "methods of violence against individuals now openly adopted by the police." They urged restraint and regard for human dignity.

In a reply to the clergymen and others making similar protests, François C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, said that the police were dealing with "intimidators" who try to keep Africans from their jobs.

But in Capetown today the Senate approved a bill empowering the Government to outlaw the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress, the major groups representing African political aspirations. The bill had already been passed by the House of Assembly, and it now becomes law.

Two Killed in Violence

The death of an African tonight at the African settlement of Lamontville near Durban brought to two the number killed in violence today in South Africa. Five Africans and a white policeman were hurt when the police opened fire to break up a mob threatening African workers returning from their jobs in Durban.

Meanwhile, an outbreak of violence in the Capetown area, where the Government appears to be in control of the situation only through the use of force, led to at least one death today and injuries to five Africans. Thirty persons, some in serious condition, were still being treated for injuries suffered in yesterday's crackdown by the police on Africans in the Capetown area.

Throughout South Africa authorities reported that the African labor force, upon which the country's economy is based, was back at work. In Capetown 90 per cent of the African workers were at their jobs.

The concern of the business community over the tense situation and its economic effect was stressed by Peter Mosenthal, a textile manuacturer and president of the Fort Elizabeth Chamber of Commerce. Port Elizabeth is an important Indian Ocean port and the site of automobile assembly plants owned by United States manufacturers.

At the chamber's annual meeting Mr. Mosenthal said, "The time has arrived when organized commerce must speak." He appealed for a revision of the governing National party's strict appartheid policy of racial segregation and said that "consultation with all races must be undertaken."

Mr. Mosenthal said, "The Bantu [Africans] certainly have legitimate grievances which must be righted, not by intimidation and force but by consultation."

"The Almighty in His wisdom decided tha South Africa was going to be a multi-racial country and the sooner people realize this the better," he told his audience.

T. O. Weir, president of the Pretoria Chamber of Commerce, warned in a speech at his chamber's annual meeting today that if present trends were allowed to continue South Africa would be the outcast of Western Civilization. Pretoria is the administrative capital of South Africa and a center of National party strength.

"Even the most optimistic of ups must view the future with certain doubts," Mr. Weir said. He called for a change in the Government's policy so that South Africa could become known as a happy land of sunshine.

A proposal that Africans be permitted to elect representatives to Parliament was made by Douglas Mitchell, leader of the Opposition United party in Natal province, where the party has its strongest support.

Speaking in Johannesburg, Mr. Mitchell said that as soon as the present crisis had passed South Africa must go into the question of "finding a basis for a nonwhite electorate."

"Responsible Bantu must be allowed their representatives in Parliament," he said.

At present there are three white members in the House of Assembly elected indirectly to represent the African interests. Under present legislation this representation is to cease at the close of the present session of Parliament.

Mr. Mitchell urged that the National party Government under Dr. Verwoerd consult with moderate African leaders to discuss future race relations. He cautioned, however, that control of the Government must continue in white hands to insure "an effective Government of Western civilized standards."

African Policeman Killed

One of the deaths reported today occurred at the Nyanga African township outside Capetown. An African policeman was hacked to death by a mob and two white policemen were injured.

Minor disturbances in African and today were reported by the police in Johannesburg, Durban and Fort Elizabeth. It appeared that harsh police action, particularly in Capetown, was being used to break work stoppages by African stay-at-home demonstrators.

At the Langa African township, also outside Capetown, the police found many persons had large amounts of food stored in their homes in apparent preparation for a long siege.

To complicate matters in Johannesburg an outbreak of smallpox has occurred in Pimville, an African dweling area west of the city. Eight cases have been discovered. They are said to be mild but mass inoculations in the township have been ordered.

In the Senate today Mr. Erasmus advanced the bill to outlaw the African National and Pan-Africanist Congresses.

"I know of no democratic country with self-respect which would permit two organizations such as these to tell the worlddefended police action against openly that they were out to"agitators" and repeated that undermine the existing author-the Government would combat ity," he said. lawlessness "with all the means

Observers See No Chance for Compliance—Police Halt New Demonstrations

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 2—The United Nations Security Council's appeal to South Africa to abandon her apartheid policy of racial segregation met here today with stony silence.

Racial tension continued high and further disorders between whites and Africans caused at least one more death but there was no official reaction to the Security Council's move.

Observers here saw no chance that the Government of Prime Minister Hednik F. Vernoerd would yield to the council's plea. The vote condemning South Africa's racial policies was seen only as producing a stiffening of official attitude that South Africa's race problems are her own domestic business and that South Africans are best equipped by knowledge and experience to know what to do about them.

Infant Boy Killed

In Capetown an infant African boy strapped to his mother's back was shot and killed this morning. The senseless shooting was difficult to understand. It came a short time after the police had turned back several thousand Africans who attempted to march into Capetown from African dwelling areas.

According to reports received here the child was being taken to a hospital by his parents. As they left Nyanga Township outside Capetown in a car they were stopped by sailors of the South African Navy on emergency duty. The driver asked permission to leave the African area but was refused. Shots were fired and the child was killed and the mother wounded.

The March on Capetown was made by Africans who had slipped out of the township before 8 A. M. on the pretext of going to work. They were stopped by the police who feared another riot like one that occurred in Durban yesterday. Four were killed and eighteen wounded by police bullets in Durban, according to revised casualty figures that became known today.

Throughout the night and today strong forces of policemen in armored cars patrolled Cato Manor, Durban's African slum. Searchlights played over the area last night and spotter aircraft droned overhead today. All persons leaving the area were searched for weapons.

Mayor Alec Gorshel of Johannesburg appealed today for calm.

"Everybody is under a duty now to see that he does not do or say anything that might provoke unrest between white and nonwhite in our city," he said.

In Capetown, the Most Rev. Joost de Blank, Anglican archbishop of Capetown, appealed to churches attended by members of the Government to work for "a change of heart and a change of policy in the leaders of the nation."

Apartheid Repudiated

He observed that the Dutch Reformed Church, to which most Afrikaners belong, had abandoned three years ago any effort to provide spiritual and theological justification for apartheid.

"This repudiation has not been driven home with sufficient speed or emphasis among the rank and file of their church membership," the archbishop said.

Afrikaners, descendants of South Africa's Dutch settlers, provide the bulk of support for the National party Government of Prime Minister Verwoerd.

Apartheid, an Afrikaans word meaning separateness, was adopted as one of the major policies of the National party when it assumed power in 1948 under the late Prime Minister Daniel F. Malan. But racial discrimination, the basic cause of the present emergency in South Africa, has long been official policy.

Demonstrations against racial discrimination go back almost to the formation in 1912 of the African National Congress, one of two African political organizations in South Africa that the Government has announced will be outlawed.

Recent demonstrations against pass laws that led to the present emergency were organized by African political leaders. Yet, as a result of the mass shooting of Africans by the police at Sharpeville March 21, emotions were aroused and the leaders lost control of the situation, observers here say.

African Leaders Curbed

Efforts by the Africans to organize politically has continually been frustrated by the Government. Their leaders have often been banned from attending meetings and from traveling about the country. Many were rounded up in 1956 and placed on trial for treason. This case is still being heard but court procedings were adjourned this week until April 19 because of the emergency.

Many Africans now believe that, with the suspension of a week ago of the requirement that Africans carry passes at all times, they have made an important gain.

During the week, however, members of the Government have indicated that they consider the pass system necessary to order and public safety and that they expect it will be reimposed.

Police Halt Demonstrations

JOHANNESBURG, April 2 (AP)—Demonstrations against South Africa's white supremacy rule occurred today at Captown and Paarl but police and military forces kept them from erupting into new violence.

Several thousand Africans streamed out of their settlement of Nyanga and marched on Capetown, but they were stopped by the police.

In Paarl, a wine center forty miles northeast of Capetown, several hundred African men and women gathered in front of the court building. They built fires and burned their pass books.

The police arrested several leaders and the crowd dispersed without further incident.

In Johannesburg, troop units stood by on the outskirts to reinforce the police. Civilian defense units were under alert. The only incident reported overnight was the stoning of two reporters of an African newspaper by young Africans.

On the south coast, bands of masked Africans roamed through african settlements near Port Elizabeth calling on residents to destroy their pass books.

South Africa To Stand on Race Policy

New York Herald Tribune
Mon 5-2-60

Verwoerd's Faith In It Firmer Than Ever

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 1 (AP).—Hope among Liberal and other groups that the government of South Africa would relax its strict segregation policy has been dashed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd.

This was disclosed by M.D. De Wet Nel, Minister of Bantu (Negro) Affairs and Development, at a Nationalist party meeting last night at Pretoria after he visited Mr. Verwoerd at the hospital where he is recovering from wounds received on April 9 in an assassination attempt by a white opponent of his racial policy.

"Dr. Verwoerd believes more than ever now that the policy being followed in South Africa is the correct one," said Mr. Nel, who is the chief executor of the government's policy toward the Negro majority of the population.

"That is the message I bring you from the Prime Minister. All the bullets and all the scandals will not deter us from our path.

"We have no illusions that the man who shot Dr. Verwoerd was the instrument of the devil's hand. . . . Those bullets were not only aimed at Dr. Verwoerd, but they were a specific challenge to the European (white) population of South Africa."

Clergymen Assailed

Mr. Nel repeated frequent Nationalist charges that English-language newspapers and Anglican clergymen, as well as elements abroad, prompted South African Negroes to engage in their recent campaign against white supremacy laws.

He added that the government intends to retain the passbook system through which it controls the movement of Negroes and which they hate. The Negro demonstrations which began in March and led to bloodshed and disorders were aimed primarily at the passbooks.

Police and troops are continuing raids on Negro settlements throughout the country. In the last fortnight, 4,000 Negroes have been arrested, including 1,00 in one raid on Friday at East London.

S. Africa Detains 20 Children

The Washington Post
Washington D.C.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 14 (AP)—More than 20 white and Negro youngsters were arrested today while demonstrating outside Johannesburg's City Hall against the jailing of their parents under South Africa's emergency laws.

Sun 5-15-60

The children were bundled into police vans and taken to jail for questioning.

They ranged from small children to 17-year-olds. Later they were released separately and told to go home.

P. 8

They had lined up on the steps of the City Hall holding up placards declaring: "We want our parents" and "Why are you keeping my mother and father?"

1700 Adults Held

The youngsters' parents are among 1700 adults of all races jailed in South Africa as suspected political subversives. Emergency regulations proclaimed to combat racial violence allow them to be detained indefinitely without trial.

After the protest had begun a small deputation of white and Asian children were admitted to City Hall for an audience with Mayor Alec Gorshel.

They handed him a letter urging him to ask Justice Minister Francois Erasmus to obtain their parents' release.

The Mayor and the children were still talking when police arrived and marched up to the children who were left outside to continue the silent demonstrations.

Crowd Shouts Abuse

The South African Press Association reported that as the police led the children across the street, a large crowd of people gathered. Some shouted abuse at the police. The police ordered the crowd to disperse.

Earlier, Anglican Church authorities, fearing prosecution on political grounds, banned the use of their churches for "24-hour vigils of prayer and fasting" by relatives and friends of detainees.

Church authorities said in a statement permission will not be given to use the Johannesburg Cathedral for "demonstrations of a political character."

'New Spirit' in South Africa

The New York Times

A major test of strength that could have led to revolutionary explosions in South Africa has been averted due to the failure of a projected week-long general strike to materialize. The strike, intended to paralyze the country, was ordered by revolution-bent African leaders. But for various reasons—such as the arrest of their leaders, lack of money and the Government threat of banishment to remote areas—the large mass of Africans ignored the strike call and flocked back to work and school.

This does not mean that the racial conflict is any nearer solution. On the contrary, new police raids, new arrests, new jail sentences and fines attest its continuation. But there are also signs that basic racial tensions are lessening, at least for the moment; that the recent riots, which cost scores of lives, the attempted assassination of Prime Minister Verwoerd and the world-wide condemnation of the Government's policy of apartheid have shocked the country into taking a new look at it; that, in fact, the masses of both the white and the African people are less extreme than their leaders.

Among the whites there is rising clamor among a growing number of liberals, but also in business and industrial circles, for an end to the repressive emergency rule and, if not for an end to apartheid, at least for a more flexible approach to it. The Government is still unwilling to yield, but it is significant that the acting Government head, Lands Minister Sauer, calls for a "new spirit" in race relations, for an earnest and honest reconsideration of them and for important changes in the application of apartheid to give the Africans hope for a happier existence.

In this "new spirit" the Government has already reversed itself and has agreed to a visit by Secretary General Hammarskjold in compliance with a United Nations Security Council resolution. How far the Government proposes to go remains to be seen, but it does appear at last to take note of Prime Minister Macmillan's warning that the wind of change is blowing through Africa.

On the other side, there are similar indications that the Bantu Africans, as much comparatively recent conquerors in South Africa as the whites, are not yet ready to follow their extremist leaders who pursue racial policies of their own and claim a whole continent in the name of color. What the results of such policies can be is shown by the sanguinary tribal conflicts in the Congo and the Cameroons. It will take moderation on both sides to live with a problem in a country where "deliberate speed" in its solution may call for the moment for more deliberation than speed.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 20—The National party ranks were in confusion and disarray in Parliament today following a seeming division in the Cabinet on the future application of apartheid policies.

The storm in the governing party arose over remarks made yesterday by Paul O. Sauer, Minister of Lands and leader of the Assembly. In a speech at Humansdorp, Mr. Sauer called for sweeping changes in the application of apartheid.

More than 600 Africans were arrested today as the Government continued its drive to break resistance to the strict segregationist policy.

Police units, supported in most cases by troops and armored cars, were active in Capetown, East London and Port Elizabeth. A major round-up of Africans took place in East London, an Indian Ocean port, where more than 400 were seized only two days ago.

Better Relations Urged

Mr. Sauer, who has presided at Cabinet meetings since the wounding of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd in an assassination attempt April 9, said in his speech that the race riot at Sharpeville last month, in which seventy-two Africans were killed, had closed the "old book" of South African history.

The Government will have to improve relations with the Africans, Mr. Sauer asserted, suggesting that a start could be made by removing "pinpricks," such as overly rigid enforcement of identity pass regulations and liquor laws.

He also suggested higher wages for urban Africans and the establishment of healthy contacts between the races in urban areas.

There was nothing sensationally new in any of these proposals. All had been aired in the moderate National party organ Die Burger. But no party leader had wrapped them all up in one speech. And what particularly angered conservatives in the party was Mr. Sauer's tone of accusation against the Government.

"We must create a new spirit which must restore overseas faith—both white and nonwhite—in South Africa," he said. Mr. Sauer added that the Africans "must be given hope for a happy existence" and said that numerous liquor raids made the African feel "he was being chased around."

Mr. Sauer's timing appeared to have been particularly unfortunate. His speech rang discordantly against the dominant theme of Eric H. Louw, Minister of External Affairs, who has been contending in the current Assembly debate on foreign affairs that world anger against apartheid was founded chiefly on the lies and distortions of foreign newsmen.

Opposition spokesman were quick to seize upon this evident split. They asked M. Louw whether Mr. Sauer's statement was an official declaration of policy and whether Mr. Louw would adopt Mr. Sauer's line at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference in London next month.

In reply Mr. Louw delivered a thinly veiled rebuke to Mr. Sauer. Only Prime Minister Verwoerd, who is now recovering from his bullit wounds, can change the basic policy of apartheid, he said.

Verwoerd "Progressing"

"According to information I received today," Mr. Louw said, "the Prime Minister is progressing very nicely and probably within a week will be able to give his full attention, if only in his hospital room, to affairs of state and political affairs."

Amid cheers and shouts from Afrikaners in the Nationalist benches, Mr. Louw added: "Basically, the Government's policy remains unchanged. If any statement is to be made in regard to basic policy, that statement will be made by the Prime Minister."

Mr. Sauer, looking somewhat chastened, made a brief appearance in the Assembly but did not speak. Newsmen ran after him as he hurried from the hall. He said his Humansdorp speech was "a statement of my opinion on the question—that is all."

Mr. Sauer's brief vision of a less rigid policy caused stocks to rise in the Johannesburg Exchange as a result of hopes of a new deal." But the Minister of Lands was quickly rebuked by Die Vaderland, a conservative Nationalist Johannesburg paper, which said "Sauer's motivation leaves a lot of room for serious doubt."

345 Seized Near East London

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 21—Two-hundred policemen with armored cars raided the African township of Duncan Village near the port of East London again today.

They arrested 345 Africans, who they said were loafers, "inciters" or illegal residents or lacked the Government-issued identity passes that every African is required to have before he can move about in South Africa.

At Port Elizabeth and the adjacent town of Uitenhage, both centers of automobile assembly plants on the Indian Ocean coast, 200 Africans were arrested for not having passes or residence permits. At the Port Elizabeth African township of Kwazakele a military plane swooped overhead as the police, aided by troops, went from house to house demanding passes and checking on "idlers."

About fifty persons were arrested at the African township of Langa, outside Capetown, today when 200 policemen conducted a house-to-house search. They reported that a quantity of weapons was confiscated.

At Durban, a scene of several disorders in recent weeks, four Africans were arrested for distributing leaflets calling for a work stoppage.

Today's activity by the police and troops continued the application of force that has enabled the Government to restore relative peace and order after the violent uprising by Africans in recent weeks against the official racial policies.

PAAMA IS CRITICAL OF CANAL ZONE PLAN

Special to The New York Times.

PANAMA, April 20—Opinion in the republic today seemed to be one of satisfaction at President Eisenhower's program for better pay and more supervisory jobs in the Canal Zone for Panamanians. But politicians were quick to say these and other betterments fell far short of what Panama expected from the United States.

Administration and Opposition leaders stressed that the program did not mention Panama's desire to fly her flag in the Canal Zone.

Most Americans in the Canal Zone approved the 10 per cent pay rise for unskilled and semi-skilled workers and for teachers. But a spokesman for the American Federation of Government Employes said his union wanted more rather than fewer of the 3,500 United States pay-rate jobs reserved for United States citizens.

Commenting on President Eisenhower's promise of 500 new homes for Panamanians in the Canal Zone, a federation spokesman said most residents termed it "a fine idea provided the cost is amortized or absorbed by theUnited States Treasury."

NASHVILLE, Tenn., April 20 (UPI)—Judge Homer Weimar today denied John Kasper's petition for immediate release from Davidson County workhouse. Kasper must serve the remaining three months of a six-month term for inciting to riot against school integration here.

Africans Face Banishment if They Strike

The Sunday Star Washington, D.C. June 4-17-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 16 (AP).—Negroes were warned by the government today they may be banished to backwoods reserves if they obey the underground call for a work boycott next week.

The department of Bantu (native) administration and development issued the warning.

Against the background of a report Tuesday by Justice Minister Francois Erasmus that authorities already are "shipping many idle and superfluous Bantu back to their homelands," it said:

"The Bantu public are reminded that a considerable number of Bantu workers were dismissed from their employment as a result of the recent stay-away-from-work campaign and have since been unemployed. Unless they find work soon they will have to go back to their homelands.

Warned About Pamphlets

"Bantu workers are therefore, in their own interests, warned not to pay any attention to pamphlets or other forms of encouragement for them to stay away from work."

The outlawed African National Congress is promoting the work boycott. It wants to revive the stay-at-home movement broken last week after police raids on African settlements netted sacks of arms and hundreds of men described by authorities as subversives, agitators and terrorists.

With most of its known leaders in jail, the Congress' emergency committee called for Negroes to stay at home throughout next week to enforce four demands on Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd's regime.

End of Passes Sought

These are elimination of the law requiring all Negroes to carry passes, release of the Congress leaders, ending of the state of emergency by which the country is run under near martial law, and restoration of the Congress as a legal organization.

Government raids were launched to nip the revival after ANC pamphlets showed up in Johannesburg's African settlements Thursday. Police Commissioner Col. J. C. Lemmer announced police will be out in force next week to protect Negroes who ignore the call.

Mr. Verwoerd, recovering in a Pretoria hospital from wounds resulting from two bullets fired into his head by a white assassin a week ago, was described in a medical bulletin as making excellent progress.

In recent years political cooperation between the Africans and Asians has grown, culminating four years ago in the Congress Alliance. This brought together for the achievement of common aims the two principal African and Asian political organizations, the African National Congress and the South African Indian Congress.

The alliance included also the Congress of Democrats, a group of liberal white supporters of African and Asian causes, and the South African Trade Union Congress, which includes white, African and Asian members.

Leaders of all these groups were pailed after South Africa declared a state of emergency March 30.

Hostility Declining

As political collaboration between the Africans and Asians has grown in the last ten years, hostility between the two races has decreased. An example of this was given last year in the African slum of Cato Manor in Durban, a large Indian Ocean port.

In African rioting there the Asians were not molested and the Indian bus service into Cato Manor continued to operate while municipal bus service was suspended. Ten years earlier 140 Asians were killed in African rioting there.

The improving relations between Asians and Africans in South Africa contrasts with the situation in East Africa, particularly in Kenya and Uganda. There Asians are often attacked by Africans. They are caught between the whites, who distrust them politically, and the Africans, who complain that they are economically at the mercy of Asian traders.

In South Africa Africans and Asians are both victims of the Government's strict racial segregation policies. Under the Group Areas Act of 1950 large numbers of Africans and Asians have been shifted from one dwelling place to another to satisfy the ideas of the governing National party on where people should live.

As owners of property and businesses the Asians have lost heavily and stand to lose even more.

Most Indians in Natal

Most of South Africa's Indians live in Natal Province. There are 361,000 Asians in Natal and 223,000 of them live in Durban.

The value of property owned by the Asians in Durban is estimated at more than $85,000,000. Asians hold more than 6,000 trading licenses in Durban where the whites hold somewhat more than 7,000.

A recent report by the South African Institute of Race Relations said that 80,000 Asians, 81,000 Africans and 1,000 whites in Durban will have to move under present proclamations.

Earlier Dr. S. Cooppan, an Asian economist at the University of Natal, said in a report on South Africa's Asians, "The torment of racial discrimination in the lives of the Indians has to be lived and experienced to be really appreciated."

"Indians do not have the political, economic and military power of the white minority to seize what they want," he said. "They do not have the weight of numbers of the African, which compels a certain amount of respect and recognition," he added.

The first Indians came to South Africa a century ago as indentured laborers. They were in great demand on the sugar plantations and in the coal mines of Natal and as railway workers. Today 95 per cent of the Asians in South Africa were born here and know no other home.

Since 1927 the South African Government has made frequent efforts to induce its Asian population to return to India. It has offered repatriation bonuses of $112 for each adult and $56 for each child, but only about 1,000 have left South Africa.

Asians Have No Vote

The Asians have not had a vote of any kind in South Africa since 1924. They have no say in decisions that affect their jobs, businesses, homes, schools, churches and transportation.

From 1893 to 1914 the late Mohandas K. Gandhi lived in South Africa and fought discrimination against the Asians. He developed his technique of passive resistance here.

In recent years the plight of South Africa's Asians has been the subject of many complaints in the United Nations by the Indian Government.

Most Asians employed in South Africa earn less than $1,000 a year, although a handful in Durban are millionaires.

Employment opportunities for Asians are limited by four legal barriers. These are laws preventing Asians from moving freely about, the color bar, laws reserving certain jobs exclusively for whites and laws preventing the acceptance of Asians as apprentices in certain trades.

Poll on Republic Could Pen Commonwealth Status

By THOMAS F. RONAN

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, May 10—South Africa's continued membership in the Commonwealth was put in doubt today.

This became apparent during a discussion at the commonwealth Prime Ministers conference of South Africa's status if it becomes a republic. Its Government is planning a referendum to determine whether this step should be taken but it has not yet named a date.

Upon becoming a republic, South Africa, like India and Pakistan, would no longer owe allegiance to Queen Elizabeth II but would simply recognize her as head of the Commonwealth.

This would apply unless South Africa decided to drop out of the Commonwealth or the other countries barred it.

At today's session Ghana notified the conference that in conformity with her recent plebiscite she planned to become a republic on July 1 but wished to remain in the Commonwealth. The representatives of the other governments then told her they would accept her continued membership.

When South Africa raised the question of its status after becoming a republic, a debate ensued that will continue into tomorrow. It was understood that some delegates again raised the question of its racial policies, a subject of sharp controversy at the conference.

Others cited precedent as a reason for delaying a decision. They said the constituent assemblies of India and Pakistan had voted to make their countries republics but to remain in the Commonwealth before asking continued membership. Ghana took a plebiscite before doing so, they pointed out.

It was suggested that South Africa take its referendum and then raise the question again. This is expected to be the ruling of the conference when the debate is concluded.

But since South Africa does not grant full suffrage to Negroes or persons of mixed blood, the results of the referendum undoubtedly would be challenged by other commonwealth members who bitterly oppose South Africa's racial policies.

These policies were defended by Eric H. Luow, South African Minister of External Affairs, in an uncompromising speech before the South African Club tonight.

He declared that his country's relations with Britain might be seriously disturbed if the "anti-South African campaign" here continued unchecked. He sharply assailed the criticism and attacks to which his country had been subjected from abroad.

Mr. Louw, who is attending the conference as deputy for Dr. Hendrik F. Verwoerd, the wounded Prime Minister of South Africa, spoke with particular bitterness of Britain's House of Commons.

On April 8 Commons approved a resolution deploring South African racial policies and urging the British Government to voice its strong disapproval of them at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers conference.

"As a people we, the European population of South Africa, claim the right of survival, as does every other nation," Mr. Louw said. "This right we, like other nations, will defend by every means at our disposal—as the people of the British Isles have always done when their survival was threatened."

Hunger Strike Set

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 10—Fifty-two white persons jailed under South Africa's emergency regulations have threatened a hunger strike.

Twenty-one of the fifty-two political prisoners are women. In a petition to Francois C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, the women said they would stop eating Thursday unless Mr. Erasmus ordered their release. The thirty-one men said they would start a hunger strike in sympathy on Saturday.

U. N. Blasts South Africa But N. Y. Group Is Silent

The Pittsburgh Courier P. 16

Pittsburgh, Pa., Sat. 4-9-60

Warning that "apartheid contains the seeds of international war," a United Nations spokesman for the 29-member Afro-Asian bloc sought UN backing for sharp condemnation of South Africa for its recent wave of brutal killings.

• Abdul Monem Rifa'i of Jordan said the 11-nation Security Council "should speak in a loud and clear voice which will resound around the world."

The chances for such a clear voice seemed good over the weekend, as the council prepared to adopt an Ecuadoran proposal, calling on South Africa to end its racial segregation policies.

• The United States, led by U. N. Delegate Henry Cabot Lodge, was expected to give hearty approval to the proposal with Britain and France attempting to tone it down, and the Afro-Asian bloc trying to sharpen it.

Meanwhile, in New York City, two of the most prominent organizations working in the field of African-American relations both vigorously repudiated the South African Government's policies while a third such organization refused to comment on the brutalities.

Both the American Society for African Culture and the American Committee on Africa supported the U. S. Department of State's recent denunciation of the killings. The two organizations wired, also, top African leaders of their support and willingness to raise money for the black South Africans.

But the African-American Institute, which maintains headquarters both in New York City and Washington, D. C., refused to make any comment on the wave of killings.

• "Really, we are a non-political organization," Lloyd Steere, executive vice president of the AAI told The Courier. "So we are not commenting, he said, "simply because we are non-political."

A fairly wealthy organization, the African-American Institute claims it is "devoted to establishing closer bonds between the peoples of Africa and the United States." Five Negroes serve on the board of directors. They are: Dr. Horace Mann Bond, Etta Moten Barnett, John W. Davis, Edward R. Dudley and William Leo Hansberry.

In the United Nations debate on the South African issue, Alex Qualson-Sackey, Ghana's U. N. representative, hit hard at the "arrogant racist government, dedicated to the suppression of the rights and, indeed, the personality of its African citizens."

• Mr. Qualson-Sackey compared the Nationalist government's policies to those of Hitler. "They are not a mere internal matter any more than Nazi policies and practices were," he declared.

One of the differences expected in the U. N. resolution will be to substitute the word "deplore" for "condemn."

It is expected that the world body will call on Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold to survey the South African situation and report back by June 30.

UN Pots and Kettle

The Pittsburgh Courier

Nothing could be more ironic than the United Nations pots meeting to spank the South African kettle, which undoubtedly needs spanking for its atrocities which worsen year by year.

Pittsburgh, Pa.

Despite the outraged pleas of liberal forces everywhere, the United Nations is unlikely to get out on this limb of inteference in internal affairs because many member nations are vulnerable due to mistreatment of minorities, even genocide.

It is difficult to think what members of the UN could be singled out as lily-white in the general atmosphere of soot and smudge.

P. 12

Certainly not the United States, certainly not Britain or France, certainly not Cuba or Venezuela or Haiti, and certainly not by any means Soviet Union with its hecatoms of victims.

We greatly fear that if anything is to be done to help the victims of South African police terror, they will have to do it themselves with, we hope, an assist from the humanitarians of the world.

Negro Police Burned Out

Dealing With 'Toms' The South African Way

DURBAN, South Africa — Negroes here in Durban have a unique way of dealing with their "Uncle Toms."

P. 10

They are forcing them to join in the demonstrations which are becoming a daily occurrence throughout this fear-ridden nation which is on the brink of open revolt.

Also facing a hard way to go are Negro police, who like their white counterparts have been particularly brutal towards their prisoners.

■

FORCED to live among their own kind, local Negro police are returning home to find theifr houses burned down and then are forced to flee for their lives back to the protection of the police station.

Jail is "home" these days for Negro police.

Durban, scene of the great Indian rioting during the 1950's, is extremely tense with Indians keeping discreetly quiet. The Durban Negro, of Zulu, Xosa and Sotho stock, is considerably more militant than most in the Union.

This has been expressed in the manner in which bystanders and so-called "Uncle Toms" were grabbed by marchers and forced to take part in the demonstrations.

■

THE SOUTH African government in the words of South African Minister of Justice Francois C. Erasmus is now engaged in quelling a revolution.

Twenty-six regiments, 13 auxiliary units and an air squadron of the South African Army have been alerted to deal with the massive demonstrations being staged all over South Africa by a great proportion of the African population.

In order to subdue the rioters, the nation's white supremacy government sent navy men to form a cordon around Nyanga township, near Capetown. Soldiers are already assisting police in many places.

■

THE RIOTING, which broke out March 21 in Johannesburg after police killed more than 70 Africans and wounded 211 defenseless men, women and children during a peaceful anti-pass regulation demonstration, has continued daily all over South Africa.

The unrest Saturday had spread to 114 of the 300-odd districts throughout South Africa. A national strike of all work by Africans was said to be fairly effective.

On March 30, acting under Minister of Justice Erasmus' demand that maximum penalties for intimidation be increased from a fine of $100 or six months in prison to $1,400 fine or five years in prison or ten lashes with a whip, police raided the shanties of Africans in the Cato Manor settlement near Cape Town and arrested 200 leaders, white and black, who are openly against apartheid.

The New York Times May 14, 1960

CONGO TRIBAL WAR: Feuding Lulua and Baluba warriors clashed again in part of Leopoldville (cross).

"During these informal discussions Mr. Louw gave information and answered questions on the Union's policies, and the other ministers conveyed to him their views on the South African problem. The ministers emphasized that the Commonwealth itself is a multi-racial association and expressed the need to insure good relations between all member states and peoples of the Commonwealth."

South Africa, it was clear, came out a winner by a narrow margin by this handling of the conference report. It was not condemned and, for the record, it had not "formally" discussed a question of its "internal affairs."

There had been speculation that some of the other members would issue a "minority report" stating their anti-apartheid views more frankly, but they were dissuaded at the last moment from doing so.

South Africa faces another battle, however, should it decide to become a republic and still remain in the Commonwealth.

Mr. Louw notified the conference that his Government intended to hold a referendum on the question, and the other members "affirmed the view that the choice between a monarchy and a republic was entirely the responsibility of the country concerned."

But the Commonwealth would have to agree unanimously to permit South Africa to remain a member. In that case South Africa would almost certainly encounter stiff opposition on at least two grounds: first, that apartheid is unacceptable to the others and, second, that the proposed referendum would be held among only the white minority.

Ghana also intends to become a republic by July, in conformity with a recent plebiscite and vote by the Constituent Assembly. The communiqué said the other Commonwealth countries "accept and recognize" Ghana's continued membership.

In a speech to the English-Speaking Union tonight, Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana cast strong doubt on South Africa's future status. Freed of the restraint on public statements during the conference, Mr. Nkrumah declared:

"We believe that the Commonwealth cannot exist as an effective association of nations all dedicated to the same principles of life, if exceptions are made."

It is illogical and unreasonable, he said, to expect African states to be happy about joining and remaining within the Commonwealth if it tolerates governments that perpetuate policies of racialism.

The conference communiqué also noted the meeting's review of "the major international problems of the day" on the eve of the summit conference and expressed hope for further progress on disarmament.

PARLEY DELAYS ON SOUTH AFRICA

Question of Commonwealth Tie May Come Up Friday or Be Left Unresolved

Thurs. 5-12-60

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, May 11—The Commonwealth Prime Ministers Conference, shaken by deep-rooted differences over South Africa's apartheid, or racial separation policy, postponed today any decision on that state's future Commonwealth membership as a republic.

The day's two sessions considered instead only subjects that could be discussed in the customary non-controversial manner of such Commonwealth gatherings. A spokesman for the Commonwealth Relations Office described the sessions as "routine" and quiet.

In the morning the Prime Ministers or their deputies finished their discussion of the European trade and economic situation. In the afternoon they engaged in a general review of the problems of the Middle East, Southeast Asia and the dependent territories of Africa.

Put Off Until Friday

The issue of whether South Africa would remain in the Commonwealth as a republic, after a referendum in which only the minority whites would have expressed their views, was put off until the closing sessions of the conference Friday, when "still outstanding problems" will be dealt with.

The question may not come before this conference at all. But it is more than likely that the representatives of the Asian or African members will press for some expression of Commonwealth opinion on the question of racial policy or human rights before the meetings end.

The only other move for a positive decision was also put aside for future consideration. Senator Edmund J. Cooray, Minister of Justice in Ceylon, proposed a Commonwealth Court, which would adjudicate disputes between Commonwealth members unwilling to go before Britain's Privy Council, which normally serves that function.

Question Too Complex

A sharp difference of opinion arose, with some of the newly independent members contending they would sacrifice some of their independence under such a procedure. The outcome was a decision that, because the proposal was so complicated, it should be referred back to the member governments.

While the Commonwealth conference was careful to avoid disruptive debate and controversy, there was no lack of forthright suggestions from other sources. One of these, Dr. Ambrose Reeves, Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg, demanded in a speech that South-West Africa be removed from South African jurisdiction and made a trust territory under the United Nations.

South-West Africa was taken over by South Africa as a mandated territory under the League of Nations after World War I. United Nations has repeatedly resolved, however, that the South-West territory is not part of the Union of South Africa.

Wounded Leader Sure Policy Is Right

Chicago, Ill.

Mon 5-2-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 1 (AP)—Prospects that South Africa will relax its strict segregation policy have been dashed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd from his hospital bed.

This was disclosed by M. D. de Wet Nel, minister of Bantu [Negro] affairs and development, at a Nationalist party meeting Saturday night in Pretoria after he visited the wounded Verwoerd, who is recuperating from a recent assassination attempt by a white foe of his racial policy.

Sure of Policy

"Dr. Verwoerd believes more than ever now that the policy being followed in South Africa is the correct one," said Nel, who is the chief executor of the government's policy toward the Negro majority.

"That is the message I bring you from the prime minister. All the bullets and all the scandals will not deter us from our path.

"We have no illusions that the man who shot Dr. Verwoerd was the instrument of the devil's hand . . . Those bullets were not only aimed at Dr. Verwoerd but they were a specific challenge to the European [white] population of South Africa."

Repeats Charges

Nel repeated frequent Nationalist charges that English language newspapers and Anglican clergy as well as elements abroad prompted South Africa's Negroes to stage their campaign against white supremacy laws.

He said that the government intended to retain the pass book system by which it controls the movements of Negroes. The Negro demonstrations that broke out in March, leading to bloodshed and disorders, were aimed primarily at abolishing the pass books.

Nel's words were emphasized by continuing police and army raids on Negro settlements. In the last two weeks alone, 4,000 Negroes were arrested, including 1,200 in one big raid Friday at East London. Other Negroes have been banished as troublemakers from cities and sent to native reserves in the interior.

Seek Emergency End

Despite Nel's stern words, English language newspapers and some business men continued to demand an early lifting of the state of emergency under which 1,600 persons of all races were jailed without arraignment.

Pleas also were continually voiced for the government to relax its policies toward the Negroes, in order to restore racial peace and bring back confidence in the nation's political and economic future.

Business men especially were making such pleas. They are hurt badly in their pocketbooks by continuing declines in stock exchange prices and foreign trade.

A Broadcast Hints Regime Considers Shift on Racial Segregation Policies

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 24—A significant shift in emphasis has occurred in the last two weeks in comments by the Government radio on South Africa's racial crisis.

The South African Broadcasting Corporation, Government-controlled, has begun to reflect the consideration of a possible new approach by the governing National party.

This thinking was stimulated during the last week by Paul O. Sauer, Minister of Lands and acting chairman of the Cabinet during the convalescence of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd. In a public speech, Mr. Sauer called for modifications of some of the harsher provisions of the country's racial segregation policies.

In the latest of its weekly political commentaries, the radio said: "It is fully realized that the time has come for white and nonwhite to come to an understanding. Otherwise the position can become unbearable."

Written by Ex-Editor

The commentary is written by Johannes J. Kruger, who resigned early this year as editor of The Transvaler, official daily newspaper of the National Party in Johannesburg, to become cultural adviser to the South African Broadcasting Corporation.

The commentary said that white men must help to improve relationships between the races, "but on no other basis than the solid foundation of self-preservation." In a broadcast two weeks ago Mr. Kruger rejected as "childish" proposals by non-nationalist South Africans for consultations with African leaders.

In a statement published today, Sir de Villiers Graaf, leader of the Opposition United party, questioned whether the Government was "justified in continuing the application of emergency powers much longer."

He noted that Mr. Sauer had said earlier in the week that law and order had been restored. "If Mr. Sauer is correct," Sir de Villiers said, "he should take the initiative in having the state of emergency ended forthwith."

Warning that the emergency had placed the executive arm of the Nationalist Government, with the aid of the army and the police, "virtually in control of the rights of our citizens," Sir de Villiers said the emergency powers "can be used only in the interests of the state and never in the interests of a particular political party."

Americans aid South Africa

NEW YORK — In a letter received Monday by George Houser, Executive Director of the American Committee on Africa, the Anglican Archbishop of Cape Town acknowledged receipt of the first of a number of contributions being made through the Africa Defense and Aid Fund by Americans to Africans in need of legal aid and family welfare.

"Thank you indeed for the check for $2000," wrote the Archbishop, "which is going to be the greatest possible help to us and will, I know, encourage tremendously all those who are working for justice in this country."

Archbishop Joost de Blank, one of several South African trustees of the non-sectarian African Defense and Aid Fund of the American Committee on Africa, is an outspoken opponent of the South African government's harsh apartheid policies, and has recently been in news headlines in his controversy with the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa.

Checks amounting altogether to $10,000 have been sent within the past two weeks by the African Defense and Aid Fund to other acting trustees of the Fund in South Africa. This money has been raised from the American public since the killings by police of Africans at Sharpeville in March and subsequent mass arrests, police clubbings and shootings affecting thousands of Africans. Legal and welfare aid amounting to several million dollars is estimated needed from outside sources in the current South African crisis.

Situation in South Africa Points Up Changes That Have Taken Place

By THOMAS J. HAMILTON

Although the Union of South Africa has not actually refused to consult with Dag Hammarskjold, the trend of events seems to indicate that it will stick by its position that "local disturbances" are no business of the United Nations. This does not necessarily mean that South Africa will continue racial discrimination indefinitely. Indeed, the potential dangers of insurrection are so great that South African business leaders have already suggested that the Government make concessions.

But there is a definite possibility that the Secretary General will be permitted to play only a small role, or none at all, in the great events ahead. In that case the Security Council's resolution on apartheid, like the series of resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on Hungary since 1956, will gather dust in the United Nations archives.

It is essential, however, to place the Security Council resolution in its proper perspective. South Africa's contention that its racial policies are its own affair dates back to 1946, when the General Assembly started protesting against the discrimination against Indian residents.

No Binding Effect

Moreover, it should be remembered that in this case the Security Council resolution is merely a recommendation without binding effect, and is thus on a par with those of the General Assembly.

Since the Charter authorizes the Security Council to order the use of military force against aggressor states, this limitation upon its powers is often overlooked. However, these great powers can be exercised only under Chapter VII of the Charter, dealing with breaches of the peace or acts of aggression.

The Asian-African complaint against South Africa, however, was brought under Chapter VI, dealing with the peaceful settlement of disputes. The fact that such resolutions are merely hortatory has been obscured by the use of the vague but impressive phrase "calls upon." Actually, the Security Council is merely recommending that somebody do, or refrain from doing something.

The useful work done by the Security Council in such questions as Palestine, Indonesia and Kashmir is a sufficient demonstration that the strength or weakness of an international organization is dependent only in part upon its legal authority.

For Different Reasons

In these questions a settlement was really made possible by the fact that both the United States and the Soviet Union, each for its own reasons, favored the Israelis against the Arabs and the Indonesians against the Dutch, and both acquiesced in the de facto partition of Kashmir.

The decline in the peacekeeping functions of the Security Council in the last decade is due to three principal developments, all of which took place without any amendment to the Charter:

(1) In 1950 the United States induced the General Assembly to adopt the Acheson plan, formally known as "Uniting for Peace," under which the General Assembly asserted its claim that it had a right to take over whenever the veto prevented the Security Council from acting. This started the decline of the Security Council.

(2) Stalin's successors, having acquired the hydrogen bomb in 1953, began taking a tougher line in the Security Council, using the veto in disputes in which the Soviet bloc was not involved. This gradually reduced the Security Council to its present impotence. Mr. Hammarskjold, with the consent of the two superpowers, stepped in to fill the vacuum.

(3) The mass admissions deal of 1955, engineered by Canada with the support of the Latin American and Soviet blocs, started the onrush of Asian and African countries. This has already cost the United States most of the advantages it expected from the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, since the Assembly is now balanced between the Western powers and the total number of neutral and Soviet bloc countries.

Although the present-day United Nations preserves the old forms, these developments have produced a far different organization from the one that functioned throughout the more tempestuous days of the cold war.

Since Mr. Hammarskjold has the firm support of both the United States and the Soviet Union, the veto is not a factor in the election of a secretary general. The veto on Security Council decisions remains an inhibiting factor, but everyone is now reconciled to the fact that none of the great powers is willing to give it up.

Fault in Charter

This does not mean that there is universal satisfaction. One influential United Nations expert regrets that the Charter did not give the organization clear-cut powers to check up inside every frontier on compliance with the human rights provisions of the Charter. It is too late, but if this had been done there would have been no question of the United Nations competence in dealing with South Africa.

A number of Western European delegates wish that the "Uniting for Peace" resolution had never happened. Since they recognize that the General Assembly is now in the saddle they wish they could replace the rule of "one member, one vote" with voting weighted according to population as a condition for the exercise of effective power by the General Assembly.

The New York Times

Bernardus G. Fourie, U. N. delegate from South Africa.

However, the value of such a change is doubtful, even if it could be put into effect. The numerical strength of the Asian countries, notably China, India and Indonesia, is so great that the industrial nations of the West would lose, not gain, under a system of weighted voting. Since the smaller countries would fight to the death against partial disfranchisement, it is not practical politics in any event.

The chances of giving the United Nations greater authority will improve, of course, if it succeeds in dealing with the problems ahead in Africa and in the undeveloped countries in general. For the present, however, the restrictions on national sovereignty contained in the Charter are as far as the world wants to go, and the problem is to make the United Nations work as it is.

Malayan Leader Walks Out on Informal Meeting With South African in London

By WALTER H. WAGGONER

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, May 5—The informal Commonwealth talks on South Africa's racial policy exploded today in angry accusations of subbornness and betrayal.

Tengku Abdul Rahman, Prime Minister of Malaya, disclosed he walked out of a meeting yesterday afternoon with Eric H. Louw, South Africa's Minister of External Affairs. He said he would have no further talks with the South African.

The Malayan leader was committed by his Parliament to raise the racial issue when the Commonwealth Prime Ministers met, and he did so at the opening meeting Tuesday. Mr. Louw held it was a domestic matter but offered to talk informally with the other delegates.

Prime Minister Abdul Rahman issued a statement today saying that Mr. Louw had "reenacted Pearl Harbor" by holding a news conference yesterday in the midst of the informal discussions.

Action Called Unfair

"It is cold, calculating and downright unfair of him to forestall the possible results of the talks in this manner," he asserted.

It was learned on high authority that the eleven Commonwealth representatives had agreed at the opening session that the delegates would not hold news conferences for the duration of the meetings.

The Malayan Prime Minister said there were two aspects to the apartheid policy of racial segregation. The first is South Africa's relations with her own Africans, which he described as racial domination. The second is South Africa's relations with Commonwealth countries that are not white. On this point, he accused South Africa of racial discrimination.

Prime Minister Abdul Rahman said he had raised the issue of racial discrimination in an attempt to see that a satisfactory conclusion was reached.

Plans to Pursue Issue

"But it is impossible to discuss or go any further with the representative of a country which has firmly decided that there will be no change in its policy," he continued.

"I am therefore determined to pursue this issue to the end, even if necessary to a bitter conclusion.

"On my return to Malaya I shall invite the attention of all Asian and African countries to this impasse and ask them to decide firmly what action to take against South Africa."

The conference decided today to continue its discussion of the world economic situation next week.

Today's discussions included a general economic review by Derek Heathcoat Amory, Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was also a discussion of aid to under-deevloped countries and the possible effects on the Commonwealth countries of the economic groupings in Europe.

Two Bullets Are Cut Out Of Verwoerd

PRETORIA, South Africa, May 7 (UPI) — Physicians today removed the two bullets fired into the head of Premier Hendrik F. Verwoerd a month ago in an assassination attempt.

The 58-year-old Premier's condition was reported satisfactory after surgery, but visitors were forbidden for a few days while he regains strength.

Verwoerd was shot April 9 at the Johannesburg annual fair moments after he had delivered a speech defending the apartheid white supremacy policies of his government.

David Pratt, a wealthy white farmer, hit him in the right cheek and below his ear with two shots from a .32 pistol. One of the slugs shattered Verwoerd's jaw. Both penetrated his head and physicians left them there until he recovered from the shock and had built up strength to undergo surgery. He had bled profusely from the wounds.

Pratt is being held under emergency regulations promulgated during the racial crisis. He was removed from the Johannesburg prison where he was first held to an unknown destination.

Verwoerd was reported recuperating and his wife denied a newspaper report that the bullets had impaired his sense of balance.

Meanwhile, in Cape Town a number of persons detained as a result of the racial outbursts were removed from a city jail to an outlying area. It was believed all were whites.

Commonwealth Chiefs Must Discuss Topic, He Says—Nkrumah Shares View

By SETH S. KING

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, May 1—The Prime Ministers of India and Ghana served notice today that they intended to raise the question of South Africa's racial policies at the Commonwealth conference that begins here Tuesday.

On his arrival this morning Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru of India said this was a subject that could not be "glossed over" from the point of view of the Commonwhealth.

"How we deal with it here is a matter still to be considered," he said. "But in the Commonwealth as it is today, it seems to me obvious that you cannot have this policy of racial discrimination and racial segregation."

Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah, of Ghana, who arrived a few minutes earlier, said he hoped those attending the conference would discuss the racial problem in open sessions as well as in private talks.

"But it has to be discussed," he declared. "I understand the Prime Minister of Malaya plans to raise the question. If he doesn't, I will."

Malayan Committed to Act

Tengku Abdul Rahman, the Malayan Prime Minister, has been commiteed by a resolution of his country's Parliament to force the issue during the conference.

When he arrived tonight, he said that as the representative of the newest member of the Commonwealth he would reply to Prime Minister Macmillan's welcoming address and would at that time discuss South Africa's apartheid, or segregationist, policy.

"I shall be quite happy to leave it to the direction of the other Prime Ministers whether we discuss it informally or formally," he declared. "But it would be a sad thing if it were decided not to take it up at all."

A number of other Commonwealth leaders, including Prime Minister John Dictenbaker of Canada and President Mohammed Ayub Khan of Pakistan, who arrived Friday, have declared that they favor a moderate approach through private discussions.

Resolutions are not adopted at Commonwealth conferences. It is possible that a formal declaration on racial policies could be made, but at the moment this is considered unlikely.

Demonstrators Meet Louw

Early this morning Eric H. Louw, South African Minister of External Afairs, was met by small crowd of demonstrators when he arrived at London Airport.

Another crowd, with many of its members carrying torches, was assembled across the street from Mr. Louw's hotel in the fashionable Mayfair district. As he stepped out of his automobile, they began chanting "Murder, Murder."

Louw will represent South Africa at the conference in place of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, who is still recovering from the bullet wounds he received from an assassin April 9.

With Sir Roy Welensky, Prime Minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Mr. Louw drove this afternoon to Chequers, Prime Minister Macmillan's official country residence, where they were to spend the night.

Their visit with Mr. Macmillan was a continuance of the informal meetings the British Prime Minister has already started with the Commonwealth leaders.

The agenda for the Commonwealth conference, the eleventh to be held since World War II, will be decided Tuesday at the first formal session.

Verwoerd Reaffirms Policy

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, May 1 (AP)—The hopes of liberal and other groups that South Africa will relax her strict segregation policy has been dashed by Prime Minister Verwoerd from his sickbed.

This was disclosed by Michiel D. C. de Wet Nel, Minister of Bantu Affairs and Development, at a Nationalist party meeting last night in Pretoria after he visited Dr. Verwoerd in a hospital there.

Nigeria for Commonwealth Ouster of South Africa—Pamphlet Urges Action

By WALTER H. WAGGONER

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, May 2—The Prime Minister of the Federation of Nigeria said today that South Africa should be barred from "the club" unless she abandoned her racial segregation policy of apartheid.

Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, leader of the West African state that will gain its independence Oct. 1, responded, "Why not?" when asked at a news conference why a member of the Commonwealth that violated human rights should not be excluded.

"Why not kick him out, is my view," he said.

The Nigerian federation, a terrritory of more than 30,000,000 people on the west coast of Africa, is almost certain to join the Commonwealth as a fully independent state after Oct. 1.

The Nigerian Prime Minister's comment was but one of several developments focusing attention on the issue of race relations in the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference opening at 10 Downing Street tomorrow.

Pamphlet Stresses Problem

With the conference about to begin the Conservative Political Center, a research and pamphleteering arm of the Conservative party, issued a sixty-two-page booklet entitled "Wind of Change: The Challenge of the Commonwealth."

The title is from a speech made Feb. 3 at Capetown, South Africa, by Prime Minister Macmillan. Discussing the development of African aspirations, he said:

"The wind of change is blowing through this continent and, whether we like it or not, this growth of national consciousness is a political fact."

The pamphlet said the problem of reconciling the races was "the central problem of Commonwealth policy."

"If it cannot be solved, the Commonwealth will cease to exist," the pamphlet continued "and with it will go the best chance of bridging the gulf between the West and the emerging nations of Asia and Africa. On the other hand, if this problem is satisfactorily solved, its solution may well rank as the greatest feat of statesmanship in the twentieth century."

Lord Colyton, chairman of the group producing the study, called the report the first Conservative pronouncement on Commonwealth and colonial policy in ten years.

The Conservative Central Office, however, said it was not an official pronouncement but an important consensus of opinion and a contribution to the formulation of Conservative thought.

Integration Called Practical

The report condemned apartheid and endorsed racial integration on cultural, humane and practical grounds. It said South Africa had shown that closely knit communities could not apply the policy of race separation without grave injustice and violence.

There is enough experience in the Commonwealth, it added, "to prove that harmony between the races on a basis of partnership is a perfectly practical policy."

Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru of India, who said yesterday he would press for discussion of the South African race policy at the conference, declined at a news conference today to say whether he thought the meetings would do anything about the situation.

He said that if the question of South Africa, which is here especially in South Africa, will lead to increasing trouble on a very big scale."

Commenting on apartheid, he said:

"Apart from the immorality of it, it is a danger to world peace and from that point of view the whole question of racial discrimination in the Commonwealth and Africa, India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, is here expected to deal with the race issue in private talks. Sir Roy Welensky, Prime Minister of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, is here by special invitation.

The Rising Tide

The New York Times

Forty years ago Lothrop Stoddard wrote a book in which he pointed out what seemed to him the problems created by "The Rising Tide of Color." He feared that the white races could not indefinitely continue to run the world. Of course they cannot. The Security Council's rebuke to South Africa on Friday, mild though it was, tells the story. So do countless world-wide dispatches.

Two years ago a native chief in South Africa, named Albert Luthuli, issued an appeal to white voters in his country in which he said: "Our poverty has become desperate. Every door through which we might have sought advancement, culture and a higher civilization has been slammed in our faces. Every means of legitimate national expression and protest is being closed to us. Our leaders and spokesmen are arrested and deported and silenced."

Almost a year ago Mr. Luthuli was placed under house arrest in the Province of Natal. Last Wednesday, perhaps on the theory that the Bantus who fell under the police rifles in the recent South African rioting were somehow criminal for being in the line of fire, Mr. Luthuli, along with about three hundred Bantu leaders and sympathizers, was put in jail.

To say that the present situation in South Africa is not the concern of the United Nations is to stir the dry dust of technicalities. What happens in South Africa touches half a continent immediately. It crosses the frontiers of every Asian country. It affects our own country, where the Federal courts and the Federal Executive are committed to the doctrine of equal rights before the law, but where Southern Senators invoke the Constitution to prevent the passage of laws which would make the Constitution effective.

But this we ought to know: It is not a rising tide of color or of race that we need to fear. It is rather the rising tide of anger and intolerance. The Government of South Africa stands rebuked before the world because it is stirring up the spirit of violence. This violence, whether exercised by police and soldiers, or by mobs who kill and destroy in a blind fury, is evil. There can be no victory in a race war any more than there can be in a war fought with nuclear weapons.

There is no escape for mankind from unimaginable disaster unless the races and the nations reason together. Universal brotherhood is not a dream. It is the only road to peace within nations or among the nations. And it is a field in which the U. N. is the only secular agency that can claim jurisdiction.

Cautions Against Steps That Might Produce Crisis in British Commonwealth

By WALTER H. WAGGONER

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 5—Prime Minister Macmillan declared today that the "tragic situation" in South Africa was "a source of deep regret" to him. But he cautioned against any action that might produce a crisis in the British Commonwealth.

Calling for a suspension of party politics on this issue, the Prime Minister said it was "our duty to influence and to guide" others toward the principles Britain believed should be accepted everywhere.

"We have to be bold in statement of our views but cautious in any action which, if foolishly carried out, might jeopardize the whole structure of our Commonwealth proceedings in their formal character," he added.

The preservation of the Commonwealth, which includes nine nations in addition to Britain and South Africa, was Mr. Macmillan's constant theme as he answered questions put to him in the House of Commons by Hugh Gaitskell, the Labor party leader.

Exchange Is Restrained

The Macmillan-Gaitskell exchange was notably restrained, partly because the Prime Minister's speech in Capetown, South Africa, in February against South African race policies was "admirable" even in the labor view and partly because the Opposition also recognized the delicacy of Commonwealth relations.

The Prime Minister rejected a request by Desmond Donnelly, Labor Member of Parliament, for a statement about th talks he had had with Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd about the South African Government's future membership in the Commonwealth. But Mr. Macmillan responded sympathetically to Mr. Gaitskell's queries.

The Opposition leader began: "While we for our part have no desire to raise the difficult issue of membership in the Commonwealth, the presence of South Africa in the Commonwealth should not be allowed to prevent or inhibit any clear expression of critical opinion on the racial policies of the South African Government.

"Will you not agree that the overwhelming majority of the British people received with a shock of horror the news of the police action in Capetown yesterday? Will you, consistent with your admirable speech at Capetown last February, give early expression of your regret to the South African Government?"

Sympathy Is Expressed

Mr. Macmillan acknowledged his own sense of deep regret and said he shared the "feelings of sympathy for those who have suffered."

"But I would ask the House to consider our position not as a party matter," he went on. "The British Commonwealth has a great past and I believe it has the possibility of a great future. It will outlast the particular people who preside over the fortunes of any country at any given time.

"We must not lightly throw away or injure what I am certain in the years ahead will be a great instrument for good."

Mr. Gaitskell disclaimed any party criticism and remarked that he was "well satisfied" that the Prime Minister and many of his friends "feel as strongly as we do."

But he suggested in his questioning that the events in South Africa would have an "extremely adverse influence" on the Commonwealth, among present members as well as those who may wish to join when they are independent.

To Mr. Gaitskell's request for "an assurance that all these mattters will be fully discussed" at the Commonwealth conference beginning May 3, Mr. Macmillan replied that the topics for discussion would be fixed by the conference itself.

He referred to a statement by Prime Minister Verwoerd that "This does not preclude us from using what influence we can so as to steer things as best we hope in a good direction."

"This is quite different from taking action which would precipitate a crisis in the Commonwealth," Mr. Macmillan said.

Menzies Expects Talks

CANBERRA, Australia, April 5 (Reuters)—Prime Minister Robert Gordon Menzies said today he was sure there would be "informal" talks on the South African question at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference in May.

"I will be very happy to hear what the Prime Minister of South Africa has to say to me or the other Prime Ministers," he said.

Mr. Menzies denied saying last week that the matter would not be discussed. It would not be a "listed item," he said.

Nash Opposes Meddling

WELLINGTON, New Zealand, April 5 (Reuters)—Prime Minister Walter Nash said tonight that "I have never shirked any statement of my own opposition" to South Africa's racial policies.

"But most of those who criticize ought to live on the spot in South Africa before they meddle in others' afairs," he added.

Nehru Fears Deterioration

NEW DELHI, India, April 5 (Reuters)—Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru said here today that all of Africa was in ferment, with the possibility that the situation would worsen "in a big way" unless it improved soon. Addressing the Indian Council for World Affairs, he described the South African Government as "worse than colonial."

Confers With Delegate, Who Still Awaits Instructions—British Score Resolution

By LINDESAY PARROTT

Special to The New York Times.

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., April 5—South Africa's principal representative paid a brief call on Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold today as Mr. Hammarskjold began a study of means to implement a Security Council resolution seeking South African racial harmony.

The visit by Bernardus G. Fourie was made at the Secretary General's request and lasted about three-quarters of an hour. A statement from the Secretary General's office said there had been "no question of a consultation on the basis of the resolution adopted yesterday by the Security Council."

The resolution, approved by a vate of 9 to 0, with Britain and France abstaining, characterized recent bloodshed in South Africa over the racial separation policy as a situation that might endanger international peace. Itinstructed the Secretary General to consult with the Government of South Africa over "arrangements' 'to have the United Nations Charter, with its human rights provisions, respected there.

Hammarskjold Trip Rumored

Some suggestions here were that Mr. Hamarskjold might decide to go himself or to send a special representative. Presumably, however, no such action would be taken unless the Union Government indicated that it would be welcome.

South African delegation sources said that no instructions had been received from their government. It was considered that South Africa's official reaction to the Council resolution might be made public Monday. Parliament will be in session at that time and informants say it is likely that the Minister of External Affairs, Eric Louw, will make a statement.

As far as was made known, Mr. Hammarskjold gave Mr. Fourie no formal message for transmission to his Government. There was speculation that the most the Secretary General might have done was to inform Mr. Fourie of his preliminary ideas on how consultation with the South African Government could be brought about.

In the absence of new instructions, the South African stand here today remained as it was outlined yesterday by Mr. Fourie before the Council. South Africa challenged the right of the United Nations to intervene in what it calls a domestic matter and stated that "a serious view" ould be taken of any resolution the Council adopted.

Meanwhile, delegates scanned with interest the British Foreign Secretary's criticism of the Council action. The criticism closely followed the line adopted before the Council by the British representative, Sir Pierson Dixon, and by Armand Berard of France. Both expressed the belief that the eleven-nation body had gone beyond the functions assigned to it in the Charter.

While the resolution was generally considered moderate, some delegations took a different view. The alleged mildness of the move, they maintained, consisted only in the lack of outright condemnation of South Africa.

New Departure Seen

From this view the resolution constituted a new and possibly dangerous departure by the Council in that it called upon a member government to cancel a basic policy. This was contained in the clause calling on South Africa to "abandon its policies of apartheid and racial discrimination."

These observers pointed out that the General Assembly had done much the same in the past on the question of apartheid, on separation of the racets. But, they asserted, such atction had not been taken by the Security Council—the United Nations body that alone has the authority to apply diplomatic, economic or even military sanctions.

General Assembly resolutions on apartheid, and the somewhat similar matters of free passage of shipping through the Suez Canal and the Hungarian rebellion, have been freely disregarded on the pleat of domestic jurisdiction.

Some delegates as yesterday's debate went almost as far as to argue that no such thing as purely internal jurisdiction existed.

What the Council now might do should South Africa simply ignore the resolution, and the Secretary General as its agent, promised a knotty problem for the United Nations, in the opinion of those delegates who doubted the international organization's authority to act in the South African case.

Witness of Violence Reports Early Sharpeville Aura of a Sunday Outing

New York

The following dispatch is by Humphrey Tyler, assistant editor of Drum, magazine for Africans. He was in Sharpeville, South Africa, when violence erupted there March 21.

Sun, 4-3-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 2 (UPI)—We went into Sharpeville the back way around lunchtime on March 21 traveling behind a big gray police car and three armored trucks.

As we drove through the fringes of the township, many people were shouting the Pan-African slogan "Izwe Lethu" (our land)."

But they were grinning and cheerful. Some kids waved to the policemen sitting on the trucks and two of the policemen waven back.

It was like a Sunday outing—except that we knew that there were bullets in the guns on the trucks.

Security Chief Maj. A. T. T. Spengler led the convoy toward the Sharpeville police station while the police obligingly signalled the left and right turns to us as we drove behind them. Maybe they thought we were plainclothes detectives.

Crowd at Police Station

Then we caught a glimpse of the crowd around the police station at the top of a long rise.

Abruptly, Major Spengler turned his car around. The armored trucks followed. We trailed behind the convoy to the main gates of the location, where policemen were stopping all cars coming in from the outside.

There was no Sunday outing air about the convoy on this trip. The policemen were all on the inside of the trucks, with the hatches battened down, looking at Sharpeville through the chinks of the armor plating.

There were crowds in the streets as we approached the police station. There were plenty of police, too, wearing more guns and ammunition than uniforms.

Mr. Spengler led the trucks through the police cordon, but we hesitated. I parked the car and Ian Berry, photographer, went off to see what he could find.

Crowd Called ePaceful

Then an African approached him saying that he was a local Pan-African leader. He said his organization was against violence and that the crowd was there for a peaceful demonstration.

This was about seven minutes before the police opened fire. The crowd seemed orderly. I moved freely through it, quite obvious with my white skin. We drove around to the other side, and parked in a big field.

The crowd seemed to be loosely gathered. The kids were playing. There were about 3,000 people.

There were shrill cries of "izwe lethu"—women's voices. Hands went up in the Africanist salute.

We heard the chatter of a machine gun, then another, then another. Bodies were falling. Hundreds of children were running. Some of the children were shot, too. Still the shooting went on.

One policeman was standing on top of a truck and was swinging his sten-gun around in a wide arc from his hip as though he were panning a movie camera. Two other police officers were atop the truck with pistols.

Soon there was no longer a crowd and it was very quiet.

Afrikaners' Rigid Governing Of Negroes Startles World With Use Of Brute Force

Fri 4-8-60

p. 2-B

One of the most startling aspects of the current racial troubles in South Africa is the assumption by the Afrikaner government that, after forcing the Negroes into enclaves to live, it has the right to force them out again to work.

Some years ago there was a great uproar in the United States when investigations pointed up the extent to which many poor whites and Negroes were bound to the tenant farms they worked, by debt and other immobilizing economic factors.

The cry of peonage swept the country. Yet the responsibility lay with individuals, operating within a social and economic order which was and is still seeking humane solutions to its problems.

In South Africa the conditions are produced by direct and declared government policy, acting in extension of attitudes established by the white community. If they seek to use the weapon of general strike — a weapon long available to workers in free countries—they are liable to beatings from police with clubs and rubber whips, and even to shooting.

Thus the climax comes to 12 years of a policy operating since 1948, when the Afrikaners won by politics the Boer War which Britain thought she had won with guns in 1902.

What is the essential difference, then, between lashing men to work when they do not wish to go, and the practice of slavery in the United States 100 years ago?

The African blacks are paid wages of a sort, which the American slaves were not.

The bodies of the African blacks are not commercial commodities.

Those are the major differences.

As usual when governments resort to restriction of human rights, the restrictions tend to extend themselves beyond the original objects of hatred and to penetrate the whole political body.

Now even members of the South African Parliament are not permitted to visit the Negro enclaves to see for themselves what is going on. Will the liberties of the white opposition be the next object of government attack?

It has often happened that way.

Macmillan Suggests Racial Policy May Be Wrong

New York

LONDON, March 19 (AP)—Prime Minister Macmillan suggested today that South Africa was gravely mistaken in its racial segregation policies.

In a blunt public utterance, the 66-year-old Briton told a London audience in a prepared statement:

"South Africa has been independent for fifty years and most of us in this country feel she is making a grave mistake in her handling of racial questions."

While seeming to indulge in direct criticism, the Prime Minister at the same time again condemned the boycott against South African goods now being conducted in Britain by the Labor party.

"This is an argument," he said, "that will not be settled by words, least of all by harsh words bandied at each other, certainly not by organized boycotts which may recoil upon us both."

RIOTS CONTINUE IN SOUTH AFRICA

3 More Shot in Anti-Pass Campaign—Many Stay Away From Jobs

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, March 22—Rioting in protest against South Africa's racial laws continued today.

Shots were fired and three Africans were wounded and taken to a hospital at Langa, outside Capetown. An armored car put down an attempt by Africans to set fire to an industrial building.

At Vereeniging and Vobijlpark, near the scene of disturbances yesterday there was almost a complete shutdown of many factories because African labor remained at home.

The official casualty figures of yesterday's rioting in the Sharpeville and Langa locations, put the toll of Africans killed at sixty-six and the number of injured at 182. Most of casualties were at Sharpeville.

Many of the injured are in serious condition.

At Sharpeville, about thirty-three miles south of Johannesburg, the situation was quiet tonight although armored police trucks were patrolling the area. The Africans were tense and fearful of another outbreak of violence by extremist elements.

At Langa, trouble flared again after Michiel D. C. de Wet Nel, Minister of Bantu Administration, visited the location, or African settlement.

In the Vereeniging area many Africans said they were afraid to go to work for fear of reprisals by demonstrators. Only about a third of the African workers left their homes today for work. In the locations groups of Africans stood about, some sullen and resentful but not belligerent.

Although the immediate cause of the strife was the protest against the laws requiring Africans to carry passes at all times, the Liberal party blamed the whole structure of apartheid, the Government's official policy of racial segregation.

The United party leader, Sir de Villiers Graaf, asked for a judicial commission inquiry into the riots and their underlying causes.

The most influential newspaper supporting the Nationalist Government, Die Burger of Capetown, appealed in an editorial today to the Government to "win and mobilize" moderate, law-abiding Africans in the interests of law and order.

The newspapers stressed that the African National Congress specifically stood aside from yesterday's demonstrations. This is interpreted as suggesting that the Government could open discussions with the congress.

Most of the African National Congress leaders have been banished or banned. Some are on trial for high treason. Since 1954 about 170 persons have been banned from attending gatherings.

Among those bannel last year was Albert John Luthuli, President General of the African National Congress.

So far the Government has refused to meet with Africans whose views on racial matters differed from the official policy.

With the responsible leaders regarded as moderates banned or banished the extremist elements are left to whip up anti-white sentiment through organizations such as the Pan-Africanist Congress, headed by Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe. The group's motto is "Africa for Africans."

Sedition Charge Planned

JOHANNESBURG, March 22 (AP)—Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, whose Nationalist party is the driving force behind South Africa's racial laws, announced today that 132 members of the Pan-Africanist Congress held in Johannesburg would be charged with sedition. Included is Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe, the group's leader.

The group issued a statement terming the police "sadistic bullies" who had opened fire on "unarmed, peaceful demonstrators" at the start of the anti-pass campaign.

The sctatement added that Pan-Africanist supporters had been warned to avoid any violence even in the face of provocation. It said the group's enemies want to make the campaign "an occasion to satisfy the animal lust for spilling African blood for which the Europeans [whites] in this country have been legally licensed."

During the night the Africans in Langa set fire to at least eight buildings, including churches, the library, a recreation hall, a reception center, an office building and African settlement workshops. Street-lights were smashed.

Reports of rioting also came from Nyanga West, another African settlement near Capetown. The police fired on Africans who tried to set fire to an electrical department building, the reports said.

First Pass Law in 1807

JOHANNESBURG, March 22 (Reuters)—South Africa's pass laws first were introduced in 1807. The first organized demonstration against them occurred in 1903.

The first passes were designed to prevent an influx of Africans into urban areas, and unemployment. The Earl of Caledon, Governor of Cape Province during the second British occupation, introduced them to the province.

In the Transvaal and Orange Free State, then independent republics, a passport system also existed. The chief purpose of both systems was to prevent unemployment among the African population of urban areas.

3 More Wounded as Rioting Continues—Plants Close When Many Stay Home

By DANA ADAMS SCHMIDT

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, March 22—The State Department expressed regret today over the violent police suppression of African demonstrators in South Africa. It did so while acknowledging that its statement was an intrusion into the domestic affairs of another country.

Diplomats interpreted the move as a rebuke to South Africa. They saw in it also a deliberate gesture by the United States to gain the goodwill of the rising number of independent African governments and to head off the Soviet bloc's exploitation of African grievances.

In a move before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Under Secretary of State Douglas Dillon asked for a special $20,000,000 aid program for Africa south of the Sahara. Although small compared to the total of foreign aid, he said this program "may be the most significant proposal offered for your consideration."

[Rioting continued in South Africa in protest against the country's racial laws. Three Africans were wounded at Langa, outside Capetown, when the police opened fire.]

Answer Prepared in Advance

The State Department's comment on South African violence was made by Lincoln White, press officer, in response to a question by an Indian reporter, Krishnamachari Balaraman of the newspaper, The Hindu.

"The United States," said Mr. White, "deplores violence in all its forms and hopes that the African people on South Africa will be able to obtain redress for their legitimate grievances by peaceful means.

"While the United States, as a matter of practice, does not ordinarily comment on the internal affairs of governments with which it enjoys normal relations, it cannot help but regret the tragic loss of life resulting from the measures taken against the demonstrators in South Africa."

The statement had been prepared in advance in anticipation if such a question was asked.

W. C. du Plessis, South African Ambassador, declined comment but expected a sharp reaction from the South African Parliament now in session. He expressed the view that passive resistance which had led to the riots was an "Asian concept" that was bound to lead to violence when applied to Africa because "Africans are not attuned to it."

The New York Times

Later in the day State Department officials discussed inconclusively the possibility that the South African Government might react to Mr. White's words by raising objections to United States plans to fire an intercontinental missile from Florida past the tip of South Africa, into the Indian Ocean. The South Africans have been informed of the plans and have thus far acquiesced.

In the South African riots, as Washington views them, the tidal wave of African independence is crashing against the breakwater of Afrikaaner resistance.

More Violence Foreseen

United States experts foresee a period of increasing violence. Since they have hardly any arms the Africans are expected to use massive demonstrations and to burn property.

They will have the support of the newly independent countries south of the Sahara. These are the countries that today's State Department statement might affect and about which Under Secretary Dillon spoke before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee today.

"That part of Africa which lies south of the Sahara has not in the past played a prominent role in international affairs," he said. "But in the decade of the Sixties its role may be critical."

"Africa," he said, "has been made a major target area by the Communists, who are stepping up their propaganda and aid programs and seeking to heighten frustration and increase tensions in order to block sound progress under free institutions."

The special $20,000,000 program Mr. Dillon requested for this area was in addition to regular aid programs which in the 1960 fiscal year amounted to $17,300,000 for technical assistance and $85,000,000 in economic assistance. In addition, the Development Loan Fund has extended $20,000,000 in loans.

Thus far Soviet penetration has become apparent only in Guinea, where Soviet, Czech, Hungarian and Polish military and economic and technical aid has been abundant since it chose independence from France in 1958.

LONDON, March 22—Angry protests against the shooting of South African rioters were sounded today from many quarters in Britain.

In the House of Commons Hugh Gaitskell, leader of the opposition Labor party, asked the Government to take the initiative in creating a fund to aid the victims of yesterday's outbreak.

Commonwealth Prime Ministers Conference Rules Out Public Rebuff Of South Africa

LONDON (AP)—The Commonwealth prime ministers conference Tuesday ruled out any public condemnation of South Africa for its racial segregation policy.

Instead, the leaders of this free association of nations that once made up the British Empire decided to discuss the problem informally at a series of private meetings with South Africa's foreign minister, Eric Louw.

This formula was worked out at the opening of the 10-day conference, behind locked doors, after Louw reminded his colleagues that South Africa claims the sole responsibility for its own domestic policy.

The decision to avoid putting South Africa in the position of a defendant in court represented a triumph for Prime Minister Harold Macmillan of Britain over angry leaders from dark-skinned nations in the Commonwealth, particularly Ghana, India and Ceylon.

He convinced visiting leaders that more good could be done in informal conversations either singly or in pairs with Louw, who is deputizing for Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, wounded last month by a white, British born assailant.

Leaders from Britain and 10 of her former dependencies are taking part in the conference. They represent 700 million people of various races — a quarter of the world's population.

South Africa's policies loomed as the greatest issue facing the meeting. Racial violence broke out there in March.

Demands were made in various parts of the Commonwealth, and in some sections of the British press, for a public condemnation of South Africa. Some urged expulsion of South Africa from the Commonwealth, an organization to which South Africa itself is not particularly warm because of old hatred of the British.

Prime Minister Abdul Rahman of the newly independent nation of Malaya raised the racial problem at the opening session. He said discrimination in South Africa is affecting its relations with other nations in the Commonwealth.

Lord Home, Britain's secretary of state for Commonwealth relations, told newsmen the prime ministers themselves would decide how to conduct their discussions with Louw.

Indian Prime Minister Nehru and Pakistani President Ayub Khan launched a discussion during the afternoon session on international affairs. They are understood to have touched on the expansionist policy of Communist China. Succeeding sessions will deal with prospects for the summit conference opening May 16 and Commonwealth economic problems.

4-Year-Old Treason Trial Halts—Emergency Will Continue, Official Says

PRETORIA, South Africa, April 26 (Reuters)—The police raided more African townships today as the four-year-old mass treason trial drew to a halt when the defendants withdrew their lawyers.

In Parliament, François C. Erasmus, Minister of Justice, sai demergency regulations, imposed to curb racial violence, wil lremain as long as "speedy action" was necessary.

He said the regulations were being used to round up "large numbers of vagrant" Africans in the cites to to ship them to their homes.

Today police and military forces moved into Nyanga township outside Capetown and the police arersted Africans in Johannesburg.

The total of African arrests since March 21 stands at more than 3,290.

Two hundred policemen raided Nyanga as troops formed a cordon around the township, preventing anyone from entering or leaving. Fifty-seven persons weer arrested on various charges.

The police arrested 158 Africans last night in raids in the Orange Free State goldfields.

In Pretoria, the mass treason trial took a new turn when the defendants told their lawyers to withdraw from the case after the court had over-ruled protests that the current emergency laws might endanger the freedom of defense witnesses.

Originally 156 persons were accused four years ago when the trial began. Thirty now are still on trial, although one defendant disappeared on April 1. New indictments are being prepared against some of the original defendants, against whom charges have been dismissed or dropped.

Protection Promised

The Government contended Today's developments hinged on the emergency laws. On April 1 the defense claimed, and judges agreed, that defense witnesses could put themselves in danger of arrest if they testified.

that an amendment to the emergency laws now made it possible for witnesses to testify and they would be protected.

Israel Maisels, defense lawyer, said the amendment made no difference since the police could find other reasons than their evidence to arrest witnesses. The court overruled his objections and said the trial would continue.

The defendants then told their lawyers to withdraw.

A defendant, Duma Nokwe, speaking for the others, said they were in doubt whether they could call the witnesses they wanted, and whether, if called, the witnesses would freely express their point of view. He said "they also feel concerned about exposing other people to the emergency regulations."

Commonwealth Talks Open —To Discuss South African Race Policy Informally

By WALTER H. WAGGONER

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, May 3—The Commonwealth Prime Ministers' conference opened today and promptly disposed of its most pressing issue—South Africa's race policy—by agreeing to discuss it only informally.

Any possibility that South Africa's apartheid policy of racial segregation would become the subject of disruptive controversy in the general sessions of the tenth conference since World War II seemed to be eliminated. The opening meeting "reaffirmed the traditional practice" of the Commonwealth of refusing to discuss the internal affairs of member countries.

A communiqué summarizing the day's work showed that the race issue arose to face the Commonwealth leaders shortly after the first plenary session opened at 10 Downing Street.

Prime Minister Macmillan expressed "deep sorrow" at the injuries, eceived in an assassination attempt, that kept South African's prime minister, Hendrik F. Verwoerd, from attending. He then welcomed Tengku Abdul Rahman as the first Malayan prime Minister to attend since Malaya attained full membership in the Commonwealth.

Replying to Mr. Macmillan, the Malayan leader "raised the problem of racial discrimination in South Africa and its effects on relations between South Africa and other Commonwealth countries," the comminqué said. He also "expressed the hope that opportunity would be found for the Commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss this while they were in London."

This brought an immediate response from Eric H. Louw, Minister of External affairs for South Africa. The communiqué said Mr. Louw emphasized that "the sole responsibility for domestic policies within South Africa rested with the South African Government.

The Earl of Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, said at a news conference that the decision against formally discussing South Africa's racial affairs was unanimous.

Nevertheless the issue will probably dominate the conference, "after hours" at least, for the next several days Mr. Louw "expressed his readiness" for informal talks on the question. Arrangements "are being made accordingly," the communiqué said.

ONLY PRIVATE TALKS: Eric H. Louw, South Africa's Minister for External Affairs. He said he would be happy to discuss apartheid informally with Prime Ministers attending the Commonwealth conference.

Lord Home said that the Prime Ministers would make their own palns for the talks, and that Mr. Louw had agreed to see two or more delegates at a time.

Issue Might Rise Again

It appeared that this would not rule out entirely the possibility that the South African question might rise again in the general discussion. The conference, scheduled to end May 13, might produce some kind of statement on human rights.

Other Prime Ministers attending are John Diefenbaker of Canada, Robert Gordon Menzies of Australia, Walter Nash of New Zealand, Jaraharlal Nehru of India, Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana and Sir Roy Welensky of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, who is attending as an observer. Pakistan is represented by President Mohammad Ayub Khan and Ceylon by her Minister of Justice, Senator Edmund Cooray.

After disposing of the South African problem, the first session discussed the world political situation.

Lord Home said the topics discussed included "relations between the Communist and the free worlds."

"But there is no point in asking me what individual Prime Ministers did," he added. "That is never discussed."

Future meetings will explore defense relations, economic and trade policy, constitutional developments within the Commonwealth such as Ghana's intention of becoming a republic, and subjects of a regional nature.

Because Mr. Macmillan will leave for the summit meeting in Paris soon after the Commonwealth conference ends, it is assumed that there will be exchanges, too, on disarmament, the nuclear test ban, and the Western position on Berlin and Germany.

South Africa Seizes 400; Strike Showdown Today

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 18—About 400 Africans were arrested today in advance of a showdown expected tomorrow on a nation-wide protest work stoppage called by African leaders. The arrests were made by policemen supported by soldiers and armored cars at Duncan Village near East London, a port on the Indian Ocean. The prisoners were described as members of terrorist gangs.

The work stoppage protesting the Government's racial segregation policies had been called for a week, starting today. However, the initial reaction to the walkout call was not viewed as a test of the strike's effectiveness, since most of South Africa's labor force will not be required to return to work until tomorrow, the end of the four-day Easter holiday.

Those Africans scheduled to work today did so.

Two African Groups Banned

The strike was called by an emergency committee of the African National Congress, the Africans' major political organization. This group, along with the Pan-Africanist Congress, the other big African political body, has been banned for a year.

If most of the Africans, who provide the bulk of the nation's labor, report for work tomorrow, observers here believe it will mean that the Government has succeeded in breaking the organized resistance that has plunged the country into a state of emergency and racial strife in the last month.

In the main industrial areas of Johannesburg, Durban, Capetown and Port Elizabeth, Africans worked today at power stations, hospitals, railway facilities, docks, dairies and automobile service stations. Some factorie also were in operation with full staffs.

But shops, business concerns, government offices and most manufacturing plants are not scheduled to reopen until tomorrow.

Extra police patrols were reported to have moved into African dwelling areas early today, but the police denied this. They said that only normal forces were on hand and that they had little to do.

However, police officials said strong forces would be on hand tomorrow, when the bulk of the Africans are due to return to work.

The New York

The Government has charged that in the last few weeks many Africans particpated in work stoppages because they had been intimidated by "political agitators." Officials have pledged that Africans who want to work will be protected against intimidation.

New York

Stiff penalties for encouraging strikes have been fixed under the emergency regulations and Africans staying away from work have been threatened with dismissal and banishment to remote reserves.

South Africa's labor forces consists of about 450,000 whites and 1,965,000 other workers. The bulk of these are Africans, with some of Asian and mixed blood included. Both the Government and the industry have always feared a general strike by the Africans, who have shown by token stoppages in the last month what the loss of labor can mean.

But without their leaders, who have been jailed for the duration of the emergency, the Africans apparently have been unable to organize the planned week-long stoppage.

Leaflets urging the strike were distributed late last week in the African township of Johannesburg. Over the week-end they appeared in Durban and Port Elizabeth.

In Capetown, where port operations and construction projects have been seriously curtailed in the last month by Africans' refusal to work, the police reported there was no sign of any stay-away movement or preparations for one.

In an incident today at Port Elizabeth, a major port and manufacturing center, an African policeman on his way to work was badly beaten by a gang. Six Africans were arrested.

In the Johannesburg area forty Africans were arrested, some for violations of the laws requiring them to carry identification passes and others for intimidation.

Regime Wooing Mulattoes

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 18—The Nationalist Government of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd is wooing South Africa's 1,400,000 people of mixed race with strange intensity. It does not quite promise them full equality, but hints that some of the more humiliating aspects of apartheid may be softened for them.

Among the hints is the suggestion that the mulattoes who continue to live on other side of the tracks, may soon again be allowed to ride first class on commuter trains.

They rode in the front coaches with white men until soin after the National party came to power in 1948. Then apartheid banished them to the rear carriages used by Africans

"We need you" is the theme of flattering tributes paid to the colored peoples—as those of mixed race are known—by the Nationalists, who are feeling lonely and frightened after the massive African demonstrations of two weeks ago.

"The white man and the colored man need each other," Pieter W. Botha, Deputy Minister of Internal Affairs, declared when he opened a colored people's festival at Newlands today. "Let us face the next fifty years with a feeling of goodwill, understanding and trust."

This appeasement is being listened to with quiet amusement by the coloreds, who were formerly called "bastards" in Afrikaans.

A moderate leader of the Cape Colored community said today in an interview that offers of an alliance with the whites would be unacceptable if the alliance meant betraying the Negro Africans.

"We would be very chary of ratting on the Africans," said Dr. Richard E. Van Der Ross, principal of Battswood College, a training school for colored teachers. "This country is destined to be ruled by the black man. If the colored man chooses against the black man, he cannot expect much in the way of sympathy."

Two Refugees Reach Britain

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 18—Ronald Segal, editor of the South African liberal magazine Africa South, arrived here today by air from Nairobi, Kenya. With him was Oliver Tambo, deputy leader of the proscribed African National Congress.

They had fled from South Africa by way of Bechuanaland because, Mr. Segal said, they knew they would have been arrested under their country's emergency regulations.

Mr. Segal said Africa South would be published in Britain under the title Africa South in Exile. "We shall try to send as many copies as possible to South Africa," he said.

Patrols Seek to Bar Strike Today—Foes of Apartheid Policy Wary of Arrest

By LEONARD INGALLS
Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 17—The Government was reported today to be considering sealing the South African borders with the British protectorates of Bechuanaland, Swaziland and Basutoland to cut off the escape of political refugees.

Many persons fearing arrest under the present emergency regulations recently have slipped across the borders by automobile, the majority to Swaziland but some to Bechuanaland. Most of them are persons who have been outspoken critics of the Government's apartheid policy of racial segregation.

Three refugees have flown on from Bechuanaland, bound for London, although the South African Government tried to intercept them in Nyasaland for having left South Africa without passports. They are Ronald Segal, editor of the liberal magazine Africa South; Oliver Tambo, acting president of the outlawed African National Congress, and Dr. Yusuf Dadoo, former leader of the South African Indian Congress.

Hope of Haven Offered

[Police armored cars patrolled African communities in advance of the work stoppage called for Monday by African groups protesting the white supremacy laws, news agencies reported. The police were said to be arresting "hard-core loafers and thugs" in an effort to prevent the strike, whose effectiveness may not be felt until Tuesday because of the normal Easter Monday work holiday.]

Britain has indicated that persons who seek political asylum in Bechuanaland, Swaziland, and Basutoland will be permitted to stay.

South Africa has long maintained that the three protectorates should be incorporated into the Union of South Africa. But after the racial strife of the last month here, it seems likely that official British resistance to such a transfer will increase rather than diminish.

At least a dozen persons are reported to have gone to Swaziland, which has a border with the Portuguese territory of Mozambique, rather than risk imprisonment under the emergency regulations. These permit the Government to detain anyone without charges and without trial.

Arrests Made During Night

At the same time, other persons in South Africa who fear arrest and cannot leave are taking steps to elude the police. Some have given up staying in their homes overnight and arrange to sleep at the house of a different friend each night.

Most of the persons now in detention were seized by the police after being roused from their beds during the night.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Elizabeth Verwoerd, wife of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, said in a statement published that she believed her husband's survival after an assassination attempt eight days ago was "a sign to us that we are on the right path and God is with us."

The statement was published in the Johannesburg Afrikaans-language newspaper Dagbreek. Afrikaans, derived from Dutch, is the language spoken by Afrikaners, the descendants of the Dutch settlers of South Africa from whom the National party led by Prime Minister Verwoerd draws its principal support.

Mrs. Verwoerd was quoted as having said:

"I see the hand of God in the absolute miracle that not only was Dr. Verwoerd's life spared but that he is expected to recover and continue the struggle. Is it not a sign to us that we are on the right path and God is with us."

Dr. Verwoerd, shot twice in the head by a white farmer, is said to be making good progress in a Pretoria hospital.

Easter passed quietly in South Africa. Many thousands attended church services. Other thousands had taken advantage of the four-day holiday to travel to Indian Ocean beaches and other resorts. No incidents of violence were reported.

De Blank Condemns Apartheid

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 17—The Most Rev. Joost de Blank, Anglican Archbishop of Capetown, condemned apartheid tonight as "clearly contrary to divine law."

In an Easter sermon to a throng of 1,500 jammed into St. George's Cathedral, Archbishop de Blank again implored the Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa to repudiate the racial policies of the Nationalist Government.

"Surely," he said, "it is not too much to ask that every Christian and every Christian body, as surely as they reject adultery, should equally categorically reject any system that breeds hatred, distrust and ill will among different sections of the population."

South Africa Minister Charges U.N. Hypocrisy

The Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Foreign Minister Eric Louw charged Monday critics of his government would hand over South Africa to a black proletariat to destroy what the whites have built.

Tues, 4-5-60

Louw assailed as hypocrisy the action of the U.N. Security Council Friday in urging South Africa to abloish its policy of apartheid, or segregation.

P.10

He spoke to an audience that included many ambassadors at the opening of the government pavilion at Johannesburg's Union Exposition.

"The climax in the United Nations' incitement and interference in South African affairs was reached last week when the Security Council, in contravention of its own charter, took it upon itself to pass judgment on South Africa," Louw declared.

"One marvels at the blatant hypocrisy of the many countries that lodge complaints against South Africa." He said these included Communist and nonwhite countries.

"The forces now ranged against us, not only in South Africa but also in other parts of the world, particularly at the United Nations, would hand over South Africa to a black proletariat to destroy what has been built up during the past years," he said.

"We have a foretaste of what would then happen when we see the ruins of churches, schools and even clinics which were erected for the benefit of the Bantu (Negro) people and burned down last week."

Louw declared that white settlers, dating back to the first British and Dutch, had built up South Africa.

"In these respects South Africa is far and way ahead of any other country in Africa, and, indeed, ahead of many other countries in the Western world," he said.

"Then there is also another side to the picture as well. The great bulk of the Bantu are law-abiding, decent people. That is why hundreds are returning to the Bantu reserves."

"When the shock of these happenings of the past two weeks has passed, they will not be so easily swayed by agitators, Bantu or white," Louw said.

"They will not be cowed by gangster organizations. They must be made to realize that the white man's police force is there to protect them."

In parliament, a bill to outlaw the African National Congress and Pan-Africanist Congress came up for its third reading. The two groups are blamed for the outbreak of violence.

D. J. Potgieter, Nationalist member, said the bill was "an act of self-preservation."

"Those people do not want cooperation with whites. They want to have the entire say," he said.

RE: POT AND KETTLE

Washington—Although I deplore South Africa's racial attitude, it is like the pot calling the kettle black when America attempts to censure the Union of South Africa.

Our whole way of life sees race in ever nook and corner. If whites and colored happen to get in the same photograph, the whites are invariably looking at each other.

The whites stole South Africa from the blacks.

According to a news service release from Montreat, N.C., Billy Graham was quoted as saying:

"South Africans have one question which is very embarrassing to Americans and very difficult to answer. 'What about the American Indians? Didn't you steal their land? Didn't you massacre thousands on the slightest pretext? Didn't you put them on reservations (apartheid like)?"

The hypocracy I see is appalling. How are we to meet the challenge of Red China and Russia with the dense smog of race constantly dimming and blurring our visions?

South Africans Try to Root Out Mixed Blood in Zones Set Apart for Whites

New York

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

DURBAN, South Africa, April 30—A ruthless drive to purge white neighborhoods of persons of mixed blood is under way here.

Sun. 5-1-60

Family trees are being inspected by the Group Areas Board, the agency that decides where people of different color may live. The crude manner of interrogation by more fanatic agents of this board has outraged some Afrikaners who always accepted apartheid, or racial separation, as a perfectly normal condition of life.

Acute sensitivity about color has prevailed among Afrikaners almost from the start of the Dutch settlement on the Cape. Jan van Riebeeck, the founding father, allowed one of his men to marrya Hottentot, and ever since it has required almost superhuman courage for old families to scrutinize their ancestry.

Calling a man a "Capie" here is the supreme insult. Capie is short for Cape-colored and is the designation for 1,500,000 half-castes.

Nowhere in the Union is uprooting of communities more drastic than in Durban. Eighty thousand nonwhites, mostly Negroes and Indians, are being transplanted from Cato Manor and other slums to remoter districts.

Hardship for Indians

This is no great hardship for the Africans, who are quitting one of the world's most forbidding slums for housing that is appreciably better. But the Indians, who have accumulated considerable land on the western slopes of the Berea ridge, will lose heavily in forced sales.

The inhumanity of apartheid does not end at Cato Manor. In the lower middle class areas such as Greenwood Park families of mixed racial origin have lived peaceably alongside whites for many years. Now Greenwood Park has been zoned for Europeans. Only pure whites can live there.

Suspecting that some light-skinned Cape-Coloreds in Greenwood Park may try to pass as whites, Government agents have bee nworking overtime, acting on tips of spiteful neighbors and interrogating Afrikaners whose ancestry seems indisputably white.

One Family's Story

Thus when Johannes Jacobus Botha, a Durban mailman, returned to his neat Dutch Colonial home on Allenby Road one evening last week, he found his wife Linda waiting in the garden in tears.

Two sleuths from the Group Areas Board had called, she told her husband. They had pounded on the door and then pushed past her and seated themselves in the living room without invitation. They had demanded identity cards, birth certificates and a marriage license and had asked whether her husband was white. Mrs. Botha told them to wait for her husband's return, but they persisted in the interrogation.

"Finally I got annoyed and went into the kitchen" she recalled, "But then they started questioning our 4-year-old son Jannie, asking Jannie how old he was and where he went to school. When I returned, they started questioning me about my neighbors. They asked very personal questions. They wanted to know who visited us on the two previous Sundays."

This particular line of questioning mystified the Bothas until Johannes, who buys old automobiles for scrap, suddenly realized that a colored man who wanted to sell a car had called on both Sundays. Apparently some busybody with a lively imagination had witnessed these visits and concluded that the Bothas had Cape-colored kin.

12,000 Seized in Raids

EAST LONDON, South Africa, April 30 (AP)—Policemen and troops staged four mass raids in near-by Negro settlements yesterday and arrested nearly 1,200 persons for passbook violations and other irregularities.

They followed this with swoops on the bush areas near the select white suburbs and detained fifty-two non-whites as undesirables. Raids are part of the Government's campaign to stamp out resistance to its white-supremacy laws.

A line of troops with fixed bayonets, standing at twenty-yard intervals, extended four miles as policemen and troops entered the bush—a notorious meeting place for criminals and persons attending illegal drinking parties.

There were no incidents. The arrested Negroes were taken by surprise. They will be charged with being in an urban area illegally and failing to produce passbooks.

CAPE TOWN, April 30 (UPI)—Lands Minister Paul O. Sauer, a leading Government advocate of a moderate policy toward South Africa's negroes, said today he will try next week to persuade Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd to accept his views.

Mr. Sauer said he would visit Dr. Verwoerd in the Pretoria General Hospital, where the Prime Minister is recovering from wounds inflicted by an assassin. The Lands Minister said he would propose relaxation of pass and liquor laws affecting the Negroes, and would urge an increase in the wages paid to Negro city workers.

South Africa Protests American Denunciation

Montgomery, Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—The government told the United States in effect Wednesday to keep out of South Africa's race troubles.

The government rapped back at U. S. State Department denunciation of bloodshed as blacks challenged the nation's white supremacy laws with work boycotts after two days of violent demonstrations.

The Foreign Ministry summoned U. S. Ambassador Philip Crowe for a conference, then issued a statement.

The statement said the discussion with Crowe does not mean that South Africa is "conceding the right of the U. S. government to concern itself with the domestic affairs of South Africa, just as the Union (of South Africa) government does not concern itself with riots or racial disturbances in other countries."

Deputy J. Von S. von Moltke told Parliament "they shoot one another for a pint of milk" in the United States, but "we do not blazen forth these events in our press as they do when our police are compelled to protect themselves."

The statement declared the State Department had criticized police violence here without knowing all the facts "regarding attacks by many thousands of Bantu (Negroes) on a small police force to whom was entrusted the duty of maintaining law and order."

As criticism of this week's police violence mounted in world capitals, officers kept a tight lid on South Africa's 11 million non-whites.

The Negroes' work boycotts threatened to paralyze some important industrial centers. The weapon could be a potent one for the Negroes, who supply the low-cost labor that keeps the country's economy going.

In the Vereeniging coal mining area, where Monday's worst riots occurred, police chiefs held a conference to plan action against the Pan-Africanists.

Leaves Canceled As Africa Readies For Tense Weekend

Montgomery, Ala.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—All leaves were canceled for policemen and soldiers Friday as this racially split nation prepared for a tense weekend. On Monday, the government is to introduce a bill outlawing the nation's two leading Negro organizations.

Notice of the bill was given to Parliament by F. C. Erasmus, justice minister in the Nationalist party government which is the driving force behind South Africa's white supremacy policies.

The bill will be directed primarily against the African Nationalist Congress and its militant offshoot, the Pan-Africanist Congress, sponsor of demonstrations that led to this week's bloody violence.

Erasmus said that in addition to the two Negro groups, the bill would ban other organizations for the "safety of the public and maintenance of law and order."

Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd has charged the riots were part of a "massive revolt" and said white policemen opened fire to maintain order. Casualties total about 80 Negro dead and several hundred wounded.

MEETINGS BANNED

Verwoerd's government also has banned all public meetings for the next three months. But exceptions were made for a Nationalist party meeting Saturday night and white sports events—white soccer league games and the Transvaal track and field championships Saturday.

More than 200 other applications for exemptions have been received in Johannesburg, mostly from white athletic groups that had arranged weekend matches. No applications have been received from Negroes.

A Negro professional boxing tournament scheduled for Saturday was canceled. It was to have been held in Sharpeville, the Negro settlement where the week's worst riots took place.

The Sharpeville area has remained quiet under a tight police lid. But a Negro work stoppage in nearby Vereeniging is seriously affecting the economy. Whites can be seen there performing many chores normally handled by Negroes.

The Montgomery Advertiser

PROTECTION MOVE

The order canceling leaves for police and defense forces apparently is designed to provide more protection in the Cape Town region, where tension continues high. More than a thousand Negroes lined up in front of a police station there Friday. Earlier, 20 Negroes were turned away when they demanded to be arrested for not carrying passes. Philip Kgosana, a Pan-Africanist leader, was taken into custody. Before being led away he said: "We want to see how many of us they can lock up."

In Cape Town, leaders of four religions issued separate statements deploring Monday's riots and expressing concern at the country's racial policies. They were Cape Town's Anglican archbishop, Dr. Joost De Blank; the Roman Catholic archbishop, the Most Rev. Owen McCann; the chief rabbi, Prof. I. Brahams; and the Council of the Congregational Union of South Africa.

Most members of the Nationalist party, however, belong to the Dutch Reformed Church. The Nationalists are mostly settlers of Dutch descent. Their bitterness toward the British dates to before the Boer War. The British settlers gravitate toward the opposition parties and advocate a milder form of racial segregation. Their political stronghold is Cape Town.

To counter the ban on public meetings, Albert Luthuli, former Zulu chief who heads the African National Congress, called on all nonwhites to stay home Monday.

100 wounded as Negroes demonstrate

The Birmingham News

VEREENIGING, South Africa, March 21—(AP)—Twelve thousand African Negroes protesting the white government's compulsory pass system besieged a police station today. Officers inside opened fire with rifles and machine guns. Eyewitnesses said the front ranks of the crowd went down like tenpins.

Unofficial reports placed the number of dead at 34. Brig. C. J. Els of the Witwatersrand police gave a figure of 30 dead and 100 wounded—and said that was a conservative estimate.

LATER, POLICE upped the estimate of dead to "nearly 50."

One officer described the scene as "a World War battlefield — bodies lay mangled and sprawled all around." A Johannesburg news protographer commented:

"I took pictures of more bloodshed than I have ever before seen in South Africa."

THE BARRAGE drove back the crowd, leaving dead and wounded in the streets. Police called in armored cars and jet fighter planes to break up the demonstration.

It was part of a national campaign billed as non-violent and aimed at abolition of the passes that all non-whites in South Africa must carry.

But violence erupted at Sharpeville, a native quarter near Vereeniging, which is 30 miles south of Johannesburg.

TWO HOURS after the shooting, ambulances still were running back and forth to hospitals at Vereeniging. Hospital officials refused to disclose any casualty information.

About 25 police were besieged inside the police station by the Africans. When the Africans began to stone the station, the police opened fire.

The rioting was part of the start of a Negro passive resistance campaign to tie up the nation's commerce and industry.

Demonstrators in Johannesburg, Capetown and other cities marched to police stations without their passes and dared police to arrest them.

DRASTIC MEASURES were taken in Vereeniging after tear gas failed to break up the crowd, enraged by the killing of an African leader and the wounding of at least four others. The mob had tossed stones and injured several policemen.

Then thousands of men and women, shouting the nationalist cry "Afrika," besieged the Sharpeville police station. Sharpeville is a native location where thousands of black Africans live.

Jet aircraft screamed down in an attempt to frighten away the Africans. At Bophelong, which lies nearby, police made baton charges and used tear gas against demonstrators.

POLICE described the situation as tense and sent armored cars to patrol African townships.

Traffic police from Vereeniging escorted ambulances along the two-mile route between the hospital and the Sharpeville native location.

The crowd had gathered at Sharpeville to be arrested for not carrying passes. It got out of hand and stoned an automobile carrying senior officials of the local African Affairs Department. Police were then called.

Mobs stoned police cars at Bophelong. Two Africans were wounded when police opened fire. Several police were hurt and their automobiles damaged.

CONGRESS PRESIDENT Robert Mangaliso Sobukwe had called on all Africans to leave their compulsory passes at home, invite arrest and thus clog courts and jails and stop business. The idea is to prove that local business and industry cannot operate without low-cost African labor.

But Sobukwe himself was ignored by authorities when he marched into Orlando township police station outside Johannesburg with 30 supporters. The incident had its comic opera aspects. Sobukwe went from office to office at the police station pleading to be arrested.

THE POLICE chief made him wait outside for hours. Sobukwe said if they refused to arrest him today he would return tomorrow.

By law, all non-whites must carry passes when away from home as part of South Africa's strict racial segregation laws.

The Pan-Africanist Congress is a militant offshoot of the African National Congress of South Africa. National Congress leaders said the pass campaign was not properly organized and had little chance of success. They refused to support it.

The Pan-Africanist Congress staged a number of rallies in several African townships outside Johannesburg yesterday. Armed police in armed troop carriers prevented any disorders.

The rallies also called for a minimum wage of 35 pounds ($98) monthly for Africans plus other benefits.

Says America Had No Choice But To Protest Slaying Of Africans

The Call Kansas City Mo
Jan 3-25-60

By STEWART HENSLEY

WASHINGTON. — (UPI) — American officials said Tuesday that the United States had no choice but to denounce South African police for slaying Negroes demonstrating against the white supremacy policy.

Silence in the face of the killing and wounding of native men, women and children would have severely damaged the moral position of the United States throughout the world, they said.

Officials acknowledged, too, that the contest between the United States and the Communists for the sympathy and support of the newly awakened nations of Africa also had much to do with the American statement Tuesday deploring the violence against the Africans.

State department officials were braced for an almost certain protest from the South African government against the U. S. statement, admittedly an extraordinary comment on the internal affairs of a friendly nation.

U. S. officials said they knew, when they decided to issue the statement, that it was bound to evoke an angry reaction from South Africa where three million whites have enforced strict segregation policies against 10 million restless Negroes and other non-Caucasian peoples.

However, these officials added, increased tension with South Africa was a price which had to be paid in the light of broader and more basic considerations of U. S. foreign policy.

The United States, in addition to denouncing the violent government measures, also appeared to be taking sides for the first time on the merits of segregation issue in South Africa.

The official American statement expressed hope that the natives would be able to achieve 'their legitimate aspirations."

A South African protest was foreshadowed by the comment of Ambassador W. C. Du Plessis, who told United Press International that the U. S. statement was bound to spark reaction in his country.

"We deplore the loss of life as much as anyone else does," the ambassador said. "But any attempt to employ the policy of passive resistance in South Africa is bound to lead to violence, just as it would elsewhere."

WASHINGTON. — (UPI) — The United States, in an unusual comment on the internal affairs of a friendly country, announced that it "deplores" the loss of life in South Africa resulting from police firing on Negro mobs.

The State Department's comment also said that it hoped South African Negroes would "be able to obtain redress for legitimate grievances by peaceful means."

State Department Press Offic Lincoln White issued the stateme in response to questions. He a knowledged that it was unusual fo the United States government to comment on internal matters of a friendly country but said the department felt justified in this case.

"While the United States, as a matter of practice, does not ordinarily comment on the internal affairs of governments with which it enjoys normal relations," he said "it cannot help but regret the tragic loss of life resulting from the measures taken against the demonstrators in South Africa."

Police in South Africa Monday killed 62 Africans and wounded 208 among crowds demonstrating against that country's white supremacy policy.

Although White declined to elaborate on the statement, it appeared to be directed against the violent measures taken by the police rather than the policy itself. However the statement also referred to 'legitimate grievances" of the Africans without saying what they were.

700 Arrests In Africa Aimed At Negro Strike

Montgomery, Ala. Thurs. 4-21-60

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP)—Police and soldiers backed by armored cars arrested 700 Negroes Wednesday in raids on native settlements outside major cities on South Africa's cape peninsula. More than a thousand have been seized in the last 48 hours.

The raids are part of the drive to squelch an abortive strike called by the outlawed African National Congress protesting the government's strict apartheid laws.

Failure of the strike brought demand from liberal white groups for an end to emergency regulations permitting raids on Negro settlements without search warrants and detention of hundreds in jail indefinitely.

Lands Minister Paul Sauer, acting government head, said Tuesday South Africa would "reconsider in earnest and honesty her whole approach to the native question."

But in a statement to Parliament Wednesday, Foreign Minister Eric Louw rejected any basic changes in government policy, including racial segregation. He also turned down suggestions for a coalition government with the opposition United party which proposed easing the Negroes' lot.

If there is any change, Louw said, Prime Minister Hendrik V. Verwoerd will make it. Verwoerd, recovering from two bullet wounds inflicted by a white assassin April 9, probably will be well enough to take full charge of the government within a week, "even though he might have to do so from his bedroom," Louw declared.

Louw also said the government's announced decision to discuss its racial problems with U.N. Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold in London next month did not herald a departure from the government's viewpoint that there should be no interference in the domestic affairs of member states of the U. N.

The talks stem from the April 1 U. N. Security Council resolution asking South Africa to end racial segregation.

The apartheid-backing Dutch Reformed Church offered to join the Anglican Church in a petition to the government to allow the self-exiled Anglican bishop of Johannesburg, the Right Rev. Richard Ambrose Reeves, to testify before a commission investigating the March 21 Sharpeville shootings in which 67 Negroes were killed and 186 wounded by white police.

GENEVA, Dec. 11—The International Commission of Jurists condemned South Africa's apartheid policy today as a "morally reprehensible" violation of the rule of law and of human rights.

In a 239-page report issued after a year of study, the commission warned that the policy of rigid segregation of whites and nonwhites created a "potentially explosive" situation which may soon lead to even more widespread violence than has already been experienced in South Africa."

The commission, a nongovernmental organization supported by 37,000 lawyers, judges and teachers of law throughout the world, is sending the report to the United Nations and to many of the world organization's member governments.

Program Is Examined

Detailed chapters in the report examine the working of the apartheid program and its restrictions in almost every aspect of social and economic life —racial classifications, trade unions, education, marriage, movement and residence and political rights.

Jean-Flavien Lalive, secretary general of the commission, emphasizes in a foreword that lawyers responsibilities go beyond deciding on the "formal correctness" of a piece of legislation.

"The commission holds that the application of the principle of apartheid, which has come under scrutiny in this report, is morally reprehensible and violates the rule of law," he adds.

"The impact of apartheid extends to virtually all aspects of life in the union. The humiliation inflicted by such measures is the testimony on which apartheid can be judged. Its price in terms of human degradation will never be known, but it is one which is high enough to outweigh any of the benefits which it is claimed to bring."

'Human Suffering' Cited

The "human suffering" resulting from apartheid, said the report, affects whites as well as nonwhites.

"Liberty of expression, movement and association are but three of these freedoms which have been drastically curtailed," it said. "Judges who alleviate injustice by refusing to interpret the law in the spirit motivating the Government are vilified openly. That fundamental principle of fair trial, knowing the exact nature of the accusation, appears to have been forgotten."

These are some of the report's conclusions, drawn from examining legislation in South Africa, police powers, and the testimony of white and nonwhite South Africans:

Real freedom of selection and change of employment or improvement of status was "virtually non-existent."

Expression of opposition to or protest against the application of the apartheid policy "constitutes a criminal offense."

The laws forcing nonwhites to carry documents of identification and produce them on demand had led to arbitrary arrests and detention and created a system "which can be described as legalized slavery."

The educational system was geared to prepare nonwhites to receive and accept an "inferior social, economic and political status."

South Africa: A Sick Country

The New York Times

The sickness of South Africa yesterday reached halfway round the world, from the tense cities of Capetown, Johannesburg and Durban to the U. N. headquarters on the East River, where the Security Council was in the second day of a discussion of the race troubles that have shaken the Western world.

Voices of reason were heard today as they had been yesterday. In South Africa Alan Paton, author of "Cry, the Beloved Country," said he felt "slightly disreputable" not to have been arrested. He added: "The kind of people they have been arresting in any normal society would be the most sound, stable citizens of the country." Some of the other white South Africans doubtless listened to him with sympathy. Others sold their securities and the stock market broke in Johannesburg.

At the United Nations men with dark skins, brown skins and yellow skins sat side by side in the Security Council and in the audience without discrimination of any kind, except what might have been in their minds. This subject was not wholly new. It had been discussed in the General Assembly every year for the last five years, as Ambassador Lodge pointed out. The lines of argument had scarcely changed. South Africa contended, as before, that the upheavals in that country were "purely local disturbances." But Bernardus G. Fourie warned that to take any action would be "a most dangerous precedent which might in the future recoil also on other member states."

Yet there was no doubt whatever that the trouble in South Africa was a contagious malady that might sweep across frontiers just as other diseases do, just as the tsetse fly follows the vegetation and the cattle. Even Mr. Fourie admitted that some Bantus were coming into South Africa from other countries. One could not listen for even an hour or so to the discussion in the Security Council, one could not even watch faces of other listeners without knowing that this was more than a parochial disturbance. This sickness of South Africa is a symptom of a world sickness that can be cured only by the medicine of sanity, justice and tolerance. The real atrocity that was being complained of yesterday and the day before was not the panic action of police shooting down demonstrators, but the long years of degradation and denial of human rights that had preceded that tragedy.

No resolution, no allocation of duties to an already overworked U. N. Secretariat, can bring health back to South Africa. The cure will have to come from within. But the pressure to bring this cure about is and must be international. That is the real meaning of two days' talk in the Security Council so far as it can be interpreted at this moment. The resolution introduced by Ecuaodr late yesterday may or may not be a prescription the South Africans can use.

South Africa on Trial

The New York Times

The deaths and violence that have characterized the South African struggle against the policy of apartheid have given that issue of the separation of the races an international character. Technically, the Verwoerd Government may be able to say that this is strictly an internal affair. Prime Minister Menzies of Australia, for instance, took that line in his Parliament yesterday. However, the very fact that the Australian Legislature debated the issue shows that the repercussions are world-wide.

The Security Council will take up today the matter of the slaughter of seventy-two Africans in Sharpeville on March 21. In May the Commonwealth conference in London will have to face the issue. Prime Minister Verwoerd of South Africa will attend the meeting and he is sure to hear some strong language from men like Prime Minister Nehru of India on the subject of apartheid.

Herald 3-30-60

Meanwhile violence, tensions and the loss of more lives have to be expected. There is no hope for the South African Government so long as it follows the policy of apartheid. The doctrine is not only immoral; it is politically and economically impractical. It goes against the inexorable trend in Africa and elsewhere in the contemporary world. South Africans are fighting a battle they must lose, sooner or later. All they can do is gain time, and recent events would indicate that a high price in lives and economic distress will have to be paid for every day gained.

These things seem obvious to outsiders, but there is no sign yet that the South African leaders have understood. Their policy line has hardened. They are defiant of the United Nations and of all their critics in the outer world. It is therefore difficult not to feel discouraged. Nevertheless, it is important for the U. N. Security Council at its meeting today, and for organs of opinion everywhere, to go on record in condemnation of a policy that is tragically wrong. South Africans are intelligent people and not intentionally wicked. The time will surely come when they will see the folly of apartheid. World opinion can help to bring that time nearer by giving expression to the universal feeling on this subject.

TENSION DECLINES IN SOUTH AFRICA, POLICE ON ALERT

The New York Times

Only Minor Incidents Occur —Nation Is Awaiting Next Move by Government

New York Herald Tribune 4-4-60

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 3—Tension appeared today to be easing after two weeks of extreme racial strife in South Africa.

Only isolated incidents of petty violence, such as stoning of buses, were reported from such major trouble spots as Capetown, Durban and the African townships southwest of Johannesburg. Thousands of policemen and troops still maintained emergency patrols at African dwelling areas.

Johannesburg was enjoying its usual Sunday quiet. Workmen were busy completing the decoration of department stores and public buildings for the Union Festival that is being held this year to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the formation of the Union of South Africa.

The Union Exposition, organized as part of the observance, will open on schedule tomorrow in Johannesburg.

Hotels Filled With Visitors

Hotels here are packed with visitors from many parts of South Africa and from abroad. The declaration of a state of emergency appears to have had no effect on the tourist trade. Communications and air, rail and bus services are functioning normally.

Both African and white window-shoppers strolled peacefully through downtown Johannesburg today. Yesterday thousands of persons attended a full program of sports events, including racing, rugby football, soccer and tennis, as on a normal Saturday.

Meanwhile, the country was anxiously awaiting the next move from Capetown, the center of government when Parliaments is in session. Should the calm continue, it is expected that leaders of the governing National party will turn their attention to whatever political decisions they feel must be made as a consequence of the rioting and unrest of the last two weeks, which have thrust South Africa to the center of the international stage.

But thus far the Government, headed by Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, has given no indication of making any basic change in its policy of racial separation, known as apartheid.

As a result of this attitude, there is much talk that political forces are at work that will dislodge the Verwoerd regime and replace it with one less intransigent on racial matters.

According to South Africans who have made a careful study of their country's politics, this may be accomplished through a coalition of moderate members of the National party, the United party, which is the chief Opposition group, and the National Union, a new political group recently formed by Japie Basson, a former Nationalist who represents South-West Africa in the House of Assembly.

However, it is not expected that Prime Minister Verwoerd will give up easily. The immediate question on many lips is what will the Government do to relieve tension, restore tranquillity and end the emergency.

In two speeches during the last week, including one at a United party rally last night, Sir de Villiers Graaff, leader of the Opposition in Parliament, suggested eleven steps that should be taken to restore racial peace in South Africa. They were:

¶Reassess those laws that have contributed to the present difficulties.

¶Remove conditions that are causing strife and trouble between sections of the white population.

¶Adopt a fundamental change in the attitude toward nonwhites.

¶Insure more humane and reasonable administration of the laws so as to avoid racial friction, resentment and frustration.

¶Amend drastically the laws requiring Africans to carry Government-issued passes to move about.

¶Use white capital and skill for developing African areas in cooperation with the Africans.

¶Have a settled policy for Africans living and working in white areas as a permanent part of the population of those areas.

¶Respect the normal human rights of Africans.

¶Bring about racial separation peacefully by developing amenities for all races and avoiding compulsion.

¶Strengthen the white population by immigration.

Sir de Villiers criticized the Government for refusing to consult with the Africans.

Meanwhile, Chief Albert Luthuli, president of the African National Congress, South Africa's oldest political organization for nonwhites, appealed to the Government to concene a multiracial conference "to discuss race relations in general and matters affecting my people in particular." He stressed that "the time for negotiations is now."

His appeal appeared in a weekly column he writes for the Johannesburg Sunday newspaper Golden City Post. Chief Luthuli also declared that "whatever our people do must be done without violence."

Graaff Rejects 'Interference'

JOHANNESBURG, April 3 (Reuters)—In a speech last night, Sir de Villiers Graaff, United party leader, made the first major political comment here on Friday's resolution by the United Nations Security Council criticizing South African racial policies.

He called on all South Africans to stand together and assert their right to settle their own affairs without outside interference.

Churchmen Schedule a Day of Prayer—Nation Quiet in Observing Holiday

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 6—South Africa announced today it was reintroducing the enforcement of laws requiring Africans to carry identity passes. It was this requirement that touched off the current racial violence in the country.

Arrests for failure to produce passes and for other minor offenses were suspended by the Government March 26 in what was interpreted as the recognition of African grievances over severe restrictions on their liberty.

The Minister of Justice, François C. Erasmus, warned that the police henceforth would be empowered to demand passes or temporary identification papers, which would be issued in the place of passes. Many Africans burned their passes in protest against the pass laws.

Arrests for pass violations were suspended as violence spread through the country after more than 300 Africans had been killed or injured in police shootings March 21.

Need for Passes Stressed

Mr. Erasmus emphasized the importance of the passes as proof of the right of Africans to be in urban areas.

In a tacit admission that enforcement of the pass laws had been humiliating to the Africans, Mr. Erasmus told Parliament that the Government would explore ways of making the system more palatable.

He suggested that the police might be instructed to check the passes "in such a way as to lay more stress upon the advantages" that the passes hold for the Africans.

But any amelioration, he added, will have to be achieved "without sacrificing the necessary control measures."

The passes are the keystone of the apartheid system for the separation of the races. The African must have his pass signed each month by his employer. Otherwise, he forfeits his right to live in an urban location and is herded back to an African reservation.

Employers Are Warned

Until the uprising two weeks ago the police were so severe in enforcing pass laws that a housewife who wandered a few hundred yards from her hut to get water could be arrested if she left her passbook at home.

Mr. Erasmus warned employers that the law required them to see that the passes of their African workers were in order. Employers should immediately arrange that Africans without passes obtain temporary documents, he said.

"The police will also render assistance to the Bantu [Africans] to obtain the necessary temporary documents," he said. "For this purpose, as well as to reintroduce control measures, the police will henceforth again be able to demand reference books or temporary documents."

Meanwhile, South Africa's business and industrial leaders appealed urgently for a meeting with Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd because of severe economic effects of the racial crisis.

Times 4-7-60

It became known today that they plan to place before the Prime Minister a demand for a radical change of policy. The men who run South Africa's economy are said to be frustrated and angered over the enormous cost of the emergency.

Times 4-7-60

Economists say there is no way to calculate the exact losses caused by the internal disruptions and the loss of confidence by foreign investors. It is estimated that the loss in production in the last three weeks as a result of the refusal of Africans to work has cost industry more than $60,000,000.

Day of Prayer Set

Leaders of Protestant, Catholic and Jewish faiths called today for the observance Sunday of a national day of prayer and penitence.

South Africa was quiet today as it observed a national holiday commemorating the first Dutch settlement in South Africa 308 years ago.

It is understood that the business delegation seeking to meet with the Prime Minister will include representatives of the Federated Chamber of Industries, the Chamber of Mines, the Association of Chambers of Commerce and the Board of Trade and Industries.

The proposals they plan to put to Dr. Verwoerd will include the following points:

¶Immediate consultation between the Government and acknowledged leaders of the Africans must be held.

¶Present identity passes must be replaced with identity cards and restrictions on the Africans' liberty modified.

¶Controls over the influx of Africans into cities and towns must be confined only to areas where an accommodation problem exists. The African labor force otherwise is to be given complete mobility.

Release of African Sought

The business men are expected to press for the immediate release of Chief Albert Lithuli, president of the African National Congress, who is considered to be a moderate man of high integrity. He is believed to be the best man to build a firm bridge between the Africans and white authority.

Chief Luthuli at present is one of more than 300 African, Asian and white critics of the Government in jail under emergency regulations.

The business men plan to suggest that a strong campaign against the hooligan element among the Africans must be undertaken but only after the Government's racial policy has been modified and the goodwill of responsible Africans won.

An indication of the rigid attitude held by the Afrikaners, descendants of the Dutch settlers who are the main supporters of the Verwoerd Government, was given today by the newspaper Die Burger in Capetown.

Warns of Flexibility

The paper warned that any flexibility by the Government would give African nationalists the impression that black supremacy over South Africa was possible. It said any [illegible] would sharpen the appetites of African nationalists and hasten the day of white capitulation.

The appeal for a national day of prayer on Palm Sunday was made by leaders of the Dutch Reformed, Roman Catholic, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist and Congregationalist churches, the Salvation Army and the United Hebrew Congregation of Johannesburg.

They said that after several days of consultations "there is unanimous agreement that the greatest need of South Africa at this time is to turn to God for pardon and guidance in the troublous events of today."

Their statement noted that the Dutch Reformed Church, which has the largest number of members among the whites of South Africa, had "already called their people to humiliation and prayer."

African 'Gangsters' Warned

Col. C. D. Van Wyck, deputy commissioner of police, said that all African gangsters, whom the police blame for continuing violence, would be "tracked down by the police and given the punishment they deserve."

Machiel D. C. de Wet Nel, Minister of Bantu Affairs, told a gathering of Africans at Umtata in the Transkei reserve to beware of "wolves" among themselves who "tell you that the whites and the Government oppress you."

Most of the thousands of Africans who had stayed away from their jobs in the crisis have returned to their jobs.

At Vereeniging, thirty-six miles south of Johannesburg, several hundred Africans have been refused their jobs. Their employers are replacing them with Africans brought in from the near-by Orange Free State and from tribal reserves. The Sharpeville settlement where the March 21 shootings occurred is outside Vereeniging.

ACTORS DISAVOW SOUTH AFRICA BAN

British Equity Scores Race Curbs but Votes to Permit Performance Anywhere

By WALTER H. WAGGONER

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, April 3—The British Actors Equity Association rejected today an appeal to forbid its members to perform in South Africa.

Times 4-4-60

It approved instead a resolution affirming a member's right to perform with and before anyone, regardless of race, color or creed. At the same time it condemned any discrimination against fellow artists who might exercise that right.

P. 6

The association debated racial segregation at its annual meeting in a West End theatre. But while there was no lack of condemnation of South African race policies, a majority of the members agreed with Terence Soall, who said:

"We are not a political body and we should not attempt to dictate to the Government of South Africa, however much we deplore their attitude to colored people. I think we should be overreaching ourselves."

'Actors Are People'

But from a member far back in the orchestra seats came a dissenting shout, "Actors are people."

The attempt to impose a ban on members performing in South Africa was contained in an amendment to a resolution introduced by John Neville on behalf of forty-six members.

Mr. Neville observed that the resolution had been originally introduced before developments in "another place" had "shocked and disgusted" all of them. But he continued:

"Before we start shouting about other countries, we must be sure our own house is in order. This must inevitably apply to every theatrical digs in this country. We know we have not an entirely clean slate here."

Effective Aid Urged

Richard Attenborough, also opposing the amendment, declared:

"The only way that we can bring any effective aid to these people who are suffering in this intolerable way is by going there and if possible doing everything in our power to show that we think what they are doing is revolting.

"By all means let the council tighten up the clauses in the contracts which state specifically on what terms we will go and act in South Africa. But do not let us say we will not go and so dodge the whole issue."

Dame Sybil Thorndike agreed. "If we refuse to go, no one will know how we feel," she said.

Roger Snowdon supported the ban. He called on the membership "as a profession and as human beings" to show its feelings about South Africa by withholding its talent.

"I would like to see world economic sanctions against South Africa on everything," he declared.

Apartheid's Promoter

Paul Oliver Sauer

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 15—Minister of Lands Paul Oliver Sauer, who has been presiding at South African Cabinet meetings during the convalescence of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, is known as a genial bon vivant.

Man in the News

He is also the man who first popularized the word apartheid (separateness) as the label for South Africa's racial segregation policies.

His post as Minister of Lands is his reward for more than thirty years as a National party workhorse.

When the party's fortunes were at their lowest after an election defeat in 1943, Mr. Sauer was appointed chairman of a party committee assigned to give the Nationalists' policy of strict racial segregation a new appeal. Mr. Sauer seized on the Afrikaans word apartheid, which had been used once or twice by the late Dr. Daniel F. Malan in political speeches.

Policy a Success at Polls

A detailed policy was based on it. This captured the interest of the Afrikaners, the descendants of the Dutch settlers of South Africa who constitute about 55 per cent of the white population of the country. The Nationalists believe the attraction of apartheid helped them to win the 1948 elections and to make Dr. Malan Prime Minister.

Mr. Sauer, a rotund, bald man of 62, is the son of J. W. Sauer, a famous South African political figure who served as member of the Cabinet of Gen. Louis Botha early in the twentieth century.

The son was born in Wynberg, a suburb of Capetown and part of South Africa's wine region. He intended to become a wine farmer and he took agricultural courses at the Universities of Capetown and Stellenbosch and began farming near Stellenbosch.

He was first eletced to Parliament in 1929 and he has been there since. As leader of the House of Assembly the lower chamber, he has been one of Dr. Verwoerd's chief lieutenants.

Derides Beer Drinkers

A gourmet and connoisseur of wines, Mr. Sauer recently referred to beer drinkers as "barbarians." He said "We should encourage the daily drinking of good healthy pleasant wine because it is as cheap as beer."

Mr. Sauer sits quietly in the House, a smile never far from his lips. He prefers to concentrate on issues rather than personalities and will often leave the chamber with pained expression on his face if bad tempers flare and personal attacks are made.

He has been described as "a comfortably built man not renowned for his energy."

National party workhorse

His suits always look as if they are a size too small. Boredom sometimes overcomes him during parliamentary proceedings and he has been known to nap on the Government front bench.

He is a witty speaker, however, and few members of Parliament know as much South African history as he does. Mr. Sauer often provides a forgotten date or set of facts to colleagues who turn to him for aid during debates.

Mr. Sauer loves to talk about his travels, especially if his ever-present pipe is drawing well. He has been to Europe and South America.

He once said he spent his leisure time "watching and enjoying the vanities of my fellow beings." He is a crack shot with a rifle and likes to hunt.

As Minister of Lands he spends a lot of time opening irrigation projects, attending agricultural shows and presiding at conferences on wildlife.

Business Ability Criticized

He formerly was Minister of Transport, responsible for the state-owned railways and air lines.

Commenting on his work in this post, the periodical South African Industry and Trade said:

"The worst business brain in the Cabinet is in charge of the biggest business in the country. Mr. Paul Sauer has many excellent qualities. A nimble mind, geniality, long political experience and much political sagacity certainly make ministerial material. But Mr. Sauer's negligible business experience, non-existent administrative capacity and total disinterest in economic issues disqualify him as Minister of Transport."

Mr. Sauer was married in 1921 to the former Elsabe Aling. They have two daughters.

CHURCH RACE RIFT WIDENS IN AFRICA

Dutch Reformed Sect Says Stand by Anglican Bishop Precludes Cooperation

By Reuters.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, April 13—The Dutch Reformed Church said today that cooperation with the Anglican Archbishop of Capetown, Dr. Joost de Blank, had "become impossible."

The Archbishop said Monday that unless the Dutch Reformed Church repudiated the Government's apartheid (racial segregation) policies, it was "condemning itself to extermination."

Associated Press

AFRICAN LEADER wears hood to conceal his identity during filming of television show on outskirts of Johannesburg, South Africa. Program, shown in Britain, featured discussion of South African situation by African leader and independent observers in secret rendezvous.

The Dutch Reformed Church statement, issued by the moderature of the cape synod, one of three divisions of the church in South Africa, said:

"At a time when cooperation between churches is more necessary than ever before and when there is a need for mutual trust, we are compelled — no matter how much against our will—to reply to the challenge of Archbishop de Blank."

It said an agreement had been signed last year between the Dutch Reformed Church and the Anglican Church under which they undertook to enlighten each other on policy and action and do everything in their power to obviate unfounded conclusions which may be injurious to the interest of the churches."

The churches undertook to seek new ways and means to promote mutual consultation at every level and to encourage their officers to promote a spirit of trust, the statement said, but this agreement "was broken by the Anglican Church on various occasions."

Church for Race Inquiry

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 13—In an earlier action today, Dutch Reformed leaders said they would welcome an investigation of the racial situation by the World Council of Churches.

The Dutch Reformed Church has the largest membership among whites on South Africa. Archbishop de Blank, has suggested that the World Council expel the Church from membership.

The Church was reported to be preparing a report on the South African racial situation for the World Council, including a complaint that Anglican Church schools here practiced segregation.

Today was one of South Africa's quietest days since the country was catapulted into the racial crisis March 21.

Speculation continued on possible changes in the Government's race policy. The police questioned the editors of two Johannesburg publications for Africans. Statements about the continuing emergency came from several quarters.

Verwoerd Progressing

Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd, recovering from wounds inflicted by an assassin was reported to be making "continued progress." His physicians said: "His general condition is satisfactory. The local injured area also progresses as desired."

There was no indication of when the two bullets in his head would be removed.

The speculation, mostly in newspapers, was that Africans living in urban areas might be given a greater voice in the conduct of their affairs, that Africans' wages might be increased and that more attention would be paid to building up purely African areas, probably with the help of funds borrowed abroad.

It has been estimated that $300,000,000 would be required to industrialize African reserves sufficiently to make them self-supporting regions within South Africa. Thus far the Government has appropriated $1,400,000 for the purpose.

Commenting on the consideration by some members of the governing National party of possible moderation of racial policy, Sir de Villiers Graaff, leader of the Opposition United party, said: "It is important that we have a recognition for the first time by the Nationalists that their internal policies have affected the world's attitude toward South Africa, and will continue to do so."

3 Publications Investigated

During the day detectives visited the offices of The Golden City Post, a Sunday newspaper, and of Drum, a monthly magazine, and questioned staff members. Both have large African readerships and both have been critical of the Government's policies toward Africans and have published exposés of how the policies work.

In Port Elizabeth, on the Indian Ocean coast, the police raided the homes of three executives of the nonracial South African Sports Association. They seized letters and documents, including correspondence the association had had with Walter Nash, Prime Minister of New Zealand; the International Olympics Committee and Avery Brundage, president of the International Olympic Games Association.

Dr. Edgar H. Brookes, president of the South African Institute of Race Relations, warned in a statement that South Africa would not solve its racial problems until "free and frank" consultations had taken place between white and nonwhite leaders. The institute has frequently criticized the Government's policy.

Dr. Brookes said there was no question that the reasonable aspirations of Africans, Asians and persons of mixed blood must be satisfied. "But is it to be done early by mutual goodwill or only after recurring crises?" he asked.

Bishop Reeves in Rhodesia

SALISBURY, Southern Rhodesia, April 13 (AP)—The Right Rev. Ambrose Reeves, self-exiled Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg, has arrived by plane from Swaziland.

Bishop Reeves fled to Swaziland, a British protectorate, because he feared arrest under South Africa's emergency regulations. He strongly criticized the conduct of the police in the Sharpeville incident March 21 that precipitated the present crisis. Seventy-two Africans were killed by police fire.

Council to Send Delegate

GENEVA, April 13—The World Council of Churches announced today that it would send a high-ranking official to South Africa "immediately" to consult with religious leaders there on the racial issue.

The statement, issued by Dr. W. A. Visser 't Hooft, general secretary, did not name the official. The council groups most Protestant, Anglican and Orthodox churches.

VERWOERD BEGINS TO RESUME DUTIES

South African Chief Gives His First Order Since He Was Shot a Week Ago

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, April 15—Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd has begun to take an active role again as head of the South African Government.

A bulletin issued today said he had given "his first important instructions in regard to affairs of state since the attempted assassination against him last Saturday."

No details were given. The bulletin merely said he had given the instructions last night to his private secretary, Fred Barnard.

The bulletin, issued at Pretoria General Hospital where Dr. Verwoerd was taken last Sunday, also said:

"With a good deal less pain and discomfort and the better possibility of feeding, the condition of the Prime Minister is now improving more rapidly. His general progress, as well as the progress of the injured area, is thus far very satisfactory."

Dr. Verwoerd was also reported to have had a "good night." Two bullets remain in his head and he is suffering from a broken jaw.

Dr. Verwoerd's only visitor other than his private secretary has been Mrs. Verwoerd. She was reported to be spending Good Friday with their seven children at Libertas, the Prime Minister's official residence in Pretoria, the administrative capital of South Africa.

Despite the injuries incapacitating him, Dr. Verwoerd has continued as head of the Government because the members of the Cabinet and a National party caucus in Parliament have been unable to agree on an acting Prime Minister.

The failure to name someone to act for Dr. Verwoerd resulted from strong rivalries between the Nationalists in Cape Province led by Theophilus E. Dönges, Minister of Finance, and those in Transvaal Province, led by Benjamin Schoeman, Minister of Transport, and Jan de Klerk, Minister of Labor.

The two factions feared that should Dr. Verwoerd not survive or not recover sufficiently to continue as Prime Minister anyone chosen to act for him would be almost certain to succeed him in the post.

Sauer Named Spokesman

The result was that Paul O. Sauer, Minister of Lands and leader of the House of Assembly, the lower chamber of Parliament, was chosen as the Government's spokesman and chairman at Cabinet meetings.

Today's announcement that Dr. Verwoerd had given important instructions on the affairs of state was interpreted as a signal that he was still in charge and had no intentions of relinguishing the command of the Government.

Meanwhile, many South Africans turned their attention from the racial strife of recent weeks to a solemn observance of Good Friday.

This was the first day of a four-day holiday. All Government offices, businesses and places of entertainment were closed. Special church services were held and the state-operated radio abandoned its usual daily fare of soap operas and rock 'n' roll jazz to broadcast religious services and serious music.

Hanging over the nation was the threat of resumed racial tension when South Africa goes back to work next Tuesday. An Emergency Committee of the outlawed African National Congress has called for a one-week strike by Africans in Johannesburg next week.

The police have pledged strong forces to protect any Africans who want to work but Africans questioned today reported that other Africans supporting the work stoppage "tell us if we come to work they are going to kill us."

Government officials have contended that much of the violence in recent weeks has been the work of "agitators" and "intimidators." Emergency regulations in force throughout South Africa provide heavy penalties for persons convicted of intimidating others to withhold their labor.

Churchman Due for Talks

It was announced today that Dr. Robert S. Bilheimer, director of the division of studies of the World Council of Churches, is scheduled to arrive in Johannesburg Tuesday from Geneva to meet with representatives of seven South Africa churches affiliated with the World Council. He will discuss the possibility of an investigation of the racial situation in South Africa by a World Council mission.

Dr. Bilheimer is coming as a result of a complaint by the Most Rev. Joost de Blank, Anglican Archbishop of Capetown, who has said that the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa should be expelled from the World Council. He said it supported the Government's racial segregation policy.

Dr. Bilheimer is expected to consult with representatives of the Dutch Reformed Church, the Anglican Church of the Province of South Africa, the Methodist Church of South Africa, the Presbyterian Church of South Africa and the Bantu (African) Presbyterian Church.

Judging South Africa

To THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR:

May I be allowed, without being accused of having a chip on my shoulder, to make some comments with regard to the letter "The Bubble in South Africa," printed on March 24.

I am quite sure no American would care to have the people in his country summed up on so slight an acquaintance.

Among other things the letter writer says, "The native of South Africa is held in forced suppression, complete segregation, and menial labor with no possibility of advance." I wonder why he does not read any of the many publications for natives, such as "The Drum" which would open his eyes to the fact of how advanced many of the urban natives are, and how they have their social distinctions just as much as the white people. Considering the short time (and on this history will bear me out) since they have come under the civilizing influence of the white man, quite a large number of them are highly educated and many are very prosperous.

I can assure your letter writer that all "Europeans" in South Africa do not have servants, and I should be very interested to hear in what areas the native servants are working for 10 shillings a month plus food. Certainly not in the big cities he mentions.

In my opinion generalizations are always liable to be inaccurate, and so again I should like to recommend that any overseas readers who would really like to judge the situation fairly should make an effort to read issues of periodicals published especially for natives and about natives, to get impressions of current trends; and also to read books by missionaries and civil servants to gain some understanding of what heroic work was done among the totally uncivilized native peoples less than 100 years ago.

Many of those natives suffered so shockingly at the hands of their own chiefs and witch doctors that if they could have been transplanted into this so-called age of suppression they would very likely have thought they had arrived in heaven! That the influence of witch doctors has not yet been eradicated is borne out by the fact that cases of "ritual murder" are still occasionally brought before the courts.

In judging South Africa, could our critics please try to get a sense of perspective? Undoubtedly there is plenty of room for improvement in South Africa but surely that can be said about all countries.

SOUTH AFRICAN MASSACRE MAY SIGNAL REVOLT

The Atlanta Constitution
Atlanta, Ga.
Sun. 4-3-60.
P.4-E

By WILLIAM R. FRYE
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., April 2—In the broad sweep of history the Johannesburg massacre of March 21, 1960, may prove to have been as significant a turning point for the African continent as the Boston Massacre of March 5, 1770, was for North America.

On that winter day nearly 200 years ago, British Redcoats fired into a group of New England patriots agitating against colonial grievances. Five were killed.

By this act, the British solidified and gave impetus to the American independence movement, providing an emotional issue of great force and discredited the Tory cause. They virtually made the American Revolution inevitable.

End to Whites?

Last month, just outside Johannesburg, South Africa, a modern revolution was similarly galvanized into blazing fury. Police opened fire on a crowd of 20,000 Africans protesting the compulsory carrying of hated "reference books" (passes). At least 72 were killed and more than 250 wounded.

In many respecst, the two events, 200 years apart, are entirely comparable—and the result of the Johannesburg massacre could be to sweep the white man off the African continent as the British were swept from America.

U.N. diplomats, anxious to avoid the mass bloodletting which could accompany such an upheaval, sought to make of the United Nations this past week a safety valve. They summoned the U.N. Security Council into session and invited Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, Ethiopia, India and Pakistan to give voice to the Africans' anguish.

Representatives of these countries came and told their story—sometimes in the halting words of a man new to Western education, sometimes with eloquence and polish, always with deep emotion.

South Africa's View

The South African delegate contended that the whole process of U.N. consideration would inflame, rather than relieve, tensions. He argued that the U.N.'s eight previous airings of apartheid (racial segregation) in the General Assembly—each year since 1952—had had that effect. He dismissed the events of March 21 as "purely a local disturbance".

The Nigerians who voted at a mass rally to demand the ouster of all white South Africans from their country did not consider it "local." Neither did the Indian Parliament.

The Johannesburg massacre may not have been the direct and immediate threat to world peace which Afro-Asian delegates, partly to meet legal and procedural requirements, sought to make of it; but it was obviously not a purely local problem.

All over the world, non-white peoples—and they constitute an overwhelming majority of the earth's population — are rising up to demand what they regard as their legitimate rights.

There are "sit-ins" in the American South. There are race riots in London and switchblade "rumbles" in New York. There are clashes between white and yellow in Okinawa.

A serious stir is abroad in the world, and the only solution U.N. people can see is a general recognition and acceptance of the fundamental fact that all men are created equal in the eyes of their common heavenly Father.

Pace Too Slow

Even in countries such as the United States, where efforts are being made to translate this proposition into practical reality, the pace is too slow for the process to be wholly peaceful.

What has happened and is happening in South Africa, U.N. people say, is a warning that if the pace is too slow, or if no progress at all is made, there will be an explosion.

The U.N. has done much, and attempted more, to ease the adjustment. The U.N. Trusteeship Council has supervised and spurred the progress toward independence of tens of millions. The Economic and Social Council has helped provide education, houses, clothing, and food—necessary or desirable preliminaries to self-government. The General Assembly has proclaimed a charter of human rights and sought to prod nations into complying.

The story is by no means a seamless robe of consistency. As U.S. Delegate Henry Cabot Lodge indirectly reminded the Afro-Asians this past week, many of them tried to look the other way when Red China committed its bloody suppression of human rights in Tibet.

Henry C. Lodge

But the U.N.'s influence, in general, has been toward a nonviolent solution of this most elementary and impelling of human problems: the demand of non-white peoples for political, economic, and social equality—now—regardless of the consequences.

The grim sight of Africans chopping at police with axes, ramming bicycle spokes up the noses of strike breakers, and setting fire to churches was ample evidence that more needs to be done.

"It is not five minutes to midnight: the midnight toll has already begun to ring," one U.N. diplomat said this past week.

ASIA, AFRICA GHOSTS SHADOW DE GAULLE

The world's leaders are going to Charles de Gaulle. Visitation season began early last month with British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan's weekend in Paris; Russia's Khrushchev concludes his visit today; the summit meeting opens there May 16.

Over these discussions in Europe, says The Yorkshire Post, hover the two dark, enigmatic shadows of Asia and Africa—ghosts of the past and portents of the future. The British newspaper goes on:

"THE INTERESTS and the hopes of Britain and of France are, in this decade more obviously than ever before, inextricably linked—not only in Europe but overseas—in the final phases of the liquidation of their separate empires. In de-colonization as in colonization, we have both had our successes and our failures; we have had our agonies and our consolations.

"Now, almost simultaneously, we approach the end of this painful but, it must be supposed, historically necessary road. France suffers the running sore of Algeria; Britain wonders with dismay whether the same grim infection is not to be expected in Kenya and in the Central African Federation. Neither of us is entitled to give high and mighty lectures to the other."

U.N. Urges S. Africa To End Racial Bias

The Atlanta Constitution

Atlanta, Ga.

By BRUCE W. MUNN

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. (UPI). The United Nations Security Council voted 9-0 Friday to urge South Africa to end its policy of race discrimination which has led to rioting and bloodshed. Britain and France abstained from the vote.

Sat. 4-2-60

The vote on the resolution, introduced by Ecuador with the backing of the 29-nation Afro-Asian bloc, came after three days of debate. South Africa participated only to the extent that its ambassador, Bernardus Gerhardus Fourie, denied the council had the authority to deal with the internal affairs of a nation. He charged the council was adopting a "double standard" for certain countries.

P. 2.

The United States supported the resolution. U.S. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge said the resolution "seeks to build a bridge not a wall" in the racial conflict in which three Africans were killed and three more wounded Friday in a street demonstration in the South African city of Durban.

The resolution calls on Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold to "consult" with the South African government and "take such measures as would adequately help in insuring" the principles of the U.N. charter.

Britain, leader of the commonwealth to which South Africa belongs, and France, embroiled in the Algerian war, both refused to take part in the vote in view of the article of the U.N. charter forbidding the U.N. to intervene in the domestic affairs of any country.

BRITAIN ABSTAINED

There had been reports during the day that Britain was prepared to go so far as to veto the resolution. This was not the case. Abstention was as far as Britain went.

The Ecuadorian resolution arose from a complaint by the Afro-Asian bloc against "the large-scale killings of unarmed and peaceful demonstrators" near Capetown and Johannesburg while they were denouncing the "apartheid" segregation policies of the government.

South Africa warned that it would regard any U.N. action "in a serious light."

Backers of the measure argued that the council was dealing with a case of suppression of human rights, which the U.N. charter pledges all member nations to uphold.

The resolution as passed was considerably watered-down from the original.

Demands for a "condemnation" of South Africa were eliminated. Also removed was a June 30 deadline for Hammarskjold's mediation efforts.

As approved, the resolution calls on South Africa to "initiate measures aimed at bringing about racial harmony based on equality in order to insure that the present situation does not continue or recur, and to abandon its policies of apartheid and racial discrimination."

The police acted under the government's new emergency powers approaching martial law. Under the state of emergency decreed Wednesday, police apparently have felt less constraint in using their weapons. Even in the face of 30,000 Cape Town demonstrators earlier this week, they held their fire.

Sat. 4-2-60

Friday about 1,400 marchers headed into Heramus, a coastal resort 50 miles east of Cape Town. The crowd, including some women, was warned to disperse, but refused. Police charged, swinging clubs and rifle butts.

P. 5.

Police on the Cape peninsula took emergency measures to break a crippling work stoppage. Police said citizen arrests could be made of anyone found handing out leaflets urging people to stay away from work, or intimidating workers.

The peninsula has been bearing the brunt of widespread disorder as Negroes attempt to exert an economic boycott and enforce their demands for abolition of the pass system for nonwhites, equal work for equal pay with minimum wages and hours—and possibly political rights. Low-cost African labor is the main support of South Africa's economy.

The Nationalist government, trying to cope with spreading unrest, has found that Negro members of the police force have been assaulted or their houses burned down.

The main metropolis of Johannesburg was relatively calm following a night of violence in nearby native settlements that left numerous injured and at least two dead.

One was a Negro constable stabbed to death, the other a rioter killed when police opened fire.

Buses were stoned as agitators tried to force Africans to observe a work boycott. Makeshift roadblocks were set up and quickly knocked down by police. An administrative building, two stores and the homes of three Negro police constables were put to the torch at a settlement outside Cape Town. The Negro headman was reported assaulted in the new Brighton township near Port Elizabeth, and a church was burned down.

South Africa Looses Reins Gingerly

Christian Science Monitor

Johannesburg

Although 1,200 political detainees have been released from jails in South Africa and the state of emergency lifted in a further 34 magisterial districts, the country is by no means back to normal.

Boston Mass.

About 400 white and nonwhite detainees are still in custody and will be kept there for an unstated period while their cases are investigated. Another 8,600 African "idlers" are being detained indefinitely under emergency law.

The state of emergency is still in operation in 67 magisterial districts, including all the stringent emergency regulations, including the right to detain people without trial and to suppress publications which print "subversive" statements, are being retained.

Announced by Government

The Minister of Justice, Francois C. Erasmus, announced in a statement June 28 the partial lifting of the emergency. He said 1,200 of the 1,600 political detainees would be released within the next fortnight.

One white woman was released from Pretoria jail June 28, and others will now be released daily.

The released persons, it is understood, are to be tied down to conditions. They must not engage in political activity. They must not communicate with ex-detainees or members of banned organizations.

They must disclose no information about their detention. They must not leave the district in which they live or change their place of residence or employment without notifying the police. They must remain indoors between 8 p.m. and 8 a.m., and they must report to the police regularly.

Fine Threatened

If they contravene any of these conditions they can be fined up to £500 ($1,400) or sentenced to five years' imprisonment.

A hint that the government intends to retain the state of emergency in some form or other for some time has been given by the government-supporting newspaper in Johannesburg, which criticized opposition newspapers this week for pointing out that the emergency has lasted for three months already.

The newspaper said the opposition press had made no protest about the eight-year duration of the state of emergency in the British territory of Kenya. The newspaper was adamant that the government would retain the powers it held under the emergency regulations for as long as it considered them necessary.

Congo Bid Declined

By Reuters

Pretoria, South Africa

South Africa and the central African Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland have said they will not send representatives to the celebration of Belgian Congo independence June 30.

A federation spokesman said June 28 at Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, that the decision there was made in view of a recent protest by the Congo's Chamber of Deputies against celebration invitations being sent to the Federation, South Africa, and Portuguese Angola.

South Africa's External Affairs Ministry said it had become clear to the South African Government that if a representative attended the celebration, this could lead to difficulties for the new Congo state.

An official South African statement June 28 said the government here would send a message of good will and congratulations expressing recognition of the new state.

Excerpts From Macmillan's Talk to South African Parliament Members

The New York

CAPETOWN, South Africa, Feb. 3 (Reuters)—Following are excerpts from an address to members of the South African Parliament by Prime Minister Macmillan: New York

It is a great privilege to be invited to address members of both houses of the Union Parliament. 2-4-60.

It is a unique privilege to do so in 1960, just half a century after the Parliament of the Union came to birth. I am especially grateful to your Prime Minister, Dr. Verwoerd, who invited me to visit your country and arranged for me to address you here today.

It gives me great encouragement to reflect that the economies of both our countries, while developing rapidly, have yet remained interdependent and capable of sustaining one another.

Britain has always been your best customer and, as your new industries develop, we believe we can be your best partners, too.

In addition to building this strong economy within your own borders, you have also played your part as an independent nation in world affairs.

As I have traveled through the Union, I have found everywhere, as I expected, a deep preoccupation with what is happening in the rest of the African continent. I understand and sympathize with your interest in these events, and your anxiety about them.

Ever since the break-up of the Roman Empire, one of the constant facts of political life in Europe has been the emergence of independent nations.

They have come into existence over the centuries in different shapes with different forms of government. But all have been inspired with a keen feeling of nationalism, which has grown as nations have grown.

National Consciousness Rising

In the twentieth century, and especially since the end of the war, the processes which gave birth to the nation-states of Europe have been repeated all over the world. We have seen the awakening of national consciousness in peoples who have for centuries lived in dependence on some other power.

Fifteen years ago this movement spread through Asia. Many countries there, of different races and civilizations, pressed their claim to an independent national life.

Today the same thing is happening in Africa. The most striking of all the impressions I have formed since I left London a month ago is of the strength of African national consciousness.

In different places it may take different forms. But it is happening everywhere. The wind of change is blowing through the continent.

Whether we like it or not, this growth of national consciousness is a political fact. We must all accept it as a fact. Our national policies must take account of it.

Of course, you understand this as well as anyone. You are sprung from Europe, the home of nationalism.

And here, in Africa, you have yourselves created a full nation—a new nation. Indeed, in the history of our times, yours will be recorded as the first of the African nationalisms.

And this tide of national consciousness which is now rising in Africa is a fact for which you and we and the other nations of the Western world are ultimately responsible.

For its causes are to be found in the achievements of Western civilization in pushing forward the frontiers of knowledge, applying science in the service of human needs, expanding food production, speeding and multiplying means of communication, and, above all, spreading education.

Peril to Peace Noted

As I have said, the growth of national consciousness in Africa is a political fact and we must accept it as such. I sincerely believe that if we cannot do so, we may imperil the precarious balance of East and West on which the peace of the world depends.

The world today is divided into three great groups.

First, there are what we call the Western powers. You in South Africa and we in Britain belong to this group, together with our friends and allies in other parts of the Commonwealth, in the United States of America, and in Europe.

Secondly, there are the Communists—Russia and her satellites in Europe and China, whose population will rise by 1970 to the staggering total of 800,000,000.

Thirdly, there are those parts of the world whose people are at present uncommitted either to communism or to our Western ideas. In this context, we think first of Asia and of Africa.

As I see it, the great issue in this second half of the twentieth century is whether the uncommitted peoples of Asia and Africa will swing to the East or the West.

Will they be drawn into the Communist camp? Or will the great experiments in self-government that are now being made in Asia and Africa, especially within the Commonwealth, prove so successful and by their example so compelling, that the balance will come down in favor of freedom and order and justice?

The struggle is joined and it is a struggle for the minds of men. What is now on trial is much more than our military strength or our diplomatic and administrative skill. It is our way of life.

Many Nations Face Choice

The uncommitted nations want to see before they choose. What can we show them to help them choose right? Each of the independent members of the Commonwealth must answer that question for itself.

It is the basic principle for our modern Commonwealth that we respect each other's sovereignty in matters of internal policy. At the same time, we must recognize that in this shrinking world in which we live today, the internal policies of one nation may have effects outside it.

We may sometimes be tempted to say to each other, "Mind your own business." But in these days I would myself expand the old saying so that it runs: "Mind your own business, but mind how it affects my business, too."

Let me be very frank with you, my friends. What governments and parliaments in the United Kingdom have done since the war in according independence to India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya and Ghana, and what they will do for Nigeria and the other countries now nearing independence—all this, though we take full and sole responsibility for it, we do in the belief that it is the only way to establish the future of the Commonwealth and of the free world on sound foundations.

All this, of course, is also of deep and close concern to you. For nothing we do in this small world can be done in a corner or remain hidden.

Nevertheless, I am sure you will agree that in our own areas of responsibility we must each do what we think right. What we think right derives from long experience, both of failure and success in the management of our own affairs.

Associated Press

Prime Minister Macmillan

We have tried to learn and apply the lessons of both. Our judgment of right and wrong and of justice is rooted in the same soil as yours—in Christianity and in the rule of law as the basis of a free society.

Democratic Aims Cited

This experience of our own explains why it has been our aim in countries for which we have borne responsibility not only to raise the material standards of life but to create a society which respects the rights of individuals—a society in which men are given the opportunity to grow to their full stature, and that must in our view include the opportunity to have an increasing share in political power and responsibility; a society in which individual merit, and individual merit alone, is the criterion for man's advancement, whether political or economic.

Finally, in countries inhabited by several different races, it has been our aim to find the means by which the community can become more of a community, and fellowship can be fostered between its various parts.

This problem is by no means confined to Africa. Nor is it always the problem of the European minority.

I have thought you would wish me to state plainly and with full candor the policy for which we in Britain stand.

It may well be that in trying to do our duty as we see it, we shall sometimes make difficulties for you. If this proves to be so, we shall regret it.

But I know that even so you would not ask us to flinch from doing our duty. You, too, will do your duty as you see it.

Problems Acknowledged

I am well aware of the peculiar nature of all the problems with which you are faced here in the Union of South Africa. I know the differences between your situation and that of most of the other states in Africa.

You have here some 3,000,000 people of European origin. This country is their home. It has been their home for many generations. They have no other. The same is true of the Europeans in Central and East Africa.

As a fellow member of the Commonwealth, it is our earnest desire to give South Africa our support and encouragement, but I hope you won't mind my saying frankly that there are some aspects of your policies which make it impossible for us to do this without being false to our own deep convictions about the political destinies of free men, to which in our own territories we are trying to give effect.

I think we ought as friends to face together—without seeking to apportion credit or blame—the fact that in the world of today this difference of outlook lies between us.

The United States provides a valuable illustration of one of the main points which I have been trying to make in my remarks today.

Its population, like yours, is a blend of many different strains, and over the years most of those who have gone to North America have gone there in order to escape conditions in Europe which they found intolerable.

Isolation Unsuccessful

It is not surprising, therefore, that for so many years a main objective of American statesmen, supported by the American public, was to isolate themselves from Europe, and with their great material strength and vast resources open to them this might have seemed an attractive and practicable course.

Nevertheless, in the two world wars of this century, they have found themselves unable to stand aside.

Twice their manpower in arms has streamed back across the Atlantic to shed its blood in those European struggles from which their ancestors thought they would escape by emigrating to the new world.

And when the second war was over, they were forced to recognize that in the small world of today isolationism is out of date and offers no assurance of security.

The fact is that is this modern world no country, not even the greatest, can live for itself alone.

It has always been impossible for individual man to live in isolation from his fellows—in home, tribe, village, or city. Today it is impossible for nations to live in isolation from one another. All nations now are interdependent one upon another.

Plain Talk in Capetown

The New York Times

At the base of Table Mountain, just off the tree-sheltered ease of Government Avenue, in Capetown, sit the Houses of Parliament of the Union of South Africa. There on Wednesday two Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth made speeches; and it may be that events to come will cause the exchange to take on a certain historic significance.

The guest speaker was Harold Macmillan, Prime Minister of Britain itself. He spoke with great deliberateness for forty minutes to an audience of legislators who listened in almost complete silence as he told them, in effect, that their country was out of step with the world. In the very citadel of the Afrikaner Nationalist Government Mr. Macmillan asserted that black African nationalism was growing, and that it must be recognized and come to terms with as a political fact—failing which "we may imperil the precarious balance of East and West on which the peace of the world depends."

The host was Hendrik F. Verwoerd, Prime Minister of the Union. He replied that some British policies might involve great "dangers" in Africa. He insisted that it was as a direct result of benefits derived from European progress in Africa that the African had advanced to the point of political awareness. He asked understanding of South Africa's position; and "justice" for white men too.

The course upon which Dr. Verwoerd and his Government has embarked, furthering that of his predecessors, Malan and Strijdom, is unwavering. The goal is white supremacy and racial segregation—absolute and uncompromising—in a naturally endowed land where the white population is barely one-fifth of the total. And it may be taken for granted that nothing Mr. Macmillan said will cause official amelioration of the doctrine of apartheid.

But the fact remains that the British Prime Minister has spoken, both in judgment and in warning. He has exalted the criterion of individual merit before the leaders of a nation which denies it. And it is at least conceivable that his words may prompt more effective opposition before it is too late. For reform in South Africa can come only from within; and if it does not come constitutionally, at white behest, it may come violently. If this seems like a melodramatic alternative, it is safe to assert that both Mr. Macmillan and all who heard him Wednesday were fully aware of it.

Macmillan Warns of Extremism In Handling Africa's Problems

New York Times

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, Feb. 5—Prime Minister Macmillan of Britain ended his month-long African tour today with a warning against extremism in attacking the continent's problems.

He said extremists "make the mistake of oversimplifying what is really very complicated."

Mr. Macmillan said that "there is no single solution to these most complicated and baffling problems." He appealed for "mutual forbearance and understanding" in developing solutions.

The British Prime Minister and his wife, Lady Dorothy, sailed on the liner Capetown Castle for Las Palmas in the Canary Islands, where they will board a plane for London after a week's voyage.

Cheered by Thousands

Mr. Macmillan was cheered by thousands of persons who lined Capetown streets to watch as he drove to the docks with Dr. Hendrik F. Verwoerd, South Africa's Prime Minister. Mr. Macmillan stood in the back of an open car, waving to the crowds and smiling. Mr. Verwoerd sat, unsmiling, beside him.

At a news conference earlier in the day, Mr. Macmillan gave his views on problems confronting Africa. Most of the questions were based on his speech Wednesday to members of the South African Parliament in which he condemned apartheid, this country's policy of racial discpimination against non-whites.

Asked what was to become of the white man in Africa, the British Prime Minister said that in territories with relatively large numbers of whites, such as South Africa, Kenya and Rhodesia, the question was: "Is it possible to devise a position where they [the whites] could continue to have influence based not on numbers but on their strength and wealth?"

One aspect of the situation, he said, is that twenty years ago people would have spoken of guaranteeing the rights of the Africans and now it is a question of guaranteeing the rights of whites.

He said some solution would have to be found whereby all the people would play some part in the political and economic life of the country. He added that the relationship would have to be determined by different means and different emphasis according to the circumstances in each territory.

"We believe that the problem must be faced and can perhaps be solved," he said. "It may fail. What is the alternative? Perhaps another worse failure."

He emphasized that the problems of Africa could not be solved "on a basis of hatred and recrimination."

Asked if Britain would be less constant in supporting South Africa at the United Nations on racial matters, Mr Macmillan said:

"I don't think that arises at all. What happens at the United Nations depends upon the resolutions, their terms and the rules governing discussions."

British Abstention Seen

It is anticipated here that Britain will henceforth abstain from voting in the United Nation on resolutions dealing with South African racial problems.

However, Mr. Macmillan indicated that he was hopeful that South Africa, should it become a republic, would remain a member of the British Commonwealth.

Asked if in the light of South Africa's racial policies it was not a strain for Britain to live with South Africa in the Commonwealth, he replied:

"There is no doubt at all about the answer to that question. We have had long connections with this country. We are half the founders of it. We have put money, lives, fortunes and hopes into it and it would be tragic if we could not all live together and each play our part in the comradeship of this family. The Commonwealth was not easily made and it is not to be broken up as you would throw a glass upon the ground."

South Africans Told Of Boycott Menace

The Christian Science Monitor

Boston, Mass.

By R

Johannesburg

Transport Minister Barend Schoeman has warned South Africans they would have to "tighten their belts" if the boycott movements against the country's racial policies gained momentum.

He told the annual meeting here of the Federal Consultative Council of Railroad Staffs Associations June 7:

"The Union today is facing the most difficult position it has had to face for the past 50 years. We are being slandered, vilified, misrepresented and attacked in every country in the world. We are alone today."

Mr. Schoeman said there was a boycott movement against South African goods in almost every country in the world.

"We are already feeling the effect in a small way," he said. "If these boycott movements gain momentum and get more support, South Africa can be placed in a very bad way economically.

"We will have to tighten our belts. We will have to turn every penny over twice.

Position Uncertain

"Our economic position in the next six or seven months is an unknown factor. We do not know whether these boycott movements are going to develop and strike a blow at our economy."

A spokesman for the Federated Chamber of Industries said here June 8 that some South African industrialists are considering sending a team to the West Indies to investigate moves to boycott South African goods.

The plan, which follows the refusal of Trinidad dockworkers to unload a South African cargo and other West Indian boycotts, will be considered by the chamber's executive committee early in July.

A group of South African exporters had considered sending a good will mission—including an African—to Trinidad, but abandoned the idea on the advice of principal Trinidad importers. They said the mission would not serve any purpose because of the strength of anti-South African sentiment there.

Malayan Move Started

In London, Malayan Prime Minister Tunku Abdul Rahman said June 8 that he intends to write to other Asian heads of government in an attempt to organize an Asian boycott of goods produced in South Africa.

The Tunku told reporters at London Airport that an order had been issued to the Malayan Treasury to stop buying South African goods because of that country's apartheid (racial segregation) policy.

He said this was just the first step in a boycott he planned to organize.

United Nations Will Consider The S. African Race Situation

BY WILLIAM N. OATIS

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y. —(AP)— The U. N. Security Council will be called into a special session early next week to discuss the explosive South African racial conflict.

The Asian - African bloc called for the meeting. They planned to present a formal request later today for the council to take up the situation arising from the killing of some 80 Negro demonstrators by South African police. The Asian-African letter reportedly said the South African situation was a potential threat to international peace.

U. S. Delegate Henry Cabot Lodge, Security Council president for March, told newsmen he would convene the 11 - nation group "within a few days'—probably on Tuesday. He said the killings in South Africa this week were "very distressing."

Diplomats said the Asian - African bloc countries were considering asking the council to condemn the killings and to create an investigating committee.

Only seven votes are necessary to put the issue on the council's agenda, and the Asian-African request seemed certain to muster that many.

Lodge would not say how the United States would vote. But he noted that in the past the United States has held that South Africa's segregation policy—the root of the present trouble—was "a proper subject for discussion in the United Nations."

The South African government has protested and boycotted all previous U. N. debates on its white supremacy policy. The 82-nation General Assembly ruled then that it could discuss the issue but was not competent to intervene.

In Toyko, meanwhile, U. N. Undersecretary Ralph J. Bunche said there may be need soon of a United Nations "presence" in troubled Africa. He did not say whether it should take the form of a military force, as the U. N. has stationed between Egypt and Israel, or a diplomatic mission, such as it sent to Laos last fall.

SOUTH AFRICA MAPS AN ALL-WHITE VOTE

CAPETOWN, South Africa, March 11 (Reuters)—The Government took the first formal step today toward staging a whites-only referendum on whether this Commonwealth country should become a republic.

The Government presented a bill providing for the referendum over the protests of the Opposition in Parliament.

Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd said only white citizens would be able to vote in the referendum, calling for a yes-or-no answer to the question: "Are you in favor of a Republic of South Africa?"

Dr. Verwoerd countered that the colored people were being excluded to prevent their vote from being abused by a minority of the white population.

African Negroes Plan Job Strike

Hundreds Expected To Submit To Arrest For Not Having Passes

From Wire Dispatches

Johannesburg, March 23 (Wednesday)—Thousands of Negroes were expected to refuse to go to their jobs Wednesday in the aftermath of two days of rioting against South Africa's white-supremacy laws.

Hundreds of nonwhites made it plain they were ready to march into police stations and be arrested for not possessing passes they are required to carry day and night.

World-wide criticism of the deaths of 67 Negroes killed by police bullets in the riots spurred the Government to review the crisis. Opposition parties in South Africa demanded an investigation.

Authorities Blame Agitators

Official reports set the number of wounded at 182. Unofficial tabulations put the figures for dead and wounded somewhat higher.

White authorities blamed African nationalist agitators for fanning what had been planned a peaceful demonstration against the pass laws into violent disorders.

The Government said it was considering forming a commission to investigate the underlying causes of unrest among the nation's black population.

In Tuesday's rioting Negroes burned buildings near Cape Town, then stoned firemen who fought the flames. Police fired on Mobs for the second day in a row.

Uneasy Truce Enforced

Thousands of police enforced an uneasy truce on the Negro quarter of Sharpeville in the coal-mining district south of Johannesburg. Sharpeville was the scene of Monday's major riot, in which at least 50 Negroes died.

The new outbreaks centered around the Negro settlement of Langa, outside Cape Town, where at least six Negroes were killed Monday.

Resentful Africans hid in the bush around their villages. One police patrol near Langa was ambushed by a number of Negroes. A police sergeant wounded one of the attackers.

The Johannesburg Star said South Africa's world standing was being undermined, and demanded "an end to this drift to disaster."

Peace Feeler Urged

The Nationalist newspaper, Die Burger, in Cape Town appealed to the Nationalist Government to approach the moderate native leaders in the interest of law and order.

(In London 600 students clashed with police in Trafalgar Square in front of the Union of South Africa headquarters. With chants of "Murder, murder," they tried to crash police cordons around the building. The British Government asked South Africa for a report. South Africa prices tumbled on the London Stock Exchange.)

During the night the Negroes in Langa set fire to at least eight buildings, including churches, the library, a recreation hall, a reception center, an office building, and Negro settlement workshops. Street lights were smashed.

Firemen Are Stoned

The battle between the police and the mobs was waged by the light of the fires and the beams of armored-car searchlights.

The rioters first stoned the firemen, who retreated and returned later under police escort to continue fighting the blazes.

Reports of rioting also came from Nyanga West, another Negro settlement near Cape Town. Police fired on Africans who tried to set fire to an electrical department building, the reports said.

Slogans Chalked On Walls

Defying police, Negroes chalked these slogans on walls: 'Freedom," "Minimum wage and equal pay for equal work," and "Down with passes."

The Pan-Africanist Congress, a militant offshoot of the dominant Negro African National Congress, sponsored the anti-pass campaigns. The passes are detested by the Negroes as a symbol of the Government's strict racial-segregation (apartheid) laws, which bar Negroes from many jobs, force them to live in special areas, impose nighttime curfews, and outline numerous other restrictions.

The Pan-Africanist Congress had called for a passive-resistance campaign, urging Negroes to leave their passes at home and invite arrest. The idea was to fill the jails to overflowing. But police would arrest only the ringleaders.

Congress Leader Arrested

The head of the Pan-Africanist Congress, Robert Managlisco Sobukwe, resigned his post as a language instructor at the University of Witwaterswand and was taken into custody by police at his own request.

Prime Minister Hendryk Verwoerd, whose Nationalist Party is the driving force behind the racial laws, announced that Sobukwe and 131 of his Negro followers held in Johannesburg would be charged with sedition.

Sobuwe's group issued a statement terming the police "sadistic bullies" who had opened fire on "unarmed, peaceful demonstrators" at the start of the antipass campaign.

The statement added that Pan-Africanist supporters had been warned to avoid any violence, even in the face of provocation. It said the group's enemies want to make the campaign "an occasion to satisfy the animal lust for spilling African blood for which the Europeans (whites) in this country have been legally licensed."

Verwoerd defended the police for firing on the Negro demonstrators and said the riots had nothing to do with apartheid but were a reflection of the independence movement sweeping Africa now. He accused the native leaders of trying to organize a revolt.

U. N. Africans To Meet

United Nations, N. Y., March 22. (AP) — Nine African delegations will meet Wednesday to consider what to do in the U. N. about the shooting of Negro demonstrators by police in South Africa. The meeting was set up Tuesday at the request of Ghana, Sudan, and the United Arab Republic.

BILL WOULD BAR NEGRO PARTIES

S. Africa Cancels Police and Army Leaves

By LYNN HEINZERLING

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — All leaves were canceled for policemen and soldiers Friday as this racially split nation prepared for a tense weekend. On Monday, the government is to introduce a bill outlawing the nation's two leading Negro organizations.

Notice of the bill was given to Parliament by F. C. Erasmus, justice minister in the Nationalist party government which is the driving force behind South Africa's white supremacy policies.

The bill will be directed primarily against the African Nationalist Congress and its militant offshoot, the Pan-Africanist Congress, sponsor of demonstrations that led to this week's bloody violence.

Erasmus said that in addition to the two Negro groups, the bill would ban other organizations for the "safety of the public and maintenance of law and order."

'MASSIVE REVOLT'

Prime Minister Hendrik Verwoerd has charged the riots were part of a "massive revolt" and said white [illegible] to maintain [illegible] total about 80 Negro [illegible] several hundred wounded.

Verwoerd's government also has banned all public meetings for the next three months. But exceptions were made for a Nationalist party meeting Saturday night and white sports events—white soccer league games and the Transvaal track and field championships Saturday.

More than 200 other applications for exemptions have been received in Johannesburg, mostly from white athletic groups that had arranged weekend matches. No applications have been received from Negroes.

NEGRO BOXING BARRED

A Negro professional boxing tournament scheduled for Saturday was canceled. It was to have been held in Sharpeville, the Negro settlement where the week's worst riots took place.

The Sharpeville area has remained quiet under a tight police lid. But a Negro work stoppage in nearby Vereeniging is seriously affecting the economy. Whites can be seen there performing many chores normally handled by Negroes.

The order canceling leaves for police and defense forces apparently is designed to provide more protection in the Cape Town region, where tension continues high. More than a thousand Negroes lined up in front of a police station there Friday. Earlier, 20 Negroes were turned away when they demanded to be arrested for not carrying passes. Philip Kgosana, a Pan-Africanist leader, was taken into custody. Before being led away he said: "We want to see how many of us they can lock up."

CONCERN VOICED

In Cape Town, leaders of four religions issued separate statements deploring Monday's riots and expressing concern at the country's racial policies. They were Cape Town's Anglican archbishop, Dr. Joost De Blank; the Roman Catholic archbishop, the Most Rev. Owen McCann; the chief rabbi, Prof. I. Abrahams; and the Council of the Congregational Union of South Africa.

Police Shoot Down Women During Riots

P. 6

(Editors Note: UPI correspondent Henri Schoup witnessed the outbreak of racial violence Monday in Sharpville, South Africa. His dispatch follows.)

By HENRY SCHOUP
United Press International

VEREENIGING, South Africa (UPI — Police opened point blank fire Monday on rioting, stone-throwing Africans, in the nearby village of Sharpville, killing at least 34 and wounding more than 60.

A high police official said he did not know how many had been killed. His comment on the stone throwing mob was: "If they do these things they must learn their lesson the hard way."

The rioting was part of a series of racial outbreaks throughout the Union of South Africa to protest laws requiring Africans to carry passes at all times. Passes are not required for whites.

The South African government sent in jet fighters and light bombers as a show of force but they did not fire on the Africans.

This correspondent counted 34 bodies, including eight women, before being ordered to leave the Sharpville area where the worst shooting occurred. The streets were littered with bodies and it was impossible to determine how many were injured.

TREATS MORE THAN 60

The Vereeniging Hospital said more than 60 persons were being treated there. There were so many casualties many had to be treated on the lawn outside. Only the most seriously wounded were admitted to the hospital.

Violence also was reported Monday in Nigeria where natives armed with bows and poison-tipped arrows clashed with police using modern firearms and tear gas grenades. The riots there were to protest new taxes. Lagos reports said several persons were killed.

The Sharpville riot was the most serious of a group of incidents in a cluster of villages about 40 miles south of Johannesburg. About 5,000 Africans protested outside police stations in Capetown but there was no violence.

Monday was the opening day of a campaign by the 31,000 member Pan-African Congress against laws dequiring Africans to carry passes giving full names, ages, occupation and other information. Many Africans went to police stations in hopes of being arrested — and to jam jails with thousands of protestors.

SEVERAL EUROPEANS INJURED

In Vanderbill Park 45 miles south of Johannesburg, several Europeans were injured in scuffles with Africans. Police used clubs, gunbutts and tear gas to disperse one mob but a second formed and drove nine whites to the security of a magistrates court. One African was killed, industry was halted.

In Orlando, on the outskirts of Johannesburg, Pan-African President Mangaliso Sobukwe and his entire Secretariat presented themselves and asked to be arrested with 50 followers. Police refused.

At Bophelong, where some firing was reported, whites were heard to blame the episodes on British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan who had warned the South African Parliament of rising tides of nation-

Mus. 3-22-60

At Sharpville the fighting broke out around 1 p. m., when the Africans surrounded the police station. Police opened fire.

SURROUND STATION

"It all started when hordes of natives surrounded the police station," Col. Piernaar, the officer in charge, told UPI. "My car was struck by a stone. If they do these things they must learn their lesson the hard way."

The air was filled with the cries of women who had found their menfolk among the dead. Ambulances carried away both dead and dying while natives roamed the area seeking lost friends and relatives.

An African Salvation Army officer burst into tears and sobbed, "it's my brother" as he stumbled over one body.

After the shooting, heavily armed police moved cautiously among the crowd looking for weapons. A constable spotted a hatchet in the hand of an African standing next to this correspondent.

"For your own sake, leave this place," he told me. "It's very dangerous."

Africans among the crowd milling around the corpses said the shooting was unprovoked.

"They came here to kill us and that's what they did," one said.

'Republic' Campaign Divides South Africa

Christian Science Monitor

Boston, Mass.

Mar. 7, 1960

By Stanley Uys
Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Cape Town

The republican campaign which the Nationalist government has just launched threatens to be the most emotional and bitter campaign experienced since the Union of South Africa was founded 50 years ago.

The campaign will culminate in a referendum, probably during October, at which the white electorate will be asked to vote for or against a republic. None of the country's 12,000,000 non-whites is being allowed to take part in the referendum.

About 1,800,000 whites will be entitled to vote in the referendum. About 50 per cent of them are Africans—speaking supporters of Dr. Hendrik F. Verwoerd's government, and they will all vote republican. The other 50 per cent, or possibly a little less, are supporters of the various opposition parties, and the majority of them will vote anti-republican.

These are facts which neither side challenges. Dr. Verwoerd, however, has expressed the hope that a sufficient number of opposition supporters will vote in favor of a republic to give the government an adequate majority.

Views Expressed

He believes that, while opposition supporters are opposed to his racial policies, a considerable number of them are not opposed to a republic.

Dr. Verwoerd has presented the republican issue as the peak of the Nationalist Party's republican struggle over the years, and he has declared that if this issue can be removed from the political arena (by giving the government the majority it needs), white South Africans will be able to achieve the unity which has eluded them for so many years.

While it is true that English-speaking South Africans, who comprise nearly 40 per cent of the white population, are not as ardently promonarchist as they used to be, it is too early to say whether they are prepared to vote for Dr. Verwoerd's republic.

The outcome of the referendum, therefore, is genuinely uncertain. Even Dr. Verwoerd seems a little uncertain of the result, because he has said that he will regard a majority even of one as sufficient to establish a republic. This, incidentally, contradicts assurances given by previous Nationalist Prime Ministers, namely, Dr. Malan and Mr. Strijdom, that a republic would be established only if there was an "adequate" majority and if it was clearly based on the "broad will of the people."

The political party leaders have flatly rejected Dr. Verwoerd's appeal for support for the referendum in order to achieve "unity." They point out that, in the 12 years in which it has been in power, the Nationalist government has pursued policies deliberately designed to divide the people.

Some of Dr. Verwoerd's more outspoken critics declare that he wants a republic simply to establish a totalitarian state and force the whole white electorate to support his race policies.

Campaign Speeds Up

Now that the Parliamentary session has ended and Members of Parliament have had an opportunity to catch their breath, the republican campaign is suddenly being thrown into top gear. The Nationalist Party has announced that, for the first time since 1945, it will hold a national congress to prepare for the republic. The Nationalist Party is a federal party, and it has held only six national congresses in its history.

An intensive propaganda campaign has also been launched to build up Dr. Verwoerd. Opposition newspapers declare that the purpose of the campaign is to "glorify" or "deify" Dr. Verwoerd and so promote the republican campaign.

Films showing the attempt made to assassinate Dr. Verwoerd are being screened at republican rallies in the Transvaal. Dr. Verwoerd is being presented as the "man of destiny" who was spared by Providence that he might fulfil the "great tasks" which lie ahead.

Assassination Attempt

In broadcast speeches, Dr. Verwoerd has stated that he believes he was spared by Providence. Other prominent Nationalists have described the assassination failure—two shots were fired at point-blank range—as a "miracle."

Dr. Verwoerd was shown the film of the assassination attempt while he was still in the hospital.

United Press International

Hendrick F. Verwoerd

In search of a "republic"

Nationalist supporters are being told: "Our republican struggle cannot fail with a man like Dr. Verwoerd at its head. He is infallible."

Dr. Verwoerd is due to address a big republican rally on July 2 in the Transvaal. It is expected that he will announce the date of the referendum at the rally.

A political commentator on the staff of a Nationalist newspaper in Cape Town, asserting that a "miracle" saved Dr. Verwoerd, wrote: "And from that moment on there was a new quality to his leadership that had not been there before. It is something mystical."

Meanwhile, the administrator of the Cape Province, J. N. Malan, has appealed for contributions to an "H. F. Verwoerd Prize Fund," which was set up to "express gratitude to the Almighty that the Prime Minister escaped death in such a miraculous manner."

But if government supporters are being nourished with this kind of highly emotional propaganda, so are opposition supporters. One prominent opposition leader has made a speech which an opposition newspaper has described as a threat of rebellion.

The opposition leader is Douglas Mitchell, M.P., chairman of the United Party (the main antigovernment party) in Natal. Natal is predominantly English speaking and is certain to vote against the republic by a large majority.

Mr. Mitchell hinted that Natal might not accept the outcome of the national referendum if it disclosed a majority for a republic. What precisely Mr. Mitchell meant is not known. Natal is one of the four provinces of the Union and cannot take unilateral action—unless, of course, it secedes from the Union.

INTEGRATION TO STOP

Negro Colleges in Africa

PORT ELIZABETH, South Africa (AP) — A new phase in South African education starts this year as the government opens three state-controlled colleges for Negroes.

This means the end of independent higher education for nonwhites and the end of integrated education. From now on nonwhites will be barred from the two universities — Witwatersrand in Johannesburg and the University of Cape Town — which had previously accepted them.

The government will allow only Negroes in the three new colleges — at Alice in Cape Province, Ngoya in Natal, and Turfloop in the Transvaal. A separate college for Eurafricans, or mulattoes, will be opened in Cape Town later.

African students will be sent to the college which caters to their ethnic or tribal grouping. The effect is not only to segregate whites from nonwhites but also to separate the various nonwhite groups.

The end of independent education was most strikingly marked with the transfer to the government of the University College of Fort Hare at Alice, 150 miles north of Port Elizabeth. It was established 40 years ago and had graduated hundreds of Negro students from all parts of the continent. Its academic reputation was outstanding.

The principal, Raymond Burrows, was told he would not be retained. The government followed this by firing 11 members of the staff. Fourteen other members resigned in protest. Of 28 members of the college senate, only 9 will remain under the new regime.

Trial to Resume In South Africa

The Washington Post

Washington, D.C.

PRETORIA, South Africa, Jan. 17—South Africa's marathon treason trial resumes Monday after a two-month adjournment.

Thirty defendants — two of them whites and the rest Africans, Indians and "coloreds" of mixed ancestry—are starting their fourth year as targets of charges that they conspired to overthrow the government by violence.

In addition to the 30 now on trial, 61 others are awaiting trial.

With the special court sitting here adjourned late in November, a South African newspaper calculated the defendants had sat through more than a thousand hours of court proceedings, had heard more than 4.5 million words spoken in argument and evidence, . . . had heard more than 300 witnesses and had seen about 10,000 documents handed in."

When he was Justice Minister last May, Governor General C. R. Swart declared: "The trial will be proceeded with, no matter how many millions it may cost. That does not affect the issue. What does it matter how long it takes?"

Cost is Heavy

The cost to the defendants has been heavy. Best-selling South African novelist Alan Paton is a trustee of a Treason Trial Defense Fund that thus far has spent about 100,000 pounds ($280,000) in funds raised here and abroad. The fund estimates 40,000 pounds ($112,000) will be needed this year.

The story of the case first hit the headlines in December, 1956, when 156 persons of all races were arrested throughout the country.

After a year-long preparatory examination, 65 persons were discharged. The remaining 91 were charged with high treason and two alternative charges under the Suppression of Communism Act.

Trial Began in 1958

The first trial began Aug. 1, 1958, and that October the prosecution withdrew the originial indictment following lengthy argument on its validity. The defendants then were divided into groups numbering 30 and 61.

The 30 appeared before the court Jan. 19, 1959, to face a new, shorter indictment which put greater emphasis on the element of violence in their alleged treason and contained no alternative charges.

Part of this indictment was appealed and the trial adjourned until March 3. The appeals court then ruled it could not hear an appeal before the trial ended. The trial of the 30 resumed Aug. 30.

On April 20 last year the 61-defendant group went on trial divided into two sections. The court found the indictments were inadequate and threw them out.

Since then the 61 have been awaiting new charges against them.

Tragedy in South Africa

The New York Times

The mine disaster at Coalbrook, near Sasolburg in the Union of South Africa, may prove to be one of the world's worst. While there is still the faintest hope, all efforts—and all interest—must concentrate on the entombed men. South Africans are courageous, inventive and tireless under pressure. The authorities and the local community can be counted on to do everything possible to save any or all of more than 350 trapped men.

But whether they succeed or not, the tragedy has a political aspect that cannot be ignored. Not more than six of the missing miners are white. The mining economy of the Union is based on black African labor. Afrikaner officials in Pretoria argue that such labor is better paid and cared for than it would be elsewhere in the continent. They cite the traditional (but government-arranged) migration of Africans from Portuguese Mozambique to the Transvaal mines; they tell how the men go home proudly, laden with bicycles and other symbols of material wealth.

But the fact remains that the African in South Africa is not paid the "rate for the job"—that is, what a white man would receive for doing the same work. His life is one twist of segregation after another. And—in the very nature of the social structure—when there is a cave-in at a mine, the vast majority of victims are Africans.

There is no suggestion that carelessness or exploitation caused the Coalbrook collapse. But at a time of exacerbated racial feelings in the Union, the disaster is bound to serve as a glaring searchlight, showing up the murky and foreboding atmosphere of apartheid.

MODERN HOSPITAL SERVES AFRICANS

The New York Times

Racial Teamwork Is Shown by Staff of Institution on Johannesburg Outskirts

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa, Jan. 11—In the early hours of a recent morning two surgeons, one white and the other Asian, worked with the assistance of African nurses to save the life of an African laborer.

This example of racial interracial teamwork in South Africa, which observes racial segregation as a basic policy, took place in an operating room at the Baragwanath Non-White Hospital. The example is repeated many times a day in the large institution seven miles from the center of Johannesburg.

Although the hospital is directed by white South Africans and has Europeans, Asians and Africans on its staff, it is primarily a hospital for Africans. Its 2,000 beds are nearly always all occupied and more than 1,500 out-patients are treated daily.

Hospital Has 48 Wards

Since it was established twelve years ago on the rolling veld, the Baragwanath hospital has grown to its present forty-eight wards housed in a cluster of brick buildings. In the next eighteen months 500 more beds are expected to be added.

Of its 200 staff doctors more than half are fully registered specialists and others are being trained as specialists. The staff includes eight Asian doctors and six African doctors.

When strict racial segregation is imposed in South Africa's universities in the next few years in accordance with announced Government policy, the Baragwanath hospital will become the major medical school in the country for African doctors. It also has a nursing school, with 650 African nurses now in training.

Miss Wendy Peterson, head of the nursing school, said her African students "have a great desire to learn and they apply themselves." The results of their examinations, she said, were "good and compare favorably with results throughout South Africa."

Research Carried On

In addition to providing specialist services for the more than 4,000,000 Africans who live in Transvaal Province, and general hospital services for more than 600,000 Africans in Johannesburg, the hospital has made contributions to medical knowledge. More than 200 articles have been published by its doctors on new medical information.

Some of the most important contributions have been in the field of heart disease. One such study enabled doctors at the hospital to fix nutritional deficiencies as the cause of certain heart afflictions. At present, the absence of coronary heart disease in Africans is being studied at Baragwanath under a $140,000 grant from the United States Public Health Service.

Latest Equipment Used

The hospital employs the latest equipment and techniques. One example which has reduced post-operative deaths is the recovery room that is adjacent to the nine operating rooms. Patients who have undergone surgery remain there until they have recovered consciousness and can be safely taken to the wards.

The hospital operates on a budget of $5,600,000 a year provided by the Transvaal Provincial Administration, largely from tax revenue. All services to patients are free.

The hospital was named for a Johannesburg pioneer who once owned the land on which it is situated. Facilities similar to those provided for Africans at Baragwanath are available to whites at Johannesburg General Hospital, only a few minutes drive from the center of the city.

Rejects Racial Superiority

British Prime Minister Attacks Racial Policy Of South Africa

Atlanta Daily News Atlanta, Ga.

Thurs. 2-4-60, 1,8a

CAPETOWN, South Africa (UPI)—British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan delivered a stinging attack against segregation Tuesday before the race-conscious South African Parliament.

In a table - pounding speech before a joint parliamentary session, Macmillan said bluntly that Britain rejected any idea of racial superiority. He said some aspects of South Africa's "policies" made it impossible for Britain to support the Commonwealth country.

Macmillan is winding up a 17,000-mile swing through Africa that has alternately rought him brickbacks and cheers from Africans.

REAFFIRMS SUPPORT

The Prime Minister told Parliament Britain realized South Africa's problem in having a large mixed population and reaffirmed his government's intent to give the country its "support and encouragement."

"But I hope you won't mind my saying frankly that there are some aspects of your policies which make it impossible for us to do this without being false to our own deep convictions and about political destinies of free men," Macmillan added.

He explained that South Africa's racial segregation conflicted with a freedom policy that Britain was trying to extend into all its African colonies.

ASKS UNDERSTANDING

He said the strength of the British Commonwealth lay largely in the fact that it was a free association of independent sovereign states, each responsible for ordering its own affairs but cooperating in pursuit of common aims and purposes in world affairs.

Macmillan, pounding the table for emphasis, said he hoped that in another 50 years "we shall look back on the differences between us as matters of historical interest."

South African Prime Minister Hendrix Verwoerd replied:

"Our ways may be diffeernt but let's try to understand each other. You wish to be our friend. We wish to be youngs.

"I hope you in Britain will have less problems than we have here."

'COLOREDS' UPSET IN SOUTH AFRICA

The New York Times

Persons of Mixed Blood Are Feeling Impact of Laws on Racial Separation

New York

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, Jan. 23—Dr. Richard Ernest van de Ross is a descendant of European and African ancestry. In South Africa he and other persons of similar ancestry are known as "coloreds."

As a product of European settlement, they have enjoyed a special position for many years and have been treated in some respects as near equals by the country's dominant white minority. But now the governing Nationalist party has begun to apply its racial separation laws more strictly against them.

There 1,000,400 persons of mixed blood in South Africa. Most dwell in Cape Province and 280,000 live in Capetown. Dr. van de Ross, who received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in education at apetown University in 1952, is a leader of the community. He told in an interview of his people's plight.

What has caused the greatest concern among the persons of mixed blood is the application of the Group Areas Act. Under this law white, colorebs, Asians and Africans must live in separate areas specified by the Government.

In Capetown many coloreds have lived harmoniously with whites for years.

"Now we have been given a scare and told we better get out," Dr. van de Ross said.

New Home for 13 Years

In his own case the 38-year-old teacher will be forced to give up the modest six-room house he and his family occupied for thirteen years. He has a wife and a son and daughter.

"We try to be optimistic," he said, "but we see it getting worse, and it engenders a great feeling of despair."

In the Sea Point area, where families of mixed blood have lived among whites for a hundred years, the prospect of losing their homes has led two fathers to commit suicide, Dr. van de Ross said.

"We will lose our homes, at great financial loss, to the whites who will take them, and we will be driven to areas that are worse than the ones we live in," he declared.

In the economy of this part of South Africa the coloreds are the artisans, waiters, domestics and laborers on the farms and in the vineyards. In some cases they do work equivalent to that done by whites, but their pay ranges from 30 to 60 per cent less than that for whites. Some in vineyards receive as little as the equivalent of $8.40 a month, plus generous amounts of wine to drink and shacks to live in.

In a recent study of 506 poor families of mixed blood, the Teachers Educational and Professional Association, a colored organization, found that the average amount of money they had available for food each month was $3.

Many Live in Slums

The community is concerned also because segregated schools available to their children are overcrowded. In some rural areas the children must walk thirteen miles a day. However, increased governmental expenditures on schools are expected to make it possible to have compulsory elementary education for colored children in Capetown by next year.

About 12,000 families of mixed blood live in Capetown in overcrowded or slum conditions.

Rescue Work Is Delayed in African Mine

New York Times

Conditions Worsen; Fast Drill En Route

COALBROOK, South Africa, Jan. 23 (AP)—Rescue teams tonight were withdrawn from the mine here in which 440 coal miners have been trapped for two days by massive rock slides.

Mine officials said the action was taken because conditions under ground had deteriorated. This was not explained immediately. Rescue workers previously had reported that new sides, gas pockets and rising water levels in the tunnels were threatening rescue operations.

A statement by the chairman and board of directors of the Clydesdale colliery said the rescue teams will "remain at the mine property pending results of further underground inspection."

Drill En Route

A high-speed drill was being rushed here to sink an air and food shaft to the entombed miners. Some air already was getting through to the 434 African and six white miners, raising hope of survival at least any who escaped the crush of rocks 600 feet down in the Clydesdale north colliery.

Not since the roof caved in Thursday has there been communication with the entombed men. The rockfall snapped a communications pipe. However, the main fan was put back into operation yesterday and made a marked improvement in the mine's ventilation, the mine directors said.

Since it may take days to reach the trapped miners, mine officials were putting their main reliance for quick relief for the men on the drilling rig, ordered from the Northern Transvaal. The rig, with a thirteen-inch bore, is the fastest drilling machine in South Africa.

Mine officials plan to bore a hole from the surface to the passageway where the men are believed to be. This would improve ventilation and establish communication with the miners.

30 Ponies Saved

Hope rose this morning with the rescue of thirty pit ponies trapped between the first rockfall that entombed the miners and a second rockfall yesterday. The ponies were in an area where deadly coal gas was believed to be concentrated. Rescuers believe that if the ponies could live in that section then there is hope for the men. Forty-five more ponies were caught in the section where the miners were trapped.

Rescuers believe the miners could survive on horse meat and seeping water if necessary.

Governor Seeks Friendship With Rest of Continent—Foes Assail Government

New York

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

CAPETOWN, South Africa, Jan. 15 — South Africa's new Governor General said today that his country wanted friendly relations with the rest of Africa.

The Governor, Charles R. Swart, who formerly was Minister of Justice, said at the opening session of Parliament, "It is the declared aim of the Government to promote a policy of friendship and of cooperation in regard to matters of common concern with all the states and territories in Africa."

Mr. Swart was installed Tuesday as the representative of Queen Elizabeth II in this British Commonwealth country. He succeeded the late Ernest G. Jansen.

Immediately after his speech to a joint meeting of the House of Assembly and the Senate, opponents of the Government of Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd outlined a series of resolutions in the House expressing dissatisfaction with the Administration. They assailed particularly the Government's racial policies.

Macmillan Visit Awaited

Governor Swart noted that Prime Minister Macmillan and his wife would be visiting South Africa later this month.

"They can be assured of a very hearty welcome," he said.

He added that "their stay in the Union's legislative capital will provide a valuable opportunity for discussions of matters of common concern."

The Governor indicated some of the major legislation that the Government intended to introduce in the new parliamentary session.

The governing Nationalist party seeks to put education under strong central control and to stress Afrikaans as the language of instruction. That language, derived from old Dutch, is spoken by most white South Africans.

Governor Swart said the Government planned to reorganize the Senate, the upper house of Parliament. Its size was increased in 1956 to enable the Nationalists to obtain sufficient votes to amend South Africa's constitution and to remove persons of mixed blood, known as coloreds, from the common voting roll.

The Nationalist party now finds itself with a surplus of Senators. The new legislation is believed to call for reducing the size of the Senate.

Censorship Bill Expected

It is understood that the Government plans to adopt legislation giving it extensive new censorship powers. These would apply to publications produced in South Africa and would enable the Government to censor all material it considered objectionable. Governor Swart did not mention this legislation.

The attack on the Government in the House of Assembly was led by members of the Progressive party. The delegation in the House is composed of twelve former members of the opposition United party who felt that its criticism of the Government was not sufficently strong.

The Progressives said that they would urge Parliament to accept "the permanent multiracial character of the South African nation and society." They want it to reject any policy designed to partition the Union between whites and Africans. The Africans make up a majority of the country's population.

The Progressives seek a new constitution safeguarding each racial community against domination by any other and giving each a share in the Government.

They were joined today by the elected white representatives for African interests in calling for the abolition of the pass system under which all Africans must carry passes endorsed by the authorities before they can move about the country.

The attack by the Progressives indicates dissatisfaction with the Government's policy among a segment of the dominant white population. However, there is little likelihood that the Government will change its policies as a result.

Hammarskjold Faces Difficult Task In Mission to Ease Segregation

New York

By THOMAS J. HAMILTON

The United Nations Security Council has entrusted to Dag Hammerskjold the most difficult task that he has faced since he began his political interventions in 1955 with his mission to Peiping. His assignment is nothing less than to induce the Union of South Africa to stop discriminating against its black and brown citizens. Since the cheap labor provided by the native Africans is the very foundation of the South African economy, the difficulties facing the Secretary General are formidable, indeed.

The directive to Mr. Hammarskjold is elastic and merely calls for him to make such arrangements, in consultation with the South African Government, "as would adequately help in upholding the purposes and principles of the Charter."

What the Security Council had in mind was Article 55 of the Charter, which pledges the United Nations to promote "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion."

The legal basis for the Security Council's action is doubtful in view of the Charter's express provision that "nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state * * *."

Since resolutions of the General Assembly are not binding on states, the fact that the Assembly approved the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948 does not alter the legal situation.

A Lost Cause

The rights set forth in the declaration would have legal force only in those states that have signed a separate international agreement pledging compliance. For a variety of reasons, including the opposition of the Eisenhower Administration, the two human rights covenants envisaged at the United Nations became a lost cause years ago.

Whatever their merits, the legal issues were disposed of by the General Assembly in 1946, when it first began protesting against racial discrimination in South Africa.

Veterans at the United Nations still recall the dramatic speech by Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, the sister of Prime Minister Nehru, in her golden sari, which persuaded the Assembly to espouse India's complaint against South Africa's discrimination against Indian residents.

This routed the forces of the late Field Marshal Jan Christiaan Smuts, one of the leading figures in the League of Nations, and the author the eloquent preamble to the Charter. Marshal Smuts promptly went back to South Africa and was never seen again at the United Nations.

The same legal issues were raised and overruled in 1952, when India and other Asian and African states placed before the Assembly their complaint against South Africa's apartheid policy, which goes beyond anything ever dreamed of by Little Rock segregationists.

Resolutions urging South Africa to stop these practices or at least to discuss them with Assembly committees, have poured from the Assembly ever since. But there has been no improvement. Some experts on Africa, in fact, believe that the resentment in South Africa against what was thought to be interference from the outside was partly responsible for the fact that racial discriminations are worse now than they were in 1946.

Nothing Accomplished

At this point the chances for the success of Mr. Hammarskjold's intervention would be small indeed, except for the very fact that the situation is so serious.

The South African Government has already suspended the enforcement of the hated laws requiring Africans to carry passes, and other concessions to the twentieth century may follow after the Security Council debate.

The New York Times

Dag Hammarskjold.

Certainly world disapproval was made clear when the Security Council approved the South African resolution 9—0, a much more overwhelming vote than those taken when the issue was in the Assembly. Although Britain and France abstained, neither tried to defend South African policy.

Mr. Hammarskjold's ability as a negotiator will be a further advantage if the South African Government decides to admit him to its territory for discussions of the problem with representatives of both the Government and the native Africans.

In that case the Secretary General, speaking as the representative of a universal organization, might be able to suggest mutually acceptable compromises that would be rejected if presented by either party.

Encouraging Record

Mr. Hammarskjold's record in the Middle East supports this hope. Although the full story has not been disclosed, it would seem that this technique brought about certain implicit understandings between Premier Ben-Gurion and President Nasser which have helped keep the existing uneasy peace.

The unanswered question is whether Mr. Hammarskjold's diplomacy will be sufficient to produce the fundamental changes in South Africa's domestic policy that will be required if the Security Council's wishes are respected, and apartheid is abolished.

When national prestige is involved, it is difficult for any government to make such concessions, as witness Mr. Hammarskjold's failure, after a year of trying, to obtain passage for Israeli cargoes through the Suez Canal.

With passions running high in South Africa, and the continuance of white supremacy apparently in danger, the Government may refuse to consider concessions. Only events will show whether the acute danger will produce a moderate or an unyielding response. But if the South African Government began leaning toward a more moderate course, the fact that the responsibility for concessions could be attributed to Mr. Hammarskjold might be the decisive factor.

Obviously the Secretary General's chances of success will be greatly improved if Britain and the United States, the two countries that are closest to the Union Government, supplement his efforts.

UNITED NATIONS REPORT

Tanganyika leader on tour of U.S.

The Afro-American
Baltimore, Md.
Sat. 6-18-60
P. 19

UNITED NATIONS — The man whom everybody concedes will be the first Prime Minister of a self-governing Tanganyika came to New York last week and discussed the question of African political progress.

He is Julius Nyerere, the leader of the 600,000 strong Tanganyika African National Union, an independence movement of that East African United Nations Trust Territory under British mandate.

Mr. Nyerere is a slightly built 124 pounder, quick and sharp in mentality. He speaks excellent English. He was educated at Tabora Government School, Makerere College in Uganda and won a master of arts degree at the University of Edinburgh (1949-1952).

He says "chaps," instead of "men" or "fellows" and otherwise exposes his "British training." He is 37 or 38 years old — no records were kept of Africans' births in those days — his father was Chief Nyerere Burito, head of the Zanaki, one of the smallest tribes. Julius was one of 26 children.

* * *

MR. NYERERE is not one to mince his words. Speaking he says, "We are absolutely certain of our success."

"Although he is in the United States as a guest of the Government, and at their invitation, he does not hesitate to say: "The United States has missed the boat in Africa."

He admits that the U.S. had to chose between "tradition and expediencey," but he says that "we did not have a positive policy" toward Africa.

He further says, that recent support in the direction "came too late."

He admits though, that in the next phase, "when we tackle our development problem," the United States could regain lost ground if willing to "look at our probem as they appear on their merit."

* * *

JULIUS NYERERE has often appeared before the Trusteeship Council of the United Nations as a spokesman for his people and the political party which he founded. He is a Roman Catholic by faith.

Once upon his return from the United Nations, his Irish priest felt that he was meddling in politics to the detriment of a promising future and advised:

"Julius, politics and teaching don't go together. My sincere advice to you is to continue your vocation as a teacher and to leave politics to others."

With that advice, he walked home slowly. The next morning he told his young bride and his mother to pack their belongings and be ready to leave for his late father's country on the shores of Lake Victoria.

Then he handed his resignation to the headmaster, giving up to become prophet of African unity in a country equal in size to France and Germany combined.

* * *

TODAY HE is the leader of the elected members in Tan- Legislative Council. He still retains the presidency of the Tanganyika African National Union.

Mr. Nyere held a press conference at African-American Institute.

He is on a five-week tour of the United States. Since he has been here, he has had audiences with Secretary of State Christian A. Herter and Joseph C. Satterthwaite, assistant-secretary for African Affairs.

NOT EXACTLY A MUD HUT—Proof that most Americans need to be brought up to date about Africa is this block of luxury apartments overlooking the Indian Ocean at Dares Salaam, Tanganyika. There is no segregation in building which houses Africans, Asians and white persons. Unlike South Africa, Tanganyika due for independence this year, has no racial problems.

Tanganyika Takes Step Toward Independence

The Christian Science Monitor
Boston, Mass.

By Reuters

Dar es Salaam, Tanganyika

This British trusteeship territory has taken a giant step toward eventual independence. Julius Nyerere was sworn in Sept. 3 as the territory's first African Chief Minister.

The British-educated Mr. Nyerere declared in a broadcast that his aim was self-government for the central African territory next year.

Mr. Nyerere, whose party won 70 of the 71 legislative Assembly seats in recent elections, and 10 of his ministers, were sworn in by Governor Sir Richard Turnbull.

The new Chief Minister is a son of Chief Nyerere Burito of the Zanaki, one of Tanganyika's smallest tribes.

A teacher turned politician, and a fluent, forceful speaker in both English and Swahili, he was educated from the age of 12 at the native school at Musoma and later at the Roman Catholic Mission school at Tabora.

He took a teaching diploma at Makerrere College, Uganda, in 1945, and studied at Edinburgh University from 1949 to 1952 where he obtained a master of arts degree.

Mr. Nyerere has won a reputation for sound and balanced political leadership. He has said that he would like to see Tanganyika remain within the British Commonwealth, and that the "one man, one vote" principle did not mean that the African majority would "ship the Europeans out of the country."

He also has said that new nationalist governments in Africa must be essentially socialist, but has denied that his party wishes to "nationalize everything."

TANGANYIKA TOWN STUDY IN POVERTY

The N. Y. Times

Most of Bagamoyo's 5,500 Folk Live in Mud Huts—Life Centers at Market

New York

By LEONARD INGALLS

Special to The New York Times.

BAGAMOYO, Tanganyika, Aug. 30—This town of 5,500 people lies thirty-six miles along a sandy road north of Dar es Salaam on the Tanganyika coast.

Life here is much like that in all the other villages and towns of Tanganyika away from the capital, Dar es Salaam. The most striking aspect of the place is poverty.

Most of the people dress shabbily, suffer from periodic disease and never seem to have enough of the right food. The Africans who make up the bulk of Tanganyika's population nearly all live in houses made of mud and sticks, with roofs of grass.

Life in Bagamoyo, as in other villages and towns, centers at the market place. Here the Africans sell their vegetables and firewood and the fish that are caught daily in the Indian Ocean from outrigger sailboats dug out of tree trunks.

Shops Line Main Street

Small dark shops line the narrow main street. Most are owned by Asians who offer a general line of goods as well as such services as tailoring. In front of most of the Asian shops sits an African at a sewing machine turning out the garments at piecework rates.

But a few shops are African-operated. One is a bicycle repair shop. Pembeji Idi, a tall, well-built African who looks younger than his 35 years, conducts the business with two partners. He has lived all his life in Bagamoyo.

Business is not brisk and Mr. Idi said "current expenses" are a problem. Some months he and his partners have only about $3 profit to share. Because there is nothing else to do, Mr. Idi and his partners think they will stay in the bicycle repair business.

Speaking of the passage of the days he said: "Once we leave here we go home and have a bath and tea and think what is to be done for tomorrow."

Mtoro Mtubwi, four years younger than his neighbor, Mr. Idi, is somewhat better off. As market master he earns $8.40 a month for seeing that those who trade there observe the rules. On this he suports a wife and child.

Asked what pleasures there are in Bagamoyo, the market master replied: "Dances, sometimes once a week, sometimes once a month, according to arrangements."

One of the 200 Asians in Bagamoyo is Rahim Karim, 57, who has a wife and six children. They live with him at the back of his dry goods shop. He complained that busines was slow and told a little sadly of the routine of his life.

"As soon as we close shop we go to the sea beach and when we return we go to the mosque and pray and then we return to the shop," he said.

The most attractive part of Bagamoyo is the beach of white coral sand between the groves of coconut palms and the sea. There is the atmosphere of a tropical paradise, but it was not always so.

Some of the 5,000 Africans in Bagamoyo can remember when the tiny port was a slave-trading center. The sale of slaves to be sent to Arabia ended in Bagamoyo in 1902. A great baobab tree at the present market place is known as "the slave tree" and the story is that many Africans were sold into slavery under this tree.

Freedom Is Tanganyika Goal

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

By ALICE A. DUNNIGAN

WASHINGTON (ANP) — Independence is the chief goal toward which Tanganyika is striving said Julius K. Nyere, a nationalist leader of that central African nation.

The next step will be the economic development of the country. They will then need economic aid but they are not willing to accept any foreign aid that would threaten their freedom.

Nyere, who will likely be candidate for Prime Minister when the British-ruled U. N. trusteeship territory gains self-government said he felt the United States was "dragging its heels" in the United Nations.

He foresees that Tanganyika will win its independence within the next five years.

THE 37-YEAR-OLD leader said he thought the United States, the most powerfull ex-colonial country in the world, should take a "definite, positive position" for Africa's freedom.

It should adopt a policy of giving whatever aid it can without regard to its NATO allies or Communist threats.

Nyere brushed off the old contention made by the colonial powers that many African countries are not yet ready for self-government.

"That old idea might make sense to the capitols of the colonial powers, or even to the United States," he said, "but it doesn't make sense to us."

"Every country has a rght to govern itself," he continued. "If we fumble, we are fumbling with our own affairs. We are not fumbling with other people's affairs. As it is now, other people are fumbling with our affairs.

"You can't keep down people on the grounds that they are not ready for self-government," he emphasized. "And who gives those self-appointed judges the authority to determine who is ready?"

The 'Key' to Tanganyika

The New York Times

Julius Kambarage Nyerere

New York

THE most influential man in Tanganyika is slight, mild and boyish. He is Julius Kambarage Nyerere, who weighs 124 pounds and stands 5 feet 6½ inches tall. Mr. Nyerere, who was here for a news conference and speech yesterday, has a Chaplinesque mustache and a quiet manner.

Man in the News

There is the first dusting of gray hair just below his temples; but his smile and his sense of humor bespeak a deep-seated youthfulness. Mr. Nyerere is 37 or 38 years old. He is reasonably sure the year of his birth was 1922 or 1923, but he has no idea of the date. That is because he was one of twenty-six children, born to one of the several wives of Chief Nyerere (pronounced NY-a-REH-ray) Burito. The chief headed the Zanaki, one of the territory's smallest tribes. It kept no records.

Mr. Nyerere attended the University of Edinburgh in 1949-52. He returned to Tanganyika a Master of Arts.

Reorganized Association

In his homeland, he renewed ties with the Tanganyika African Association, formed in 1929 as a social organization. He was chosen its president in 1953, and determined that it should be reoriented along political lines.

In July, 1954, a new constitution was drafted and it became the Tanganyika African National Union. Under Mr. Nyerere it swept elections and his sharp rise began.

Mr. Nyerere has also been chosen to head the Tanganyika Elected Members Organization. This is in effect the permanent, multi-racial Opposition; and it has been remarked, somewhat facetiously, that Mr. Nyerere has less trouble keeping it solidly behind him than the T. A. N. U., with its exclusively African membership of 800,000.

Dominates the Scene

Mr. Nyerere dominates the scene in Dar es Salaam, the capital of the territory. One Briton called him the "key to everything" in Tanganyika; another said he was "fifty years ahead" of anyone else in the African nationalist movement. His repute outside his own country was underlined by his election to head the Pan-African Freedom Movement of East and Central Africa.

Camera Press-Pix

'All Africa is impatient'

Mr. Nyerere knows he cannot get everything he wants in the time he would like. But he says, "All Africa is impatient; time is important."

And he continually cites the United States, in what seems like a negative way, to make a positive point. He says if Africans were "annoyed" by Little Rock, then by pursuing logic to its natural conclusion, they could never abide discrimination against people of any race in their own country.

Goal Is Independence

An independent Tanganyika, within democratic multi-racial lines, is Nyerere's goal. Last Dec. 15, the announcement by the Governor, Sir Richard Turnbull, that the territory would receive internal self-government during 1960, was received with rejoicing. And few doubt that when the ultimate step to independence is achieved, the first Prime Minister of the new state will be Julius Nyerere.

A chain smoker, Nyerere also likes to sip gin and tonic and remark that he has "all the vices." Actually, he is a tireless worker with no time for hobbies. He leaves home at 9:30 A. M. and usually returns about 11:30 P. M.

On informal occasions, he will go coatless and tieless, a gold-tipped fountain pen in his shirt pocket, a square signet ring on one finger, and an ivory-tipped cane under his arm.

He and his wife, Maria, have five children.

Party Chief Says Here That 5 Years Is 'Longest Period' Territory Must Wait

New York Thurs. 2-11-60

By MILTON BRACKER

Julius Nyerere, who is expected to be the first Prime Minister of Tanganyika, predicted here yesterday that his territory would attain full independence by 1965.

"No date has been set," he told a questioner, "but the longest period you can give is five years."

A general election is scheduled for September, when Tanganyikans will gain internal self-government under constitutional changes announced last December.

Mr. Nyerere held a news conference yesterday morning and made a speech last night. He arrived on a State Department grant Jan. 30 and returned here last Tuesday after a visit to Washington. He will return here again March 5 after a trip to the Pacific Coast.

Trust Territory Since '46

Tanganyika, a former German colony, has been a trust territory of the United Nations since 1946. It has a long shoreline on the Indian Ocean between the British colony and protectorate of Kenya, and the Portuguese province of Mozambique.

The population includes about 9,000,000 Africans and fewer than 30,000 Europeans. The majority of the Europeans are civil servants. White settlers number only a few thousand members of individual farm families; and there is no reserved land as in the "white highlands" of Kenya.

The news conference was held at the African-American Institute, 345 East Forty-sixth Street. Mr. Nyerere answered every question incisively.

In Washington, Mr. Nyerere saw Secretary of State Christian A. Herter and Joseph C. Satterthwaite, assistant-secretary for African Affairs. Asked what they had discussed, the Tanganyikan replied, "Not United States policy." After a laugh, he added, "I talked about my own problems."

However, Mr. Nyerere was outspoken yesterday on United States policy. He felt that in the past it involved some "fumbling." He also held that since Africans were already winning the political battle," the United States could be considered to have "missed the boat" with regard to the freedom movement. However, he said the United States could still catch "the economic and development boat."

Diplomacy of Rivalry

With regard to Premier Khrushchev's proposed visit to the West African state of Guinea, Mr. Nyerere said, "this is going to be one of our problems on the African continent—this diplomacy of rivalry."

Mr. Nyerere, leader of the Tanganyika National Union, was questioned on the tendency of new African states to develop one-party regimes.

"Let me say one should not be surprised to see that first governments will be largely one-party governments," he said.

He said this was because the dominant party was invariably a projection of a "patriotic" movement that had successfully concentrated on the unopposed issue of freedom.

But he insisted that it was a "mistake to assume that one-party rule was necessaritly undemocratic." He called the "freedom to shout" all-important.

"Democracy is essentially government by discussion," Mr. Nyerere said, "and nobody can teach Africans to discuss."

At night, Mr. Nyerere addressed a scholarship benefit meeting for Tanganyika at the Hotel Biltmore.

'Tanganyika Races Unite on Freedom'

By GEORGE S. SCHUYLER

NEW YORK — Julius Nyere, head of the Tanganyika African National Union, told the New York press last week that he was hopeful of a successful multi-racial state in his country (now a United Nations Trusteeship administered by Great Britain) because the 20,000 whites and 72,000 Asians in the six million population regarded themselves as Tanganyikas, not aliens.

The 37-year-old, slightly built leader, a guest of the U. S. State Department, spoke at a crowded press seminar at the headquarters of the African-American Institute at 345 East 46th St.

He said that the white and Asian groups were agreed that the African majority should take over the government after the September elections, and were ready to work as a team. They would, he said, show that democracy could work.

There will be a new constitution after the election, with more liberal basis of suffrage.

■

THIS YEAR saw the first elected government: 12 ministers, five elected. Of the latter, he pointed out, three are Africans, one European and one Asian.

While the country will remain a U. N. Trust Territory, the target date for independence is about 1965. There was, he insisted, no white settler problem with areas set aside for them, but simply holdings on the basis of individual ownership open to all.

White settlers number only 3,000.

■

THE AFRICAN leader sees the next problem in Tanganyika as economic development in which he hopes the United States will help, although charging that it has "missed the boat" previously in its African policy.

In this connection he did not explain how the U. S. A. could by-pass the colonial powers and aid the colonies directly, just as other African leaders have failed to do when accusing this country of "fumbling."

He asserted that of the 4,000 civil servants in his country, there are only 300 Africans, in pointing the need for education and training.

A university is projected for 1963.

Text of Commonwealth Conference Communique

The New York

LONDON, May 18 (Reuters)—Following is the text of a communique issued at the end of the British Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Conference here today:

The meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers ended today. Pakistan was represented by its President. The United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, India, Ghana, the Federation of Malaya and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland were represented by their Prime Ministers. South Africa was represented by the Minister of External Affairs and by the Minister of Justice.

This was the tenth of these meetings to have been held since the war, the first taking place at a time of great significance to the Commonwealth and the world.

The continuing growth of the membership of the Commonwealth was marked by the attendance at this meeting of the Prime Minister of the Federation of Malaya, which achieved independence in August, 1957. The representatives of the other Commonwealth countries welcomed the presence of the Federation at the conference.

The Commonwealth is an association of independent sovereign states, each responsible for its own policies: but the primary objective of all is world peace and security. It is their declared purpose to do everything in their power to achieve that objective, and to continue to cooperate to that end with all the peace-loving nations of the world.

In this spirit the Commonwealth ministers have reviewed the major international problems of the day, on the eve of the impending summit conference, which is to be attended by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. They expressed their sincere hopes for a successful outcome of that conference as a further step in the relaxation of international tension.

They discussed, in particular, the problem of disarmament and they welcomed the progress made at the Geneva conference on the discontinuance of nuclear weapons tests.

Hope for Summit Voiced

They hoped that, on the basis of the preliminary work already done, the summit conference would be able to make some significant progress toward an eventual settlement, under international control, of the problem of disarmament. An advance toward a solution of that problem, linked with a progressive lessening of political tensions, would afford a firm basis for strengthening confidence between nations and promoting world security.

The Commonwealth ministers also discussed the problems of Africa, the Middle East, the Far East and Southeast Asia. They recognized that economic and social progress are essential for political stability. They welcomed the continuing contribution which mutual assistance under the Colombo Plan affords throughout Southeast Asia to these aims: and they agreed that there and elsewhere throughout the less developed areas of the world the best hope of peace, stability and political freedom lies in practical international cooperation of this kind.

The ministers reviewed the world economic situation. They noted that, while in general the outlook was favorable, the economic expansion which had taken place since their last meeting had been greater in the industrialized countries of the Commonwealth than in the primary producing countries.

They agreed that an important condition of the prosperity of these countries was their ability to develop their export trade. They also recognized the urgent need to maintain and, where possible, increase the flow of economic assistance to the less developed countries. They welcomed the decision to establish an International Development Association.

European Trade Discussed

The ministers discussed European trade problems. They expressed concern at the prospect of any economic division in Europe and its possible political implications. The countries of Europe form an important market for Commonwealth exports.

The ministers expressed their hope that these countries would follow trade policies in accordance with the principles of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and thus avoid damage to the economies of the primary producing countries and those that are also developing exports of manufactured goods. In addition, European countries have an important contribution to make in assisting the economic development of the less advanced countries. The ministers hoped that these problems could be speedily and satisfactorily resolved, with due regard to the interests of countries outside Europe.

The Commonwealth ministers reviewed the economic development of Commonwealth countries in Africa which have recently attained or are approaching independence. They agreed that consideration should be given to the possibility of cooperative action among members of the Commonwealth in assisting the economic development of these countries. This possibility will be studied in the first instance by officials of Commonwealth Governments, and the Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council will examine it at its next meeting.

The ministers also reaffirmed their belief in the value of exchanges between Commonwealth countries of persons with specialized skills and experience. They agreed that further efforts should be made to foster and encourage these exchanges, whether on a regional or other basis, and that the Commonwealth Economic Consultative Council should take this question into urgent consideration.

Employers Get Plea

They trusted that employers in Commonwealth countries—whether Governments, statutory bodies or private companies—would be ready, wherever possible, to encourage members of their staffs to undertake a period of public service abroad and would do their best to insure that their prospects in their home countries would not thereby be prejudiced.

The ministers considered various questions of Constitutional development within the Commonwealth. They noted that the Federation of Nigeria would attain independence on Oct. 1. They extended to the Federation their good wishes for its future and looked forward to welcoming an independent Nigeria as a member of the Commonwealth on the completion of the necessary Constitutional processes.

The meeting was informed that in pursuance of the recent plebiscite, the Constituent Assembly in Ghana had resolved that the necessary Constitutional steps should be taken to introduce a republican form of Constitution in Ghana by July 1.

In notifying this forthcoming Constitutional change, the Prime Minister of Ghana assured the meeting of his country's desire to continue her membership of the Commonwealth and her acceptance of the Queen as the symbol of the free association of its independent member nations and as such the head of the Commonwealth.

The heads of delegations of the other member countries of the Commonwealth assured the Prime Minister of Ghana that the present relations between their countries and Ghana would remain unaffected by this Constitutional change and they declared that their Governments would accept and recognize Ghana's continued membership of the Commonwealth.

The meeting noted a statement by the South African Minister of External Affairs that the Union Government intended to hold a referendum on the subject of South Africa becoming a republic. The meeting affirmed the view that the choice between a monarchy and a republic was entirely the responsibility of the country concerned.

South Africa Issue Noted

In the event of South Africa deciding to become a republic and if the desire was subsequently expressed to remain a member of the Commonwealth, the meeting suggested that the South African Government should then ask for the consent of the other Commonwealth Governments either at a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers or if this were not practicable by correspondence.

The ministers reviewed the constitutional development of the Commonwealth, with particular reference to the future of the smaller dependent territories. They agreed that a detailed study of this subject should be made for consideration by Commonwealth Governments.

Whilst reaffirming the traditional practice that Commonwealth Conferences do not discuss the internal affairs of member countries, ministers availed themselves of Mr. Louw's presence in London to have informal discussions with him about the racial situation in South Africa. During these informal discussions, Mr. Louw gave information and answered questions on the Union's policies and the other ministers conveyed to him their views on the South African problem.

The ministers emphasized that the Commonwealth itself is a multi-racial association and expressed the need to insure good relations between all member states and peoples of the Commonwealth.

'Storm' Will Subside, African Tells Herter

New York, N.Y.

Togo's President Calls Violence Of U. N. Debate 'Just Incidents'

Mon. 9-26-60

By David Miller

President Sylvanus Olympio of Togo, ranking United Nations delegate of the new African states, dismissed yesterday the violence of last week's U. N. exchanges as "just incidents" that will have no permanent effect on the organization itself.

"We are convinced," he told Secretary of State Christian A. Herter and the delegates of eleven African states and Cyprus, "that it is only a storm which is blowing, and this storm should blow over."

His remarks were interpreted at the U. N. as casting a moderating tone on the bitter discussions that erupted between President Eisenhower and Mr. Herter on the one hand and Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev and President Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana on the other.

President Olympio's soothing words came at a luncheon given at the Waldorf Towers by Mr. Herter and James J. Wadsworth, United States Ambassador to the U. N., in honor of the U. N.'s new members.

U. S. Aid Pledged

Mr. Herter assured the delegates of "full support" from the United States in realizing their hopes of social and economic progress, but added that the U. N. was their best guaranty of continued sovereignty.

But President Olympio, who first came to the U. N. in 1947 representing Togo when it was under French trusteeship, took the initiative in responding to a toast by Mr. Herter.

"I have been present at several discussions—some of them have been even more violent than the speeches we have listened to a few days ago," he said. "But, even then, means and ways have been found and things have been straightened out.

"So I think we are fully confident that whatever is happening now in the U. N. can only be just incidents, and they have no permanent effect on the solidity of the organization itself."

Mr. Olympio praised President Eisenhower's proposal that the U. N. guarantee the territorial integrity of the new independent states and clear the way for African development.

Herter Pleased

Mr. Herter, who speaks excellent French, said later he was very pleased with the outcome of the luncheon. He said it "could not have been friendlier" and was "a very good reception."

The countries represented at the two-hour luncheon were, in addition to Togo and Cyprus, Cameroun, Central African Republic, Chad, Dahomey, Gabon, Ivory Coast, Malagasy, Niger, Somali, Upper Volta and the French Congo Republic. The Belgian Congo Republic has also been admitted to the U. N. but the delegates have not yet been accredited.

Zenon Rossides, chief delegate of Cyprus, also spoke and called for the formation of a United Nations army to guarantee peace and as a step to disarmament.

Plan Also Said to Include Togoland and Cameroon in Move Aimed at Ghana

Special to The New York Times.

LOME, Togoland, March 11—A plan to organize the French Community states in Africa and Togoland and Cameroon into a bloc was disclosed today by Togoland's Premier, Sylvanus E. Olympio.

Its key feature would be a defense pact, under which a military attack on any member of the bloc would be considered an attack on all.

The members of the proposed bloc are also planning close cooperation in other fields, Premier Olympio added in an interview.

The prime movers of the plan are the leaders of the Mali Federation, which includes Senegal and Sudan and which seeks independence by April.

The federation's Premier, Modibo Keita, recently toured French African states and discussed the idea of a bloc with various leaders.

The bloc is not envisaged as anti-British, Premier Olympio said.

The British West African colony of Nigeria, due to become independent next October, is being reasonable with its neighbors, he said.

Members of the Nigerian Federal Government are now in Niger, a member of the French Community negotiating for the free movement of goods and men across the Niger-Nigerian frontier, the Premier noted. He said the Nigerian leaders had never suggested integrating Niger into Nigeria.

Togo Premier Calls Ghana Charge Ruse To Put More in Jail

The New York Times

Special to The New York Times.

LOME, Togoland, March 17—Sylvanus E. Olympio, Premier of the United Nations trust territory of Togoland in West Africa, dismissed today Ghana's charge of plans for an armed attack as a Ghanian pretext for jailing more political opponents without trial.

Togoland, administered by France but scheduled to achieve independence April 27, is Ghana's eastern neighbor.

According to Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Togoland is about to be used as a base for an armed attack on Ghana.

Togoland has no army, Premier Olympio said in an interview, and France was never permitted to raise one there. In any case, Togoland would have enough on her hands building up her economy, the Premier added.

M. Olympio is a member of the Ewe tribe a million strong, which lives on Ghanaiau-Togoland frontier.

Prime Minister Nkrumah has charged that an armed attack was being prepared with Premier Olympio's secret support by Ewe leaders on the Ghanaian side of the border in the former territory of British Togoland, which was integrated into Ghana on her independence in 1957.

"Our brothers in former British Togoland were dead set against integration and still are," Premier Olympio said. "Occasionally rumor is spread among the Ghana Ewes that when we become indepedendent they would join us. Maybe Nkrumah thinks I support this rumor."

Asked if he did, the Premier replied: "Mind you, we on this side also object to Ghana's integration of the other half of Togoland. I warned they were going to have an Irish problem on their hands." He was alluding to the partition of Ireland.

But, he added, as the integration of British Togoland into Ghana had been sanctioned by the United Nations, "I have accepted it as a fact."

Premier Olympio agreed with Prime Minister Nkrumah that Ghanaian-Togoland frontier presented problem for the Ewes. It cuts across farms and villages and homes in some places. It prevents families on one side from attending funerals of relatives on other.

Mr. Nkrumah should have thought about this when he campaigned against Togoland unification and integrated one-half of Togoland against Ewe opposition, the Premier said.

He was asked if he considered Prime Minister Nkrumah's proposals to integrate French Togoland as well a solution to this problem.

French to Help Build Army After It Becomes Free—Threat by Ghana Noted

New York

LOME, Togo, April 7 (UPI)—Togoland will raise an army with French backing to defend its borders after receiving independence April 27, Premier Sylvanus E. Olympio said today.

Neighboring Ghana which includes the former British Togoland, has threatened to integrate Togoland as its seventh region when the country becomes independent. M. Olympio discounted the border threat but said defense was called for.

"We cannot be an independent nation without an army of some sort, although the army will not be big," he said. "We must start by replacing the French unit now stationed here."

M. Olympio made the comment in an interview after his return from eight days of talks in Paris on the problems of French withdrawal. His nation chose independence to end forty-sixe years of colonial rule.

On the threat from Ghana, he said:

"I know there has been restiveness there, but there is nothing to be alarmed about. I do not think Ghana has the means to conquer Togoland. If they tried they would eventually lose everything."

He emphasized that Togoland had no intention of invading Ghana.

Close Tie to France Planned

"I believe France is quite prepared to act as a steadying influence throughout the French Community," he said. "Later on we might pool our military resources with other members of the French African Comunity."

M. Olympio, 57-year-old graduate of the London School of Economics, has no intention of being drawn into the "cold war" despite his people's Western sympathies.

"We are too small to be involved in the East-West struggle," he said. "We should like to be left out of the battle of the giants. We have lived a long time with the West and we do not think the Russians will ask us to leave. If they did we would probaly say 'no'."

"The primary objective of our new Government will be to improve living conditions," he added. "We will not waste time on international politics. Time and money will be spent on our small economy, not sending delegations to conference tables."

M. Olympio said he hoped France would continue its assistance, but he also wants to make arrangements with other nations, including West Germany.

France, which governs Togoland as a United Nation trust territory, took over under a League of Nations mandate after Germany was deprived of the territory at the end of World War I. With independence the trusteeship will expire.

ACCRA, Ghana, April 7 (Reuters)—Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah said today that as long as an incho of African soil remained under colonial rule, "there will be strife and conflict" in Africa.

"So long as any group on this continent denies the principle of one man, one vote, and uses its power to maintain its privileges, there will be insecurity for the oppressors and constant resentment and revolt on the part of the oppressed," he declared.

Mr. Nkrumah was opening a three-day "positive action" conference for peace and security in Africa. About 300 African delegates and observers attended.

Energetic Togo Leader

Sylvanus Olympio

New York

7-25-56

PREMIER Sylvanus Olympio, a 57-year-old man of many jobs, is not one to worry about portfolio niceties. For him the thing to do is to do.

Sometimes called "Mr. Togoland," he is also Minister of Finance and Minister of Justice, and he shortly will be Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Man in the News

Yesterday he served notice that he intended to raise an army to protect Togoland after it became independent April 27. He is unusual among Premiers in that he has no civil rights in his own country.

In 1954 the French, the administrators of the United Nations trusteeship over Togoland, withdrew them for five years. But four years later, when M. Olympio's political party swept Togolese elections—although he could not run—the French were forced to call on him to form the government.

Premier Olympio expressed the belief recently that Togoland would not have to organize any kind of substantial defense force after it becomes independent. But Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah of neighboring Ghana has been talking of making Togoland a Ghanaian province.

Premier Olympio, who was once a close friend of Mr. Nkrumah, has been doing some talking of his own, in return. Described as having a "splendid command" of several languages — English, French, German, Portuguese and his native tribal Ewe—M. Olympio has put a considerable amount of opinion about Mr. Nkrumah into two words: "black imperialist."

Question of Slave Trade

Togoland's Premier, who was born in the capital, Lomé, on Sept. 6, 1902, grins when he is prodded on reports that his forebears dealt in slaves, and notes that by the time his grandfather went to West Africa from Bahia, in Brazil, slave trading was already prohibited.

Young Sylvanus was brought up as a Catholic, attending a German Catholic school as a boy. In 1914, just as he was ending his elementary studies, the Germans were forced to flee the region. He continued his studies in an English School until 1920, when Lomé was turned over to the French. His father sent him to England, where he entered London University and later received a degree in commerce from the London School of Economics.

Returning to Africa, he went into the service of the Great West African Trading Branch of the Unilever Company, and had a career most unusual for an African. After working on the Gold Coast and in Nigeria and Togoland, he became general agent for the big Unilever subsidiary, United Africa Company.

For him the thing to do is to do.

In 1942 he was interned in Northern Dahomey with others suspected of opposing the Vichy regime in France. He likes to make a comparison between his release from prison and the releas eof Togoland from French control. Political independence is not enough, he maintains, for all new nations are badly in need of aid for development. Then he recalls his own rewon freedom:

"The jailer told me, 'You are free.' But what kind of freedom was it when the jail was in the desert, hundreds of miles from my home, and there was no gasoline for the truck we were to travel in?"

In 1950 he had to transfer from his job in Africa with Unilever because of French pressure. He had made visits to the United Nations in New York in 1947 and 1948 to plead the cause of Togo independence. He went to the company's Paris office but was not happy there and resigned a year later.

He became dedicated to an all-out effort, through his Comité de l'Unité Togolaise, to win independence for his country. When his party won the 1948 elections, he declared at a victory rally: "I have always told you that no people was made by God to serve under another forever."

The Premier lives with his wife and five children in a large, well-furnished mansion near the sea at Lomé. Two or three times a week he drives out to visit his coconut plantation; on other days he works at home on business or politics. In the evenings he and his wife, Dinah, change from Western to African dress.

Togoland Head Rebuffs Ghana As 'Insulting' in Bid for Merger

Olympio Cautions Nkrumah —Both Nations Seek to Unite Border Tribe

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

LOME, Togoland, Feb. 4 — Premier Sylvanus E. Olympio rejected as "insulting" today renewed demands by Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana that Togoland become the seventh province of Ghana.

"My reaction is: Nothing doing!" cried Premier Olympio, wagging a stern finger in an interview here.

"What Nkrumah wants is territorial expansion at the expense of Togo, the Ivory Coast and Upper Volta [Voltaic Republic]. Well, he won't get it.

"I wonder if he realizes what he's doing? Doesn't he know he's surrounded by former French territories that after struggling for freedom over many years have no intention of being absorbed by Ghana?

Ghanaian Leader Cautioned

"I can tell you that regardless of who's in power in Togo, Upper Volta or the Ivory Coast, none of these will ever submit to Nkrumah. He had better assume a friendlier attitude."

This tiny West African country, which is called Togo here although known officially in the State Department and in the United Nations Trusteeship Department as Togoland, becomes independent April 27. On that day France formally relinquishes United Nations trusteeship over this former German colony. Togoland is only half as big as Ohio but looked at another way it is as large as the Netherlands and Belgium combined.

After World War I German Togoland was split between Britain and France. The British or western region in the 1956 plebiscite voted for integration with the Gold Coast colony, now Ghana.

Premier Olympio recalled today that he had fought against the plebiscite in the United Nations. He wanted to reconstitute the two trust territories into an independent nation.

He said Prime Minister Nkrumah was "having a lot of trouble with the people in former British Togoland."

Tribal Unification Urged

Both Mr. Nkrumah and Mr. Olympio contend that the industrious, intelligent Ewe (pronounced evvy) tribe split by the existing frontier should be reunited. The question is: under which flag?

[In Accra meanwhile, a Ghanaian Government spokesman insisted that Mr. Nkrumah's office was flooded with messages urging him to press for integraiton" in the interest of the Ewe people." The spokesman said this reaction followed "absurd and unrealistic statements" made in Lomé last week by Premier Olympio. "If Olympio is interested genuinely in Ewe unification," the spokesman continued, "he should accept Dr. Nkrumah's proposal for integration."]

Premier Olympio was interviewed in the plain two-story concrete building that is the headquarters of his Government. He said he had had good personal relations with Mr. Nkrumah until the Ghanaian "dropped the bombshell about our becoming the seventh region of Ghana."

"He was not very kind to make such a declaration," Premier Olympio added. "We take it as an insult. We have always believed in some sort of union with Ghana, at least a customs union so that people and goods can move freely across frontiers.

'Unitary State' Rejected

"But what we will never accept is a unitary state. We don't intend to throw away our identity. And Nkrumah in his heart knows we can't do it."

Mr. Olympio said he had a chance to explain his position to other African leaders during the inauguration of President William V. S. Tubman in Monrovia, Liberia, last month.

"Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Dahomey and Guinean leaders agreed a loose federation rather than a unitary state was what West Africa needed," the Premier said.

Mr. Olympio suggested Togoland might ask the United Nations to guarantee her frontiers. The Premier said that when Dag Hammarskjold, United Nations Secretary General, visited Togoland last month the Premier brought up the question of Mr. Nkrumah's "odd behavior."

"I told Hammarskjold it was extraordinary that one United Nations member should try to absorb another country in this way."

Despite Mr. Nkrumah's "threats," Togoland plans no sizable military establishment, Premier Olympio said.

"Nkrumah has two old minesweepers. A bit of a joke that. He could have spent the money on better things."

TOGOLAND LEADER SHOWS OPTIMISM

He Asserts New Country Will Stand on Own Feet—Sees No Need for Elections

By HOMER BIGART

Special to The New York Times.

LOME, Togoland, Feb. 4— When Togoland becomes sovereign April 27 she will be standing on her own two feet and "not asking one shilling of anybody," Premier Sylvanu E. Olympio said today.

Premier Olympio is Mr. Togoland. He is not only Premier but also Minister of Finance and Minister of Justice. When France relinquishes her United Nations trusteeship over the former German colony he will also pick up the portfolio of Foreign Affairs.

He is fiercely proud of his country and he challenged an interviewed who called it small.

"What do you mean we're small?" he said. "Maybe we're not as big as Texas but we're bigger than Israel and as big as the Netherlands and Belgium combined."

Coastal Togoland with its Palm-shaded beaches and pounding surf looks like a stage setting for the musical South Pacific.

Tribal Split an Issue

Only 1,100,000 Togolese live in the thin corridor that rolls back from a fifty-mile coast on the Guinea Gulf to the parched savannahs of Upper Volta [Voltaic Republic] more than 400 miles to the north.

Many of these people are members of he industrious Ewe tribe (pronounced evvy) that spills over into Ghana and seems destined to play an important role in the political evolution of West Africa.

Himself an Ewe, Premier Olympio is a champion of Ewe unification. He wants to unite the Togolese members of the tribe with some 200,000 Ewes that were "lost" when British Togoland merged with the Gold Coast, now Ghana, in 1955.

This brings him into conflict with Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, who would solve the Ewe problem by making Togoland a province of Ghana. Premier Olympio called this proposition insulting.

Neighbors Confer

Relations between the two men, who were once close friends, are now severely strained. Premier Olympio revealed that Togoland had had "indirect discussions" with the Ivory Coast and the Voltaic Republic on how to contain Mr. Nkrumah's expansionist tendencies.

With no army, navy or air force, Togoland would seem to be a push-over for Ghana. Lome, the nation's capital and biggest city with 70,000 people, nestles right beside the Ghanaian frontier. Prime Minister Nkrumah could take the town with one of his "builders brigades" that are establishing settlements resembling Israel's Kibbutzim along Ghana's frontiers.

Yet Premier Olympio said he was not losing any sleep over this.

Togoland is planning no expansion of her security forces, he said. He felt that the pressure of world opinion would be sufficient to inhibit any Ghanaian temptation to swallow Togoland.

Exports Exceed Imports

Turning to domestic problems, Premier Olympio said Togoland was economically viable and had a balanced budget. Last year exports exceeded imports.

The exports were reasonably varied with cocoa and coffee representing 75 per cent of their total value, followed by copra, palm products and cotton.

Premier Olympio is trying to encourage such industrialization as cotton spinning and weaving and rope making.

The country's main hope of economic betterment, however, lies in phosphates. Huge phosphate deposits exist east of Lome and only twenty miles coast. A French company is building railroad from mines to the coast.

No Elections Planned

Premier Olympio said he saw no need for elections immediately following independence. He felt that the overwhelming victory of his National Unity party in 1958 gave him a "mandate to go ahead."

Togoland operates under a 1958 statute and the Premier said he believed the country could continue under this statute. Only the veto power of the French Commissioner would have to be deleted, he said.

Two weeks ago, Antoine Meatchi, the leader of the main Opposition party was assaulted by Government supporters at Blitta, an upcountry town.

"Not an organized thing," said Premier Olympio. "Just a personal quarrel."

He said that, unlike Ghana, Togoland had no political prisoners. "The Opposition is so harmless, why persecute them?" he shrugged.

There are only thirteen Opposition candidates in the forty-six-member Chamber of Deputies.

3 UGANDA CHIEFS BEATEN TO DEATH

Tax-Protest Riots Lead to Killings—Governor Gives Police Added Powers

KAMPALA, Uganda, Jan. 19 (Reuters)—Three chiefs were reported to have been beatn to death by mobs today in the Bukedi district of eastern Uganda.

The reports said the body of a chief's wife also had been found.

The police also opened fire today on a rioting crowd in the same district of this British East African protectorate, but no casualties were reported.

Today's outbreak followed disturbances over tax assessments in the district, in Uganda's eastern province.

Sir Charles Hartwell, Acting Governor, signed an order earlier today declaring the Bukedi district a "disturbed area."

Crowds were reported to be still gathering tonight in the district where several chiefs' houses had been burned.

A team of detectives moved into the area to investigate the reported murders, arson and other incidents.

Three days ago, the police opened fire on an African crowd demonstrating against what were called unfair tax assessments near Mbale in the Bukedi district. One man died and two others were hospitalized.

Officials said the police opened fire after a chief and a British assistant district commissioner had been assaulted by the demonstrators.

Today's incidents were the latest of a series of demonstrations in the area. The Uganda Government will hold an inquiry into the system of tax assessment in the district.

The official statement declaring Bukedi a disturbed area said the police commissioner was empowered to prohibit or control the use of motor vehicles, possession of firearms and ammunition and the carrying of spears, sticks or other weapons.

The declaration also empowered the police commissioner to impose curfews and prevent persons from leaving or entering the area.

Congo Troops Battle Tribes

LEOPOLDVILLE, Belgian Congo, Jan. 19 (UPI)—Belgian-led colonial troops battled tribesmen in Kasai province today in an effort to prevent a "war of extermination" between the Lulua and Baluba tribes.

One tribesman was known to have been killed and one soldier wounded in a clash near Tshikapa. Unconfirmed reports said there had been brushes between troops and tribesmen in several other places.

Dozens of arrests were reported.

At least 111 tribesmen have been killed in less than three months of fighting between the Luluas, historic residents of the province, and the recently arrived Balubas. Each tribe has threatened to wipe out the other.

The colonial troops were pitting rifles, submachine-guns, tear gas and light armor against the spears, blowguns and ancient muzzle-loading firearms of the tribesmen.

Uganda Women Taking Interest in Politics

By Priscilla Chapman

Probably the most exciting life to be had these days is being a young couple in a young country. Mr. and Mrs. Sam Ntiro, who are here from Uganda, are exactly that.

To the gratification of New Yorkers who pride themselves on their harrowing pace of life, the Ntiros make the traditional admiring observation that every one here runs, not walks, to every exit in sight. But after a few minutes of conversation, it turns out to be sheer politeness. A day in their lives at home in Kampala makes us look as though we're dragging our feet.

There are elements New Yorkers haven't thought of since the United States was brand new. On a normal morning, Mrs. Ntiro, who is the first woman from Uganda to win an honors degree at Oxford and the politician of the family, sees her husband off to the university where he lectures. She has a few minutes with their four-month old son, then leaves him with a nurse and embarks on a round of work.

She can't just canvass from one neat suburban door to the next with the League of Women Voters. She has to get out and persuade village women in a country which isn't quite independent that they have a political responsibility. To see that there's an educated generation coming along to cope with independence, she works to improve schools and to get scholarships for students.

Mrs. Ntiro is a member of the legislative council of Uganda, and is one of just five women who are. If there's a meeting, she spends her afternoon there. "You know," she said in a gentle voice with overtones of Oxford, "the women in our country grow a lot of the food," and then added the understatement of the week: "I'm afraid I don't because I have other things to do."

It's Mr. Ntiro who forges ahead on the arts front, in the midst of all the political and material progress. He's one of Africa's leading painters, a lecturer at Makerere College, University of British East Africa, and determined that present-day students will be introduced to art properly.

"I'm really from Tanganyika," he explained. "I grew up on the southern slope of Mt. Kilimanjaro. It is a wonderful place to live and I treasure the experience, but I had never seen a museum when I began to paint. Later I went to Makerere College and the Slade School of Art in London, and I want other young artists to have still more of a chance."

Herald Tribune—Engels

Mrs. Sam Ntiro

The Ntiros have come to New York for an exhibition of his paintings on life in British East Africa, (Merton D. Simpson Gallery, 1046 Madison Ave., through June 1), which is the first showing in a New York gallery by a contemporary African painter.

They are both confident about the coming independence for their country, and Mrs. Ntiro, who is something of a modern-day, non-militant suffragette, is sure women will have a voice in government.

She has her own experience for justification. "In 1957, before I was married, my tribe asked me to serve on its top council. I was the first woman to do it, but what counted is that they made good use of me once I was there."

Her only worry is making her counrtywomen recognize their rights and responsibility. "I haven't had much chance to talk to American women, but I plan to see members of the League of Women Voters. I can learn a lot from them; if they have trouble getting people to vote, you can imagine how much more I'll have."

When asked about her interest in painting, Mrs. Ntiro answered, "I admire painting. Sam wants me to learn, but I tell him it isn't my medium."

"Oh you can learn in your leisure time," he countered.

But Mrs. Ntiro put her foot down at one more accomplishment and said firmly, "I'll play tennis."

King's Request Turned Down

LONDON (AP) — Britain rejected a Negro king's plea to Queen Elizabeth for permission to take his people and country out of the East African protectorate of Uganda.

A public rebuff by colonial secretary Iain MacLeod was addressed to Frederick Mutese II, the young Kabaka of Buganda, whose territory is one of four Ugandan provinces.

King Freddy, as he is known here, petitioned the queen earlier this year for leave to proclaim Bugandan independence Jan. 1. The Kabaka and his Lukiko (parliament) fear their rights and powers will wither away as the 94,000 square-mile protectorate and its six million people move toward statehood.

NEVER BEEN SLAVES

The Tall Senegalese Strut as No Other Men

The Atlanta Journal Atlanta, Ga

By HAROLD MARTIN

Dakar, French West Africa.

IT WAS A FINE trip across. We came up to Rio and I wandered down to the docks in the morning to see the crew of the Navy ship Glacier that had just come in from crunching around in the pack ice off Antarctica and there was a good story there, but I didn't have time to dig into it for my plane was leaving.

We took off just at dusk in a little rain, pulling up out of Rio in the sun's last light, with the city a glowing jewel through the misting rain and the great statue of Christ standing with sun on its head and clouds at its feet.

THE FRENCH

The French know how to do things nice, as the saying goes, and I kept thinking of how an old gourmet would have enjoyed the dinner while flying at 19,000 feet over the Brazilian jungle, eating such food. It started off with foie gras, stuffed with a little slice of truffle on a thin piece of Melba toast and went on from there to poulet saute Forestiere, which was chicken, boned and cooked in a wine sauce, and the best piece of tender ham I ever tasted, broiled in what tasted like port wine. I took both, which seemed to please the chief pilot very much for he was a merry man with a bay window and it was easy to see he liked his nourishment. But he didn't drink champagne with the passengers, as the French pilots are said to do. He just came back and visited with us and beamed on us as we ate. There was plenty of champagne though and red wine with the cheese and cognac with the coffee.

Which is maybe why that was so weird and beautiful a sunrise which I watched as we came in over the African coast to land at Dakar. It was a light lemon yellow at the horizon and above that a blue like an aquamarine and in the blue one white star was shining like a diamond. There wasn't a cloud in the sky, just this layer on layer of strangely beautiful colors, with the one star shining and finally fading.

We had a one-day layover before we left for Liberia and we spent it wandering in the markets down town. I remember Dakar as a flea-bitten semidesert town with nothing but the great airfield which served us so well in the war.

Now it's big and full of new buildings and cleaner than I ever expected, and not hot and dusty at all but swept by a wind from the sea with the first wonderful chill in it I've felt since I left home in January. And the people weren't the scaly-legged scarecrows draped in bed sheets that I remembered from my last trip here.

Harold Martin appears regularly in the daily Atlanta Constitution.

They celebrated the end of the Holy Month of Ramadan yesterday and they were out in all their finery—hawk-nosed men from the desert in robes of purple and the tall coal-black Senegalese, proud and straight, the women dressed in all the colors you ever thought of, with every style of headdress their ingenuity could conceive.

WORE BANGLES

They all wore bangles and bracelets of gold and silver and they looked, as they thronged in the streets, like the Arabian Nights come to life again. They were quietly celebrating the end of the month of prayer and fasting by dressing up, moving about, laughing and talking and strutting in their finery. And if you've never seen a six-foot six-inch Senegalese strut you've never seen a proud man walk.

These folks, they tell me, never have been slaves. They were the ones who caught other folks and sold them as slaves to the Arab traders and there is a little island called Goreet, where you can still see the rock houses and the caves they kept them in while waiting for the pious Yankee shippers to come with their slave ships to carry them away.

Native Children Sold In[illegible] Slavery, British Declare

Atlanta Daily World, Atlanta, Ga., Thur. 6/23/60

LONDON — (UPI) — British authorities in West Africa are alarmed over an epidemic of kidnapings of native children for sale into slavery or for ritual sacrifices, it was reported Wednesday.

The report was made by the British Anti - Slavery Society, a non-governmental organization which has been consultant status in the United Nations.

The problem was said to be particularly serious in Britian's large West African colony of Nigeria, which receives its independence this summer.

In an exchange of correspondence with the British government, the society said the Foreign Affairs Under - Secretary Lord Lansdowne admitted the increase in child kidnapings in West Africa.

The anti-slavery society said one recent letter from a Nigerian official pointed out that parents or relatives sell children into slavery or offer them for sacrifice in making "juju," which is native witchcraft.

The official said in many cases mutilated bodies were found and it was established the children were kidnaped. In the Ibadan Region this year, he continued, police investigated the case of a kidnaped child whose mutilated body had been found, apparently after a ritual sacrifice.

Smuggling of both children and women as slaves from Nigeria to the nearby Spanish island colony of Fernando Po in the Gulf of Guinea also occurs from time to time, it was reported.

222 Students From Africa Arrive For Studies In U. S.

Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta, Georgia

NEW YORK — Airlift Africa 1960, consisting of 222 students from East and Central Africa to attend colleges and universities in the U. S. and Canada, arrived in Idlewild Airport on Monday, Sept. 12. Students from Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Zanzibar, Nyasaland, Northern Rhodesia, and Southern Rhodesia are traveling under the auspices of the African American Students Foundation, Inc., which has been aided in this project by the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr. Foundation. Fri. 9-16-60

"This is the greatest number of African students ever to be brought to America at one time," stated Mr. Frank C. Montero, president of the Students Foundation. He revealed that the Foundation, through the efforts of Mrs. Ralph J. Bunche — a member of its Board of Directors — helped the students accumulate a total of more than a half million dollars of scholarships in American institutions. The students applied for scholarship aid directly to American institutions after careful and thorough screening by a selections board consisting of American-educated Africans. They then had to prove further qualification to their colonial office to secure visas. Many of the students have received further aid through private sources, including the Lutheran Council, the African-American Institute, and other agencies. Page 6

The students will stay in New York City for five days for an extensive orientation program. This will include meetings with prominent American educators, a visit to the U. N. with briefings by representatives of the Trusteeship Council, and discussions of patterns of American life and culture. They will be entertained at a dance given by the Kenya Students of America and at a reception given by the American Committee on Africa.

To complete arrangements for the Airlift and to initiate advance orientation, a five-member advisory group from the Kennedy Foundation visited Kenya briefly during the week of August 28th.

Co-chairmen of this delegation were Mr. Theodore W. Kheel, President of the National Urban League, and Dr. Aaron Brown of the Phelps-Stokes Fund. Other members were Gordon Hagberg of the African-American Institute, Father Gordon Fournier of the Foundation for all Africa, and Mr. Albert Sims of the Institute for International Education.

The African American Students Foundation was established in 1958 by Mr. William X. Scheinman to help increase the pace of educating Africans in the U. S. from non-self governing areas in East and Central Africa. In addition to Airlift Africa 1959, which included 81 students who are now successfully continuing their schooling in 50 colleges in the U. S. and Canada, the Foundation has helped individual African students with scholarships, emergency problems, and summer job placements. Mr. Frank C. Montero is president of the Foundation. African board members include Julius Nyerere, first Chief Minister of Tanganyika; Tom Mboya, secretary of the Kenya African National Union; Kenneth Kaunda, president of the United National Independent Party of Northern Rhodesia; and Dr. Hastings K. Banda, president of the Malawi Congress Party of Nyasaland.

148 African College Students Airlifted Here

The N. Y. Times

256 Due by End of Week to Attend 200 Institutions

New York

Two planes filled with African students arrived here early yesterday in the vanguard of an airlift that became a minor campaign issue last month in the Presidential race. 15-60

Cries of "Uhuru" from a welcoming party of fifty African students greeted the 148 new arrivals at New York International Airport. Two more planes are scheduled to arrive later this week bringing the total of airlifted students to 256.

"Uhuru" is the word for "Freedom" in Swahili, the pidgin-Arabic used as a lingua franca in East Africa.

The airlift was financed by a $100,000 grant from the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Foundation, a family philanthropy named for Senator John F. Kennedy's elder brother, who was killed in World War II. Partisans of Vice President Nixon had prodded the State Department for funds in an attempt to forestall the Kennedy foundation grant. It was made after the Kenya African leader, Tom Mboya, visited the Democratic candidate at Hyannis Port, Mass., on July 26.

William X. Scheinman, vice president of the African American Students Foundation, Inc., which sponsored the student movement, said the Africans would be distributed among about 200 colleges and universities. They span the country from Harvard and the Inter-American University in Puerto Rico to Hawaii University and the Alaskan Methodist University.

Mr. Scheinman said many of the institutions had offered scholarships to the African students totaling $1,600,000. He said the students themselves had raised about $250,000 in their own communities.

"People who could not give money sold their goats and sheep to help," a woman student said at a press conference at the New Yorker Hotel.

Samuel G. Ayany, 38-year-old Kenyan history teacher, chosen by the students as their spokesman, said:

"I can only say that if the Congo is what it is today because of lack of education, then I think that makes it especially important that we come to America for education."

The students came from Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Zanzibar, Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia. A number of them wore the beaded hat of elders of the Luo tribe of Kenya. The hat and accessory fly whisk have been made symbols of African nationalism by Mr. Mboya.

Transportation Is Paid by the Kennedy Foundation

WHAT SCOTT HAS TO SAY

Washington —I am writing to make quite clear my position on the African Airlift which would transport about 240 African students to study in the United States.

In the political controversy which has raged around this situation, it was to be expected that some people would misinterpret my motives.

I became interested in this very worthy project several months ago when I had dinner with Jackie Robinson, retired ball player who is now a successful business executive in New York.

He urged me to add my voice to that of Vice President Nixon's in an effort to have the Department of State assist in transporting these students to our country. I did see that such requests were renewed.

My friend, Jackie Robinson, has been good enough to refer to my continuing interest in his newspaper column.

My statements about the actions of the Kennedy people were not an attempt to question the value of the airlift itself. quite the contrary. I was objecting to the political maneuvering by the Kennedy people.

The important thing is that these students come to the United States to study under scholarships, which others have so painstakingly arranged.

The young people of Africa should be given every opportunity to study here to learn at first hand the workings of a free constitutional form of government. Both we in the United States and they in that great emerging continent will gain by such projects.

The AFRO can be sure that my interest in helping to bring students here from Africa will continue, as will my efforts in connection with civil rights legislation. We could have used more help than we got on that issue in the August session.

The latest addition to the Douglass high school enrollment, which has already gone over the 1400 mark, is Miss Tabitha (Nlambi) Warui, a ninth grade girl who traveled more than 7,000 miles from Kenya, East Africa, to Oklahoma City.

In the city, she resides in the home of Rev. and Mrs. Goree James, 3332 N.E. 16th, with her brother, George Warui, who is a sophomore at Oklahoma City university where he ist a pre-med student.

Little Miss Warui, who comes from a family of three sisters and eight brothers, plans to spend the next eight years in this country to complete her secondary and college education. She, too, is interested in science, but has not made any definite plans for a future in this field. In Kabete intermediate school where she did her elementary school work, her favorite subject was science because "I like to grow things."

When asked why she made the decision to come to America, Tabitha replied very politely, "I wanted to learn to be clever."

TELL REVERSAL ON STUDENT AID FOR AFRICANS

Nixon Man Intercedes, State Dept. Says

Wed. 8-24-60

Washington, Aug. 23 (AP)—The state department acknowledged Tuesday it agreed to offer funds to transport African students to this country after intercession by a political aid to Vice President Nixon.

William B. Macomber, Jr., assistant secretary of state, said the department's approval, reversing decisions dating back to August, 1959, was communicated directly to James Shepley, Nixon campaign assistant last week.

Released by Fulbright

Macomber's letter was made public by Sen. J. William Fulbright [D., Ark.], who, in a Senate speech called it "a sorry performance," deploring "a department which is so susceptible to outside pressures."

Fulbright, chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, said Shepley and the state department "entered the project on a crash basis" after learning that the family of Sen. John F. Kennedy [D., Mass.]—Nixon's rival for the Presidency — had agreed to put up $100,000 to transport the students here.

"It is quite clear that the department reversed itself on what it construed to be the orders of Mr. Shepley," Fulbright said.

Misgivings Cleared Up

Macomber's letter said the department, after looking further into the project at Shepley's request, found that some aspects about which it had had misgivings had been cleared up.

One point with which the department had been concerned, he said, was "the manner in which the students were looked out for once they reached this country."

He said these doubts were cleared away when sponsors of the project to bring 250 African scholarship students to study in United States colleges agreed to work with the Institute of International Education.

This decision was reached a week ago Monday — just two days after Shepley telephoned to Macomber and urged the state department to review its earlier refusal to provide funds for the project.

Calls for Nixon

Macomber said that Shepley, in his telephone call on Aug. 13, said he was calling on behalf of the Vice President.

"I understand that the Vice President was unaware of Sen. Kennedy's interest at this time or any time prior to when the department's ultimate offer and the foundation's rejection was reported in the press," Macomber wrote.

Macomber advised Fulbright that the next day, Sunday, Aug. 14, he reported Shepley's call to Undersecretay of State Douglas Dillon.

"Undersecretary Dillon telephoned to Mr. Shepley and indicated that he was sympathetic to the request," Macomber added.

Daughter of Kenya politician enrolls at Boston University

The Afro-American

Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON, Mass.—The daughter of an internationally-known African political leader who spent 4½ years in a British detention camp in Kenya for alleged Mau Mau affiliations is enrolled this fall as a freshman at Boston University after graduating from Newton High School last spring.

Miss Mary Gichuru, daughter of James Gichuru, president of the Kenya African National Union, is at the University's College of Basic Studies and plans to major in sociology.

* * *

MISS GICHURU will return to Kenya to teach after completing her studies in America because "teaching is the best way for me to contribute something to my country."

In this respect, she will be following the footsteps of her father who also began his career as a teacher, although, unlike him, she has no immediate plans to enter politics.

There are few women politicians in Kenya, the African student added, partly because women are not educated for the field, and partly because politics is considered a man's sphere. At present the Kenya Legislative council can boast of only one woman representative, she said.

* * *

MARY'S FATHER has been active in politics for several years. As chief of the Kikuyu tribe, he was both representative and vice president of the African District Council. Mr. Gichuru was elected chief in 1951 and resigned two years later.

It was in 1955 that Mr. Gichuru was detained by the government because of alleged Mau Mau affiliations. Although he reportedly admitted taking the Mau Mau oath, Mr. Gichuru was quoted at the time as saying, "I believe the real reason they detained me was that I had more power in the district than the chief who succeeded me." He was released in January of this year.

Soon afterward he was elected president of the newly formed Kenya African National Union, a party designed, Mary said, "To bring together all the different parties so that they act as one unit."

* * *

MISS GICHURA, who is 21 years old, is one of five children. She has two brothers and two sisters, all of whom are younger than she. One of her brothers is studying in India and hopes to eventually come to this country to attend college.

Most of Mary's time is taken up with studying, she said. Whatever spare time she had in high school was devoted to the International Club, to membership on the badminton team and to playing "some" tennis.

On occasion, when Mary has a little extra time, she participates in a past - time familiar to most American students trying to supplement their income - "baby - sitting."

100 African Students Leave Iron Curtain

Chicago Defender Sat-Oct. 22-28, 1960

By DONALD MAY

WASHINGTON — (UPI) — The State Department has revealed it has quietly helped about 100 African students leave Iron Curtain countries and come to the U. S. for study.

Officials said the students had accepted offers to study in Communist countries, most of them in Russia, but found they didn't like it and appealed to the United States for help.

The State Department said the program to bring them to this country has been going on quietly for about a year. The U. S. paid their stransportation costs and tuition at American universities out of education grant funds.

P. 10

KEPT SECRET

The program was kept secret to avoid furor with the Communists. It was the first education grant program in officals' memory specifically amied at weaning students away from the Iron Curtain.

The State Department revealed details after newsmen began to make inquiries. Earlier, the State Department issued a statement saying only that there are some African students in Iron Curtain countries who had asked for U.S. help and that this country was doing "everything it could properly do" for them.

Later, the State Department said all but 10 or 12 of those students who asked for help are in this country.

VARIOUS REASONS

The students gave various reasons for wanting to leave the Communist countries. Some objected to indoctrination and said their living expenses payments from the Soviet government were reduced when they did not "cooperate in political activities."

Some said they were not allowed to mingle with Russian students or other foreign students. Some criticized the standard of education, housing and food.

The problem — an extremely delicate one in the cold war — began arising last spring. Several African students who had gone behind the Iron Curtain to study told the U. S. embassies they were fed up with communism and would like to continue their studies in the west.

TWO MAIN OBSTACLES

Prior to the State Department announcement, officials said privately, that two main obstacles stood in the way of snapping up the students' offers to switch to the West.

One was the furor the Communists might raise if this country set up an exchange program designed to wean students away from the Iron Curtain.

The other problem was screening the applicants to decide which ones genuinely want to study in the West and which ones were loyal Communists who would only make trouble.

AFRICAN MEDIC LIVES AS AN ATLANTAN—Cameroun's Dr. Joseph Sende gets personal experience by living as an Atlantan for two full days. The young surgeon will return to Paris, France, within the month. (Perry's Photo)

African Doctor Tours Gate City

Atlanta, Ga

Tues. 8-2-60

By PAUL DELANEY

Atlanta was visited by an African medical doctor the past weekend who came to America to, as he said, fill a "vacuum" of ignorance of this country. Dr. Joseph Sende, a native of Cameroun who is now studying surgery in Paris, was in the Gate City to "experience segregation."

His experiences included a segregated taxi cab, the drinking fountain in Municipal Market and other signs familiar to southerners.

Saying that in the south "the people live a serious drama," Dr. Sende blasted the practice of segregation:

"Segregation," he stated, "is a situation where selfishness uses absurd prejudices which can be justified by no biological, moral, or genuine presupposition. I think, therefore, that segregation must be fought. Better than that, the processes of integration have to be accelerated."

He has visited New York, Philadelphia and Washington, D. C. Atlanta was his first trip south. He plans to go on to Chicago and Detroit and possibly Minneapolis and Boston.

About the northern cities he has been in thus far, he pointed out that he had not found "any apparent segregation, although it may exist." Saturday night he went to the Amphitheatre and saw a production of "South Pacific." Sunday, he worshipped at First Presbyterian Church and was very cordially received, he said.

Dr. Sende will spend a total of five weeks in the U. S., before returning to his studies. When he goes back to Africa, he will be one of the first African surgeons in Cameroun.

He said that Africa has much respect for America, but bad race relations here certainly have had bad reactions there.

"Every African student in France, and there are 7,000 of them, knows the names of Little Rock and Alabama because of segregation."

Dr. Sende said he was "very astonished" to meet Dr. Martin Luther King. He praised the student movement for their determination to work for an end to all segregation by all means. That is the only way they can have confidence in their future in the American society."

He predicts cooperation between the U. S. and new African states. However, he feels that "segregation does not serve the interests of the United States in Africa. More than that, segregation decreases the prestige of the United States in the world."

IBADAN, Nigeria — An American technical education expert from West Michigan University, Frank Scott, has arrived in Indiana as head of a six-man team of American instructors of teach in new technical colleges in the Western Region. The remainder of the team arrives in September.

Under the 1955-60 development plan, two technical colleges are being established by the Western Nigerian government. One is being built at Ibadan and the other will be built at Benin City for the benefit of students in the Mid-West area of the Region.

The Ibadan Technical College will be opened next January and will at first offer pre-technical courses, to which sixty students will be admitted. In the latter part of next year the College will start higher course in electrical, mechanical, and civil engineering at the level of the ordinary national diploma and production engineering at the level of the higher diploma.

TRADE SCHOOLS

Eligible to take these courses will be those Western Nigerians who have satisfactorily completed the pre-technical courses or selected apprentices from the region's trade centers. Six trade centres are being established in Western Nigeria. The Sapele trade centre has been considerably expanded and new centres opened at Ijebu-Ode and Oshogbo. Other centres are being complete at Agege, Oyo and Owo.

Products of Secondary Grammar Schools and students possessing satisfactory experience and sponsored by the Government o rindustry will also be eligible for admission to the technical colleges.

In addition to two full years of study in the technical colleges students will be required to spend at least fifteen months as apprentices in industry to give their courses the necessary technical bias and give the students practical experience. In order to improve the technical know-how of those already in industry, day-release and evening courses will be given at the Ibadan Technical college.

Arrangements have been made under the International Co-operation project to train Nigerians who will later take over from the American instructors.

Some fifty educators, foundation officials and interested citizens yesterday called on the United States government to bring "some thousands of students per year" from the countries and territories of Africa to study in this country.

While private organizations and educational institutions can play a larger role in bringing African students here, the group said, only the government has the resources "to finance promptly and adequately a scholarship program of this magnitude. Without such a program the United States will have failed to do what it can and should do on behalf of African nations."

Ferrer

The group's statement was made public yesterday by the Phelps-Stokes Fund, 297 Park Ave. South. The fund, together with another foundation, the Fund for Tomorrow, 5022 Waldo Ave., the Bronx, sponsored a meeting of the fifty here on July 25.

Groups Represented

Among the groups represented were the Carnegie Corporation of New York, the African-American Institute, the Asia Foundation and the American Council on Education.

Yesterday's statement was not connected in any way with the Washington political controversy over the African student airlift, which will bring 250 East Africans here with funds from the Joseph P. Kennedy jr. Foundation.

The group of fifty called for more government scholarships such as those recently offered to Guinea and the Belgian Congo Republic. The United States has offered 150 scholarships to Guinea, and the African-American Institute, 345 E. 46th St., is under contract with the International Co-Operation Administration to begin bringing the scholarship holders over here next month, Lloyd Steere, the institute's executive vice-president, said yesterday. The Congo has been offered 300 scholarships, but no further action has been taken.

1,959 Studied Here in '59

Last year, 1,959 students from thirty-one African countries studied in the United States as graduates and undergraduates, according to the Institute of International Education.

Yesterday's statement called for a co-ordinated but not centralized effort for African scholarships, coming from both public and private sources. It declared that, if possible, each student's first year should be adequately financed in advance with opportunities for self-help and the co-operation of American business and labor in providing summer employment. African students should be selected "only on merit and in open competition."

B'ham World B'ham, Ala.

Wed 9-21-60

NEW YORK — Airlift Africa 1960, consisting of 222 students from East and Central Africa to attend colleges and universities in the U. S. and Canada, arrived in Idlewild Airport on Monday, Sept. 12. Students from Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Zanzibar, Nyasaland, Northern Rhodesia, and Southern Rhodesia are traveling under the auspices of the African American Students Foundation, Inc., which has been aided in this project by the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr. Foundation.

"This is the greatest number of African students ever to be brought to America at one time," stated Mr. Frank C. Montero, president of the Students Foundation. He revealed that the Foundation, through the efforts of Mrs. Ralph J. Bunche — a member of its Board of Directors — helped the students accumulate a total of more than a half million dollars of scholarships in American institutions. The students applied for scholarship aid directly to American institutions after careful and thorough screening by a selections board consisting of American-educated Africans. They then had to prove further qualification to their colonial office to secure visas. Many of the students have received further aid through private sources, including the Lutheran Council, the African-American Institute, and other agencies.

The students will stay in New York City for five days for an extensive orientation program. This will include meetings with prominent American educators, a visit to the U. N. with briefings by representatives of the Trusteeship Council, and discussions of patterns of American life and culture. They will be entertained at a dance given by the Kenya Students of America and at a reception given by the American Committee on Africa.

Political Fat in the Fire On Africa Student Aid

The Washington Post
Washington, D.C.
Aug. 8/19/60

By Warren Unna
Staff Reporter

Everybody on Capitol Hill was for Africa yesterday but both Democrats and Republicans were up in arms over who gets the credit.

It all centered around the $100,000 being provided as transportation costs to bring 250 African students to the United States.

And it appears that the man who brought on the political furor is Jackie Robinson, Negro baseball hero who now is devoting his bench years to business, politics and to writing a newspaper colume.

Robinson, at the beginning of the year, was campaigning for Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) as his No. 1 candidate for the Presidency. When Humphrey lost out, Robinson switched to Vice President Richard M. Nixon. He has bee endorsing him ever since in his regular colume in the New York Post.

It came to pass that Robinson, through his association with the African-American Student Foundation, learned that the family foundation of another presidential hopeful, Sen. John F. Kennedy (D-Mass.), was about to donate the necessary $100,000 to bring the African students to the United States. This would enable them to utilize the $200,000 in scholarship funds already raised for them.

Robinson was familar with the need. A few months ago he had gained Nixon's help in making a special plea to the State Department.

But even the Vice President got a turn-down, from J. C. Satterthwaite, Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs.

Robinson shelved his plea until last week, when he learned through the student group that the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Foundation (named for the Senator's late brother) had been approached for the funds and was willing to donate.

He sought out James Shepley, the Time Magazine editor-on-loan for the Nixon campaign. Shepley succeeded in getting the State Department to reverse itself and approve the $100.000 grant.

But Shepley's good news failed to gain acceptance from Frank C. Montero, president of the student group. Montero refused Shepley's pleas to leave the Kennedy money untouched. He explained that the Kennedy Foundation had been willing when neither the State Department nor other foundations were. Moreover, the Kennedy group promised to give a helping hand to the African students during their stay in the United States.

Name Kept Out

Until then, the group had kept the name of its benefactor silent, at the Foundation's request.

But Wednesday night on the Senate floor, Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa.), a former Republican National Committee chairman, critized Kennedy for "the apparent misuse of tax-exempt foundation money for blatant political purposes." He also criticized the students for knuckling under to "pressures brought by the Kennedy people."

Yesterday Chairman J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.) of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee threatened an investigation of the State Department aid program to learn why a newspaperman named Shepley is more successful in gaining student exchange expenditures than either he or his committee have been.

Rep. Charles C. Diggs Jr. (D-Mich.), a Negro, declared: "The State Department showed interest in the matter only when their inaction was about to prove embarrassing to the Republican Party."

Proposal Broadened

The State Department countered that its reconsideration was based on a change in the proposal: Originally the requests was for students from Kenya only and there was no adequate provision for the students once they arrived.

Now, the Sate Department explained, the project has been widened to include students from Uganda and Tanganyika and other objections also have been met.

But since the Kennedy money was available, State said it would pocket its $100,000 and use it for "regularly appropriate projects."

Nixon's press aide, Herbert G. Klein, told his news conference yesterday that the issue was being sidetracked: "The basic point involved is that the Vice President is interested in increasing the exchange of students." He mildly reprimanded Shepley as not "speaking for the State Department."

Fulbright Asks Why Offer to Africans Was Made on Nixon Intercession

Aug. 8/19/60

By TOM WICKER
Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 18—Democrats demanded today to know if the State Department was giving political aid and comfort to Vice President Nixon, the Republican Presidential candidate.

Senator J. W. Fulbright of Arkansas, the influential chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, took the lead. He wrote to Secretary of State Christian A. Herter for an explanation of the department's off-again, on-again decisions in the case of 250 African students seeking transportation to the United States.

Lincoln White, State Department press officer, told reporters that $100,000 had been set aside to bring the students here only after two intercessions from the Vice President's office.

On the Senate floor last night Hugh Scott, Republican of Pennsylvania, charged that a charitable foundation operated by the family of Senator John F. Kennedy, the Democratic Presidential candidate, had "outbid" the Government and would foot the $100,000 bill. He said this had been done for "blatant political purposes."

Kennedy Takes Floor

Senator Kennedy took the floor and read a telegram from Frank Montero, head of the African-American Students Foundation, refuting this charge. The Massachusetts Senator said it was the "most unfair, distorted and malignant attack I have heard in fourteen years in politics."

Mr. White's statement today plus the telegram from Mr. Montero, established the fact that the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Foundation would provide the $100,000 Mr. Montero wired the Senator that the "State Department has repeatedly turned a cold shoulder" to the student transportation project — known as Airlift Africa.

The statement conceded that the State Department had turned the project down when the original request for the funds came in from Mr. Nixon early in July. "The sponsors then asked for reconsideration," he said, and the decision was reversed.

Mr. White said this was communicated to the Vice President on Monday, Aug. 15. Senator Scott had said, however, that James Shepley of Mr. Nixon's staff had given the news "last Saturday" to Jackie Robinson, the former baseball star, who had acted as Mr. Nixon's liasion with the African-American Students Foundation.

The Democrats were contending today that, far from "outbidding" the Government for what might be a politically profitable project, the Kennedy Foundation had picked up the $100,000 tab only when it appeared the State Department would not. Senator Kennedy said the foundation had stipulated that it not be publicly connected with the project.

Senator Fulbright's letter centered on the role of Mr. Shepley, a Time-Life employe on leave to work on Mr. Nixon's campaign staff. The Senator said the sequence of events was "most disturbing" and asked for an answer to thirteen specific questions "not later than next Monday."

Senator Fulbright said he would ask for copies of all State Department memorandums, letters and communications on the Airlift Africa matter.

"If it is true that the State Department was pressured into allocating funds, it was an unacceptable interference with the orderly conduct of our foreign policy by the State Department for partisan, political purposes," he said.

Scott Appears Alone

Senator Scott, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, appeared to be alone in his position. Republican Senators John Sherman Cooper of Kentucky and Jacob K. Javits of New York expressed reservations about his remarks. A spokesman for Mr. Nixon said today it was a "fair answer" that the Vice President did not share Senator Scott's views.

Herbert G. Klein, Mr. Nixon's press secretary, said the Pennsylvania Senator had not discussed the speech with the Vice President. He added that Mr. Nixon had not been aware that the Kennedy money was available when he urged the State Department to reconsider its original refusal.

"It was not a matter of politics," Mr. Klein said.

Pierre Salinger, Senator Kennedy's press spokesman, said Mr. White's announcement at the State Department backed the Kennedy version and refuted Senator Scott.

Representative Charles C. Diggs Jr., a member of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, accused the State Department of "playing politics." He said the department showed interest only when "their inaction was about to prove embarrassing to the Republican party."

A number of Democratic Senators took the floor last night, after Senator Kennedy had replied to the Scott attack, and castigated the Pennsylvanian. Among them was Senator Fulbright, who cited some of his own difficulties in getting funds for student exchange. He observed:

"I think it is most unusual that a man such as Mr. Shepley, whoever he may be, can go down to the State Department and say, 'give $100,000 for this purpose."

Over Africa Student Aid

Montgomery, Ala.

WASHINGTON (AP) — The State Department acknowledged Tuesday it agreed to provide $100,000 to help 250 African students come to this country within two days after a campaign aide to Vice President Richard M. Nixon requested it. 8-24-60

The aide, James Shepley, in asking for reversal of an earlier decision, said he was calling on Nixon's behalf, the department said.

It added that appearently Nixon was not aware that Sen. John F. Kennedy, his Democratic opponent for the presidency, also was interested in helping the students —although Shepley knew it.

Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark), putting the department's version of the politically entangled affair into the Congressional Record said:

CRASH BASIS

"It is quite clear that the department reversed itself on what it construed to be orders of Mr. Shepley."

Fulbright said Shepley entered the picture "on a crash basis" only after it became known that the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Foundation had agreed to put up the money.

"A sorry performance," declared Fulbright, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

"I deplore, as strongly as I can, a department that is susceptible to outside pressure," he added.

"A sorry spectacle," echoed another Democrat, Sen. Richard B. Russell of Georgia.

Nixon's press secretary, Herbert G. Klein, told a news conference the State Department decision was nonpolitical.

"At the time we were working on it we didn't know the Kennedy Foundation was interested," in the matter, Klein said.

He said he was not sure when Shepley became aware of the Kennedy Foundation's interest. But Nixon, Klein added, has long been interested in providing for exchange students, especially students from Africa and Asia.

Democrats in the Senate also turned back on Republicans the charge that Kennedy-for-President backers outbid the State Department to help the students for political campaign purposes.

Sen. Hugh Scott (R-Pa) had raised the charge against Kennedy in the Senate last week, leaving the impression that the Kennedy Foundation wanted to win favor with Negro voters in this country.

Kennedy's defenders Tuesday stressed that the Kennedy Foundation—a memorial to his brother killed in World War II—agreed to pay the cost with the understanding no publicity would be given its participation.

'NOT FROM KENNEDY'

Stressing the no-publicity angle, Sen. Mike Mansfield of Montana, the assistant Senate Democratic leader, said:

"If there is politics in this—and no one can deny it—it is not from Sen. Kennedy and the Kennedy Foundation."

Fulbright, saying the foundation acted only after the government refused to do so, said the situation is exactly the opposite of an effort by Kennedy to outbid the government.

U. S. STUDENTS WORKING IN TEN NEGRO NATIONS

Chicago Sunday Tribune

Chicago Ill.

New York, July 2 [UPI]—American students are working with their hands on construction projects in 10 African nations to gain understanding of the forces remaking the face of Africa.

About 180 students from 75 American colleges are participating in the work camps project, Operation Crossroads Africa, directed by the Rev. James H. Robinson of New York.

Sun. 7-3-60

The broadly representative cross-section of students includes 35 Negroes, 25 southern white persons, Protestants, Catholics, and Jews, divided about equally between men and women. Canada and Uruguay are also represented.

P. 13

Divided into Groups

Divided into 14 groups with matching numbers of African students, they are putting in work days on construction projects specified by the nations they are visiting in Ghana, Nigeria, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Senegal, Dahomey, Togo, Guinea, Ivory Coast, and Cameroon.

It is the second student study and work camp project to be sponsored by Operation Crossroads Africa. In 1958, a pilot project of 60 Americans was undertaken in five African countries which earned the enthusiastic approval of the state department and the White House.

President Eisenhower wrote a letter to Robinson, Negro minister of the Church of the Master in Harlem and originator of the program.

Work Is Welcome

"The contribution made by the participants in Operation Crossroads Africa, working their private 'people-to-people' chanels is most welcome. I feel confident it will help establish strong bonds of understanding and friendship with the eager young people of Africa," the letter said.

Only one of the nations selected for the mutual awareness and understanding program—Liberia—has a long history of independence. The nine others are either in the process of severing colonial ties or have been recognized as sovereign nations within the last three years.

To Get Acquainted

It is the intention of the sponsors that the American students have the opportunity come "to grips" with the African personality during the seven weeks they will spend working with them.

At the same time, Africans will have an equal opportunity to see the face of America in the interracial and interreligious groups of American students.

After completion of their individual missions in Africa, the students will meet again here for evaluation sessions and a study by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Jordan Premier Slain By Bomb In Major Crisis

Atlanta Daily World, Atlanta, Ga.

BEIRUT, Lebanon — (UPI)—A bomb explosion in the Jordanian capital of Amman Monday killed Premier Hazza Al-Majali and destroyed the foreign ministry building. The blast threatened the Middle East with another major crisis.

Amman radio broadcast reported up to 10 other persons killed and 50 injured in the explosion that came as Al-Majali, an anti-Communist, met with his cabinet in the shattered building. Cairo reports said two time bombs went off.

King Hussein, a frequent target of attack by enemies within and without his troubled kingdom, was in his own palace and escaped injury, the radio reports said. He immediately clamped a curfew on the city and placed it under martial rule.

NAME PRIME MINISTER

Troops of the loyal Arab legion patrolled the deserted streets of Amman to guard against uprisings. All Jordanian airports were closed to arriving and departing aircraft, and the government declared a state of emergency, the radio reports said.

Reliable reports reaching Beirut said Hussein had named Bahjat Talhouni, chief of the royal cabinet, as the new prime minister. Talhouni, known to be loyal to Hussein, is a former minister of the interior and chief judge of the court of appeals.

The Jordanian embassy in London said Zaha Humoud, undersecretary of state for foreign affairs, and Asem Tagi, director of tourism, were victims of the explosion that killed Al-Majali.

EXPLOSION KILLS 10

Wasfi Tel, Amman's director of broadcasting and information said at Beirut that 10 persons were killed and more than 50 injured when the explosion crumbled the building.

Cairo reports said Hussian summoned his chief aides, including the national military chiefs, shortly after the blast and set up a commission to investigate the blast. The streets of the Jordanian capital were reported almost deserted.

There were no immediate reports on who the assassins might have been. But Jordan has a history of assassinations, crises, anti-government demonstrations, wars and near wars since Britain created it as a Hashemite Kingdom of Transjordan May 25, 1946.

Stabbed to death by rightwinger—

Anti-West Japanese leader assassinated

Mob of 10,000 demands revenge

The Birmingham News

Birmingham Ala.

BY JOHN RODERICK

TOKYO, Oct. 12—(AP)—A fanatic rightwing student today assassinated Socialist Party Chairman Inejiro Asanuma, an avowed friend of Communist China and the militant leader of Japanese opposition to the U. S.-Japan alliance.

Wed 10-12-60

The assassin, a slender 17-year-old named Otaya Yamaguchi, stabbed Asanuma twice with a foot-long sword as Asanuma spoke to a political forum on clean campaign practices. Members of the audience hurled the youth to the floor and carried him off to police headquarters.

P. 1

A LEFTIST THRONG of 10,000 marched on the police headquarters and then on the official residence of Prime Minister Hayato Ikeda, demanding Ikeda's resignation and prolaiming, "down with terrorism."

A few of the marchers broke windows in an ineffectual attempt to break into the police headquarters but otherwise there was no violence. The demonstrators began to disperse after a cabinet official received leaders of the leftist labor federation Sohyo and told them the government would proceed with firmness.

Police reported that the young killer confessed he had plotted the assassination for the past three days and said he had no accomplice. Police said he told them Asanuma was a traitor who was trying to sell Japan to the Communists.

IT WAS the first major political murder in 34 years in a country where "government by assassination" was prevalent before World War II. But it was the third political stabbing by a rightist fanatic in four months—the other two victims recovered—and it raised fears that ultranationalist terrorism once again is becoming a major factor in political life. Demands were expected for a police crackdown.

Asanuma, a stocky, 61-year-old was in the midst of a speech at a meeting urging a clean campaign for the parliamentary elections next month when Yamaguchi rushed forward from the left side of the stage.

The youth wore a raincoat over his black school uniform and boots, a trademark of the greater Japan Patriotic Society. Wild-eyed, he struck twice with his sword. Asanuma staggered two or three steps, held his chest, mumbled some words and collapsed on the blood-spattered stage.

Japan's three major political parties were participating in the forum on fair election practices, and Conservative Prime Minister Hayato Ikeda was sitting less than two yards away.

During the wild scramble to grab the assassin, Asanuma was temporarily neglected.

P. 3

AT THE HOSPITAL doctors administered oxygen and a heart stimulant, but he was dead when he reached the operating table.

The slaying gave the left wing a martyr and could help the Socialists in the campaign to cut down the Conservatives' strong parliamentary majority next month. The Socialists were expected to argue that the Conservative government of former Premier Nobusuke Kishi and Ikeda had failed to make good on their repeated pledges to eradicate terrorism from Japanese society.

The Greater Japan Patriotic Society is a Nazi-like group that dreams of restoring Japan to its prewar greatness. It clashed repeatedly with the leftist demonstrators whose riots last Spring against the U.S.-Japanese treaty forced cancellation of President Eisenhower's visit to Japan.

The leader of the society, Bin Akao, often called Japan's Hitler, said Yamaguchi had quit the group in May or June, probably because the society's discipline is strict and he wanted more freedom to fight the Communists and Socialists.

AKAO DENIED any connection with the youth's act and said he felt sorry for Asanuma, "but this is punishment from heaven—it was bound to happen."

Police said Yamaguchi was a student at Daito Cultural University in Tokyo. A drunken student from the same university last November fatally beat an American professor at a neighboring university, Dr. Charles E. Perry of Canton, N.Y., who had admonished him for being drunk and throwing rocks.

Asanuma was known as the "human locomotive" of the Socialists because of his driving energy. He emerged into prominence in 1948 when he was elected secretary of the party. In 1950 he was among a group of parliamentarians that visited the United States.

ANTI-WEST LEADER IS ASSASSINATED

. . . Inejiro Asanuma, eyes shut and wincing, as student stabbed him at rally last night

On a trip to Peiping last year he joined Chinese Communist leaders in declaring that U.S. imperialism was the common enemy of China and Japan. Last spring he led the leftist campaign of parliamentary obstruction and violent street demonstrations against the new U.S.-Japan security treaty that forced cancellation of president Eisenhower's visit to Tokyo.

Special to The New York Times

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan, Feb. 29—Few Afghans are invited to parties given by any of the thirty-three American families who live in Kandahar, the major city in southern Afghanistan.

Sat. 3-12-60

Most of the American men and many of their wives are with the United States International Cooperation Administration, the Federal Aviation Agency or Pan American World Airways.

They are concerned with the near-by Helmand Valley irrigation and agricultural development project, the construction of an international airport ten miles from here or the guidance of Afghans on how to operate an airline.

A "little America" has sprung up in Kandahar's most fashionable residential district. It consists of neat, one-story stone homes, many with spacious gardens. The homes have refrigerators, freezers, modern American furniture and a variety of knickknacks that indicate shopping trips to many Asian bazaars.

Garages House Autos

The garages house Chevrolets, Fords, Plymouths and at least one Cadillac. The larders are well stocked with canned and bottled delicacies from the United States, cases of American cigarettes and the choicest of liquors—all imported duty-free.

It is easy for the casual visitor to criticize this abundance of comfort for servants of the United States taxpayer. Patience and an attempt to understand reveal that it takes many comforts of home to lure most qualified United States technical advisers to remote underdeveloped lands.

Many of those in Kandahar acknowledge that some of their colleagues appear to confuse comfort with ostentation. They concede that there is little justification to display a Cadillac here, where most of the motive power is provided by camel, horse, burro or human foot.

They insist, however, that most Americans here are sincerely devoted to their jobs and have developed cordial working relationships with their Afghan counterparts. They say they would like to know the Afghans socially but that insurmountable barriers of language and custom prevent this.

Clannishness Charged

Some observers maintain, though, that the barriers can be crossed with a little effort. They accuse the Americans of clannishness, of baseless fear of experimenting with local food and mingling with the masses on local transport, of unwillingness to let their children play with young Afghans.

These observers often point to the many Soviet technicians in Afghanistan, most of whom live side by side with Afghans and buy almost all their necessities in the bazaars. This impresses many Afghans, who tend to overlook the fact that the Russians are not paid enough to live and shop elsewhere, often have no choice but to come to Arghanistan and have virtually no social contact with the Afghans who live next door.

In Kandahar, as elsewhere in the foreign aid program, the visitor finds an occasional self-sacrificing American who, out of sheer determination to learn how other people live, succeeds in crossing the barriers. But most United States officials in South Asia recognize that if the program is to depend on recruiting such persons, it might as well quit.

U. S., 13 Allies Demand Swift Solution To Crisis

P. 1

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States prodded the South Korean government Tuesday to redress swiftly "the grievances of the people." Then it joined 13 Korean War Allies in demanding early solution of the Korean political crisis by democratic means.

Diplomatic representatives of 14 nations which fought to save South Korea from Red invaders met behind closed doors and reviewed the riotous situation which has forced President Syngman Rhee to resign.

Afterward the State Department —which set up the conference — issued a statement on behalf of the entire group. It said in part:

"Those present joined in expressing the hope that there would be an early resolution of the situation in a manner which would permit the orderly functioning of democratic government in the Republic of Korea."

The meeting capped a day which also saw:

1. The United States formally call for reforms to quiet unrest which has erupted into disorders in South Korea. Rhee's foes have charged widescale irregularities and strongarm tactics in elections last month.

2. South Korea's Ambassador You Chan Yang announced he is handing in his resignation after nine years here "because I have made mistakes."

KOREA'S HUH CHUNG

The 14-nation meeting was attended by representatives of all but two of the Allies which went to South Korea's defense after the Communists crossed the 38th parallel in 1950.

Absent were the South African and Ethiopian representatives. South Korea was not invited.

Sources said the talk centered on the political turbulence which has engulfed South Korea and did not get into the military aspects.

Some strategists fear the unrest in the South will tempt the heavily armed Communists to invade once again.

Nor was there an exchange of views on what steps the Allies might take to remedy the Korean political situation, it was said. The diplomats were pictured as feeling it is up to the South Koreans themselves to put through necessarry reforms.

Yang said that under instructions from his government, he had wrongly declared in public that the Communists fomented the demonstrations seething in his homeland. He said he found out from a friend in Korea that this was not so and "I want to publicly apologize for the statements which I have made."

Kishi Defies Socialists and Labor Group Opposing Pact With U. S.

TOKYO (AP)—Prime Minister Nobusuke Kishi charged Wednesday that pro-Communist elements are behind the movement to void the new military treaty he signed with the United States last January.

The conservative Japanese leader, facing the biggest crisis of his postwar political career, took the offensive against the Socialists and the Sohyo labor federation, leaders of a noisy campaign of huge demonstrations demanding his resignation.

They have also been urging defeat of the new U. S.-Japan security treaty and suspension of President Eisenhower's visit here this month.

Kishi pointed out that many opposing the new security treaty had previously been urging revision of the 1951 treaty signed under U. S. occupation and allowing U. S. military bases in Japan.

"Among these people are those who clearly support communism, and people who are trying to split Japan and the United States under the name of neutralism and bring Japan one step closer to communism," he said.

"Approval or rejection of the security pact is a choice between defending Japan's peace and security and cooperation with the free world countries and peace on the side of the Communist countries."

Kishi defended his government's policy at a meeting of the House of Councillors special committee debating the treaty. The session was boycotted by all parties except his own. The lower house of Parliament ratified the pact May 20 and it automatically goes into effect June 19, the day Eisenhower is due to arrive.

In separate meetings with government and party aides, Kishi also mapped measures for marshaling a huge welcome of 600,000 people to drown out the "go home Ike" demonstrations planned by antigovernment forces.

Two prominent women leaders — Mrs. Kano Jodai, president of the Japan Women's University, and Mrs. Umeki Umura, national chairman of the YWCA—joined the demand for cancellation of the visit.

Mrs. Uemura was one of three labor organization officials selected by the left-wing Sohyo to go to the United States on a special mission to urge Americans to cancel the visit. The others are Prof. Shigeto Tsuru of Hitosubashi University and Prof. Hyoe Ouchi of Tokyo University.

Sohyo opened a special convention of workers, its general council unanimously adopted a resolution opposing the trip and charging the U. S. Secretary of State Christian A. Herter. Japanese newspapers quoted Herter as telling the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the area covered by the new treaty includes the Soviet Union.

Two prominent women leaders — Mrs. Kano Jodai, president of the Japan Women's University, and Mrs. Umaki Umura, national chairman of the YWCA—joined Shigeto Tsuru of Hitosubashi University, and Prof. Hyoe Ouchi of Tokyo University, at Omuta in southern Japan. Representing 3½ million workers, its general council unanimously adopted a resolution opposing the trip and charging the Kishi government with trying to go to the United States on a special mission to urge American labor organization to cancel the demand for cancellation of the visit. Mrs. Uemura was one of three others selected by the left-wing Sohyo to go to the United States on the visit. The Sohyo opened a special convention.

Text of Rhee's Statement on Korean Political Crisis

The Washington Post

SEOUL, April 24 (UPI) Following is the text of President Syngman Rhee's statement today on the government crisis:

Washington, D.C.

The terrible tragedy of April 19 has left a deep scar upon Korea and the hearts of our people. Our beloved nation has been shaken and our prestige in the Free world has been grievously damaged.

I have no words to express the depth of my sorrow for the shocking loss of life. All who died are members of our ancient Korean family and our grief is that of close relatives mourning the loss of their loved ones.

Especially our boundless sympathies go out to the fathers and mothers and the brothers and sisters of those young people who laid down their lives so prematurely.

We pray to God that the wounded will be healed quickly, and that never again shall we suffer such pain and such disgrace.

[redacted] Conscience

Examine

In examining my own conscience I have carefully considered my thoughts and actions as the nation's chief executive for almost 12 years.

I believed it was essential to establish strong political parties in order to have a democratic nation and to help bring about liberation of the northern half of our country from the Communists. It seemed that partisanship would permit moderate differences and lead to a national policy reflecting various points of view.

Political parties would eliminate excesses of factionalism, I though, and strengthen the application of democratic principles. As in other free nations this should have led to free and strongly constructive government—or so I hoped.

Consequently I not only founded the Liberal Party but sought to encourage a sound opposition.

Right or wrong, for better or worse, parties are now established. They cannot be wished out of existence—only made better.

But I have come to think that it will be better for me—as the president—to divorce myself from the Party and seek to serve the nation solely as its chief executive as the head of its administration.

From such a position and without partisan interest or inclination I can join our people in encouraging political parties to purify themselves and serve the interests of the nation unselfishly.

Fresh Approach Cited

All our parties should stand for freedom and for democratic practice in all things. When they do, the liberties and the safety of the people will be augmented, and our parliamentary representatives will be able to enact sound laws and develop healthy and honest institutions to serve nation and people.

Additionally, and to encourage the implementation of these changes, I hope that our government administration will be taken completely out of politics. Public servants then will be able to carry out their duties with honest and complete fairness. Thus can we correct the mistakes of the past and assure Korea of efficient and corruptless administration.

At the same time, such a fresh, objective approach to government will assure impartial justice in punishing those whose guilt is connected with the recent civil disturbances. We want no retribution, but we do want the punishment of any who murdered and destroyed, and we must have a government trusted by all to make certain that such is the case.

These are fundamental changes, and they will be made as rapidly as possible.

Members of the Cabinet have already tendered their resignations in order to accept the responsibility for what has happened. These resignations will be accepted.

Seeks New Leaders

I am now trying to find new and able men to head the various departments of the government. Only those who command the trust and respect of the people will be considered. In order to obtain such persons, I am consulting with elder statesmen and leaders from various walks of Korean life, and this without regard to their former political interest or lack of it.

Any delay will be solely because it is difficult to find men who are sufficiently outstanding, and also because I want to be absolutely sure that they measure up to the expectations of the people.

Government work is now piling up, and the appointments will be made and announced publicly at the earliest possible moment.

After that I know that the people will support the new ministers in their efforts to bring order and public service into the government, to enhance morale, to develop the nation's strength, and to lay sound strong groundwork for the unification of Korea under freedom and democracy.

I am personally confident that Korea will emerge from this time of trouble stronger and more united than ever before. As always, I pledge my own best endeavors and my very life to this cause.

The sorrow that has afflicted us strengthens my own determination to serve the nation and people selflessly and with greater success for all the days that may be left to me.

Syngman Rhee Offers To Resign Presidency If People Desire It

Rioters Seem Appeased By Statement

Pg. 1

From Wire Dispatches

Seoul, April 26 (Tuesday)—President Syngman Rhee, 85-year-old father of his country, has offered to resign and permit new presidential elections, Seoul's martial-law command announced Tuesday.

The announcement was issued as a milling, shouting mob of many thousands jammed downtown Seoul in menacing anti-Government gestures.

The demonstrations began at dusk Monday and went on noisily through the night and day.

One person was killed and 21 were injured Monday night.

Statement Issued

The announcement that Rhee would quit if the people want him to followed a third strong United States Government statement proposing that Rhee speed action on "justifiable grievances" of the Korean people.

The statement, issued by the U. S. embassy, called on Koreans to support efforts to restore order, but said "there is an equally deep obligation on the part of the authorities to take immediate adequate action to meet justifiable grievances."

"This is no time for temporizing," the Embassy said, adding it was "watching with deepening concern the anguish of this nation."

The martial-law command quoted Rhee as saying "since the March 15 elections are said to have been greatly fraudulent, there will be new elections called."

'I Will Resign'

"If the people want, I (Rhee) will resign from the presidency," said the statement broadcast by the Government radio.

In a four-point statement, Rhee also promised that there would be a constitutional amendment setting up a parliamentary-cabinet system of government.

And he said that Lee Ki-Poong, his controversial Assembly Speaker and vice-president-elect, is to resign all public positions.

Rhee's offer to resign followed his decision on Sunday to sever himself from his ruling Liberal Party. The party is blamed for alleged frauds and strong-arm tactics in the election that returned Rhee to a fourth four-year term.

Young Koreans, unappeased by Rhee's move to quit partisan politics, to dismiss his old Liberal Cabinet, and to take steps to choose a new independent Government, defied martial law and troops in the renewed demonstrations starting Sunday night.

Troops, Tanks Defied

More than 100,000 persons defied troops and tanks near the President's hillside mansion, shouting demands that he resign. They seized at least six army tanks and about 10 army trucks.

The students, winners in what was virtually a "student's revolution," broke into wild cheering when they heard Rhee's statement.

Only moments before they had threatened to storm the Presidential Mansion, Kyung Mu Dae.

Boy Shot In Head

An 18-year-old high-school boy demonstrator was killed in the turmoil. Seoul National Hospital said he had been shot through the head.

Sue. 4-26-60

Heedless of troop reinforcements and tanks pouring into Seoul, mobs were repelled twice by gunfire when they tried to break into the home of Vice-President-elect Lee.

Martial-law headquarters implied the shots were fired by police.

4 Buildings Damaged

Student bands destroyed or damaged at least four buildings, including a police substation near Lee's house and two homes and a theater owned by alleged leaders of a pro-Government gang that attacked demonstrating students April 18.

The night of demonstrations was touched off by a parade of 200 college professors, trailed by 5,000 youths and adults, who marched to the National Assembly demanding that Rhee, the Assembly, and the Supreme Court all resign.

Troopers, wearing gas masks and standing shoulder to shoulder, halted the marchers with tear gas.

U. S.- Japan Security Ratified While Reds Make Last Block Try

Mob Melts As It Learns Of Pact's Success

TOKYO — (UPI) —The new U. S. — Japan security treaty was ratified automatically a moment after midnight Sunday while a howling Red-led mob of 200,000 leftists besieged Parliament and threatened to burn the prime minister's home in a futile burst of fury.

The surging sea of humanity melted away with the realization the pact had gone through, but a horde of 10,000 fanatic students, many of them armed with axes, surrounded the residence of Prime Minister Kishi and made him virtual prisoner behind its locked gates.

Kishi in victory suffered personal defeat and shame. The mobs had forced him to cancel President Eisenhower's trip scheduled for Sunday in their campaign to smash the new security pact that keeps Japan on the Western defense team. And observers agreed Kishi now would have to resign, dissolve the Diet Parliament and call new elections.

Ten thousand policemen swarmed around the Diet, the Kishi home and the U. S. Embassy to cope with possible Communist or Zengakuren Student Federation attempts to storm the buildings in a rage over their failure to prevent ratification. Most of the police carried tear gas masks.

TREATY EFFECTED

The new treaty went into effect at a minute after midnight under a law making such documents legal within 30 days after approval by the House of Representatives. The House acted May 20.

The Socialist opposition party declared the treaty "null and void." But it would be law as soon as the U. S. Senate ratified it, an action expected quickly.

Police received word that the Zengakuren, spearhead of the extremist riots which began a month ago, would try to storm the Diet to plant a Red flag atop it and then try to burn down Kishi's home around him.

Estimates of the number of people who surged shoulder to shoulder through Hibaya Park before the Diet Saturday night ranged as high as 400,000, but the best conservative estimate seemed to be 200,000.

As the midnight hour passed, the "amateur" demonstrators - workers mostly - dwindled, leaving a hard core of Zengakuren students.

The students were in the vanguard of the mob that surged Saturday night in a sweaty mass through the park. The Zengakuren thoughtfully brought along a 500-member "hospital corps" to care for casualties should riots develop similar to those outside Parliament last Wednesday.

The mob chanted, sang, and snake - danced in lines that surged and heaved like ropes through the mass of humanity. There were various groups, each with its own leaders and signals. Communists tried to exhort the crowd to fury. Zengakuren student leaders shrieked "Kill Kishi" and shouted that they had scored a "victory" by forcing cancellation of the Eisenhower visit.

But the hate spark that triggered the bloody riots that left one coed trampled to death and 1,000 other people injured last Wednesday was missing Saturday night.

50,000 GATHER

Jap-U.S. Pact Stirs New Student Protest

TOKYO, Friday, June 3 (UPI)—Thousands of leftist students began massing in Tokyo early today for another mammoth protest against the U.S.-Japanese security treaty. The city alerted its 25,000-man police force in anticipation of violence.

About 50,000 members of the fanatical left-wing Zengakuren Students Federation were expected to turn out for day-long demonstrations at the Parliament Building and the U.S. embassy. The Zengakuren has been in the forefront of the most violent demonstrations against Premier Nobusuke Kishi and the new treaty.

The students vowed to storm the Diet (parliament) compound and the adjacent official residence of the Premier to back up demands for his resignation and the scrapping of the security pact with the United States.

Hundreds Injured

Hundreds of demonstrators and police were injured in previous demonstrations by students, members of the Communist-dominated Sohyo Labor Federation, and other anti-American elements.

Police officials said a task force of 12,000 policemen was mobilized to try and keep the demonstration from erupting into violence while the remainder of the police force stood by on special alert. The guard at the U.S. embassy, the scene of previous nonviolent protests, also was reinforced.

The students planned to demonstrate throughout the day and night. Early Saturday, they expect to march on railway stations to stage sitdowns on the tracks in conjunction with the nationwide protest strike called by Sohyo.

The demonstration and strike call came while the Japanese government was gripped by a serious political crisis. There was dissension in Kishi's ruling Liberal-Democratic party; the opposition parties were boycotting Parliament, and the 125 members of the opposition Socialist party have announced their decision to resign from the lower house.

The Socialists accused Kishi and the Liberal-Democratic party of abusing its majority in the Diet and thereby threatening the "very existence" of parliamentary democracy in Japan. The Liberal-Democrats approved the treaty on May 20 after 500 policemen bodily ejected Socialist members who tried to block the session by force.

Saburo Eda, secretary general of the Socialist party, said it believed the en-masse resignation of the members of the lower House was the only way to force Kishi to step down and dissolve Parliament.

The Red-led Sohyo called a general three-hour strike throughout Japan for Saturday, accusing Kishi of disregarding public opinion and therefore forcing his opponents to resort to force.

"We appeal to the nation that the general strike was inevitable to restore democracy and parliamentarianism in Japan and to block ratification of the security treaty," a Sohyo statement said.

Strike Illegal

The government has warned that such a strike would be political and therefore illegal.

There were these other developments:

1.—The International council of Youth Organization — which claims a membership of seven-million—endorsed President Eisenhower's visit June 19. It charged fifth columnists were behind the demands that the visit be cancelled.

2.—The opposition Socialists demanded that U.S. U2 reconnaissance planes be removed from bases in Japan. It charged the presence of the planes—the United States admitted three are based at the Atsugi Naval Station outside of Tokyo—placed Japan in "potential danger of nuclear destruction." The Socialists referred to Soviet Defense Marshal Rodion Malinovsky's recent warning that Russia would strike at bases of foreign planes violating Soviet air space.

Rioters Paid, Says Keating

WASHINGTON (AP)—Sen. Kenneth B. Keating (R-NY) told the Senate that Communist demonstrators in Japan were being paid $1.65 a day "to light the fires of revolt and keep them burning until Communist objectives were achieved."

He said his information on what he called a fantastically high rate of pay for Japan came from a highly reliable source.

Blaming the Communists for instigating and financing the rioting, Keating said Japan "has been sabotaged by evil forces operating from without and within."

"It was not President Eisenhower, nor Secretary of State (Christian A.) Herter nor the United States of America, it was the act of an enemy," he declared. "Anyone who seeks to make this administration the whipping boy is closing his mind to reality and the truth."

Kishi Steps Down In Japan; Leftists Maintain Pressure

TOKYO (AP)—Hayato Ikeda, an able and respected administrator but a question mark as a diplomat, Thursday took over from Nobusuke Kishi leadership of a bitterly divided liberal-Democratic party and prepared to step in as premier too.

The transfer of command from Kishi to Ikeda, remembered for the tough anti-inflation program which laid the foundation of Japan's postwar industrial boom, assured continuation of the basically pro-Western policies of the Japanese government.

An attack on Kishi by a knife-wielding ultranationalist at a victory celebration for Ikeda shocked the nation and marred the relief with which most of the country, tired of the anti-Kishi violent riots, welcomed the changeover.

STABBED 6 TIMES

Kishi was stabbed six times in the left thigh by Taisuke Aramaki, 65, who told police he only wanted to injure Kishi, not kill him. The Premier was rushed to a hospital, where doctors took 30 stitches and predicted he would recover in 10 days.

Undeterred by the incident—in fact, ignoring it—the leftist opposition which engineered the riots against Kishi gave notice it would continue the same pressure against Ikeda, as it staged a parade of 50,000 persons assailing the new conservative leader as a carbon copy of Kishi and demanding that he call early general elections.

Kishi, carrying out the first step of a promise made after seeing the new U.S.-Japan security pact come into force last month, resigned as president of the Liberal-Democratic party Thursday morning. In a party convention which followed, Ikeda, 60, defeated Mitsujiro Ishii, candidate of an anti-Ikeda coalition, on the second ballot 302-194.

In a victory statement, Ikeda told newsmen his first task would be to restore Japan's international prestige, damaged by the riots which forced cancellation of President Eisenhower's visit last month.

"We must pursue a policy that will command the respect of the Communist nations," he said. "We must not be made fools of."

Japanese Author Says: 'We Feel Akin to Negroes'

Black Doll Craze Hits Japan

TOKYO, Japan — A black-skinned plastic doll has shaken the traditional stoicism of the Nipponese here to such an extent that sociologists believe that Negro culture now seems to be Japan's one attraction.

In the fourth month of a phenomenal and hysterical craze "dakkochan," the name given a ring-eared red-eared doll, has been selling close to the 500,000 mark at the rate of better than 7,000 dolls per day.

The dolls' sale has surpassed that of the hula hoop which eventually found its way around the world and into the 5 and 10 cents stores of America.

■

DADDY of "dakkochan" (which means embraceable in Japanese) is 27-year-old Yoshihiro Suda who heads the planning section of the Tsukudaya Company, a toy-making concern.

When Suda introduced the doll to the Japanese market he was not too enthusiastic about its sale. Today, plagued by a mountain of unfilled orders, he cries, "the whole thing is crazy."

• Sociologists here have been quick to tag the craze as having deep social implications. The Japanese, having already attracted to Negro jazz more than any other American art form, are now being swept by "a Negro culture wave," according to Artist Setsu Nagasawa.

• Tensei Kawano, best-selling Japanese author, who has featured Negro characters in his last four books, declares, "We of the younger generation are outcasts from politics and society. In a way we are like Negroes, who have a long record of oppression and misunderstanding, and we feel akin to them."

The little doll is usually worn on the left arm, close to the heart. It is now seen all over this city with sales at such a hard pace that the big department stores along the Ginza have been forced to issue tickets which entitle customers to first choice when their depleted stocks are refilled.

■

ALREADY, the black market and underworld profiteers have been scalping these tickets for which long lines of people stand all night along entire blocks, waiting for stores to open in order to buy tickets.

Although the dolls cost a mere 50 cents in American money and the tickets entitling one to purchase "dakkochan" are free, the scalpers have been selling their tickets as high as $1.39 for a low-numbered ducat.

Dakkochan, 12 inches tall, is made of air-filled black plastic. Its U. S. plastic eye appears to wink when the light hits it at certain angles. The toy comes as girl dolls which have plastic grass skirts and boy dakkochans.

Kishi in Hospital; Ikeda New Premier

Washington Post, D.C., Fri. 7/15/60, P. A4

Japanese Premier Nobusuke Kishi was carried from his official residence by members of the Liberal-Democratic Party early yesterday following the stabbing of the Premier by Taisuke Aramaki, shown in panel at right surrounded by photographers and police. Tokyo police said Aramaki, a rightiest fanatic, stabbed Kishi six times.

TOKYO, July 14 (AP)—Hayato Ikeda, an able and respected administrator but a questio nmark as a diplomat, today took over from Nobusuke Kishi leadership of a divided Liberal Democratic Party and prepared to step in as Prime Minister too.

The transfer of command from Kishi to Ikeda, remembered for the tough anti-inflation program which laid the foundation of Japan's post-war industrial boom, assured continuation of the basically pro-Western policies of the Japanese Government.

An attack on Kishi by a knife-wielding ultra-Nationalist at a victory celebration for Ikeda shocked the nation and marred the relief with which most of the country, tired of the anti-Kishi violent riots, welcomed the changeover.

Kishi was stabbed six times in the left thigh by 65-year-old Taisuke Aramaki, who told police he only wanted to injure Kishi, not kill him. He would not explain the reason for the attack. The Premier was rushed to a hospital, where doctors took 30 stitches and predicted he would recover in 10 days.

[Kishi was attacked while strolling out of the dining room of his official residence, Reuters reported. The attacker, who posed as a convention delegate of Kishi's party, was immediately seized by Kishi's aides. He was identified as a member of extreme rightist Genyosha (Black Dragon Society).]

Undeterred by the incident—in fact, ignoring it—the leftist opposition which engineered the riots against Kishi gave notice it would continue the same pressure against Ikeda, as it staged a parade of 50,000 persons assailing the new conservative leader as a carbon copy of Kishi and demanding that he call early general elections. Elections are now planned for August.

Kishi, carrying out the first step of a promise made after seeing the new U. S.-Japan Security Pact come into force last month, resigned as President of the Liberal Democratic Party Thursday morning. In a convention which followed, Ikeda, 60, defeated Mitsujiro Ishii, candidate of an anti-Ikeda coalition, on the second ballot, 302-194.

In a victory statement, Ikeda told newsmen his first task would be to restore Japan's international prestige, damaged by the riots which forced cancellation of President Eisenhower's visit last month.

But the fight for party leadership had split the party deeply into two camps—the old-time party politicians and the bureaucrats-turned-politicians like Kishi and Ikeda.

Some party members speculated that Kishi's assailant was attempting to avenge an alleged "double cross" by the Premier in the fight over the party presidency. Bamboku Ono, party vice president under Kishi, charged Wednesday that Kishi had gone back on a written promise last year to make him the next Premier.

Past Troubles a Shadow Over New Japan Premier

By Day Inoshita

TOKYO, July 14 (AP)—"Let the people eat barley if they can't afford rice."

"We can't help it if 5 or 10 small businessmen starve to death."

These were statements made by Hayato Ikeda, ticketed to become Japan's Premier, as he pressed the measures which laid the groundwork for this country's postwar economic boom.

They made him no friends at the time and the latter statement cost him his job as Trade Minister in 1952, but big business, which fought him all the way, now respects and backs him.

The 60-year-old Minister of International Trade and Industry trounced Mitsujiro Ishii, candidate of a coalition rallying to the cry of "politicians against the bureaucrats," for the post of Liberal Democratic Party President, succeeding Premier Nobusuke Kishi.

Few question Ikeda's ability, toughness, or integrity as an executive. The question is Ikeda's ability as a politician.

Does he have the flexibility tact and skill to win over political enemies, to keep his party together and maintain a stable government?

He has that reputation for brusqueness which got him in trouble more than once. But many politicians feel the edges now have been rounded off the Ikeda personality. They say he is now more diplomatic and considerate in his dealings with others.

Ikeda, born Dec. 3, 1899, once was considered the wilful playboy son of a wealthy Hiroshima sake-brewing family. He has learned a great deal, his friends say, since his days as Cabinet Minister under the wing of pro-Western statesman Shigeru Yoshida.

He is beginning to talk more and more like a politician and less like a bureaucrat—a term in Japan synonymous with inflexibility, red tape and arrogance.

He recently told newsmen, "After ratification of the U. S.-Japan Security Treaty, our next task is reopening trade with Red China." He denied that this indicated a departure from his pro-American stand. A few weeks later, he followed it with a plan for doubling the income of every Japanese in 10 years.

Tear gas used on students, 473 injured

Birmingham News Birmingham Ala. Wed. 6/15/60

BY GENE KRAMER

TOKYO, Thursday, June 16—(AP)—Police fired tear gas today in attempts to disperse leftwing mobs in the most violent and bloodiest outbreak so far against Prime Minister Nobusuke Kishi's pro-Western government.

Thousands of howling students stormed the Japanse Parliament grounds yesterday, overpowered police and occupied buildings in a savage near-insurrection that ran on through the night.

At least one person and perhaps five were killed, and 473 were injured.

Kishi's cabinet met in an emergency session to deal with the uprising which broke only four days before President Eisenhower is due to reach Tokyo on his four-nation Asian tour.

KISHI

The cabinet branded the outbreak as a Communist attempt to overthrow the government by revolution and warned that it will not be intimidated.

Scarcely two blocks away, fanatical pro-Red students burned at least 10 police trucks in a show of force against the government and the U. S.-Japan security treaty.

STUDENT MOBS had torn down the Parliament gates, hurled bricks and staves at the outnumbered police in Kamikaze (suicide) charges and sacked a two-story annex to the granite Diet (Parliament) building. The latter was left intact.

More than 3000 rioters occupied part of the Parliament grounds for hours, shouting "Kill Kishi . . . Crush the U. S.-Japan security treaty" then joined thousands of socialists, communists and unionists rioting in the streets outside.

The opposition Socialist Party's secretary general, Saburo Eda, predicted the death toll would hit 10. Although his party has criticized violence, Eda said the heavy casualties have plunged Japan into new crisis which make it impossible for President Eisenhower to visit here next week-end.

The police had used only clubs and fire hoses in efforts to block the attacks on Parliament. They opened up with tear gas this morning.

Tear gas was last used here in 1952 May Day Communist riots which left one person killed and more than 650 persons injured.

OFFICIALS SAID in the new demonstrations 285 policemen were injured and 178 demonstrators.

Police followed up their tear gas barrage with a club-swinging charge into the crowd, littering the street with fallen students, including many co-eds.

"Smack them, smack them, don't let anybody get away!" shouted the police storming into the crowd.

Birmingham News

It put diehard students in full retreat.

Birmingham Ala.

The violence broke out shortly after Kishi's government yielded to socialist pressure and abandoned efforts to gain final ratification of the new U. S.-Japan military treaty in time for President Eisenhower's arrival in Tokyo Sunday.

Wed. 6/15/60

Kasaku Shinoda, public relations spokesman for Kishi's ruling Liberal Democratic Party, told newsmen the administration would recess Parliament for a "political truce, so that President Eisenhower's visit can be made a success."

More than 1000 police tried to hold the mob at bay.

"It was tantamount to an insurrection," said Shojiro Kawashima, secretary general of the ruling Liberal-Democrats.

IN CONTRAST WITH previous demonstrations, however, there was little initial expression of opposition to President Eisenhower's visit. The demonstrations carried only a handful of signs demanding cancellaiton of the visit he is to start Sunday.

Some injured students and police lay at the parliament gate, splashed with blood and mud.

The rioters overturned three police trucks and set fire to at least eight which had been massed inside the parliament gates.

MORE THAN 3000 students tore down the gates. Swinging staves and uprooted trees, they rushed into the grounds to rally for hours shouting "Kill Kishi! . . . Crush the U. S.-Japan treaty."

One mob wrecked a two-story administrative annex near parliament. The students evidently had enough strength to lay waste the imposing granite parliament tower itself, but they left it intact.

The violence broke out shortly after Kishi's government abandoned efforts to gain final ratification of the new U. S.-Japan military treaty in time for President Eisenhower's arrival in Tokyo Sunday.

WAVES OF STUDENTS repeatedly charged into ranks of club-swinging police. More than a dozen ambulances shuttled between Parliament and hospitals.

Here and there, bleeding students lay in the mud, unmoving and unattended. Every so often a mother or father would appear and try to pull their son or daughter away from the violent scene.

But the demonstrators, who included a number of co-eds, shrugged away from their relatives and tried to push forward.

Two hours after the invasion started, police said 3000 students were still massed inside the Parliament grounds. Students shouting over loudspeakers in the streets outside urged them on.

Demonstrators snarled words such as "murderers" at the police.

Milling about in the turmoil were several Socialist members of Parliament, identified by their red party sashes.

THE SOCIALISTS insisted they were trying to calm down the mob.

Kosaku Shinoda, public relations spokesman for Kishi's ruling Liberal-Democratic Party, told newsmen the administration would recess parliament for a "political truce, so that President Eisenhower's visit can be made a success."

Without the recess, the treaty automatically would take effect Sunday—the day of Eisenhower's arrival.

The treaty, providing for American bases in Japan for at least another 10 years, and Kishi's efforts to ram it through in time for Eisenhower's arrival had become major targets of a gigantic leftwing campaign in Japan.

THE U. S. SENATE foreign relations committee unanimously approved the pact yesterday, and final U. S. ratification is expected before Eisenhower arrives.

It was too soon to determine, however, if the parliamentary recess would halt the demonstrations against Kishi and the treaty.

A truckload of rightwing youths rammed into a group of leftist students outside the Parliament building today and a five-minute, stick-swinging fight ensued. Riot police restored order, and four injured were carried off.

Some 10,000 labor unionists snake-danced in nearby streets, carrying placards and shouting slogans denoucing Kishi and the security treaty.

But the demonstrating mobs carried only a handful of signs demanding cancellation of Eisenhower's visit to Japan.

Twenty-six persons were hurt in clashes between railway authorities and leftwing unionists who stopped or forced cancellation of nearly 800 early morning communter and freight trains in a widespread area from Hokkaido in the nort hto Kyushu in the south.

Japan seeks to end student protests

TOKYO, Japan — A top favorite with night clubbers in Japan is Jackie Wilson who recently closed a two - night engagement at Shinjuki's Club Lee.

A Victor Recording artist here, Wilson is under contract with the same organization that is sponsoring the appearance of Harry Belafonte in Japan in July.

Following Harry's tour, it is expected that Nat "King" Cole will also be sponsored by the same organization in an appearance here, before the end of the year.

Wilson holds the featured spot at the club, and following his closing tonight, he will go on a five - night stand outside of Tokyo. Emcee at the club is Jimmy Allen, who introduces Wilson in Spanish, English and Japanese. My host for the evening will be Tetsurou Kojima of the Nihonbashi Gallery in Tokyo.

Foreign newsmen, trying to cover the document exchange ceremony of the newly ratified U.S. - Japan Security Treaty were shut out of the Foreign Minister's press conference here, this week.

CONRAD CLARK

When the newsmen tried to enter the conference room, they were told that the conference was for "qualified Japanese reporters only."

A Foreign Office official inside the conference room held his foot against the door and shut it in the face of two Japanese - speaking reporters representing American wire service, and a British correspondent who was about to enter through another door, received the same treatment.

All that was said by the official was that the conference was "restricted."

AN ANNOUNCEMENT was made today by the Chuo University, closing the school until the beginning of the next semester in September, due to the political situation.

Another school, Meiji University, which had been closed since the bloody June 15 riot, will resume classes on Thursday (June 23), it was decided on Monday night at a meeting of professors.

Another educational note pertaining to the high schools was that the Metropolitan Education Board on Monday issued orders to the senior high school principals in Tokyo to do their utmost "to prevent students from participating in political demonstrations." The instruction further warned the principals to be most careful to be neutral while imparting political education to students.

Demonstrators Take Final Fling

. . snake dancers coil down Tokyo avenue toward Diet

By KEYES BEECH
Miami Herald-Chicago News Wire

TOKYO — After talking with Japanese students who have been demonstrating against Premier Nobusuki Kishi and the U.S.-Japanese Security Pact you are likely to walk away wondering who is crazy.

Take, for example, Miss Jun Yoshimura, 21, a medical librarian and surely the cutest little demonstrator I have set eyes on in weeks of demonstration watching.

We sat on the pavement outside the capitol building compound with about 20 other students who wanted to know what I thought as much as I wanted to know what they thought. As usual I was in the middle.

"I'm not brave," said Miss Yoshimura who stands about 5 feet and wore a blue beanie and slacks. "I'm even afraid to go to the bathroom at night.

"But I feel so strongly about Kishi I'm ready to risk my life. Eisenhower, Adenauer and De Gaulle are strong men. They do what they think is right even if people are against them.

"But Kishi — he goes every which way just to stay in office."

"But aren't you here tonight because Kishi won't do what you want?" I asked.

Several students giggled. Miss Yoshimura lapsed into mortified silence.

Another student, a handsome youth in an open-collared sport shirt, said he had come to demonstrate against the security treaty but wasn't sure it was a good idea.

"Why?" I asked.

"Because the stock market fell yesterday," he replied. "If the stock market is going to fall maybe we had better be for the treaty."

The conversation shifted to "police brutality" and "police-state tactics."

"It isn't fair that the police have pistols and clubs while the poor students have only their shirts to protect them," said Miss Yoshimura returning to the fray.

I pointed out that the police have never used pistols against the students and have used clubs only when ordered to in self-defense.

"If this was a police state you wouldn't even be here," I argued. "In Korea under Rhee, the police wouldn't have used clubs. They would have used carbines.

Red-hot Zengakuren students jumped in to say the police led them into a "trap" last wee when a 22-year-old co-ed wa trampled to death in a battle with police inside the capito compound.

"And how did you get into the trap?" I asked.

There was embarrassed silence while I pointed out they pulled down the Diet (parliament) gate and rushed inside to atack the police.

"But the police raised their clubs all the way up here when they are only supposed to raise them to here," one student protested.

I had no ansswer to that.

"If this is a democracy why are the gates to Kishi's house locked and barbed wire strung all around it?" another student demanded.

"Because you would go inside and tear the house apart," I said. There were chuckles from the group which had by now grown to 50 or more.

I read in an American newspaper that neutrality is best for Japan," another student said. "What do you think?"

"If you think you can trust the Communists then perhaps neutrality is best," I replied. There was a long thoughtful silence.

"We hate war," announced Yoshimura. "So do we," I said.

Another group of students pushed forward to replace the old one. "We want you to know there are many shades of opinion in Zengakuren," their spokesman said.

"We don't approve of the extremist leaders and violence We are not Communists."

"The why don't you speak up and do something?" I asked.

Mob Action By Majority Vote

That Japanese students who participated in recent Tokyo riots are more than a little confused is evident in some of the answers they gave in a lengthy session with a St. Louis Post-Dispatch reporter.

He talked to a dozen members of Zengakuren, the federation of Japanese student bodies, in their University of Tokyo dormitory. A little understanding of democracy, it appears, can be more dangerous than a little learning.

The students said their assault on the Diet was very democratic because they had voted to do it. They couldn't understand how the police could have seen the mob as anything but an extension of the legislative process, as the following extracts from the colloquy indicate:

Q. What should the police do in a case like that, where a minority interferes with parliamentary procedures? [Police used clubs and tear gas to resist the students.]

A. The police should defend the demonstrators . . . It is not proper that Parliament should be protected in this way against the people.

Q. Would you give the same right to the fascists if the situation were reversed?

A. We did it to prevent such circumstances [as fascist interferference with Parliament]. If the Parliament should be attacked by the fascists, we would go to its defense and help the police.

The reasoning then offered for this was tortuous, but it can be summarized this way: The student mob had the will of the majority on its side as proven by a recent newspaper poll. The newspaper had reported 58% of the people interviewed were opposed to the new U.S.-Japanese security treaty. Thus the "fascists," a vaguely defined group which presumably includes all those who favored the treaty, would not have had public sanction for their demonstration and the police would have been justified in suppressing it.

So much for that line of warped reasoning. The reporter later asked about the shouts from the rioters to kill Premier Kishi. The response was typically nutty:

A. If we killed him he would not die. He is a war criminal and essentially a fascist. He should have died after World War II. That he still lives means he could not die.

And so on, one absurd rationalization after another. It is apparent that some American ideas have rubbed off on the younger generation of Japanese but responses such as these leave considerable doubt that the inculcation of democratic principles has gone much beneath the epidermis.

Murder Of Youth, 16, Sparked Rhee Crash

Body Was Dragged From Masan Harbor, A Tear-Gas Shell Protruding From Eye

By GENE KRAMER
Associated Press Writer

Seoul, April 26.—For a moment the fisherman thought he had a big catch. Hopefully he pulled in the line. Then he froze with horror.

On the other end of the line, in the dirty waters of Masan Harbor, was the corpse of a 16-year-old country boy named Kim Chu-yul.

The single incident, three weeks ago, touched off the explosion of mass demonstrations which brought the all-powerful regime of President Syngman Rhee to collapse. The cost: at least 145 killed, more than 800 wounded, and a nation in political chaos, ruled by martial law.

Kim had disappeared during a riot in Masan protesting the March 15 elections. Rhee had been returned to office for a fourth term and his running mate, Lee Ki-poong, defeated four years before, had been elected vice-president.

Demonstrators charged wholesale fraud and police coercion.

In the demonstrations, Kim, who had come from a farm community 60 miles away to sit for the Masan Central High School entrance exams, disappeared.

When his body was found, the throng in Masan's dismal slums were horrified at what they saw. A tear-gas shell protruded from one of Kim's eyes.

Speculation still continues whether he was struck and killed by the shell or whether some policeman pounded the shell into his head and then clumsily threw the body into the sea.

But for two days thousands sullenly viewed the body at a Masan hospital. Throughout Korea it was pictured on newspapers' front pages.

Emotions erupted into Masan's second riot in a month. Demonstrators burned police substations and demanded the right to carry Kim's body to Seoul to confront the central Government.

Kim became a symbol of the victims of Korean police brutality. For years Koreans had seen increasing evidence of governmental and police restrictions, voting violations, and political interference in schools.

Repression by police is an old story in Korea—first under the Japanese occupation. Death and suffering became commonplace during the Korean War.

But this was a new generation of Korean youth, educated since World War II in the workings of democracy, no longer accepting any philosophy that life is cheap and suffering inevitable.

"We know how democracy is supposed to work and we don't think it's working right here," summed up a 19-year-old Seoul demonstration leader whose ambition is to be a banker. "We know too well the defects of communism to go for it."

The young people no longer would take such police actions as described by Kim Key-woo, the 19-year-old daughter of an ice manufacturer. Miss Kim was arrested in Masan while searching for brothers who had participated in demonstrations.

"When my turn for questioning came," she reported later, "a policeman struck my back with a piece of firewood. . . . During 30 minutes he hit me about 20 times with his club, all over my body, shoulders and back. I was in such a state of tension I didn't feel the pain."

The Government has announced it is investigating complaints of police brutality.

Book-carrying schoolboys and their brothers in college played the central role in the Seoul uprising.

More closely knit than students in America, the demonstrators, carrying placards with anti-Government slogans, were led out by their elected student-body president, cheer leaders, and heads of the student corps. Ironically, the Government promoted such groups, intending them to be a pro-Government force.

The impact of the first-day demonstrations closed major colleges of Seoul.

Rivers of students poured downtown. With an air of fatalism, they challenged police at the National Capitol. They surged into the most heavily guarded area in town, near Rhee's presidential mansion.

Tear gas exploded. Police fired blanks, then live bullets.

"We were temporarily stopped by tear gas and then suddenly something terrible happened," said a wounded student. "A couple of students beside me fell on the streets. Fear spread all over. Everybody started running in all directions."

But the marchers, now joined by thousands of high-school boys and nonstudents, became a charged mob. They seized fire engines. They attacked and set fire to what they considered symbols of a police state—Government-controlled newspapers, police stations, and the anti-Communist center which is headquarters for bully boys of Rhee's Liberal Party youth squads.

They were finally sent fleeing by the proclamation of martial law. Troops came. Police cleared streets with point-blank fire.

More than half of those killed have been high-school and college boys. Schoolgirls were killed, too.

But as one wounded survivor put it last week:

"I kept telling myself that I had fought for my country."

His Election Triggered Riots Rhee's VP Quits In Korean Crisis

SEOUL—(UPI)—Vice President-elect Lee Ki Poong, whose election touched off fraud charges that led to bloody rioting, has decided not to take office, his secretary said Saturday night.

The secretary said that Lee also had decided to quit his post as national assembly speaker.

The development came as a young reformist group within President Syngman Rhee's own Liberal Party announced it had enough votes to ram through the National Assembly a constitutional amendment limiting Rhee's power and establishing a parliamentary form of government.

Han Kap Soo, secretary to Lee, focal point in the worst political crisis Rhee has faced, said that the 63-year-old Lee had at first intended to say he had decided to relinquish the vice presidency when he said Friday that he was "considering" doing so.

He quoted Lee, assembly speaker, as saying that he did not make a definite announcement then "because of the confusion that would result if I resigned without measures to cope with the consequences."

Meanwhile, Pak Se Kyung, a spokesman for the reformist group in Rhee's party, said it had crossed party lines and gotten enough support from the opposition Democratic Party to pass the constitutional amendment in the assembly.

Associates said Rhee, who has been under pressure from the United States to redress "the justifiable grievances" which led to Tuesday's bloody political rioting, was contemplating a parliamentary-prime ministerial form of government.

He would retain the title of president but under such a system the presidency would lack the power the authoritarian Rhee now holds.

Part of the reorganization would include the 85-year-old Rhee's resignation as head of the ruling Liberal Party.

It was the worst political crisis for Rhee since he assumed power in the Republic of Korea after World War II.

A formal statement of his intentions was expected Monday.

The Liberal Party founded by Rhee was losing friends fast. The Korean Federation of Trade Unions announced it was severing ties with Rhee's party.

Students Run Wild In Korea

Few Are Injured In New Protest; Troops Fire in Air

By Edgar E. Clark
Herald Tribune News Service

SEOUL, April 25—The South Korean capital went riot-happy again this afternoon and far into the night, but this time, thanks to almost unbelievable control of troops, there were no confirmed deaths and only nine persons were reported injured.

The outbreak, again by university and high school students, was sparked unwillingly by the cream of the nation's intellectuals, some 200 university professors who felt they had to take some action or never again face their students without shame.

[U. S. Ambassador Walter P. McConaughy was reported at President Syngman Rhee's troop-guarded palace for urgent talks as the 10,000 students milled through the streets screaming "Kill Lee Ki-Poong . . . Deport him" and shouting "Down with Rhee," United Press International said. There were reports in Tokyo and Vice President-Elect Lee had fled the country.]

Rhee's Ambassador here blames Reds for Korean riots; denies widespread election frauds. Page A4.

Troops Wear Gas Masks

Troops in gas masks had fired dozens of tear gas shells and a couple thousand rounds o carbine and rifle ammunition—but all into the air—and tanks and inantry had torn back and orth in scores of directions.

The harm was done to the house of the more than unpopular Vice President-Elect. A group of students broke into it and ransacked it. Otherwise, there has probably been nowhere so much noise and activity with so little coming of it.

A really amazng angle was that all this could happen while the capital is under martial law. Time and again officers and soldiers stopped demonstrators and bystanders to explain "we are soldiers but we are Koreans too, and these are our people."

Frequently in the excitement and frenzy, youngsters would break through troop lines, bowling over soldiers, knocking their rifles to the ground and helmets from heads. At the worst of these tussles, mobile army loudspeakers warned that the troops would fire—and perhaps point blank—if the roughing up of troops continued. Not one such round was fired.

Professors Meet

Professors from the capital's 27 institutions of higher learning started it all by holding a meeting in the Seoul

National University hall. The session was illegal under martial law, but the professors went ahead with it after notifying the military governor.

In a lengthy, scholastic-like discussion they finally agreed unanimously on a 15-point declaration which supported the students. It called for new elections for Vice President, release of jailed students and punishment for those who red on and killed students. It also supported last weeks demonstration, excused damage students caused, demanded firing of politically-appointed professors and told students to stay out of politics.

Mustering up courage, 200 then marched some three miles into the capital center to the steps of the National Assembly building. There a elderly professor read the declaration, point by point, to the repeated cheers of speedily gathering crowd of students.

Rhee Stays In Seclusion

The Montgomery Advertiser

HONOLULU (AP) — Syngman Rhee, deposed Korean president whose flight to Hawaii stirred sharp criticism in his homeland, stayed in seclusion at a beach home Monday.

Newsmen were told the 85-year-old Rhee was resting when they asked comment on reports from Seoul that acting President Huh Chung had offered to resign because of National Assembly protests over Rhee's departure.

On his arrival by chartered plane Sunday night, Rhee said he and his Austrian-born wife, Francesca, would return to Korea. But neither said when they might go back.

Rhee said he had come to Hawaii for "rest and recuperation." Rhee lived in exile 25 years in Hawaii before World War II while leading efforts to win Korea's independence from Japan.

Rhee said he never had heard before of charges by Kim Yong Kap, vice minister of finance, that 20 million dollars in foreign exchange had been misappropriated while Rhee was president.

In Seoul, Huh told Assembly critics he considered Rhee's departure politically advisable because of the danger that the deposed president might be abused by counter revolutionaries.

Battle Sank Red Ship, Seoul Says

Atlanta Constitution, Atlanta, Ga. Sat. 7/30/60

SEOUL, South Korea (AP)—The South Korean navy reported one of its destroyer escorts shelled and sank a Communist North Korean patrol ship Saturday in a running gun battle.

The announcement said the action occurred in South Korean waters.

Three North Korean survivors were picked up off the east coast of Korea four miles from Kojin and 12 miles south of the truce zone dividing North and South Korea, the navy announcement said.

Four South Korean navy men were reported wounded.

The action lasted five minutes and was carried out at 5,000-yard range, the Navy added.

It was the first reported sinking of a Communist Korean navy craft by South Korea since the 1953 armistice ending the Korean War.

Tear Gas Breaks Up Students' Sit-Down in Korea

SEOUL, May 7 (UPI)—Republic of Korea army troops fired two bursts of tear gas bombs today to break up a sit-down demonstration of students in front of the Seoul City Hall.

A force of some 100 troops moved in to disperse about 100 demonstrators. Later the troops broke up a crowd of some 2000 who had been watching the demonstration in City Hall Plaza.

One student was reported injured. The demonstrators were demanding the resignation of their high school principal, Kim Jun Joon, who they charged had been affiliated with the Liberal Party of former President Syngman Rhee.

Martial Law has been in force since April 19.

The students dispersed as soon as the troops fired several tear gas bombs. The demonstrators soon regrouped and tried to rush in again, only to be met with another burst of tear gas.

The Seoul demonstration followed a series of student protest actions in big Korean cities this week demanding the resignation of the National Assembly in the wake of a bloody student uprising that forced the resignation of Rhee.

The army allowed a five-man delegation to present the students' complaint to city education officials, who told the delegates that since their high school is a private institution—founded by Kim himself—the Government cannot force him to resign.

At the same time, the District Attorney's office ordered the arrest of Kwak Yung Joo, former chief of Rhee's bodyguard, on charges of ordering "hoodlums" to attack student demonstrators on April 18.

Earlier today, Han Hi Suk, who was vice chairman of the Central Committe of Ex-President Syngman Rhee's Liberal Party and manager of its campaign, turned himself in at the Seoul District Attorney's Office. He had been hiding for almost two weeks.

He is accused of manipulating the March 15 elections to assure victory for Rhee and his running mate, former Assembly Speaker Lee Ki Poong. Rhee resigned last week, and Lee and his whole family committed suicide.

[The United States today assured acting President Huh Chung of its "fullest sympathy and cooperation" in running South Korea's caretaker government, the Associated Press reported.

[U. S. Secretary of State Christian A. Herter pledged support in a message delivered by American Ambassador Walter P. McConaughy.

[It was the first message from Washington to Huh since he took over from Rhee last week.

[Herter said the United States was "deeply appreciative of your expressions of friendship and cooperation on behalf of the interim government which you head," and added:]

["You can be assured that you have our fullest sympathy and cooperation in undertaking the multitude of difficult tasks which lie ahead, and in serving the cause of justice and peace for which your great Nation so bravely stands."

[Reconstruction Minister Chung Ye-Yong expressed hope earlier that the United States would increase economic aid to Korea as an expression of support to the Remocratic Revolution here.

[United States aid amounted to $210 million last year but has been cut to $180 million in the 1959-60 fiscal year.]

Village Chief Lynched

SEOUL, Korea — (AP) — A former village chief was lynched in revenge for a massacre nine years ago during the Korean war, the Donghwa News Agency reported.

Park Yungbo, 44, a brewery owner and former chief of Shinwon-myon, 150 miles southeast of Seoul, was burned to death by 70 relatives of the massacred.

It was the first vengeance death since the overthrow of Syngman Rhee's regime last month.

The agency said the villagers visited the graves of the victims and then went to Park's house. They accused him of failing to bring to justice those responsible for the shootings, beat him up and then burned him.

Eight policemen and 18 soldiers rushed to the house but were surrounded and attacked. More troops and policemen were called before order was restored.

The massacre—known as the "Kochang incident"—took place in February 1951. The mountainous area was infested with North Korean Communist guerrillas who relied on the villages for food and supplies. South Korean authorities ordered three villages in the area cleared to deny their aid to the guerrillas, and troops opened fire on villagers who refused to get out.

Rhee Destitute?

By Herald Wire Services

OUSTED President Syngman Rhee is portrayed by sources close to him as dazed and almost destitute. Some friends in Seoul, who decline to be identified, are casting out feelers for a pension for the 85-year-old statesman who founded the republic of Korea in 1948 and ruled it until a student revolt toppled him last month.

The idea of a pension, which South Korea does not provide for high officials, is under study by some members of the National Assembly, but they have felt it premature to talk publicly about it.

One party behind the move said Rhee and his Austrian-born wife, Francesca, have almost nothing to live on that their private home, Pear Blossom Villa, is in such shape that it cannot be heated in winter without costly repairs.

The picture of an almost destitute Rhee is disputed by critics. The stories while he was in office were that Rhee and his wife were at least as well off as the leaders of the president's free-spending Liberal party and that they owned considerable property in Korea and abroad.

IMMIGRANT WIVES SLOW TO INTEGRATE

WINNIPEG, Man. (Canadian Press)—The woman's confining world of the kitchen may be one of the major problems facing immigrants to Canada, according to the Netherlands Ambassador to Ottawa, D. J. von Balluseck.

Mr. von Balluseck, as one of the aspects of his diplomatic job, watches the progress of families coming to Canada from the Netherlands in their efforts to fit into the Canadian way of life.

Of the 3 per cent of the families who have failed to integrate and have returned to Europe, most moved at the urging of the wife, he said in an interview.

"The children have no trouble," he said. "They go to Canadian schools, associate with Canadian children and soon they are Canadians, speaking English and forgetting their native tongue.

"Men too get out of the home, meeting Canadians on the job and acquiring Canadian interests.

"But for the women it is different. They do not have the same opportunities to learn the language. They sometimes feel isolated in their homes."

MONTREAL, Canada — Stanley Augustus Clyke, executive director of the Negro Community Centre, Montreal, is preparing to wind up the busiest summer to date since he became its director 11 years ago.

In those few short years he has done as much as any one could in successfully coordinating the organization into solid body, making educational, recreational, and social opportunities available to the community regardless of race or color.

P. 22

Social work to Clyke is not only a job, it is indeed his life. There in the plain surroundings of his headquarters, located on the main floor of the huge Graystone building on Coursol street, he encounters many of the complexities of life which demand he be lawyer, doctor and social worker.

Montrealers are well aware of the role Clyke has played in important issues affecting the whole community.

Born and raised in Truro, a small town in Nova Scotia, Clyke completed high school and entered Acadia university in Wolfville, Nova Scotia, planning to study medicine however, in the thirties, at the height of the depression, work of any kind was hard to setg. He worked at a variety of odd-jobs to help finance his schooling including golf caddie and landscape gardener. Economic conditions worsened and he was compelled to leave college in 1931 with a Bachelor of Arts degree. . .

The next 18 years were spent as a railroad porter until he resigned in 1948 to enter McGill university, Montreal, to study Sociology. After his graduation with a Bachelor of social work, he accepted a position with the welfare Federation, Montreal's leargest social agency, becoming a director of one of its branches.

Canadian Rights Bill Bolsters All Freedoms

Washington Post, D.C., Sat. 8/6/60

C. A-6

OTTAWA, Aug. 5 (AP)—Canada's Parlianment has approved a bill of rights spelling out its many civil rights long guaranteed by existing Canadian law and legal precedent.

The formality of a third reading and final passage by the Senate was expected Saturday. The bill was whisked through the Upper House and approved on second reading last night after unanimous passage by the House of Commons.

"Now all that is required is that each of us mobilize in our hearts to make freedom work to a greater extent than ever before," said Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, who had made the bill a personal legislative project after introducing it on July 1—Canada's national holiday.

In a number of ways the bill parallels the U. S. Bill of Rights, but the Canadian bill goes a step farther and declares that Canadian rights exist "without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, color, religion or sex."

The bill then goes on to say that Canadians have the right to life, liberty, security of the persons and enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived of them without due process of law.

It guarantees freedom of the press, religion, speech, assembly and association, and says all Canadians are equal before the law and guaranteed equal protection under the law.

Structures Erected in 1951 Will Give Way to Gardens

By W. GRANGER BLAIR

Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, June 6—The weathered, cracked nine-year-old "temporary" buildings at the Palais de Chaillot finally are coming down.

After almost a decade of international conferences, the gardens, water basin and fountains of the Palais will once again become the domain of children, nursemaids, lovers and strollers and no unlovely edifice will spoil the view from the Palais to the Eiffel Tower and beyond to the Ecole Militaire.

The prefabricated structures, which over the years had earned many an unfriendly comment for marring one of Paris' loveliest sites, have been sold to a wrecking company for the equivalent of $60,000.

That is $1,940,000 less than the buildings cost when they were erected in the summer of 1951 for the United Nations General Assembly session.

Buildings Used By NATO

The next year they were turned over to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. They remained the alliance's administrative headquarters for eight years until the permanent North Atlantic seat was opened last December at the edge of the Bois de Boulogne.

Ironically, the final function of the buildings was to serve as a setting for the alliance's archenemy to attack the West. It was there last month that Premier Khrushchev denounced the United States and blamed President Eisenhower for sabotaging the summit conference by sending spy flights over the Soviet Union.

It is expected that the destruction of the buildings will take several months. When the material is cleared away, work will begin to restore the ramps and garden areas that flank the central basin and its fountains. This will cost $200,000.

Jacques Carlu, architect of the Palais de Chaillot and designer of the "provisional" buildings, does not regret their coming extinction.

"Ugly as they are," he says, "it should be remembered that they served a useful purpose with the United Nations and NATO."

M. Carlu, who built the original palais buildings for the Paris fair of 1937, expressed regret that his "temporary" structures were not destined to be dismantled and saved for use as a conference hall elsewhere in Paris.

The gardens and fountains of the Palais de Chaillot are public property. The last time the fountains were turned on was in 1951 for the United Nations session. The pumps and other water equipment will have to be repaired after their long period of disuse.

M. Carlu said the cost of running the fountains—$60 an hour—would restrict their use to week-ends and holidays after the grounds had been restored. This is the case with other fountains in Paris that are operated at the city's expense.

The permanent Palais de Chaillot contains a theatre and museum halls.

Integration in England

To THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR:

I should like to pay tribute to the cheerful way in which many colored immigrants to the British Isles, mostly West Indians, are adapting themselves to and integrating themselves into our ways of life. Speaking solely from my observation and personal contacts, it warms my heart to see these cheerful, philosophical people accepting strange conditions and environment with the utmost good humor, and settling down to do a thoroughly good job of work.

Most of those I see are in the employ either of British Railways or London Transport, and I am quite certain that the traveling public is the better off for their good service.

I can recall many dissenting voices being raised when the first batches of immigrants began to arrive a few years ago, and it is greatly to the credit of those same immigrants that those voices should now be silent. A. K. M. WESTON WEBB

SOVIET FIRST SECRETARY VALENTIN M. IVANOV

Red Diplomat Hoped For Future Service By Self-Styled Nazi

By Leslie H. Whitten
Staff Reporter

The State Department ordered Valentin M. Ivanov, First Secretary of the Russian Embassy out of the country yesterday for giving a self-styled American Nazi $500 to get a government job and wait for a chance to serve the Reds.

The 39-year-old deplomat, widely known here as a man about town, was declared person a non grata one day after The Washington Post reported how Roger C. Foss, 32, forged a 10-month link with Ivanov, then broke it June 14 to join George Lincoln Rockwell's tiny American Nazi Party.

Deputy Undersecretary of State Raymond A. Hare called in Soviet Ambassador Mikhail A. Menshikov to tell him Ivanov "grossly violated the established norms of diplomatic behavior."

Comments on Weather

Menshikov was pressed for comment as he left his 10-minute session with Hare and walked into the drizzling rain. "The weather is not very pleasant. That's all I can say," he told reporters.

A State Department spokesman said later that Ivanov was the highest placed Russian diplomat expelled from Washington in the past decade, and probably as highly situated as any forced to leave the country in America's 27-year relations with the Soviet.

Ivanov could not be reached for comment on his departure plans, but it was understood the State Department expected him to leave soon, probably through New York.

His wife, Antonina, an attractive gray-eyed woman of 34, and their son, Vladimir, 4, left for Moscow 3, apparently planning then to stay only for the summer.

File on Diplomat

Although the FBI declined comment on the case, it was known that United States counter-intelligence agents have compiled a thick file on the Moscow-born diplomat.

It stretches back to 1952-53 and 1953-55 when his activities while a member of the United Nations Secretariat in New Your brought him under scrutiny. Ivanov came to Washington in July, 1957.

Another Russian diplomat, Third Secretary Petr Y. Ezhov, was ordered out July 22 after he paid an American $1000 for aerial photographs of United States naval bases only to discover that the man was an agent for the FBI.

The Russians retaliated Aug. 10 by expelling E. M. Kirton, United States Air Attache in Moscow. Col. Kirton was charged with making "intelligence trips."

Red Reprisal Expected

Since then two American tourists have been told to leave Russia for "anti-Soviet activities." The State Department has branded the action part of a "somewhat hysterical" campaign to set the stage for the espionage trial next Wednesday of U-2 pilot Francis Gary Powers.

Officials expected the Russians to answer Ivanov's ouster with a new expulsion order just before of after the Powers trial begins. Such reprisals have been normal practice in the past.

The State Department said the stocky Ivanov "importuned . . . Foss to obtain employment in a United States government agency and gave him substantial sums of money for this purpose."

Foss said the sum was $500, but that Ivanov promised to pay for completion of his education broken off in 1951 after a freshman year at the University of Minnesota.

Foss, a sometime sailor, cook, counterman and clerk, claimed he always was a "Nazi in spirit" but decided to get information on emigrating to Russia because no one was waging the sort of fight against Communism he wanted.

"If you can't fight them you might as well join them," he said was his reasoning.

15 Meetings Held

A trip last September from his job in New York to the Russian Embassy here led Foss to Washington and some 15 encounters with Ivanov—known to him only as "Val," he said.

Foss said he took a Civil Service examination and Ivanov purged him to try to get a Government job. The two met often, drank, smoked foul-smelling cigarettes that were half filter, and ate Chinese food which "Val" loved, Foss said.

But Foss said he tired of waiting for the job and accepted a final $50 from Ivanov for a trip to Florida. Instead he headed for Arlington to join the Rockwell's party, of which he had read last spring.

Foss was told to register with the Attorney General as an agent for a foreign power after he told Rockwell of his Communist link and Rockwell set him to the FBI.

Two Charges in Rallies

Foss twice has been charged with disorderly conduct in connection with Sunday rallies held here by Rockwell's Party.

Ivanov, it was learned, made several efforts to reach Foss after the rapport ended. Menshikov, commenting on published rfeports of Foss statements, said yesterday "whatever was mentioned in the newspapers is not [illegible]

White, Colored Leaders Pray Together In London

LONDON (AP)—Feuding white and black leaders of the shaky Central African Federation carried their woes to a little country church Sunday and prayed for guidance, elbow to elbow in the same pew.

It was a rare sight in the 13th century Church of St. Peter and St. Paul which serves the Anglican community around Chequers, Prime Minister Harold Macmillan's country home.

The weekend conferees—guests of the prime minister in a move designed to sweep away some of the controversial cobwebs of the constitutional review which started in Lancaster House last week—all came to church together. Those who have been calling each other names worshipped side by side.

Sir Roy Welensky, the federation's white prime minister and leader of the fight to block the Africans from winning the right to secede, sat between two powerful enemies, Dr. Hastings Banda of Nyasaland and Kenneth Kaunda, political leader in Northern Rhodesia.

Nearby sat Joshua Nkomo, of Southern Rhodesia, Prime Minister Sir Edgar Whitehead of that state; Duncan Sandys and Iain Macleod, Macmillan's top ministers for Commonwealth and colonial affairs.

Dr. Banda read one of the lessons, a chapter from Isaiah which included the words, "Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in."

Banda has walked out of the formal conference and has assailed Welensky and the other white leaders of the two Rhodesias and his native Nyasaland. He demands secession now and has threatened strong measures — not excluding violence—to break up the seven-year-old federation.

Whether the peace of the church service indicated progress toward a compromise was uncertain.

SUKARNO DEMAND

Asia, Africa Summit Seats Asked

Montgomery, Ala.

SURABAJA, Indonesia (AP) — President Sukarno demanded Monday seats for Asia and Africa at the May Summit conference in Paris. He challenged the ability of his guest, Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev, and three western leaders to settle the issues of the earth among themselves.

"Let all the leaders who are going to attend the summit meeting be convinced that there will not be world peace without a real solution of the Asian and African problems," Sukarno told 50,000 Indonesians at a rally for the visiting Khrushchev.

This Communist-run city is a Red stronghold on East Java, but Sukarno's ringing speech drew greater applause than the words of Khrushchev, who once more made light of U.S. strength and endurance in the cold war. He compared the United States to a worn-out marathon runner.

Khrushchev, however, got the biggest welcome of his Indonesian tour on his arrival from Jogjakarta. Officials estimated 300,000 had turned out to cheer his ride through the city's streets.

The Soviet Premier spoke first in the public square, smiling from the palm-fringed platform at a sea of cheering, flag-waving Indonesians.

"The Soviet Union openheartedly is prepared to extend to countries in the East not only moral or political support but also material support which will grow every year," Khrushchev said.

The Premier said "the supremacy of the Soviet Union" had been proved by the launching of a rocket to the moon and next would come Soviet rockets to the planets.

"Our competition in the economic field with the United States can be compared to a marathon race," he said. "We are still trailing the United States, but this does not mean anything because they started first. Now the speed of the United States is slower. They are exhausted."

Afro-Asian Seat Asked At Summit

The Washington Post

Washington, D.C.

SURABAJA, Indonesia, Feb. 22 (AP) — President Sukarno today demanded seats for Asia and Africa at the May summit conference in Paris. He challenged the ability of his guest, Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev, and three western leaders to settle the issues of the earth among themselves.

"Let all the leaders who are going to attend the summit meeting be convinced that there will not be world peace without a real solution of the Asian and African problems," Sukarno told 50,000 Indonesians at a rally for the visiting Soviet Premier.

This Communist-run city is a Red stronghold in East Java, but Sukano's ringing speech drew greater applause than the words of Khrushchev, who once more made light of U. S. strength and endurance in the cold war. He compared the United States to a word out marathon runner.

Interplanetary Flight

[Khrushchev also said that Russia's "tremendous" new rockets, tested over the Pacific recently, will be used for flights to the planets and for launching a heavy earth satellite, Reuters reported.]

Khrushchev got the biggest welcome of his Indonesian tour. Officials estimated 300,000 turned out to cheer.

"The Soviet Union openheartedly is prepared to extend to countries in the East not only moral or political support but also material support which will grow every year," Khrushchev said.

The Premier said "the suremacy of the Soviet Union" was proved by the launching of a rocket to the moon.

Sukarno Takes Over

After the 65-year-old Russian sat down, Sukarno took over with an arm-waving speech that had the crowd applauding thunderously.

"I am surprised no representatives of Asian and African nations have been invited to thesummit," Sukarno declared. "I am very surprised indeed that only four big nations will participate in these peace talks.

"You know the first atomic bomb was exploded in Asia. Where are the most troubled spots in this world? In Viet-Nam, in Algeria—I tell you all are in Asia and Africa.

"I tell you Korea is divided, Viet-Nam is divided. Now let me ask you: Why are we not invited to participate in the talks for world peace?"

Reply to Khrushchev

At one point, Sukarno seemed to reply to Khrushchev's attacks on the United States and to the Soviet Premier's invitation to students at Jogjakarta Sunday to visit the Soviet Union and learn from it. Sukarno said Indonesia will follow its own road to socialism, maintaining friendly relations with both East and West. Then he added:

"Indonesia is friendly with all nations. It invites and receives presidents of all countries with equal warmth and open heart."

Once Sukarno gently kidded Khrushchev, and the crowd laughed. He had replied to those who criticized him for inviting Khrushchev to Indonesia by saying Communists were not devils. Then referring to his guest, the Indonesian President added:

"Look at him here before you. He is not tall. He is a little fat, He is quite simple, very modest and he represents 212 million people. More than that, this modest man represents some one billion people who follow communism."

No Bus Jobs In Turbans, Transit Firm Tells Sikhs

Courier-Journal
Louisville, Ky.

Badges On Headdress, Matching Colors Won't Help Any, British Company Says

By The Associated Press

London, Aug. 11.—The Sikhs of Manchester are pretty upset. The City Transport Company won't let them work as bus conductors in their turbans.

And even the sickest Sikh wouldn't think of wearing a uniform cap over his traditional headdress.

Applicants for the job offered to wear the company's insignia clipped to the folds of the voluminous material—the way Sikhs do in the army—but the company refused. They offered to wear uniform blue turbans, though Sikhs usually wear turbans of pastel blue or pink or brown and green. The company turned that down, too.

"We are not discriminating against the Sikh community on religious grounds," said Councilor C. R. Morris, who supervises the transit system. "It has just been a condition of employment that drivers and conductors must wear the uniform cap."

A Sikh in India wears a double-decker turban like those that Sikhs in Manchester, England, want to wear when driving buses.

Gyani Sundar Singh Sagar and five other Sikhs argued their case before a municipal committee Wednesday. The tale of the turbans started unfolding last year when Sagar applied for a job as a bus conductor. Sagar made these points on the side of the turbans:

The turban is part of a "proper Sikh's" life and has religious significance to him. More than 82,000 turbaned Sikhs were killed fighting in the two world wars.

"If Sikhs could die with the turban they should be allowed to live with it," Sagar said.

Appealing to civic pride, he said the nearby city of Newcastle-Upon-Tyne already employs six Sikhs on its buses—with their turbans.

'Turbans Would Add Color To The Scene'

"Turbans would add color to the scene," he said, "and probably would bring more passengers to see how hard and well we work."

Sagar said there are only 700 Sikhs in all of Manchester and it seemed unlikely the transport company would be flooded with job applications from them. Councilor T. U. Thomas agreed with the Sikhs, saying few people appreciate the significance of the turban.

"In the eyes of the Sikh," he argued, "it is the visible sign of his spiritual grace."

Writer tells Sammy Davis Britons abhor race abuse

LONDON — Sammy Davis Jr. was assured by prominent British columnist that most Britons are decent folk who abhor the racial abuse hurled at the famed entertainer June 7 by fascist whites resentful of his engagement to a white girl.

William Connor, columnist of the Daily Mirror writing under the pen name "Cassandra," wrote an open letter to Sammy which said:

"This is just to tell you that the beastly racial abuse to which you were subjected has nothing to do with what English people think and feel.

"I, and maybe I can speak for a fewothers (say 51,680,000 minus 100 of the population) feel revolted, an-;gry and ashamed at what happened."

West Indian Migration to Britain Is Up

N.Y. Herald Tribune
New York, N.Y.
Fri. 10-28-60

Trend Follows Drop After '58 Race Riots

LONDON, (UPI).—The flow of colored migrants o Britain from the West Indies, which slacked off last year following race riots is increasing again, according to a Home Office spokesman.

Experts estimate that if the present rate continues the number of West Indian immigrants this year will be 40,000 or double the figure for 1959.

The rush of West Indians to Britain has brought the non-white population close to the quarter-million mark. Most of them have arrived since the war riod this year.

Riots Slow Influx

So far the influx has resulted only in flashes of racial disorders. The worst of thes occurred in 1958 in the Notting Hill district, last year there was a new outbreak in the same district, and a colored man was killed.

The publicity given to the riots frightened off new migrants for a time. In the first five months of 1959, three were 3,500 West Indian newcomers to Britain, as compared with 14,800 in the comparable pe-

There appears to be on end to the migration. The West Indians are Commonwealth nationals and there is nothing to stop them coming to this country legally

At the moment there is little difficulty in absorbing them. Thousands of jobs are vacant in Britain, and the West Indians help fill them

Place in the Economy

"The Financial Times," commeting on the problems of the migrants, said it appears that "there is a real and permanent place in the economy for a large number of West Indians."

It said, however, that some prejudice against non-white workers still exists.

It said: "This is the major reason for the fact that West Indians are to be found mainly in the jobs that are least popular with British-born labor."

Among the jobs which the new arrivals are filling increasingly are those of platform attendants on the London Underground and as ticket collectors on the buses. This brings them into close contact with the public.

There has been little friction. The London Transport Board is reported keen to recruit more employees in the West Indies and bring them over here.

2,000 Shout 'Murderer' At S. Africa Leader

Commonwealth Heads Also Denounce Bias

Sat. 5-14-60

LONDON — (UPI) — Hundreds of Londoners, some shouting "murderer," demonstrated against South Africa's External Affairs Minister Eric Louw Wednesday in an angry outburst against "apartheid," or race segregation.

The crowds were held back by strong police cordons outside the South African High Commission (Embassy) office in Trafalgar Square. But they yelled at Louw as he left to drive to No. 10 downing st. for the Commonwealth prime ministers' talks.

Estimates of the crowd fanged from about 800 to 2,000. But it was far the biggest, noisiest Anti-Apartheid demonstration since Louw's arrival last Sunday for the Commonwealth Conference.

Earlier, other commonwealth leaders in a private meeting at British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan's residence at Downing st. took Louw heavily to task on the apartheid issue.

They were President Mohammed Ayub Kahn of Pakistan and the Prime Ministers of Australia, New Zealand, Ghana and Malaya. India's Prime Minister Jawzharlal Nehru also was present.

It was the first of a series of such private, informal sessions on South Africa which the Commonwealth prime ministers agreed to hold outside the conference room instead of making "apartheid," or racial segregation, a formal conference issue.

A spokesman announced that Louw would meet with other Commonwealth leaders, either individually or in groups, to discuss apartheid.

Ghana's Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah and Malaya's Tunku Abdul Rahman are two of the most outspoken opponents of "apartheid". Ayub Khan also has come out strongly against it.

British urged to pass rights law

The Afro-American Baltimore, Md.

LONDON — Great Britain needs legislation outlawing racial discrimination, the Church of England declared in a booklet issued Thursday.

"There are good arguments for supporting a campaign for legislation against certain forms of discriminatory behavior," read the handbook, put out by the Church Assembly Board for Social Responsibility.

"We have fortunately no set patterns of discrimination in this country, and many people are puzzled and hesitant in their reaction to their colored neighbors.

A law defining discrimination and forbidding acts of unwarranted discrimination (in jobs, housing and places of amusement) would set the tone we want and prevent the spread of the few acts already practiced."

The manuel also dealt with interracial marriage, asserting: "Those who marry across racial boundaries are pioneers. But in terms of general principle it is our considered view that there is no essential difference between marriages contracted by persons of the same race and interracial marriage."

There is good reason to hope the parents of interracial marriages would pass the pioneering spirit to their children. the book said.

'Nigger' Hecklers Besiege Sammy

Wed. 6-8-60

The demonstrators met Davis Tuesday night outside the Pigalle, where he has a $12,000 a week engagement, and heaped abuse on him for his plans to marry Swedish actress Mai Britt, 24.

Davis, 34, tearfully described the demonstration as "the most savage racial attack I have ever come across."

About 30 followers of Sir Oswald Mosley, British fascist leader and head of a "keep Britain white" campaign waved banners at Davis. They said: "Go home, Nigger," "Sammy, back to the trees, says Mosley," and "Get divorced first, Slag." (Slag is an uncomplimentary term for a white woman who associates with Negroes.)

As Davis rode away in his chauffeur-driven limousine, the demonstrators followed in a loudspeaker truck and repeated their slogans.

Davis, contacted in his Mayfair Hotel room, was upset and said he hoped "the news of this thing won't be spread all over the U.S. because this way it will only do me a lot of harm."

"This thing is the result of a lunatic fringe, but I never expected to see it here in England," he added. "This could never happen in the U.S. — maybe in the South, like Mississippi.

Davis said Monday that he and Miss Britt probably would make their home in Los Angeles. They hope to be married in London in September, after her divorce is final.

Rioting Ends British Beaulieu Jazz Festivals

Boston, Mass.

London

London newspapers have found a small band of teen-agers guilty of the concluding of the five-year-old Beaulieu Jazz Festival.

Mon. 8-1-60

[A similar riot this year ended the Newport, R.I., Jazz Festival.]

The mass-circulation Daily Mirror, Daily Mail, and News Chronicle took a dim view of the group of some 100 teen-agers from a crowd of from 8,000 to 10,000 whose rampage July 30 nearly prevented the opening of the festival.

Boys wearing lion and bear skins and derby hats and girls with men's shirts flowing outside slacks caused a near-riot at the opening, held at Lord Montagu's stately home at Beaulieu, Hampshire County.

They swarmed over the musicians' platform and television lighting equipment, smashed bottles and glasses, and wrecked instruments before the artists could begin to perform.

Over-all damage exceeded $2,800, festival organizers said. Four persons were treated at hospitals for injuries, and two teen-agers were arrested for assaulting police.

Lord Montagu permitted the festival to continue July 31 but said, "We cannot have a festival of this form again."

"I think I owe that to local people and my staff, who are not trained pugilists," he said.

Showgirls Come To Sammy's Aid In London

Chicago Defender Chicago, Ill.

LONDON — (UPI) — American entertainer, Sammy Davis, jr., said tearfully Wednesday, that a demonstration staged against him here Tuesday night by 30 British Fascists was "the most savage racial attack I have ever come across."

The demonstrators, followers of pre-war Fascist leader Oswald Mosley, who now heads a "Keeep Britain White" movement, shouted "Go home, Nigger" at Davis as he left the London night club at which he is appearing.

Scantily clad showgirls and a stagehand came to Davis' aid with a counter demonstration that caused a brief scuffle before Davis rode away in his chauffeur - driven limousine. His car was followed by a van blaring insults over a loudspeaker.

Twelve tall redhaired showgirls from the night club's chorus line then walked out of the club and told the Mosley followers, "Go home and grow up." They were joined by a stagehand, who remonstrated with the placard-carrying men.

The demonstrators met Davis Tuesday night outside the Pigalle, where he has a $12,000 a week engagement, and heaped abuse on him for his plans to marry Swedish actress Mai Britt, 24.

Negro Teacher Struggles In London School

Atlanta Daily World
Atlanta Ga

NEW YORK, N. Y. — (ANP) — Color prejudice didn't prevent E. R. Braithwaite from flying an R. A. F. fighter plane during World War II, but for nearly two years after his discharge it kept him from engineering jobs in London for which he was scienticically qualified. Out of desperation, this British Guiana-born Negro turned to a profession so short-handed that it was willing to overlook the color line: teaching.

The job Braithwaite got was in the heart of London's tough East End in a school for troublemaking slum children. The vicious prejudice he met from the pupils, their parents and the neighborhood stunned him. He had drawn the toughest class in school—forty-six hardened fifteen-year-olds, most of them white. They wouldn't learn; they taunted, goaded him, hurled obscenities at him, necked openly. The school allowed no punishment of a pupil.

Braithwaite's struggle to teach them to be tolerant of race and religion, his eventual victory in willing them affection and respect are told in "To Sir, With Love," which Prentice-Hall will publish February 24. Underlying the classroom problem is Braithwaite's personal struggle to conquer his own prejudice against his pupils.

E. R. Braithwaite holds a degree from the College of the City of New York and Queens College in British Guiana. He has done post graduate work at Cambridge, and holds a diploma in health education from the University of London.

9 Arrested in Clash At London Race Rally

The Washington Post Washington, D.C.

Mon. 2-29-60

Reuters

LONDON, Feb. 28 — Fist fights broke out in the heart of London today as truckloads of hecklers clashed with crowds leaving a mass demonstration against South Africa's racial policies.

Police reinforcements arrested nine persons after throwing up a cordon around Trafalgar Square.

Violence flared when more than 10,000 men, women and children started home from an open-air meeting to launch a month-long boycott of South African goods.

Throughout the meeting, trucks carrying the ultra-rightists cruised around the square and other hecklers handed out pamphlets saying "Beat the Boycott."

The hecklers, bannered as supporters of prewar British Fascist leader Sir Oswald Mosley, tried to shout down Socialist chief Hugh Gaitskell when he took the speaker's platform at the foot of Nelson's column.

Mosley himself, 63-year-old leader of a new organization, the extreme rightwing Union Movement, arrived near the end of the meeting.

Mosley Walks Off

He walked off along Whitehall toward the Houses of Parliament after the fighting erupted and was followed by some of his supporters.

First sign of trouble came at the start of the mass meeting when a man scrambled onto the speaker's platform and shouted "Stand by South Africa." He was hustled away by police.

Gaitskell's remarks were nearly drowned out later when the hecklers circled the square and yelled.

The Labor Party leader said the purpose of the nation-wide boycott was to register a passionate protest against "a repulsive doctrine."

The boycott, organized for the month of March, has been supported by the British Labor Party and the powerful Trades Union Congress.

Carry Banners

About 4000 boycott-supporters, most of them white, carried banners condemning the apartheid (racial segregation) policies of the South African government.

The chairman of the meeting, the Rev. Trevor Huddleston, warned the rally that "there may be attempts to break up this meeting with violence."

"This movement is completely non-violent and we appeal to you to use no kind of violence if you are attacked," he said.

Cops Fight 2,000 To Halt London Race Riot

Chicago Defender Chicago, Illinois

LONDON — (UPI) — More than 2,000 persons battled police and each other with fists and feet in downtown London Sunday in one of the worst outbreaks of racist rioting ever seen here.

A number of persons received minor injuries in the melee, and 50 were arrested. Nine of them appeared in court Monday to answer charges of "insulting the police."

The fighting began when paraders headed by Sir Oswald Mosley, leader of Britain's prewar Fascists, tried to break up an anti-segregationists mass meeting at Trafalgar Square.

The fighting raged through the city to a point within a stone's throw of Prime Minister Harold Macmillan's official residence before order could be restored.

Before Mosley appeared on the scene, Laborite leader Hugh Gaitskell had appeared before a crowd of $10,000 at the mass meeting to demand a month-long boycott of goods from segragationist South Africa.

Fighting between the two groups started almost at once, and police who tried to interfere were punched or kicked. Motorcycle police charged into the crowds to try to restore order.

Sat. 3-12-60

Mosley heads an organization known as the Union Movement, dedicated to halting the immigration of Negroes into Britain. Thousands have come here since the war, notably from Britain's West Indian possessions.

At his headquarters later, Mosley said the outbreak was spontaneous.

Police Halt March On Mosley Offices

The Washington Post Washington, D.C. 18d

By Norman Runnion

LONDON, March 27 (UPI)—Nearly 1000 antisegregation demonstrators clashed with police here today in an attempt to storm the headquarters of Fascist leader Sir Oswald Mosley.

Mon. 3-28-60

The clashes broke out following a mass rally in London's Trafalgar Square to protest South Africa's racial policies. An estimated 20,000 persons jammed the Square to pay homage to the scores of Negroes shot down by South African police last Monday.

Scattered fights erupted during the rally between demonstrators—many of them students and members of Labor Party organizations—and heckling right-wing followers of Mosley.

Mosley suporters were shouting "Keep Britain white," and "We've got to get rid of the blacks."

After the protest meeting broke up, about 300 demonstrators chased after 20 Mosley supporters who ran down Whitehall toward the houses of Parliament.

Police closed in to protect fleeing Mosleyites and the crowd raced back to Trafalgar Square to pick up reinforcements.

Then nearly 1000 of them started marching toward Mosley's head-quarters near Victoria Station. Police cut them off as they neared Buckingham Palace, but the mob veered off in another direction and wound up in front of Mosley's headquarters.

Authorities rushed two truckloads of police from Trafalgar Square to the scene. They formed a cordon that kept the crowd across the street.

Mosley campaigned for Parliament last October on a "Keep-Britain-White" platform.

Before the Trafalgar Square meeting, the demonstrators marched in silence through London streets. A police spokesman estimated the line was 3 miles long.

The marchers carried placards and banners reading, "Stop the Massacre," "We Mourn the Murder," "Shame, Shame," "Apartheid is Apart-hate," "Kick South Africa Out of the Commonwealth," and "Seventy Dead—How Many More?"

The only outburst during the hour-long silent march came at Piccadilly Circus when a crowd standing on the sidewalk began chanting "stand by the whites."

Then nearly 1,000 of them started marching toward Mosley's headquarters near Victoria Station. Police cut them off as they neared Buckingham Palace, but the mob veered off in another direction and wound up in front of Mosley's headquarters.

Authorities rushed two truckloads of police to the scene. They formed a cordon that kept the crowd across the street.

British Innkeeper Refuses Service To Demonstrators

The News and Courier
Charleston, S.C.

LONDON (AP)—A defiant British innkeeper refused to serve drinks Saturday to 12,000 ban-the-bomb marchers striding crusader-like toward London. But he finally capitulated to the law and opened up his bar.

Sun. 4-17-60

It happened as the army of demonstrators against nuclear weapons trekked toward the end of their second day's march from Britain's nuclear arsenal at Aldermaston to London.

P. 10-C

The pub came in sight and the marchers encamped on a big green field in front of it. The thirstiest drifted toward the bar. Seeing them coming, the landlord slammed the pub's oaken front door and shouted: "I'm not coming out."

He came to the window and shook his head at the thirsty crowd.

Then a police sergeant and a leader of the marchers spoke to the innkeeper. The sergeant pointed out that a publican is required by law to serve the public. So the innkeeper opened the door gingerly and a flood poured in.

The tide of marchers swelled as the parade passed through small towns and villages on the 54-mile route from Aldermaston to Trafalgar Square. They marched to the jangle of jazz bands, cheered on the way by crowds.

Once there was a small engagement with a patrol of the League of Empire Loyalists yelling "Keep Britain white." A couple of smoke bombs — actually smouldering reels of film—were tossed into the ban-the-bomb demonstrators.

They tossed them back and went their jaunty, noisy way along the highroad that led to lodgings for the night in the Buckinghamshire town of Slough, about 30 miles from London. Their number then swelled to 15,000. They expect to reach London Easter Monday and hope to be 50,000 strong by then.

Among them were two young Japanese who joined the walk after attending the London conference on nuclear disarmament by world youth and student leaders. Hiroshi Komai, 19, from Tokyo, flexed his toes on a roadside and said: "I have seen both Nagasaki and Hiroshima. That is why I am marching today."

Africa and Racial Issue Strain Commonwealth

The Atlanta Constitution
Atlanta, Ga. Sun. 5-8-60

The Commonwealth remained intact last week as the chiefs of its ten member nations, meeting in London, sidestepped the explosive question of racial equality.

P. 8-A

The leaders agreed to discuss the focal issue of South African apartheid only informally. And talking to newsmen outside the prime ministers conference, Eric Louw, representative of wounded Prime Minister Verwoerd, said his country will continue its apartheid policies.

There's still a Commonwealth (Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana and Malaya), but the strain must have been terrific. And the Asian prime ministers will continue urging racial equality as the cornerstone of this strange edifice of nations.

Here, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution's special correspondent gives you the background on the global association on which Britain depends heavily for world status:

By COLIN JONES
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

LONDON, May 7—The Commonwealth is a comfortable, easy-going club that has no rules, with the possible exception that no rules shall be laid down.

So, if a move came to oust South Africa or discipline her for internal policies the other members deplored, she could rightfully complain that she was being accused of violating rules that have never been written.

All Sorts

What's more, the Commonwealth's process of evolution by improvization has produced a diversity of constitutional forms that defy human logic.

It is a family of 10 sovereign and equal nations that formally are united only in recognizing Queen Elizabeth II as its head. Two of the members are republics; three more contemplate republicanism; one (Malaya) has an elected monarchy that rotates every five years; one (Pakistan) has a president as head of state, who is representing his country at this meeting of prime ministers, and another (Ghana) is at the moment in the midst of turning its prime minister into a presidential head of state.

The last two countries, too, have systems of government that are something less than democratic. The government of Ghana has been putting its political opposition into jail, and Pakistan, for the last year and a half, has been run by little more than a military junta.

Could not this diversity of forms and practices be stretched to include an apartheid state?

It has long been clear that the most important role of the Commonwealth in the world of today is to provide the kind of easy, equal relationship between Western, Asian and African nations that they all need, but which is so hard to come by.

At the moment, the Commonwealth is composed of five white nations and five Asian and African nations. The independence of Nigeria, Africa's largest state, next October will halve the population of the dependent empire and place African and Asian members of the Commonwealth in a majority. Already, there has been talk among Indians and others of a choice between getting South Africa expelled and withdrawing themselves. The latter option is not to be taken too seriously, except as evidence of their intensity of feeling.

Expulsion?

There is no precedent for a request for a member to leave.

QUEEN ELIZABETH
Head of a Family

Presumably, expulsion, like admission, will require unanimity among all the other members of the club.

The older members, Australia and Canada as well as Britain, whose conduct sheet is not at all that clean on the race problem, are not yet convinced that expulsion is the right answer, and their view seems sure to prevail through the present gathering. (It ends May 13.)

But unless there is a dramatic reversal of the present policies in South Africa, it may only be a matter of time before unanimity is reached upon a move to freeze out the offender in order to establish a rule that Commonwealth members practice racial equality. When this happens, it will be done quietly; in public, it may look as if South Africa has merely resigned.

Anti-Jew Actions Spread In Europe

Slogan Daubings Occur Hourly; West Berlin Guards Synagogues

Mon. 1-4-60

By The Associated Press

Frankfurt, Germany, Jan. 3.—A wave of anti-Semitic outbursts, apparently touched off by the Christmas Eve desecration of a Cologne synagogue, had spread Sunday night to eight European nations. And West Berlin became involved.

Police of West Berlin found the slogan "Juden raus" (Jews get out) in red letters a foot high and a swastika painted over commercial advertising posters on Berkaer Square in the British sector. They announced they had broken up a rally of about 25 neo-Nazi students in a park Saturday night.

Police broke up a group of about 25 neo-Nazi students who met Saturday night in a West Berlin park, raised a swastika flag, and sang Nazi songs.

Police said the students, between 19 and 21, were members of the League of Nationalist Students.

Guards were posted in front of synagogues of the Western sectors of the city. The Berlin Jewish community numbers about 7,500 and is the largest in Germany. Before Adolf Hitler, there were 175,000 Jews in Berlin.

Elsewhere, reports of swastikas and anti-Jewish slogans daubed on house walls, churches, and other building came almost hourly from widely scattered places.

Anti-Semitic pamphlets were distributed in Copenhagen, "morte" (death) was scrawled on the wall of the Jewish center in Parma, Italy, and in London, the windows of two Jewish buildings were smashed.

Austrian police searched for vandals who smeared the word "Jews" on a Vienna synagogue. In Antwerp, Belgium, a probe was ordered into the defacing of the Jewish shrine there. Investigations were under way, too, in France and Norway.

Far afield, in New York, swastikas were painted on two city synagogues during the night.

Police said they believe the swastikas were the work of juvenile pranksters.

In Frankfurt, Prof. Franz Boehm, a leading member of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's Christian Democratic Union and chief delegate in the postwar German-Israeli restitution conferences, said in an interview:

"I think this is a synchronized operation, a sort of rallying signal to Nazi and Fascist elements all over Europe. They may only be a few but they use the old tactics."

Boehm said he considered as dangerous the theory that the defacing might be the work of Communist agents seeking to harm the reputation of the Adenauer regime.

"These outrages are certainly welcome to the Communists, but they would not act themselves," he said. "It would be too great a loss of prestige for communism if such a plot ever came to the light."

The Bonn Government has announced it will spare no effort in bringing to justice the persons responsible for instigating the defacings.

In a statement, the Government has voiced the opinion that the incidents are part of a planned action to discredit the Federal Republic abroad and some Bonn officials have privately hinted that they have the Communists in mind.

Evidence Mounts That Drunks, Hooligans Involved

On the other hand, reports from local investigators appeared to supply mounting evidence that a considerable part of the defacings in Germany was the work of drunken hoodlums or juvenile hooligans.

In various cities, prosecutors said they were certain that swastikas and anti-Jewish slogans had been painted by rowdies with no political leanings at all.

They said it appeared that the wide publicity given to the Cologne defacing on Christmas Eve had started a transient craze. Despite more than a score of incidents in West Germany alone, only four persons have been traced as definite suspects so far.

Jewish shrines and synagogues in Hesse and Bavaria were placed under round-the-clock police vigil.

Boehm called for a central investigation agency to find the masterminds of the anti-Semitic rash. He said West German efforts would be doomed if the probe continues only on regional levels.

Bonn Government officials said that contacts with police abroad to co-ordinate might be considered later.

Anti-Jewish Alert Urged

German Incidents Spread As Luebke Issues Appeal

Fri. 1-1-60

By HANNS NEUERBOURG

BONN, Germany (AP)—President Heinrich Luebke called on the West Germans Thursday night to increase their watchfulness against anti-Jewish outrages. Police were investigating vandalism in 11 towns.

In a New Year's Eve radio address, the white-haired president warned against complacency.

What is needed now, he said, is an "ever-greater watchfulness so that we may prevent such abominations which slander the defenseless and blacken the German name."

Investigators were still trying to find out what was behind the rash of anti-Semitic acts which began on Christmas Eve with the desecration of Cologne's new synagogue.

Results seemed slim. Three members of the extreme right-wing German Reich party were arrested after the Cologne incident. But there were many who doubted that this party, led by a former general of Hitler's SS, could be blamed for all the incidents.

After Cologne, swastikas and anti-Jewish slogans appeared in the industrial Ruhr, in Lower Saxony, in Hesse, and in the area around Nuernberg. In all these areas, the Reich party had been moderately successful only in Lower Saxony.

Slogans saying "Dirty Jew," "Heil Hitler," "Death to the Jews" and "Germany Awake" were smeared on churches, court buildings, shop windows, cars, street lights and house walls.

In some cities, officials said they were virtually certain that the slogans manifested a transient craze among juvenile hooligans started by the publicity on the Cologne desecration.

In others, officials were plainly worried that this was a resurgence of Nazi tendencies which might get out of hand. Yet others suspected that Communists, outlawed in West Germany, were behind some of the outrages in an effort to discredit the regime of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer among the Western Allies.

Anti-Jewish Slogans Appear Throughout Western Europe

ANTI-SEMITIC INCIDENTS POINT UP WEAKNESSES IN THE NEW GERMANY

The New York Times

By SYDNEY GRUSON

Special to The New York Times.

BONN, Germany, Jan. 2—Like the symptoms of some long-dormant disease, a rash of anti-Semitic incidents burst out in West Germany this week, scarring the image of post-war Germany for Germans and foreigners alike.

This was not the first time since the defeat of Nazism in World War II that synagogues and Jewish cemeteries have been desecrated, Jews threatened with violence or regrets voiced openly that Hitler did not wipe out all the Jews.

But not since the end of the war has any incident involving anti-Semitism caused such pain and soul-searching among the Germans as the Christmas Day defacing of the newly rebuilt Cologne synagogue with painted swastikas and slogans proclaiming that "Germans demand Jews get out."

"Measles."

Illingworth in The London Daily Mail

Glare of Publicity

The Cologne incident seemed to act as a signal. In the harsh glare of publicity focused on the meaning of the deed, a half-dozen or more acts of vandalism were revealed in widely-scattered parts of the country.

Most of them concerned Jews, but two Roman Catholic churches were also involved, a grim reminder that while the Jews felt the brunt of the Nazis' hatred, all faiths suffered.

In the mass of bitter reaction, only one or two German voices tried to measure what was happening here against what goes on in other countries. It is probably correct that the overt manifestations of anti-Semitism over any lengthy period are no greater here than elsewhere. But this was not the point for most Germans.

They realized, and the newspaper editorials and official statements reflected the realization, that the problem here has a special urgency because of the background of Nazi barbarity.

This idea was summed up best by the Frankfurter Allgemeine, one of the country's most respected newspapers, whose politics are right of center.

"Although people know that these evil deeds allow no conclusion as to the morality and capacity of the Germans in general," the paper wrote, "everybody agrees that these desecrations simply ought not to have happened on German soil.

"After Auschwitz, Maidanek and all the other sites of [Nazi] horror," the paper continued, "every new incident, no matter how isolated and atypical, becomes a new horror."

The perpetrators of the Cologne desecration were caught quickly. They were two 25-year-olds, a baker's assistant and an office employe, the former the son of a broken, poor home, the latter from a well-to-do middle class family. Both were members of the neo-Nazi German Reichs party.

The party is, politically speaking, an insignificant speck on the West German political scene. It has only 16,000 enrolled members and the Cologne branch, to which the two young men belonged, numbered only thirty persons. Everybody else considers it the ideological successor to the Nazis, although the party's leaders deny this.

Nazi Museum

After the arrest of Adolf Struenk, the baker's assistant, the police found a Nazi-like museum in the room where he lived. A poster in his clothes cupboard showed a Germanic eagle struggling with snakes labeled "Lies," "Corruption" and "Reason"—some of the Nazis' anti-Semitic catchwords.

No one believes that only members of the Reichs party are involved in the periodic outbursts of anti-Semitism here. The legacy of the Nazis extends over a far wider area of German society than the Reichs party even attempts to cover.

Just how wide is the question no one can answer accurately because as the years have passed since the Nazi era the tendency, as often as not officially sponsored, has been to bury rather than to stamp out what the Nazis taught.

Some of the leaders of the Jewish organizations reorganized in West Germany after the war have willingly gone along with this tendency. Their attitude has been that the less said the better, in the hope that the absence of Jews from the country's political and commercial life would prevent the recurrence of anti-Semitism.

There are only 30,000 Jews in West Germany now. When Hitler came to power there were almost 600,000 in Germany. Some of them were prominent in banking, commerce and industry. Jews played a major role in the arts and sciences and helped to gain world fame for German culture.

The remnants of this once flourishing community, mostly aged persons, have no special niche in German life. The Jewish centers are tiny, the biggest, of 5,000 persons, being in Berlin. The Cologne community numbers only 1,200.

The shock to these Jewish leaders of the recent events has been as great as to the political and civic leaders of the country.

In the opinion of most serious observers of the German scene, there is a far more serious reason for the prevalence of racial hatred than the existence of a splinter political organization such as the Reichs party. The reason, as seen by these observers, is the failure or unwillingness of educators to tackle the problem of how to teach the history of the Nazi period.

What Hitler Did

Repeated surveys have shown that most German school children know little or nothing of what Hitler and the Nazis did, except, perhaps, that Hitler built the Autobahns and wiped out unemployment. This silence in the schools has been compounded by an even tighter silence in the homes.

Sociologists have tried to explain why parents are afraid of the subject. Their theory is that practically everyone now more than 40 years old was involved in one way or another with the Nazis, and to explain the Nazis' guilt would be to bare their own share of the guilt. But no one has offered an explanation for the silence in the schools.

The official reaction to the latest outbreaks has been impeccable—too impeccable for the taste of the opposition Social Democratic party. A number of Socialist newspapers said that "all the telegrams, expressions of regret, etc., appear to be a matter of routine * * * prompted chiefly by the concern over the Cologne disgrace abroad."

Wide Silence

But this is not an issue with which political capital can be made, if past events are any criterion. The best political observers doubt that anti-Semitism will cost Chancellor Adenauer's Christian Democratic Union a single vote.

But the rash of incidents has provided the Socialists with an opportunity for airing anew various grievances against the Adenauer Government. The Socialists have accused the Government of laxity in getting to the root of the problem and they have reopened the question of former Nazis sitting as judges and being employed as school teachers.

It is unlikely that anything will come of these proceedings for the Government is not inclined to become enmeshed again in denazification, a problem that plagued the occupying powers after the war and the Government in the first years of its administration.

But, everyone agrees, it is a healthy thing that at least one of the major political parties is willing to try to awaken the German conscience to these problems once again.

LUEBKE REPROVES GERMANS ON JEWS

The New York Times

President Bids Them Strive to Prevent 'Hideousness' —Incidents Continue

New York

Fri. 1-1-60

By SYDNEY GRUSON

Special to The New York Times.

BONN, Germany, Dec. 31—President Heinrich Luebke warned the West German people tonight that incidents such as the Christmas morning desecration of the Cologne synagogue were dirtying Germany's name in the world.

He called on the Germans for a greater effort to prevent such "hideousness" and chided them for "a far-reaching overestimation of material achievements as opposed to intellectual, spiritual and moral values."

The spate of incidents inspired by the defacing of the Cologne synagogue continued, however. While anti-Semitism was involved in almost all the latest cases, the ideological range of the defacers was spreading.

The slogan "Down with the Jews" and several swastikas were painted during the night on the walls of a court building in Scheinfeld, near Nuremberg. A street in Burgdorf, near Hanover, was smeared with swastikas.

Church Doors Defaced

At Allersberg, also near Nuremberg, the words "Heil Hitler" and swastikas were painted on the doors of a Roman Catholic church. The entrance to a small factory in the same town and several other buildings, including the Town Hall, were also defaced.

Similar incidents involving a Jewish cemetery and shops were reported from Nienburg, a small town between Bremen and Hanover, and from Dinslaken in in the Ruhr industrial area.

In Offenbach, near Frankfurt, the police reported that several buildings had been painted with the slogans "Nazis get out" and "Ban the German Reichs party."

Two 25-year-old members of that party have been arrested, along with the district leader in Cologne, in connection with the desecration of the synagogue there. Gerhard Schroeder, the Federal Minister of the Interior, indicated last night that the Government was considering outlawing the Right-wing nationalist organization.

The Interior Ministry of Lower Saxony ordered special police guards placed on all important monuments and similar measures were taken in a number of other states. The Cologne police maintained their guard on the synagogue and the homes of prominent Cologne Jews.

Police Minimize Acts

The tendency of most of the local police forces was to regard the latest incidents as the work of political youths and hoodlums and not as an organized nationalist outbreak.

Dr. Luebke's broadcast to Germans at home and abroad continued the New Year's Eve tradition of his predecessor, Dr. Theodor Heuss.

Dr. Heuss also went on the air tonight with a reminder to the German people that they had yet to master their past.

"The decisive question for Germany is to emerge from the romanticism of the nineteenth century, to come to grips with reality and to attain inner mastery without illusions but with a firm moral responsibility to the whole German people," he said.

President Luebke said that "one becomes deeply afraid because of such brutalization" as that shown in the Cologne synagogue desecration.

"I do not want to do the German people an injustice by generalizing about such revolting manifestations," the President added, "but it does seem to me to be necessary that each one of us should be ready with greater vigilance to prevent such hideousness, which insults defenseless people and dirties the German name."

He criticized the people for allowing "complacency and satiety" to creep into their lives and for permitting their isolation from the community because of "egoism, overspecialization in daily work and a rationalistic view of life based only on material success."

London Synagogue Daubed

Special to The New York Times.

LONDON, Dec. 31—Swastikas and the words "Juden raus" (Jews get out) were daubed last night on a synagogue in the sometimes turbulent Notting Hill section of London.

This is the area where race riots occurred in the summer of 1958 and where a Negro was stabbed to death last spring in an attack by white youths.

The police said they thought that the synagogue desecration, discovered early this morning, was an isolated incident by a group of hooligans. But they made it clear that they regarded it as an extremely serious offense.

Teen-Age Nazi Army Reported Training

London, Jan. 3 (AP)—A newspaper said Sunday an army of 50,000 teen-age Nazis is undergoing training in secret camps in West Germany to prepare for a fanatical purge of Jews.

The Sunday Graphic said the teen-agers wear Nazi-style uniforms of "gray or brown shirts, riding breeches and jackboots, leather belts with shoulder straps, and sheath knives."

"Aim of these fanatical boys and girls is to drive out the remaining 30,000 Jews from West Germany," The Graphic said.

COURT TRIES CASE ON HUMAN RIGHTS

The New York Times

European Tribunal's First Hearing Is on Irishman's Grievance on Arrest

New York, N. Y.

Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, Oct. 3—The first case involving a charge of violation of the European Convention for Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms was heard today by the European Court of Human Rights.

The case was brought before the court in Strasbourg by Gerard Richard Lawless, an Irishman who charges that he was illegally arrested and imprisoned in 1957 by the Irish Government for allegedly having belonged to Irish Republican Army.

The Court of Human Rights, established about a year ago, is empowered to hear cases initiated by individual citizens and to hand down decisions binding on the governments that have ratified the convention.

The convention has been ratified by fourteen of fifteen countries that are members of Council of Europe. The exception is France, which is a signatory to the convention but has not yet ratified it.

The opening of the Lawless case today was devoted to procedural questions. Thomas Woods, permanent Irish representative to the Council of Europe, contended that the court was not competent to consider the case.

He based his argument on a finding of the ESuropean Commission of Human Rights last December that the detention of Mr. Lawless had not violated the convention. Mr. Woods also brought up technical points about documents involved in the case.

Claude H. M. Waldock, chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, proposed in rebuttal that the legal issues involved were so important that they should be referred to the court rather than to a committee of ministers of the Council of Europe, as would otherwise be required.

Implicit in Mr. Waldock's argument was that since the commission's findings last December were approved by a narrow majority of 8 to 6, it would be wiser for the case to come before the court.

No Decision Given

No decision was made by the court today. Mr. Woods is expected to go into more detail tomorrow to support his Government's contention that the court is not competent.

Mr. Lawless is seeking redress from the court on the ground that he was illegally detained, without charge or trial, by the Irish Government from July 13 to Dec. 11, 1957. This detention, he contends, constituted a breach of the Convention, particularly of those articles that guarantee the right to liberty, security of the person and proper administration of justice.

There are fifteen members in the court and seven of them, headed by René Cassin of France, were chosen by lot to hear the lawless case. In addition to Ireland and France, the members of the council and court are Austria, Belgium, Denmark, West Germany, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Turkey, Britain and Greece.

De Gaulle Opposes Integrated Algeria In Talks to Army

By HENRY TANNER

Special to The New York Times.

ALGERIA, March 4—President de Gaulle let it be known today that he opposed integration between Algeria and France as strongly as he opposed "secession."

He repeated his belief that the Algerian nationalists were not likely to accept a cease-fire but would have to be defeated in the field.

[In Paris, those who had been hoping for an early settlement with the rebels were shocked by the President's indication of a long war that could be ended only by a French military victory.]

His remarks were made during the second day of his three-day inspection tour of remote French Army posts. They were reported by Jean Mauriac, correspondent for the French News Agency, the only newsman permitted to follow the President on his trip.

Yesterday President de Gaulle surprised his listeners and the world with his emphasis on the need for military victory.

The toughest excerpts from his statements appeared in huge banner lines in this morning's Algiers papers. They were generally interpreted as a triumph for the arm yofficers and conservative Europeans who oppose all forms of compromise with the nationalists.

Leftists Assail de Gaulle

But tonight European extremists demonstrated that they still hate General de Gaulle.

In leaflets signed "the Insurrectional committee," they accused the chief of state of having been "an accomplice in the assinations" of Jan. 24, the day of the extremist insurrection when fourteen Mobile Guards and six civilians were killed.

The extremists contend that the Government provoked the bloodshed to discredit the insurgents and pave the way for their criminal prosecution.

The leaflets were distributed tonight in the main business streets of Algiers. They referred to Paul Delouvrier, French Delegate General, and Gen. Maurice Challe, commander in chief in Algiers, as "lice, scoundrels, traitors, liquidators and cheats."

The leaflets coincided with a whispered campaign by conservatives warning their sympathizers that President de Gaulle's statements to the army were a smoke screen intended to conceal new steps toward a sell-out of Algeria.

According to some of his listeners today, President de Gaulle stated his opposition to both integration and secession in particularly solemn fashion.

"Separated from France, Algeria would not be able to live; on the other hand, the Algerian Moslems cannot be Frenchmen from Provence or Brittany," he said.

He had never before in such precise terms stated his opinion about two of the three solutions that are to be submitted to the Algerian voters as a result of his promise of self-determination.

He left no doubt that he preferred the third solution, some kind of close association between France and Algeria.

"We must not go back to what existed before," he declared, according to the French News Agency. "That is one certitude. The other certitude is that Algeria must not be separated from France."

He added that the form of the ties between France and Algeria would be determined "by the world situation and the vote of the population."

Shock Felt by French

By HENRY GINIGER

Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, March 4—The prospect of a long war in Algeria that could be ended only by a French military victory came as a shock today to some who had been hoping that a settlement with the rebels could be reached.

The prospect was presented by President de Gaulle in visits yesterday and today to the military posts of Algeria.

Officials of the Elysée Palace, residence of the President, insisted that nothing basic had been changed in the Algerian policy set by him. This policy rests essentially on the free exercise of self-determination within four years after peace is restored.

Noting the diverse reactions to President de Gaulle's latest statements, one official commented that there were some who were too much in a hurry to rejoice while others were equally too much in a hurry to become alarmed.

The rejoicing was done by the Rightists who had opposed self-determination and any cease-fire arrangement that would make its exercise possible.

In the corridors of the National Assembly these Rightists, who had backed the European settlers' insurrection in Algeria in January, expressed satisfaction that the President was coming around to their viewpoint: there will be peace in Algeria only over the dead bodies of the rebels crushed by the French Army.

Center and Left Worried

The Center and the Left, which had backed General de Gaulle fully in January, appeared taken aback by the somber future held up by the President. They spoke of contradictions or at least essential changes in emphasis from past statements by the President.

It was widely recalled that in his speech of Jan. 29, calling for an end of the European insurrection and ordering the Army to obey him, President de Gaulle said that a military victory could not bring a [illegible] settlement.

Other speeches in [illegible] optimistically predicted [illegible] peace were also contr[illegible] the ones now being [illegible] Army officers in Alg[illegible].

As for self-determin[illegible] though General de G[illegible] affirmed it, the [illegible] Paris-Presse went so f[illegible] say that the three opt[illegible] had been offered the A[illegible] had now practically b[illegible] duced to two.

The three options ar[illegible] pendence, termed secess[illegible] the President; integra[illegible] France, and a form o[illegible] tion associated with F[illegible]

He has been insisting in [illegible] last two days that France [illegible] stay in Algeria and that [illegible] pendence was "absurd" and "[illegible] conceivable."

But he also has appeared to condemn integration, demanded by the Europeans in Algeria and by the Army, by saying that the Moslems could not be like people from Brittany or Provence, two French provinces. Consequently, the only valid option, for General de Gaulle, is deemed to be association.

Rebel Spokesmen Silent

Special to The New York Times.

TUNIS, March 4—Official spokesmen for the Algerian rebels maintained tight silence tonight on President de Gaulle's statements in Algeria. But general disappointment was evident both among Algerians and Tunisians.

Al Amal, newspaper of the ruling Tunisian Neo-Destour (Independence) party, said that "the least one can say is that the words of General de Gaulle are harmful and do not bring nearer the hour of peace."

Circles close to the rebel Provisional Government here declared that President de Gaulle had closed the door to all negotiation.

Tunisians described his statements as "warlike" and said it was difficult to see any continuity in his thinking.

African Students Rip Russian Race Bias

Chicago Defender

FRANKFURT, Germany — Three African students have charged they were harassed with racial discrimination and threats while they studied in Moscow University.

The charge, designed to "expose Soviet colonialism" while Premier Khrushchev is in New York to address the United Nations, was made by students from Nigeria, Uganda and Togo.

Sat. 10-1-60

Theophilus Okonkwo, of Nigeria, Andrew R. Amar, of Uganda and Michel Ayth, of Togo, said they and scores of other African students are leaving Moscow disgusted at Communist pressure.

P. 3

In a letter sent to heads of all African nations, the three said "Students from all over Africa and the Near East are finding in Moscow that they are merely being used as agents of Russian power politics."

Chicago, Ill.

At a news conference the three held in Frankfurt, Okonkwo charged, "We left . . . because of constant discrimination, threats, restrictions on our freedom and even brutalities."

The disgruntled students distributed copies of a letter containing the charges sent to U. N. Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold.

Meanwhile, Khurshchev was wooing American Negroes, with an eye to distant Africa, by hobnobbing with Cuba's Premier Fidel Castro in Harlem, heart of New York's Negro population.

Seeks Officials To Cope With British Race Problem

LONDON — (UPI) — A British charity organization recommended that the country appoint community relations officers to help solve Britain's racial problem.

The Family Welfare Association criticized British police and unions on grounds they were not giving the nation's growing Negro population a break.

The report, drafted before the 1958 race riots in London's Notting Hill Gate section, recommended that community relations officers be appointed in boroughs which have a population of more than 5,000 Negroes.

London, has more than 50,000 Negroes who have immigrated to Britain from the West Indies, part of the British commonwealth.

The report stated that the immigrants often get into trouble because of their ignorance of English law.

"The attitude of a certain small number of members of the police force and one or two magistrates, has caused a few of our colored clients to say that they are convinced they do not have the equal protection of the law, especially in matters which have to be decided between themselves and Europeans," the report said.

"Why don't you go back to where you belong," is a typical remark made by a British policeman to a Negro landlord, the report said.

"If, as we believe, the economic and social integration of colored settlers is desirable, a much greater effort on the part of the trade unions is called for to convince their rank and file members that West Indians are not here to threaten anyone's economic security," the report said.

Employers should also give the Negroes a better chance at learning their jobs, the report added.

The association prepared the report for the trustees of the London parochial charities group.

Students Accuse Germans Of Bias

BONN — Negro students at the University and Institutes of Western Germany are complaining of racial discrimination exercised against them, according to reports in the West Deutsche and Die Welt newspaper.

The complaint of the students was presented at a meeting sponsored by the department of cultural affairs of the Bonn ministry of foreign affairs.

A student from Sierra Leone (Africa) said at the meeting that during his practice at a hospital "white patients would not allow me to make the diagnosis."

A student from Ghana said he had to leave the house where he was staying when the landlady's daughter returned because the mother had told him neighbors said, "a girl lived in the same house as a Negro."

Other students taking part in the gathering complained that people would not rent them a room or asked double the price, and others said on the streets or in streetcars they scoffed for being black.

In western Germany there are 21,000 foreign students of whom 8,000 are from African and Asiatic countries.

Schacht Presence Shocks Many

Hitler Henchman Appears At Dachau's Consecration

MUNICH, Germany, Aug. 5 (UPI).—The presence of one of Adolf Hitler's chief henchmen shocked many of the 3,000 persons attending the consecration of a church at the site of the Nazi concentration camp at Dachau today.

Hjalmar Schacht, the financial wizard who mapped the Nazi war machine's economy attended the ceremonies held in connection with Roman Catholicism's thirty-seventh Eucharistic Congress at the invitation of Munich Auxiliary Bishop Johannes Neuhaeusler who presided.

Dr. Schacht, who was found innocent of war crimes at Nuernberg, broke with Hitler late in World War II and was sent to Dachau where he met Bishop Neuhaeusler who spent several years there as a prisoner.

Dr. Schacht subsequently was convicted by a German de-Nazification court and sentenced to eight years in prison. However, after spending time in an internment camp, he was acquitted in an appeal action.

Thousands at Mass

Many persons in the crowd, including federal and local officials, termed Dr. Schacht's presence as "tasteless" and "shameful."

The congress' "Day of the Cross" began with a pontifical mass celebrated by Archbishop Adam Kozlowiecki of Northern Rhodesia who also had been a prisoner at Dachau. The mass was attended by thousands of youths, who later made the eleven-mile march to Dachau to honor the 70,000 persons who died there.

At the church, Bishop Franz Hengsbach of Essen delivered the sermon in which he said:

"Dachau lies before us like an open catalog of nihilism.

"Here the craze for destruction became part of a system of the perfect machinery. Here a collective sadism was let loose and spat into the face of men, beaten and kicked without inhibitions. Here inhumanity became the law of man. . . ."

Spellman Visits Units

The church, dedicated to Christ's agony, stands at the end of the two rows of barracks which housed the concentration camp's inmates. It is circular in shape, symbolizing the various religions, races and nationalities of the prisoners who died there.

In other developments in connection with the congress Francis Cardinal Spellman of New York, military vicar of the United States, continued his visits to American Army units. He was the guest of a special unit training in guerrilla warfare at Bad Toelz.

Some 150,000 women attended a pontifical service celebrated by German Cardinals Joseph Frings and Julius Doepfner honoring the world's women. Cardinal Doepfner said in the sermon:

"The new tasks put to a woman, the danger involved necessitate a soul, a center and depth."

Last night at the congress three cardinals and an archbishop washed the feet of 90 of the 300,000 persons attending the congress.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION CITED

African Warns Negro Students To Stay Away from Russia

Jacksonville, Florida

Sept. 9-6-60

BONN, Germany, Sept. 1 (UPI) — A 28-year-old medical student from Togoland today warned other Africans to beware of the siren call of Moscow University. The Russians classify Negroes with monkeys, he said.

Michel Ayih, now a medical student in Bonn, said the few American Negroes he met in the Soviet capital were disillusioned and unhappy and he warned other African Negroes who might be tempted to go to Russia to study that Negro students are discriminated against by other students and made objects of scorn.

Ayih said in an interview that he was directing his warning mostly to the 150 Congolese students whom the Russians have invited to Moscow on scholarships.

Lack of Liberty

Ayih said he left Russia July 8 after two years of medical studies at the skyscraper Moscow University. He reported a lack of liberty as well as racial discrimination exist there.

When he tried to switch from medicine to the study of international law and diplomacy, he said he was refused permission and told he must continue the medical studies he began at Rouen, France.

In school he said, students were told a surgeon was great because he was a Marxist, not because of his skills.

Reared a Roman Catholic, he said he was afraid to visit the Church of St. Louis in Moscow because a Ghanian friend had gone to Mass there and was accused of being a spy.

A Somali student who asked a girl to dance was beaten by four Russians, he said.

Africans are reluctant to visit Russian homes for fear of trouble with the police and in public places they are made objects of curiosity, Ayih said.

Jeered as Monkey

In an elevator at the university, he said, a student yelled at him, "You are no gentleman, you are a monkey." As he stepped from the elevator, he said the Russians on it jeered at him, "Monkey, monkey, monkey."

"The Russians consider us the animal most near to being a man, but still an animal," the medical student said.

Studying German now at a Bonn university, Ayih said there should be more openings for African students in Western colleges and universities.

"Often Moscow offers the only openings," he said. But he added that a few Africans with Communist leanings should, indeed, go to Moscow.

"Away from Moscow it is easy to become a Communist," Ayih said. "Those who were Communists when they went to Moscow lost the faith after they got there."

Water Traffic to Berlin Is Restricted — Reds Score Erhard's Planned Visit

Tues. 9-6-60

Special to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Sept. 5—East German Communists refused passage today to twenty-three West German barges bound for Berlin from Hamburg with coal, cement and other heavy goods, city officials said.

The new Communist harassment came in the wake of a five-day restriction of West German travel to the city. The restriction was lifted last midnight.

In another threat against Berlin, the official Communist press agency, A. D. N., said the scheduled visit here of acting Chancellor Ludwig Erhard of West Germany in the next few days was an "open provocation against East Germany."

City officials said the Communist police held up the barges at the frontier crossing point of Schnackenburg on the Elbe River ostensibly because they were too heavily laden.

An official of the West Berlin Interzonal Trade Office, which deals with East-West German trade, is scheduled to go to Leipzig, in East Germany, tomorrow to discuss the barge stoppage with Communist authorities.

The N.Y. Times

It is believed the official will threaten economic countermeasures, including a temporary ban on East-West German trade, unless the Communists end their interference with traffic to Berlin.

Erich Mende, leader of West Germany's Opposition Free Democratic party, said in Bonn today that East Germany should be told most bluntly, "any new infringement of the access to Berlin will met by the lifting of all obligations resulting from interzonal trade."

He said countermeasures should be taken immediately to halt developments dangerous to Berlin and the free world.

Franz Barsig, spokesman for the social Democratic party, without going as far as Herr Mende, suggested that the Allies and West Germany confer about measures to be implemented if the Communists continued their harassments.

The Communist police told barge owners at Schnackenburg that the water level of the Havel River, a tributary that leads to Berlin, was too low to permit passage of the barges. They refused to permit the barges to use an alternative canal route, saying this was "against regulations."

Trip Called 'Challenge'

City officials, although conceding possible technical difficulties because of the low water level, recalled that the Berlin blockade of 1948-49 began with Communist interference with water travel.

The Communist press agency called Dr. Erhard's plan to visit Berlin next Saturday "an open challenge." A. D. N. said Dr. Erhard, who is Chancellor Adenauer's deputy during the Chancellor's vacation, and Mayor Willy Brandt were planning "new open provocations against East Germany and its Socialist neighbors."

Herr Brandt said yesterday he would discuss counter-moves against Communist encroachments on Berlin with Dr. Erhard.

Traffic in the city and travel to Berlin on automobile routes and rail lines went back to normal today. Communist curbs on West German travel began last Tuesday, ostensibly to prevent West Germans from attending two meetings here last weekend of former prisoners of war and of Germans expelled from Eastern provinces now under Polish administration. Citizens of West Germany were barred from entering East Berlin during the five-day ban.

City officials said the Communist harassment affected 1,000 persons who were held up at East-West check points and refused passage to Berlin. However, 695 of those rejected flew to the icty in what Mayor Brandt has termed the "baby airlift." Air travel on commercial airlines at public expense was offered to everyone detained by Eastern border guards.

Jews Trickle Back To West Germany For Various Reasons

By CARL HARTMAN
Associated Press Staff

BERLIN, Jan. 16. — A quarter-century after the great persecutions of Jews began in Adolf Hitler's Germany, a slow but steady stream was trickling back — mostly from Israel.

More than 100 Jews a month were finding new homes—or returning to old ones. This, at any rate, was before the recent anti-Semitic outbreaks in Germany and elsewhere.

What effect the incidents—strongly deplored by official West German sources — will have on future relocation of Jews in this country remains to be seen.

Returnees receive $1,432 from the West German government to help them get established. This is aside from any restitution claims they may have.

The reasons for returning vary: A teacher: "I couldn't stand the climate in America."

* * *

A SMALL BUSINESSMAN: "Laws in Israel don't make it too easy for private enterprise. The money due me in Germany would have amounted to very little if I had it converted into Israeli pounds at the official rate."

A chef: "I don't think I could have made a good match for my daughter in Israel."

A student: "Germany is the one place in the world where I could come to get a degree in my specialty, and permission to work while I'm studying. Afterwards? No, I wouldn't dream of living here."

Some memories are hard to erase—a mother or a husband being dragged off to a concentration camp, while a terrified child watches from a hiding place.

"But it's no good living in the past," said one young woman active in Jewish affairs. "Many Germans who weren't Jewish had a hard time, too."

GRIM RECOLLECTION—Member of Hitler Youth—youngsters in Germany's vast anti-Semitic activity—burn books condemned as Jewish-Marxist. This was at Salzburg, Austria, in 1938. There is a resurgence of anti-Semitism in Europe today, but so far there has been no book burning. —AP Photo

Some, mostly older people, came back because of their memories — not in spite of them. Their recollections go back to youth and childhood before Hitler or before World War I. They want to return to the places they know best and the graves of their parents.

* * *

OFTEN THEY CAN COLLECT two old-age pensions, one from Germany and one from the land where they emigrated. And in Germany's booming economy it is not hard for them to get a part-time job or set up a small business.

At the end of World War II there were about 15,000 Jews left in Germany of the 540,000 who lived here before. Now there are 30,000 in West Germany and West Berlin. In 1957 and 1958 Jews were returning at the rate of about 2,000 a year. Since then, the number has fallen off.

Quite a few say they intend to stay in Germany only a few years, and then perhaps return to Israel.

In Frankfurt, Jews with this idea have formed a club where they speak only the Hebrew language. The idea is to keep alive their knowledge of that tongue, which they have little occasion to speak, but would want to know well if they want to live in Israel again.

Dr. H. G. Van Dam, general secretary of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, recently issued a blast against officials of American Jewish organizations for what he called interference in German affairs. He warned against turning in false alarms of anti-Semitism, with the remark that they might not be believed if there were a "real fire."

After the first swastikas appeared in Bonn, Van Dam called on Chancellor Adenauer, who pledged he would "find the wirepullers responsible." Van Dam was apparently reassured, and said he thought public attention given the problem placed it out of focus.

* * *

SYNAGOGUES AND JEWISH SOCIAL centers have been rebuilt in several German cities, with particularly handsome ones in Bonn and West Berlin. In accordance with Jewish traditions, great efforts are made to promote kindergartens and children's camps, and to watch over the health and social welfare of the community.

The picture is not all bright. Many Jews who have returned to Germany complain that it is still hard to find the jobs they want and feel qualified for. Others are lonesome, or disappointed to find the economic situation not quite as they expected it. Some are critical of what they consider the failure of West German authorities to educate young people about the crimes of the Nazis regime.

In Communist East Germany little Jewish life remains. The regime there has no sympathy with religion of any kind, and has done little in the way of restitution. People who have been persecuted are entitled to a pension, but it is not large.

There are a few synagogues, but rabbis for them are lacking.

Bonn Names Anti-Semitic Probe Group

BONN, Germany, Jan. 1 (UPI)—The West German government today recognized the wave of anti-Jewish incidents as a threat to the constitution and called in a secret service agency to round up violators.

There were signs that the series of swastika and anti-Semitic slogan smearings was abating. For the first time since Christmas Eve, when the Cologne synagogue was desecrated, there were no anti-Jewish acts reported in Germany today.

A government spokesman said the Constitutional Protection Agency had taken over investigation of the incidents. The agency is one of the three secret service groups directed by intelligence chief Reinhold Gehlen.

Under Federal Rule

Persons arrested by the agency are placed automatically under the jurisdiction of the constitutional court at Karlsruhe, which tries spies, illegal political party members and other persons charged with endangering the federal constitution.

The move meant anyone caught defacing a synagogue or scrawling slogans, whether motivated by Nazi beliefs or teen-age high spirits, would be taken out of the jurisdiction of local and state courts.

The government spokesman said the action did not mean there was positive evidence that the anti-Jewish incidents were part of an organized plan.

Federal press chief Felix von Eckardt spoke of such a plan last week and indicated either the Communists or organized neo-Nazis were behind it.

Reputation Damaged

Chancellor Konrad Adenauer decided to turn over the anti-Semitic cases to the agency after a secret cabinet meeting yesterday to discuss the wave of incidents that damaged West Germany's reputation abroad.

A West Berlin newspaper, The Telegraf, today demanded the dismissal of one of Adenauer's ministers as proof to the world that Germany had broken with its Nazi past. The socialist-line newspaper named Theodor Oberlaender, refugee minister, who admits he was a Nazi but denies he took part in Nazi atrocities as some Polish refugees have charged.

Police in Berlin raided the homes of 29 members of two banned neo-Nazi youth organizations and confiscated old Nazi newspapers and propaganda material.

The groups, the National Youth of Germany and the Federation of National Students, had about 70 members. They were disbanded on the grounds they violated the constitution.

Thirty-one persons suspected of anti-Semitic acts have been arrested in Berlin, most of them members of the banned groups.

Anti-Semitism Surge Dealt German, French Setbacks

The Montgomery Advertiser Montgomery, Ala.

Mon. 1-11-60.

BERLIN (AP)—Youths in Germany and France demonstrated their antagonism Sunday toward the surge of anti-Semitism, much of it blamed on fanatic young people.

A youth organization of the Christian Democratic party exhibited a documentary film about the horrors of Nazi concentration camps to a capacity audience of 1,200 youths in West Berlin.

In Paris, thousands of persons, many of them young people, braved wintry winds and paraded past the memorial to an unknown Jewish martyr in a demonstration to answer the rise of anti-Semitism in the world.

PARADE STAGED

West Berlin youth, who had staged a parade Friday night to protest against race hatred, had a meeting before the horror film was shown. Deputy Mayor Franz Amrehn praised them for wanting to know the truth about the Nazi era. Then the youths watched the French-made film, "Night and fog."

The film depicts ghastly scenes the invading Allied armies found in concentration camps in Germany. Some of the film is from German archives.

Gas chambers, piles of bodies, walking skeletons and miles of barbed wire are shown. The film ran commercially in West Germany and West Berlin theaters several years ago, but was not a financial success.

The parade in Paris was organized by the Representative Council of Jews in France. The marchers sometimes walked silently in the 25-degree weather, and sometimes broke into the Israeli national anthem or the "Marseillaise."

Most of the demonstrators were Jewish, but Protestant pastors, Roman Catholic priests and two members of the Communist party Politburo also participated. Some in the parade wore the striped uniforms of concentration camps or the yellow star of David which Jews were forced to display during the German occupation.

About a thousand of the demonstrators, mostly young people, later filed past the Paris town hall crying, "Down with the Nazis" and "Death to the hangmen." No incidents of violence were reported.

SWIFT ACTION

Fewer anti - Semitic incidents were being reported over the weekend. France, for example, reported not a single new swastika or anti-Jewish slogan had appeared on walls overnight.

But there was no letup in demands that steps be taken to stamp out anti-Semitism. British papers, for example, demanded Chancellor Konrad Adenauer of West Germany take swift action against neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic elements.

Among new incidents reported overnight were these:

Swastikas were daubed on a monument to 600 victims of German firing squads at Tamines, Belgium.

NAZI SYMBOLS

The first swastikas appeared on the Mediterranean island of Cyprus. Five of the Nazi symbols were found on buildings in the east coast port of Famagusta. The buildings are Greek-owned and have no Jewish connections.

In Recife, Brazil, black swastikas were smeared on a building of the archbishop's Roman Catholic college.

Another demonstration against anti-Semitism was held in the French city of Montpellier, where a swastika had been painted on a villa used by the Nazi Gestapo during the occupation.

Swastika Rash Revives Problem of Nazi Youth

The Sunday Star Washington, D. C.

But German Movement Is Nothing New And Its Political Power Is Slight

By CROSBY S. NOYES

European Correspondent of The Star

1-10-60

BONN, Germany, Jan. 9.—Transitory though it may be, the rash of swastika-smearing in Germany has focused public attention on a long-standing problem.

Among those arrested for outrages are a number of young men who have turned out to be members of clandestine nationalist organizations. In their homes police have discovered Nazi-like paraphernalia including uniforms, flags and pamphlets extolling the glories of the former German Reich.

This has caused some observers to accept the outbreaks as convincing evidence of a new and virulent nationalist movement. The fact is, however, that neo-nazism is not a new phenomenon. In a limited and furtive way it has flourished since before the end of the Allied occupation. In recent years its leaders—some of them prominent former Nazis—have concentrated their efforts on the youth of the country.

Recruitment has not been outstandingly successful, so far as can be learned. Authorities responsible for keeping tabs on these nationalistic youth organizations say they total at most about 60,000 members. This compares with the Democratic Federal Youth Association, with a combined membership of more than 5 million.

West German Police Guard Synagogues. Page A-3

Young Nazis Scattered

The young Nazis, furthermore, are scattered among hundreds of small circles or clubs ranging in size from a dozen to a hundred or more members. Between these clubs there is only the loosest kind of co-ordination. The names of organizations—"Young Steel Helmets," "Viking Youth" and so on—are changed frequently along with their secret meeting places.

What they lack in numbers, however, the Nazi youth clubs make up in fanatical spirit. Their meetings celebrating major Nazi anniversaries, including Hitler's birthday, are drenched in bitter nostalgia. Dressed in their brown shirts, riding breeches and boots, the youngsters regale themselves with martial music and readings from Mein Kampf and "lectures" on contemporary history.

The theme of these lectures has an unpleasantly familiar ring about it. To explain Germany's wartime defeat, the stab-in-the-back theory has been revived. Hitler is painted as a defender of Western civilization against the Bolshevik barbarians. He was, according to this version, frustrated in his mission by the blindness of Roosevelt and Churchill. Denial of Germany's war guilt is wholesale; history is retaught to purge the influences of "Anglo-American propaganda."

Divided on Cold War

In terms of the cold war struggle, the new Nazi movement is divided. While most organizations proclaim their hostility to NATO and to Germany's economic ties with Western Europe, some demand better jobs for former Wehrmacht officers within NATO's military structure. Independent negotiation with Russia is urged by others to bring about re-unification of Germany and the return of lost territories in Poland and Sudetenland. All are against Germany's present system of government.

Such co-ordination as exists within the Nationalist German youth movement is provided largely by links with larger national organizations. Among these, the most prominent is "the League of National Students," which boasts a membership of 800.

The league, which encourages the revival of dueling among its members as a manly form of entertainment, is active in a number of major universities, including those at Heidelberg, Berlin, Mainz and Marburg.

In addition, Nazi youth groups draw inspiration and support from various veterans' organizations whose activities and general attitudes are sometimes suspected of lacking democratic spirit. Among these the ultra-rightist organization of veterans of the former Waffen SS has come in for special attention from authorities, while the far larger Stahlehelm Association of ex-servicemen is by no means above suspicion.

Refugee organizations in West Germany pose a special problem. A large inflow of population from Communist East Germany has undoubtedly strengthened the current of nationalism in all parts of the country. And the exodus from Hungary inevitably included elements whose devotion to democracy is highly questionable.

The rightist groups are not without a kind of press. While all major West German newspapers are firmly democratic, a number of publishing houses have been heavily infiltrated by former Nazis. Besides innumerable pamphlets there are perhaps as many as a dozen ultranationalist periodicals being published regularly.

Disturbing as all this may be it adds up to very little in terms of real political power. The strength of the German nationalist movement is centered in the German Reichs Party, which polled less than 1 per cent of the vote in the last general election and won not a single seat in the Bundestag. Even in the party's so-called stronghold in Lower Saxony, its strength dropped by one-half between 1954 and 1958.

Even though the German Reichs Party has loudly disclaimed any responsibility for the recent outbreak of Nazi hooliganism—and fired the two members for desecrating the Cologne synagogue—there are stronger demands today for its abolition by Federal government authorities. Similar demands are being made for tighter control of student groups and nationalist organizations, and a number already have been formally suppressed.

This tougher attitude by authorities is being cited as one positive step considered long overdue by many critics of Chancellor Adenauer's regime. Along with the expected passage of a new law against incitement of religious and racial hatred, the banning of the Reichs Party is widely favored as a method of dealing with such disorders.

Some, however, are not so sure. Many members of the German Jewish community are opposed to legislation which tends to set them off from the rest of society as a special group. And those who hold that the final eradication of nazism in Germany is a long-term educational process doubt the effectiveness of repressive measures which will, they fear, merely hide the symptoms without curing the illness.

Above all there is the argument that this hangover from the Nazi era is completely out of keeping with the spirit and temper of the overwhelming majority of the German people today—and that this fact in itself is the best guarantee against its long survival.

Diefenbaker Urges Top NATO Parley

GREENCASTLE, Ind., June 5 (AP)—Prime Minister Diefenbaker of Canada called today for a top-level meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to examine worsening relations with the Soviet Union.

In a speech to a DePauw University commencement audience, Diefenbaker said heads of state among the NATO powers should get together to reassess what he termed Soviet Premier Khrushchev's tactics of "the carrot and stick."

Urges United Front

The Prime Minister said there is an immediate need for more consultation among NATO members to present a united front to the bewildering Soviet tactics of alternating affability and venom.

Diefenbaker, however, indicated he thinks it would be a mistake to try for another summit conference at this time. He said a premature summit meeting "would be worse than none at all."

He urged the Western world not to be confused by Communist switching of tactics.

"The NATO reaction to the failure of the summit meeting has passed through stages of disbelief, dismay and disappointment, but at no time defeatism," he said.

Calls for Restraint

"We must not be blown off course by Mr. Khrushchev's bellicose verbosity, ominous as it may sound. The language of insults is best answered with restraint."

Diefenbaker warned against allowing Russian handling of the U2 spy-plane incident and the summit conference collapse to cause the Western powers to retaliate with similar threats.

"In my reading of the press," the Prime Minister said, "I am disturbed from time to time that there are those who indulge in the dangerous course of vocal rocket rattling.

"I can think of no more sterile or irresponsible use of the responsibilities of office than tendency to brandish the symbols of military power."

Backs Open Sky Plan

Diefenbaker urged the West to examine carefully the merits of Khrushchev's latest world disarmament plan, much as they may seem doubtful at the start.

He renewed his support of President Eisenhower's open skies inspection proposal, offering the Soviet Union the right to make aerial surveys of Canada and its arctic territory in return for the right to make similar flights over Siberia

Pie For Khrushchev

The Dallas Times Herald

Causes N. Y. Bomb Scare

Raleigh, N. C.

NEW YORK (AP)— A travel-worn apple pie addressed to Soviet Premier Khrushchev created a bomb scare Saturday before police experts determined it was what its sender claimed it was. Among items in a five-pound package that arrived at the Soviet leader's Park Ave. residence Saturday morning shortly before he departed for the United Nations.

As it was hustled off by a police bomb squad, the sender—Virginia L. McCleary of Luling, Tex.—insisted the box contained what the label said: "pie." An apple pie.

Other Items.

In addition to the rather mashed pie, the box also contained: A metal chain and a locket inscribed with the Ten Commandments bearing a tag, "to Mrs. Khrushchev"; a card bearing the initials "N.A.A.A.P.", which police said stands for "the National Association for the Advancement of American People"; a dozen red erasers apparently intended for use with their accompanying toy rocket launcher, complete with launching pad and a note reading, "To Chairman Khrushchev: Please accept this rocket loaded with peaceful ammunition."

Police, who had deposited the package in a bunker at Ft. Tilden while they checked on Mrs. McCleary, said they hoped to deliver it to the Soviet delegation building later.

Mrs. McCleary and her husband, C. B., live in a small, neat house trailer four miles from Luling. They own but do not operate a small roadside stand.

She told Associated Press photographer Ted Powers that the apple pie she sent is symbolic of the American way of life: "Upper crust, lower crust and the goodness in between."

She said that had she baked a Communist pie, it would have an upper crust, lower crust "and nothing in between."

Mrs. McCleary said she may send pies to presidential nominees John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon.

The gaily wrapped package with the legends "perishable" and "don't tilt" was delivered shortly before 10:30 a.m. by John Galvan, a Railway Express driver who had picked it up at a company terminal.

Detectives, suspicious of its size, obtained a portable fluoroscope and plugged it into an outlet in the basement of the Italian Embassy's cultural institute nearby.

When the fluoroscope disclosed what appeared to be wires inside the package, it was hurriedly carried to a traffic island on Park Avenue and a bomb squad truck was summoned to take it to Ft. Tilden for examination.

Traffic was shut off on Park Avenue between 66th and 72nd streets during the 50-minute period police awaited the arrival of the bomb squad's special metal-mesh truck.

Newsmen and detectives standing near the Soviet delegation building were ordered into side streets.

Two diplomatic motorcades were allowed through the area during the waiting period, however.

In Texas, Mrs. McCleary was described as about 40, dark-haired, of medium height and thin. She lives in a farming community about three miles from Luling in south-central Texas.

It was reported that in September she wrote San Antonio news media saying she had "an important announcement" and would unveil an "American pie."

The letter said Khrushchev would be given an opportunity to eat "a special American pie" although "Mr. Khrushchev may not eat humble pie."

The letter bore a letterhead: "National Association for the Advancement of the American People."

Mrs. McCleary has appeared in past years at the State Capitol in Austin talking with officials about what she called her "crusade for honesty."

When her package arrived at Khrushchev's Park Avenue residence, it was taken to police at a building two doors north. This is normal procedure with all packages going to the Soviet delegation.

NEW YORK, Oct. 1—(AP) A travel-worn apple pie addressed to Soviet Premier Khrushchev created a bomb scare Saturday before police experts determined it was what its sender claimed it was. Birm. 10-2-60

The pie was among items in a five-pound package that arrived at the Soviet leader's Park-av residence this morning.

As it was hustled off by a police bomb souad, the sender —a Virginia L. McCleary of Luling, Tex.—insisted the box contained what the label said: "Pie." An apple pie.

In addition to the rather mashed pie, the box also contained:

A metal chain and a locket inscribed with the 10 Commandments bearing a tag, "To Mrs. Khrushchev"; a card bearing the initials NAAAP, which police said stands for "the National Assn. for the Advancement of American People"; a dozen red erasers apparently intended for use with their accompanying toy rocket launcher, complete with launching pad and a note reading, "To Chairman Khrushchev: Please accept this rocket loaded with peaceful ammunition."

Perishable, don't tilt

THE GAILY WRAPPED package with the legends "Perishable" and "Don't Tilt" was delivered shortly before 10:30 a.m. by John Galvan, a Railway Express driver who had picked it up at a company terminal.

Detectives, suspicious of its size, obtained a portable fluoroscope and plugged it into an outlet in the basement of the Italian Embassy's Cultural Institute nearby.

When the fluoroscope disclosed what appeared to be wires inside the package, it was hurriedly carried to a traffic island on Park-av and a bomb squad truck was summoned to take it to Fort Tilden for examination.

In Texas, Mrs. McCleary was described as about 40, dark-haired, of medium height and thin. She lives in a farming community about three miles from Luling in the south central part of the state.

It was reported that in September she wrote San Antonio news media saying she had "an important announcement" and would unveil an "American pie."

Chance to eat pie

THE LETTER SAID Khrushchev would be given an opportunity to eat "a special American pie" although "Mr. Khrushchev may not eat humble pie."

Mrs. McCleary has appeared in past years at the State Capitol in Austin talking with officials about what she called her "crusade for honesty."

When her package arrived at Khrushchev's Park-av residence, it was taken to police at a building two doors north. This is normal procedure with all packages going to the Soviet delegation.

Soviet Bids U. N. Compel U.S. Troops to Quit Korea

Sharp Statement, Linked to Decisions at Communist Parley, Charges That Unification Is Being Blocked

Thurs. 12-8-60

Special to The New York Times.

MOSCOW, Dec. 7—The Soviet Union, in what appeared to be a new diplomatic offensive, accused the United States today of blocking the reunification of Korea.

A Government statement demanded that the United Nations compel the evacuation of United States and other foreign troops from the divided peninsula.

It was the second Soviet Government statement in forty-eight hours that condemned the United States for pursuing what was described as an aggressive foreign policy. The first declaration asserted that "United States imperialism" was responsible for the dissension in the Congo.

The Soviet policy statements followed the three-week world Communist summit conference in the Kremlin. Western experts believe the strategy agreed upon at that meeting may now produce an intensification of Soviet diplomatic activity on East-West issues.

In a related development Liu Shao-chi, chief of state of Communist China, said at a meeting in the Lenin Stadium in Moscow that the United States was guilty of aggressive provocations.

"Our common enemies are the imperialists with the United States at their head," the Chinese Communist leader told his audience.

The harsh Soviet criticism of the United States in the two foreign policy statements appeared to follow the line laid down in the conference statement of the eighty-one Communist parties.

It was not clear how the conference may have affected Premier Khrushchev's expressed desire for a summit meeting with Western leaders after President-elect John F. Kennedy takes office.

A front-page editorial in Pravda, the Communist party organ, branded the United States as "the main force of aggression and wars." The editorial, which was commenting on the Communist manifesto published yesterday, added:

"With American help a hotbed of war is being energetically revived in the Far East.

The Soviet statement on Korea, published by Tass, the official Soviet press agency, was made in support of a North Korean memorandum, issued on Nov. 11, that demanded reunification of the country.

"The American occupation of the southern part of Korea is a main obstacle to the unification of the country," the Soviet statement said. It added:

"The United States' refusal to withdraw its troops from Korean territory, its unwillingness to join in a peaceful settlement of the Korean issue, the continuing agitation of American brass hats for the further strengthening of their military bases and the importing of mass-destruction weapons in violation of the armistice agreement: These are the elements of the aggressive foreign policy of the United States Government."

U. S. Wants Free Elections

The United States and other United Nations powers with troops in South Korea have taken the position that free elections must precede any withdrawal of their remaining forces.

The Soviet statement said that since the United Nations intends to discuss the Korean question shortly, the organization must permit representatives of both North and South Korea to take part in the debate. The divided country is not formally represented in the United Nations.

"The United Nations must also demand," the Soviet statement continued, "the immediate withdrawal of all foreign troops from the Korean Peninsula and also the abolition of the so-called Commission for Korean Unification and Rehabilitation, which it has been shown, clearly obstructs the country's unification."

Mr. Liu, one of Communist China's top administrators and Marxist theoreticians, declared support in his Moscow speech for Premier Khrushchev's thesis that there was now a possibility of averting world war "despite the mad arms race of the United States."

Today was the second time since the publication of the manifesto of eighty-one Communist parties that Mr. Liu had expressed support of the general lines of Premier Khrushchev's policy of peaceful coexistence and his thesis that war was not fatally inevitable."

Mr. Liu's statements made it apparent that the Communist Chinese and Soviet leaders have decided to bury the hatchet for the time being, at least on the important questions of war and peace.

Mr. Liu spoke this afternoon at a "friendship rally" staged in his honor at the Lenin Sports Palace in Luzhniki Park. The rally was attended by a capacity crowd of about 15,000 officials, party leaders, workers and students. Many of those present were Chinese.

The purpose of the rally—to demonstrate the "indestructible unity" of the Soviet Union and Communist China—was made apparent by the expressions of Mr. Liu and of the Soviet President, Leonid I. Brezhnev, who sat on the stage with other party leaders beside the Chinese guest.

Mr. Liu's speech consisted of praise for Mr. Khrushchev, an expression of Soviet-Chinese solidarity, a bitter attack against the United States and defense of the "great leap forward" program in Communist China.

He spoke once again, more briefly, on Soviet-Chinese friendship at a formal reception tonight in his honor at the Kremlin.

Mr. Liu said that the three-week meeting of the Communist leaders of eighty-one countries from East and West had been "the most outstanding event since the Moscow conference of 1957." At that conference, Mao Tse-tung, Chinese Communist party chief, helped to draft the document that guided world Communists during the last three years.

The new statement "has reaffirmed many problems facing the Communist movement and further tasks of the workers' parties," Mr. Liu said.

China Assails Imperialists

Special to The New York Times.

HONG KONG, Dec. 7—Communist China held firmly to its "hard" ideological line in newspaper comment today on the Moscow manifesto.

This was especially apparent in editorials in a TA Kung Pao and Kuangming Jih Pao, two papers used by the Communist Chinese regime for its more extreme declarations.

The Moscow Manifesto, Ta Kung Pao said, gave proof that imperialism would never change its aggressive nature.

The imperialists, headed by United States, will "burst into tears only at sight of their own coffins" and will never withdraw from the stage of history of their own accord, the newspaper asserted.

Kuangming Jih Pao said that the "insatiate greed of monopoly capital predetermines its aggressive and bellicose nature."

Rain, Boos, Jeers Greet Soviet Boss

NEW YORK (AP)—Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev indicated Monday he wants to talk about disarmament with President Eisenhower at the United Nations and thus, in effect, turn the coming U.N. General Assembly session into a world summit meeting.

The Soviet Premier and his red bloc retinue arrived Monday, to a soggy and coldly hostile New York welcome. Khrushchev at once suggested President Eisenhower should attend the Assembly session for "serious negotiations" on disarmament.

Related Picture, Stories, Page 2B

Khrushchev, beginning his second stay in the United States with a lecture to President Eisenhower, urged the President to take "really constructive" part in the Assembly session and avoid making just a "fancy speech."

ATTACKS HERTER

The boos and catcalls marking Khrushchev's arrival at a decrepit East River pier had hardly died away before the Soviet leader launched an attack on Secretary of State Christian A. Herter. He said he found "very strange" Herter's recent statement that Khrushchev's mission in the United States would be one of making propaganda.

Khrushchev said he objected to Herter saying "that the Soviet proposal regarding participation of leading statesmen in the discussion of the disarment problem at the Generally Assembly is 'completely ridiculous.' He called this "a strange sort of logic."

A U.S. spokesman at the United Nations retorted that Khrushchev had presented the secretary's remarks out of context. He said Herter was not referring to talks "by leading statesmen" but to talks by the heads of 82 nations on a matter so complicated as disarmament. The secretary continues to consider such a course ridiculous, the spokesman said.

NOTHING NEW

There was no other American comment on Khrushchev's arrival remarks except that the spokesman noted there was nothing unexpected or new in the Soviet leader's talk. He said President Eisenhower would make the U.S. position perfectly clear in his Thursday address to the Assembly.

Khrushchev and his advisers huddled at Soviet U.N. delegation headquarters on Park Avenue on their strategy for the history-making session.

Boos and shouts of "Murderer!" greeted the Soviet Communist chief as he stepped from the white-hulled Soviet ship Baltika to a rain-soaked, decrepit East River pier, to the echo of jeers from hostile longshoremen.

Apparently unperturbed, Khrushchev at once produced a 1,500-word prepared statement. In it he purported to interpret President Eisenhower's decision to address the assembly Thursday as raising the possibility of top-level negotiations.

"I am not sure whether I understand correctly the latest decision of the United States government with regard to Mr. Eisenhower, the United States President, taking part in the work of the General Assembly," Khrushchev said.

"The United States have, perhaps, reappraised their attitude toward the assembly meetings and have also come to the conclusion that serious negotiations can be undertaken in the United Nations to reach a disarmament agreement.

"Well, if this does not mean a fancy speech but really constructive participation in the work of the assembly, we would welcome such a decision."

Mr. K. Hits Discrimination Against Negroes In U.S.

(United Press International)

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. — Premier Nikita Khrushchev said Wednesday that unless the United Nations moves to eliminate "colonialism" the world's countries not yet independent should take to arms.

Thurs 11-3-60

Khrushchev also castigated discrimination against Negroes in the United States and branded as hypocritical "British benevolence" toward its colonies.

Russia will support them in their struggle, he said.

The Soviet Premier, who goes home Thursday, opened a final attack on the Western powers on two issues — colonial nations and the American U2 plane incident.

Khrushchev was seeking to have the U2 and colonial issues debated in the General Assembly rather than the usual procedure of hearing them in the political committee. He faced near certain defeat on both, such as he received Tuesday night in a similar vote on disarmament.

CITES U. S. NEGROES

Turning to the American Negroes, Khrushchev said that in many states they were subjected to discrimination and limitation of their elementary human rights.

"Negro students cannot study at the same schools where white children study," he said. "Negroes are not allowed in hotels where white people stay, they are not admitted to theatres, restaurants.

"This is the real face of 'civilization' of which the imperialist colonial powers are boasting. And this is called civilization. It was imposed by force, contrary to the peoples' wishes. The colonialists dispatched troops, guns, machine guns, followed by missionaries, cross in hand."

Khrushchev termed Congolese Army Col. Joseph Mobutu a "scum-traitor" who was keeping Premier Patrice Lumumba from office because he had been bribed by the "colonialists." He said UN Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold was acting as a tool to the West.

CALLS IT "PROPAGANDA"

David Ormsby-Gore, British minister of state for foreign affairs, hit at Khrushchev's remarks as pure "propaganda." He said Britain welcomed a serious discussion of colonialism and pointed to Khrushchev's failure to mention the many nations that the British have given freedom.

Krushchev's first address on Wednesday was given in calm but bitter words.

"If the United Nations organization fails to adopt the proposals aimed at the elimination of the colonial regime, the peoples of the colonial countries will have no alternative but to take to arms," he said.

"I have already said and I repeat it again: The Soviet people are on the side of those who fight for their liberation from the colonial yoke for their freedom and independence."

The Soviet Premier told the delegates of the new African and other nations sitting before him that their people ultimately will demand to know how they voted on this issue of colonialism.

Khrushchev Hits Bias In America

Chicago Defender

Chicago, Ill.

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y. — The unpredictable Nikita Khrushchev struck the United States in a sensitive spot Saturday when he deplored this nation's mistreatment of Negroes in a blistering speech before the United Nations General Assembly.

Khrushchev charged, during a debate with U. S. Ambassador to the UN James Wadsworth over the Red China question, that while America professes such love for the newly independent countries of Africa, she continues to exploit Negroes and deny them their civil rights.

He pointed out that representatives of African countries here have been denied hotel rooms and turned away from restaurants because they are black.

Sat. 10-8-60

Khrushchev asked: "Is this democracy? Is this respect for the dignity of man? This is human hatred."

P. 1

The Russian premier's sensational allegations were virtually ignored by some of the wire services and many newspapers. However, his stinging criticism of U.S. racial policies drew broad smiles and warm applause from members of the African delegations.

Khrushchev said Negroes are wantonly lynched in the United States and the government does little to halt the barbarism.

In the Soviet Union, Khrushchev told the general Assembly, a man is not judged by the color of his skin.

In reply to Khrushchev's attacks, Wadsworth said:

"There is more freedom, there is more opportunity, there is more well-being for every American—I say every American, regardless of race, color or creed—in the United States than there is any Communist country. Anybody who knows America knows this to be true."

'Hysteria' Is Aimed at U2 Pilot

U.S. Accuses Soviets Of Stirring Spy Hate

Russia Rules Out American Attorneys

WASHINGTON — (UPI) — The United States accused Russia Saturday of waging a "hysterical" campaign to inflame public prejudice before the spy trial of American U2 Pilot Francis G. Powers begins in Moscow Aug. 17.

The State Department also reported the Soviet Union has rejected a U.S. request that American attorneys be allowed to help prepare Powers' defense. U.S. officials have been refused permission to see Powers since he was captured May 1 when his reconnaissance plane was brought down 1,300 miles inside Russia.

Department Spokesman David Waters bluntly charged that the Russian propaganda machine is trying to whip up anti-American public opinion before the Pound, Va., airman is tried.

He cited as evidence a claim published in the Soviet newspaper Trud that American Exchange Student Edwin Morrell was expelled from Moscow University for spying.

Denying the Morrell accusation as completely false, Waters said: "The Soviet press seems to be full of this kind of fairy tale now. It is only too apparent that the objective is to inflame public opinion in advance of the scheduled trial of Francis Powers.

"I doubt that these somewhat hysterical efforts will have much effect outside of the closed societies of the Communist bloc," he said.

Waters said Morrell was asked to leave Russia last June on grounds he had failed to carry out his academic work satisfactorily. No charges of espionage were made against the 31-year-old student until Friday, he noted.

Soviet rejection of an appeal that American attorneys be allowed to help Powers was contained in an Aug. 4 note from the Russians in which they announced that a Moscow lawyer identified only as "Attorney Griniv" had been assigned to defend him.

The Soviet note said that three attorneys named by the Virginia Bar Association to try to aid the airman could not be permitted to participate in the case under "Soviet judicial legislation."

But the note advised that members of Power's family would be allowed to confer with his Soviet attorney when they reach Moscow.

Visas allowing entry to Russia have been granted the airman's wife, Barbara Gay Powers, and his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Powers of Pound, Va. They plan to reach Moscow Aug. 16, the day before the trial before a Soviet military tribunal gets under way.

Dr. Lewis Ingram, personal physician of the pilot's mother; Sol Cury of Norton, Va., a friend of his father, and Carl A. MacAfee, an attorney retained by the father, have also planned to go. However, it seemed Saturday that neither Dr. Ingram nor MacAfee would make the trip because of lack of funds.

The Soviet note was in response to two formal demands by the United States that U.S. embassy representatives be allowed to see and interview Powers and that the three Virginia attorneys be permitted to help him.

The Russian reply ignored the request that embassy officials be allowed to confer with Powers. Officials here said they expected that a U.S. representative would be permitted to attend the trial but there was still no official Soviet confirmation of this.

Russians Expel American Trio

Students Are Arrested For Passing Out Copies Of U.S. Magazine

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW, July 28.—Soviet officials Thursday ordered immediate expulsion of three Americans, a Briton and a West German arrested in an incident involving distribution to Russians of the United States State Department magazine Amerika.

The three Americans and their companions were questioned about four hours. Soviet police ordered them to sign statements, but the youths said they refused to sign anything in a language they could not understand.

Had 50 Copies

Western and Soviet officials were reluctant to discuss the incident. Informed sources said the three Americans were students who took 50 copies of the magazine from the American Embassy, where they are available to tourists.

The three drove to a downtown hotel and from their car began to distribute the magazine. A crowd gathered and Russians called the police. The police took into custody not only the three students, but a Briton, a West German and another American—described as a Chicago schoolteacher—who were taking pictures of the occurrence.

The police escorted the students into the hotel, where they demanded—and were refused—permission to call the United States Embassy. However, a fourth American, identified only as McGovern, managed to slip away. He called the embassy, which sent an official to the hotel immediately to negotiate for the group's release.

The names of those involved in the incident were not available.

SOVIET DENOUNCES REPORTS OF RACISM

New York Times Mon. 8-8-60

Attack on African Student Admitted—American Is Called Provocateur

By OSGOOD CARUTHERS

Special to The New York Times.

MOSCOW, Aug. 7—The Soviet press bitterly denounced today reports by African students of racial discrimination and attacks on Negroes at the University of Moscow.

The denunciations were a continuation of a recent series of articles branding American and British exchange students as spies and anti-Soviet provocateurs.

African and Asian students were called yesterday to a meeting of the Soviet Committee for Afro-Asian Solidarity to hear denunciations of charges of discrimination. Some among them were quoted as having declared that such reports were inspired by "those imperialist elements who are frightened by the large numbers of young Africans going to the U. S. S. R." and "circles who oppose cultural exchanges and who are against the enlightenment of black Africa."

American Student Blamed

A long report of this meeting, which was called a news conference but to which no non-Communist reporters were invited, appeared in the Communist youth newspaper Komosmolskaya Pravda.

The paper repeated earlier published charges against an American student, Edwin Morell of Salt Lake City, Utah, who was expelled from Moscow University's Graduate School. The paper accused Mr. Morell of having incited African students to take an anti-Soviet attitude and to report lies about life at the university.

The paper described reports that an African student was beaten unconscious last May by group of young Russians for asking a Russian girl to dance with him as exaggerations of a minor incident.

It was the first time that the incident had been mentioned by the official press although it was widely known among student circles.

Under special attack was a 27-year-old student from Uganda, Stanley Omar Okullo, whose account of the beating of a young Somali student at published in British and American journals.

Expelled From University

The official press said Mr. Okullo had been expelled from Moscow University's Medical School "for immoral conduct and poor scholarship."

Among the immoral things Mr. Okulla allegedly did was to send a message to the United Nations concerning the incident involving the Somoli student.

Komsomolskaya Pravda said he would not have done any of these things without the inspiration and help from Mr. Morrell, the American student accused last Friday by the newspaper Trud of having been a spy—a charge that Mr. Morrell has denied.

Komsolskaya Pravda gave its version of the incident involving the Somali student. The paper said when the Russian girl refused to dance with him he spat in her face. A young Russian student half his size struck him, the paper said, and the Somali tudent Abdul Hamid Mohamed Hassan screamed and demanded to be taken to a hospital.

The doctor there said all he needed was sleep but when Mr. Hassan returned to his quarters at the University he raised another outcry about racial discrimination and knocked a Russian girl student unconscious, the paper said.

African and Asian students were called yesterday to a meeting of the Soviet Committee for Afro-Asian Solidarity to hear denunciations of charges of discrimination. Some among them were quoted as having declared that such reports were inspired by "those imperialist elements who are frightened by the large numbers of young Africans going to the U. S. S. R." and "circles who oppose cultural exchanges and who are against the enlightenment of black Africa."

American Student Blamed

A long report of this meeting, which was called a news conference but to which no non-Communist reporters were invited, appeared in the Communist youth newspaper Komosmolskaya Pravda.

The paper repeated earlier published charges against an American student, Edwin Morell of Salt Lake City, Utah, who was expelled from Moscow University's Graduate School. The paper accused Mr. Morell of having incited African students to take an anti-Soviet attitude and to report lies about life at the university.

The paper described reports that an African student was beaten unconscious last May by group of young Russians for asking a Russian girl to dance with him as exaggerations of a minor incident.

It was the first time that the incident had been mentioned by the official press although it was widely known among student circles.

Under special attack was a 27-year-old student from Uganda, Stanley Omar Okullo, whose account of the beating of a young Somali student at published in British and American journals.

Expelled From University

The official press said Mr. Okullo had been expelled from Moscow University's Medical School "for immoral conduct and poor scholarship."

Among the immoral things Mr. Okulla allegedly did was to send a message to the United Nations concerning the incident involving the Somoli student.

Komsomolskaya Pravda said he would not have done any of these things without the inspiration and help from Mr. Morrell, the American student accused last Friday by the newspaper Trud of having been a spy—a charge that Mr. Morrell has denied.

Komsolskaya Pravda gave its version of the incident involving the Somali student. The paper said when the Russian girl refused to dance with him he spat in her face. A young Russian student half his size struck him, the paper said, and the Somali student Abdul Hamid Mohammed Hassan screamed and demanded to be taken to a hospital.

The doctor there said all he needed was sleep but when Mr. Hassan returned to his quarters at the University he raised another outcry about racial discrimination and knocked a Russian girl student unconscious, the paper said.

Soviets Bitterly Deny Stories Of Attacks on Negro Students

Miami, Fla.

Sun. 8/9/60

By OSGOOD CARUTHERS
The New York Times Service

MOSCOW — Reports by African students of racial discrimination and attacks on Negroes at Moscow University were bitterly denounced Monday in the Soviet press.

The denunciations and a reported statement of a group of African and Arab students extolling their life at the university came in the wake of a recent series of articles branding United States and British exchange students as spies and anti-Soviet provocateurs.

In part, the raising of the question of the exchange students is believed to be a response to a number of articles that have appeared recently in the Western press charging that Soviet universities have used repressive and discriminatory measures against non-Soviet students and that racial friction had developed.

The Soviet attacks also fall into the larger pattern of the intensified propaganda campaign aimed at depicting the United States and its allies as aggressive.

Moreover, they fit into the large-scale propaganda offensive the Soviet Union is currently waging to assure Africans of its selfless support in their fight against "colonial powers and United States imperialist monopolists."

African and Asian students were called to a meeting of the Soviet Committee for African-Asian Solidarity to hear denunciations of the Western press reports. Some among the coup were quoted declaring that such reports were inspired by "imperialist elements frightened by the large numbers of young Africans going to the USSR." And by the "circles that oppose cultural exchanges and are against the enlightenment of black Africa."

A long report of the meeting, which was called a press conference but to which no non-Communist reporters were invited, appeared in the communist youth newspaper, Komsomolskava Pravda.

K must remain behind 'Iron Curtain' in N. Y.

Sat. 9-10-60 P. 1

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., Sept. 10—(AP)—The United States notified the Soviet Union Saturday that Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev during his visit to New York must not travel off Manhattan Island.

In a memorandum delivered to the Soviet UN delegation, the United States requested that arrangements be made for the Soviet leader to reside as near as possible to UN headquarters and to limit his movements to those required by his official mission as head of the Soviet delegation to the United Nations.

U. S. SOURCES said similar restrictions were being placed on Hungarian Communist Party Chief Janos Kadar and Mehmet Shehu, premier of Albania.

The U. S. memorandum said the restrictions were being imposed in order to provide adequate security for the Communist leaders. The memorandum added:

"The question of assuring the necessary security for Mr. Khrushchev and the Soviet delegation has, of course, been complicated by the hostile public statements of the head of the Soviet government and by the destruction of an American plane over international waters by Soviet action and the continued illegal detention of two American fliers."

In Washington, the State Department said the restriction on Khrushchev and the two other Communist chiefs does not apply to the leaders from the remaining Red bloc countries—Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Rumania.

A spokesman said these four will be subjected only to a requirement normally applying to Rumanians that they notify the U. S. government before traveling outside the New York area.

RUSSIAN UN delegation members, and Soviet citizens generally are normally under restrictions when they come to the United States. The restrictions have been imposed by the U. S. government in retaliation for Soviet restrictions on Americans in Russia.

Thus in New York, Russians are allowed to travel only within a 25-mile radius—and some parts of the New York area are off limits to them, too.

If a Soviet official or citizen wants to go outside the New York area, he must give notification 48 hours in advance.

ALL TOLD, about two-thirds of the United States is normally banned to Russian visitors in a tit-for-tat against Russian restrictions. U. S. officals say they have repeatedly offered to Moscow to negotiate on a mutual lifting of restrictions but have received no response.

THIS WAS a reference to the RB47 reconnaissance plane which the Soviet Union claims was shot down over Soviet territory July 1. The United States avers the aircraft was over international waters and demanded the release of the two surviving crew members, a demand the Soviet Union has thus far rejected.

The memorandum requested the Soviet delegation to notify the U. S. government at the earliest possible moment the exact time of Khrushchev's arrival, his place of residence, length of stay and time and method of departure.

STATE DEPARTMENT officials indicated that an appeal would be made to the public to "act in a dignified and restrained fashion in regard to the Communist visitors."

Khrushchev, with other Communist leaders, is aboard the Soviet liner Baltika at sea heading for New York. He is due in New York Sept. 19, the day before the UN Assembly convenes.

Restriction to Manhattan Island would mean Khrushchev would be unable to use the Soviet Union's mansion at Glen Cove, Long Island.

Soviet Bias Revealed By 3 African Students

The Washington Post

Washington, D.C.

FRANKFURT, Germany, Sept. 21 (AP)—Three African students have sent an open letter to the heads of all African governments charging "constant (racial) discrimination and threats" while they were studying at Moscow University.

Wed. 9-22-60

The three told a news conference in Frankfurt today that they and scores of other African students are leaving Moscow "disgusted at Communist pressure."

They identified themselves as Theophilus Okonkow, 28, of Nigeria, who said he was the secretary of the executive committee of the African Students Union in the U. S. S. R.; Andrew R. Amar of Uganda, and Michel Ayih, 28, of Togo. All were medical students in Miscow during the last there years.

"We left—and others are leaving—because of constant discrimination, threats, restrictions on our freedom and even brutalities," Okonkwo said.

"Students from all over Africa and the Near East are finding in Moscow that they are merely being used as agents of Soviet power politics. One hundred and fifty students left last year. Scores have left and are leaving this year, disgusted.

The three said they were acting for a "majority" of the 75 to 90 African students still at Moscow University.

They claimed that students from Algeria, the Cameroons, the Congo, Ghana, Guinea, Kenya, Mali, Morocco, Nigeria, the Sudan, Togo, Tunisia, the U. A. R. and Uganda had met in secret recently in Moscow and empowered them to "present our case against communism when we arrived here in the West."

Satellite Tracking Becomes a Precise Art

The Washington Post

By Warren Kornberg

Washington, D.C.

Staff Reporter

In the days before the first artificial earth satellite launched the space era, American (and presumably Soviet) scientists were plagued by a nightmare that they would not be able to keep track of a new made object in space.

With the launching of Sputnik I by the Soviet Union, however, the end of the nightmare was in sight. 8/22/60

The satellite project was part of the International Geophysical Year effort, and scientists were preparing tracking systems to follow the birds. But when Russia jumped the gun, no one was really quite ready. P. 1-8

To follow Sputnik, the Soviet Union itself relied on radio amateurs to extend the scanty network of inter-connected observation points. In the United States, astronomers and astrophysicists had two networks in the process of organization — the Moonwatch visual network of the Smithsonian Astrophysical Observatory and the Minitrack electronic network of the Naval Research Laboratory. Sophisticated optical equipment had not yet left the factory, and the first Sputnik observation with Baker-Nunn tracking cameras was made directly at the factory.

Also relying in part on amateurs, scientists here alerted their stations around the world and before many passes were made information on Sputnik's orbit was being fitted together.

Technique Improves

Since that time, when satellite tracking was untried and relatively crude, it has grown, developed and consolidated into a highly sophisticated and predictable art.

Satellites convey two broad categories of information — they report on their environments via telemetering equipment (radiation meters, television cameras and the like), transmitting information to ground stations on radio-coded command.

And their exact location and behavior in space conveys other information — pressure caused by the impact of particles of light energy, the density of the earth's atmosphere at any given altitude, gravity and mass of the earth and its neighbors in space and the shape of the earth. Gravity, drag and pressure all have measurable effects on the orbit and orbital changes as a satellite makes circuit after circuit around the earth.

To determine the orbit and measure the changes precisely, as well as to learn where to look for telemeter transmissions, is the job of the satellite trackers.

Major Technique

The major techniques of satellite tracking in use today —are optical, interferometric, pulse radar and Doppler, the last three working on electronic rather than optical principles.

Optical techniques are extremely accurate but are dependent both on the weather and a source of light.

Before Echo, the 100-foot balloon satellite, placed in orbit high enough and at an angle calculated to keep it in constant light for many days, satellites were generally visible only at dawn and dusk, when they could catch and reflect the sun's rays over the horizon and the sky was dark enough to provide contrast. The weather is still the limiting factor.

The Baker-Nunn telescopic cameras which are carrying the burden of optical tracking of satellites were designed specifically for their job. They included triaxial mounts enabling them to be swung in any direction and are electronically controlled.

They don't get a picture—they get a trace of light on film.

The trace can either be a point, as the camera tracks the satellite against a background of fixed stars—the stars will show as lines—or it can be a line as the camera focuses on the stars. The line is chopped into points by a rotating shutter timed by precision crystal clocks and represents the location of the satellite at carefully computed points in time.

Fixed Against Stars

The fix of the satellite against the known location of the stars provides the bit of data for which the optical stations are designed. A series of such fixes and their precise coordinates provide the data from which the orbital track can be automatically computed. The computers take into account the laws of gravity and of planetary motion, the timing of a circuit and average velocity, and return a complete, eliptical orbit, its apogee, perigee, velocities and angular inclination.

The Minitrack interferometric system provides the same angular "fix" data from which orbits are computed, but its system of coordinates, rather than using the stars, uses the center of the earth for its point of origin and a corrected true north-south orientation on the earth's surface as axis.

Many of these are also equipped optically and will be augmented by Doppler equipment as tracking devices are pulled together both functionally and geographically.

Minitrack uses pairs of fixed, dipole antennas placed in or corrected to exact north south and east-west orientation. They throw up a long narrow radio cone, 100 degrees long and 10 degrees wide, tuned to pick up the transmission beep of a satellite passing through.

They measure the phase difference of the radio waves sent out by the satellite as they reach the dipoles in any pair.

Just as the human ears measure phase differences in the reception of sound, and thus determine direction, the pairs of antennas determine angular direction.

Waves a fraction out of phase between antennas 500 feet apart are coming from a specific angle, depending on the fraction to the north-south base line between the pair. An ambiguity appears if the waves are a full wave length out of phase. To the fine (500 feet apart) pair, they will appear in phase.

Ambiguity Eliminated

To eliminate the ambiguity, coarser pairs, set closer together, measure the number of full lengths, while the fine pairs measure fractions. Between they they establish an accurate angular fix. A series of such fixes, through the magic of the computer, becomes an orbit.

The pulse radar trackers do a similar job. They do it more quickly, in fewer passes, but are more complex and costly to operate.

A series of radar pulses reflected from a satellite as it passes within range provides a series of distances and angular fixes roughly equivalent to a line of minitrack stations placed close together, parallel to the satellite's path. This series of ranges and directions represents a number of points in the orbit and data for the computer.

Radar transmissions from the ground and radio transmissions from the satellite, at a known frequency, provide another tracking technique—based on the Doppler effect.

This is the effect which causes a train whistle to wail —from a high pitch to a low pitch—as it sweeps by an observer.

Sound waves emitted by or reflected from an approaching body are compressed—effectively shortening the wave length and increasing the pitch. As the body passes and recedes, the waves are effectively extended, decreasing the pitch.

The Doppler curve representing the changing pitch of the sound received resembles a shallow, inverted, horizontal S and the slope of the curve represents the intensity of the pitch change.

This, in turn, represents such information as distance and velocity. Some scientists hold that a Doppler curve offers enough information for a complete plot of a satellite's orbit. Data derived from several such curves will certainly do the job.

If the orbit is known, the curve may be used in reverse, to provide an exact determination of the location of a station on earth. This is the principle on which Transit is being used as a navigational aid.

Satellite tracking is now in a state of flux, as stations are consolidated, techniques combined and computers improved. Specific combinations will be employed to do specific jobs—like the special equipment being assembled to track the first man in space—as the techniques and devices complement each other for greater precision and more effective information from satellites in orbit.

Europe Lauds Russian Space Feat

Press Says Soviets Have Leaped Ahead

By The Associated Press

London, Aug. 21.—Europeans on both sides of the Iron Curtain Sunday acclaimed the safe return of a Soviet spaceship as a historic achievement opening the gates of outer space to mankind. Some in the West said the Soviet Union had again forged ahead of the United States in the race into space.

"Space fiction is fiction no longer," said the independent London Sunday Times. "The return of Sputnik V with its two dogs still alive is one of the greatest achievements in the history of science.

"With the imminent final conquest of space, man enters upon a new era of frightening responsibility."

Space Trip Predicted

Some papers linked the Russian feat with the U. S. success in catching a capsule from the satellite Discoverer XIV over the Pacific less than 24 hours earlier. But there was no doubt which space experiment is regarded as the greater achievement.

"Russia has once again dramatically leaped ahead of America in the race for the conquest of space," said The Sunday Times.

More Balanced View

The London Observer said the Soviet feat "will be a bitter pill to American scientists who have also successfully recovered objects from orbit, but on a far more modest scale."

Prof. Alfred J. Lovell, director of the world's largest radio telescope at Jodrell Bank, England, took a more balanced view.

"As far as rocket technology is concerned," he said, "the Russians undoubtedly have a lead of several years over the Americans in their ability to put extremely heavy objects into orbit and also in the precision of their guidance.

Red Headline Used

"But, on the other hand, the Americans, from the extremely wide scope of their scientific experiments and their ability to extract fundamental results, have a considerable lead over the Russians."

Biggest and boldest headlines came, naturally enough, from the Communist press.

"Sensational exploit of Soviet science," bannered the Communist Humanite of Paris.

In the Far East, the military critic of the Tokyo newspaper Yomiuri said the achievement means the Soviet Union has a weapon that can circle the earth with a hydrogen bomb that can be dropped on a specific target with the press of a button.

2 Dogs Catapulted In Special Container

Landing Of The Spaceship Itself Took Place On A Meadow, Pravda Reports

Mon 8/22/60

By The Associated Press

London, Aug. 22 (Monday).—Pravda said Monday that the space dogs brought back from orbit were catapulted to earth in a special container when the satellite that took them 18 times around the earth came down to a low level.

The Soviet Communist Party newspaper said the landing of the spaceship itself took place on a level meadow surrounded by fields.

"First witnesses of this historic event were collective farm workers who were working nearby," Radio Moscow quoted Pravda as saying.

The dogs, Belka and Strelka, along with other smaller animals, insects and plant, were the first living creatures ever to return from orbit around the earth.

Says Container Was Separated

The Soviet Union announced Saturday they had been returned, and heralded the achievement as another giant step toward putting a man in space.

Pravda said one of its correspondents was given the following information at the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences:

"When the spaceship satellite had come down to a low height, the container in which the animals were located was separated from it by catapulting.

"This was done to guarantee the safe landing of the four-footed cosmic travelers.

The spaceship satellite landed undamaged and whole, like the container with the experimental animals."

Pravda did not disclose the place of the space landing.

The Pravda account was the first description of the landing of the satellite and its space passengers.

'Had Not a Single Scratch or Bruise'

The Russians previously had reported that the spaceship landed within seven miles of its designated target spot.

"Within an hour a helicopter arrived at the landing spot and a surgeon stepped out of it and examined the animals' conditions," Pravda said. "It turned out that they had not a single scmratch or bruise and were completely fit."

Pravda's description of the landing, as distributed by Tass and broadcast over Radio Moscok, did not disclose whether the spaceship and the dogs' separate container came down by parachute or by some other means.

Neither did it reveal the exact altitude at which the dogs were catapulted free from the spaceship.

U. S. Raps Nikita For U. N. Antics

Russian Charges 'Legal Lynching'

The News and Courier
Charleston, S. C.

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y. (AP)—The United States delivered a stinging rebuke to Soviet Premier Khrushchev's behavior in the U. N. General Assembly Saturday and assailed the Soviet leader for an uproarious free-swinging speech hitting at the United States, its way of life and its friendship with Franco's Spain.

U.S. Ambassador James J. Wadsworth called Khrushchev's performance a "spectacle," and said the Soviet leader's "intemperate outbursts" cast grave doubt on the possibility of serious negotiation on disarmament or other major world issues.

The effect of the U.S. response was to lessen chances of a new face-to-face meeting between Khrushchev and President Eisenhower.

SPEAKS OFF CUFF

Khrushchev unloaded his major blasts in a rambling off-the-cuff continuation of a prepared address, as the assembly shifted its attention from the neutralists' campaign for a new Eisenhower-Khrushchev meeting to the question of Red China's claim to U.N. membership.

The Soviet leader was sharply gaveled to order at one point.

Khrushchev blasted the United States as a country permitting legal lynching of Negroes. Excitedly, he suggested that barring Red China conceivably could spur the Communist countries to form a United Nations of their own. But in the next breath he said nobody would want that.

If such a thing should come to pass, Khrushchev said: "That would be the burying ground of the United Nations."

The assembly's extra Saturday session began with a statement by Wadsworth opposing a bid for general debate on Red China's claim to membership. Khrushchev followed him to the stage, and after reading his text, launched into a free-swinging, off-the-cuff attack on the United States and its allies. Wadsworth then made a second appearance under the U.N. "right to reply" rule.

WAVES FIST

Khrushchev, smarting under Wadsworth's detailed indictment of Red China's record of "addiction to power and violence," waved clenched fists, his voice rising to a shout.

The Soviet leader demanded to be told why Red China should be excluded from membership when the U.N. had accepted Generalissimo Francisco Franco of Spain, whom Khrushchev called a "hangman." Assembly President Frederick Boland of Ireland gaveled him to order, reminding him of a U.N. rule against personal attacks on chiefs of state.

And from the floor, Spanish Ambassador Jose Felix de Lequerica shouted an angry protest.

Khrushchev then heatedly accused Boland of using double standards, arguing he previously had permitted a "Socialist country" to be attacked. Indignantly, he said he intended to strike back.

When Khrushchev finished, the Spanish ambassador thanked Boland for calling Khrushchev to order. But Khrushchev already was striding out of the hall. He was not there when Wadsworth returned to the rostrum.

Wadsworth, citing Khrushchev's performance, said the delegates "must once again feel a sense of deep disturbance in behalf of the United Nations itself.

"I do not speak merely from the standpoint of being regularly surprised and not a little bit shocked at the spectacle presented by the representative of the Soviet Union in this chamber—whether he be on the rostrum or in his seat—but I must say that it casts a good deal of doubt upon the possibility of serious, constructive, calm negotiations for disarmament or for any of the larger aspects of peace in our time," he added.

Dillon Says Red Attempting To Kill Organization

Memphis Tenn.

CHICAGO, Oct. 2.—(UPI)—Undersecretary of State Douglas Dillon Sunday accused Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev of trying to destroy the United Nations. But Dillon held out hope that the world organization has a bright future despite Khrushchev's attacks.

Dillon said the Soviet leader's "strident and bellicose attempts to convert the United Nations into an instrument of communist power politics" have their root in the Soviet world imperialism.

Speaking at the 80th anniversary banquet of the Polish National Alliance, Dillon said Khrushchev's behavior at the United Nations was "an affront to the intelligence and judgment of all non-communist countries—and particularly to the leaders of those nations which have only recently achieved independence."

"Despite setbacks, despite the never-ending efforts of the Soviet Union to sabotage relations between nations by demagoguery, deceit and duplicity, co-operation has become a concrete fact of international life," he said.

Dillon said that never before have "so many nations, both old and new alike, worked together through the United Nations and various regional organizations to promote scientific advancement, to eliminate disease, to mitigate poverty, to assure international security and to establish and maintain conditions of lasting peace."

Reds Pay Way Of Nonwhites At New School

The Christian Science Monitor
Boston, Mass.

By the Associated Press

Moscow

Nonwhite students flown to Moscow's new Friendship University are heavily subsidized by the Soviet Union and appear to have few money problems.

The students told foreign newsmen touring the university Oct. 18 that the Soviet Government pays their plane fares to and from Moscow. They get an initial 3,000 rubles to buy a winter wardrobe. Room and tuition are free. And they say they get a monthly allowance of 900 rubles—the pay of an average Soviet factory worker—to cover food and incidentals.

The ruble is valued officially at 25 cents, but 10 cents is considered a more realistic rate.

Considerable Fanfare

Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev announced during his tour of Indonesia last February that the university would be established for students from the three underdeveloped continents of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. After considerable fanfare, the institution opened Oct. 1 with a student body of about 300, including 65 Soviet students specializing in foreign languages. Soviet officials say the enrollment ultimately will total 500, from 65 countries.

Some of the foreign students said their home governments tried to stop them from attending.

"Eleven wanted to come from my country, but only I made it," Joseph Sankona of the Cameroun Republic reported. "Our government didn't want us to go."

Permission Obtained

Mr. Sankona said that he escaped from his West African homeland by getting permission to fly to Togoland, and the Soviet Consulate there helped him fly to Moscow.

A similar story was told by Jeffery Gatende, who said he had done some walking and used devious methods to get out of Kenya, a British colony in East Africa.

Asked by a British newsman if he was a Communist, Mr. Gatende replied, "Not yet." The Briton then asked if he had taken Mau Mau oaths, the pledges of loyalty to the anti-white terrorist movement in Kenya.

"You call them oaths," Mr. Gatende snapped back. "I call them national allegiance."

Racial Problems Cited

Several students said they had come to Moscow instead of seeking education in the West because of fear of racial problems at Western universities.

"There is no color problem here," Mr. Gatende declared. "In fact, people like you so much they almost become a nuisance at times."

Those interviewed included students from Zanzibar, Sierra Leone, Chad, Japan, Ceylon, and Mexico, as well as the Kenyan and the Camerounian. One student had a big picture of a smiling Fidel Castro, the Cuban Premier, pinned on a wall near his bed.

The university offers a five-year course, and the foreign students spend most of the first year studying Russian. Asked if he found it difficult, Khanis Haji of Zanzibar answered, "Russian isn't any harder than English."

'K' Wants An Apology From Ike On U2 Flight

Gives That Condition For Talk With President

Jackson Daily News
Jackson, Miss.

GLEN COVE, N.Y. (AP)—Soviet Premier Khrushchev Saturday night strongly indicated he would not meet with President Eisenhower unless Eisenhower apologizes for the U2 spy plane flight.

Furthermore, Khrushchev said, the Soviet Union would not release the two survivors from the U.S. RB47 plane shot down July 1 in return for an Eisenhower apology on the U2.

Khrushchev took this stiff stand in a brief meeting with newsmen at the Soviet Long Island estate where he is spending the weekend.

Heavy pressure for an Eisenhower-Khrushchev get-together to ease world tensions was sparked at the United Nations Friday by five neutral nations' plea for such a meeting.

Eisenhower has been cool to this idea ever since the blowup of the Paris summit conference last May where Khrushchev demanded an Eisenhower apology for the U2 reconaissance craft downed inside the U.S.S.R May 1.

Eisenhower has said he would not meet Khrushchev unless the Kremlin boss, among other things, releases the two surviving crewmen of the RB47 shot down in the Arctic area July 1.

Khrushchev was asked whether he would trade an apology on the U2 flight for release of the two American fliers.

"It is not a reciprocal matter," Khrushchev said.

"Both planes came to our country and each committed an equal crime."

On another important issue, Khrushchev declared he expects to win U.N. approval of his demand that Red China be admitted to the world body.

Lodge Points Out to U.S. Delegates Listening Device Inside "Trojan Horse" Seal

EAGLE WITH 'EARS'

Eavesdrop Device In Red 'Gift' Bared

The Florida Times-Union

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., May 26 (AP) — Henry Cabot Lodge displayed to the Security Council today a hand-carved wooden eagle with a listening device hidden inside.

He said Russians had given it to the American ambassador in Moscow to hang in his office so they could eavesdrop on conversations. He offered the round copy of the Seal of the United States as "a concrete example of Soviet espionage."

The U.S. ambassador said the United States had found well over a hundred concealed listening devices in "numerous embassies" in the Soviet Union and other Iron Curtain countries, as in Poland, and the latest within the past month.

Russians Smile

The Soviet delegation smiled as Lodge talked. Then Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko remarked that Lodge had shown the council "a picture." He asked what play it was out of and when the play would open.

Lodge came back:

"It's not a picture. It's not a work of art. It's not out of any play. It's out of the Soviet Union."

Poland's Ambassador Jerzy Michaloski said he wouldn't try to answer Lodge, but could give some interesting information "concerning the microphones in some of our buildings in this country."

Lodge said Russians had given the "beautiful piece of carving" to the U.S. ambassador not long ago—and "then a clandestine listening device was discovered inside."

Appears Solid

It looked like a solid piece, he explained, but turned out to be in two parts, front and back, joined by a transparent ring and hollow inside.

Lodge showed the council how it opened—and said, "Here is the clandestine listening device with the aerial—right under the eagle's beak."

This, he asserted, would enable persons outside the embassy to listen to conversations in the ambassador's office.

Lodge later said he did not know when the listening device was discovered — "I've had it three or four days, waiting for a good chance to use it."

CHAPTER I

During the two month vacation which exists between the winter and summer semesters at German universities; sixteen other American students, a German student, and I, took a private tour by way of Scandanavia to Leningrad and Moscow. All arrangements for the trip were made through a travel bureau in Stockholm and "Intourist," the Russian National Travel Bureau. The tour began on March 1, immediately after the end of a long winter semester.

p. 9

I'm very aware of the cold and considerably warmer war or wars which have existed and continue to exist between the free world and Russia. Many books, articles, and pamphlets have been written about our neighbor, and I've read many of these. When, however, I left for Russia, I didn't feel that I was going to spy on the enemy, but on the contrary, to tour a couple of cities in a land that was to me virtually unknown, and to enjoy the vacation.

Contact Limited

I didn't enter Russia with lots of preoccupation about what I would hear and see, and since my return, I don't claim that I know Russia. My actual contact with Russia and her people was limited to a two day stay in Leningrad and six days in Moscow.

We lost one and one half days of the stay in Leningrad because the thick ice between Stockholm and getting to Helsinki in time Abo, Finland delayed our to catch the Russian train which leaves Helsinki once every day. Finally on March 5, we boarded the Russian train which was a very agreeable shade of green with hammers and cycles decorating the cars. The inside was very nice, although there was a slightly closed-in feeling. Perhaps this was due to the fact that no windows could be opened and the dors were locked with a key.

In Leningrad

After rolling past a few towers, many strands of barbed wire, guards, and a border station, we arrived in Leningrad. My first impressions were the masses of people that were always on the streets and the streets themselves, which were so broad. Their massiveness gigantic squares, which have was only exceeded by the the birthplace of revo- been the birthplace of revolutions and the deathplace of many Russians..

In Leningrad, more so than in Moscow, I noticed hundreds of soldiers everywhere. Neon signs or any type of advertising are on a very small scale, thus the streets, especially at night, have a dully and empty appearance. Empty doesn't apply when one considers the number of people in the streets, but dull does apply. We, of course, made a general tour of the city, and on the first night after the ballet, we went looking for a place to have refreshments and dance. We found about two in Moscow. These were always very crowded and they closed between 12 and 1 at night.

Attends Church

On Sunday, which is a big shopping day in Moscow for most people, most of us went to the Catholic, Baptist, or Russian Orthodox churches. Two friends and I took a taxi to the Catholic Church. Upon informing the driver of our intended destination, he and the two drivers nearby responded as if we had just told a hilarious joke. They imitated, "The Praying Hands," made the "Sign of the Cross," and laughted among themselves, but the joke soon wore off and we were taken to the church.

In spite of a beautiful service, I was astounded by the people there. The worshippers were almost all very old women and only a handful of men. I'd guess that the average age was 55 or more. From the approximately 300 people in the small church, I saw only one lady, whom I thought was as young as 40. A friend, who attended the Baptist Church, reported that the situation there was the same, with the exception that small children had been brought by their grandmothers.

Visits Cathedral

Our Russian guide attempted to persuade us that we would be wasting our time to visit the Kazan Cathedral, since it only contained, "The Museem" of the History of Religion," which is known to us as "The Anti-religious Museem." Unfortunately, none of us knew Russian well enough to read what was written under the pictures and displays, nevertheless, their "History of Religion Museem" has most of the space dedicated to the role of the church during the time of the Tsars.

Most of the pictures depict the corruption and cruelty of the church and its collaboration with the Tsars. Near the entrance of the cathedral was a model of Sputnik. One of the students, quite sarcastically, but quite justifiably, I think, asked if this represented the new religion. Our cute little guide told us that there is some religious group in Germany which thinks that the heavens and stars are for the gods and not meant for the explorations of man. This exhibit was supposedly placed there to remove this fallacy. It's just too bad that we couldn't read for ourselves.

Young Pioneers

The place of Young Pioneers is an organization to which all of the school children belong. Within this indoctrination institution are clubs of many sorts — radio, sewing, dancing, chess, astronomy, etc. — some of which would interest all children. Here, the children are taught not to believe in God, and their innocent credulous little minds are gradually filled with party-line propaganda and lies about the world outside of the Iron Curtain. We sang and danced with the kids, who were, as all kids, just delightful.

Inside of the palace was a large picture of Lenin with children all around. It had a striking resemblance to the picture of Christ with the children. "Suffer Little Children To Come Unto Me" could perhaps also be applied to the former picture as well as the latter, but I won't attempt to compare the rewards of the followers of Christ with those of Lenin.

Tourist 3rd American in Week Accused of Spying

MOSCOW, Aug. 12 (AP)—The Soviet Union expelled a Kansas tourist today, the third American accused of spying or subversive activities in the week before the espionage trial of U2 pilot Francis Gary Powers.

The Kremlin charged James Schultz, 21, of Otis, Kan., gave American publications, Bibles and clothes to a citizen in the Ukraine to get him to "agitate" against the Soviet Union.

Shultz, who will be a senior this fall at Southwestern College in Winfield, Kan., is the son of a Methodist minister. He is here on a youth tour sponsored by the YMCA and YWCA. The embassy said the 13-member party spent three weeks with a world youth friendship mission near Kiev, the Ukrainian capital. The party is now in Leningrad and Shultz is presumed to have left the country.

Part of Campaign

(The new expulsion appeared to be part of a Soviet campaign—which the U.S. State Department called "somewhat hysterical"—to arouse world opinion before Powers' trial starts next Wednesday).

The family of the imprisoned pilot—Oliver W. and Ida Powers of Pound, Va.—are en route here with a doctor and a friend to witness next week's trial.

Mrs. Barbara Moore Powers the pilot's wife, is due here tomorrow afternoon with her mother and two lawyers.

The Soviet youth paper, Komsomalskaya Pravada, said Shultz found in Kiev "a rascal ready to sell his honor for foreign rags"—a reference to the practice of many Russians who beg tourists to sell them their clothing.

In return for the clothing, said the paper, Shultz demanded that the Ukrainian "carry on anti-Soviet agitation." The newspaper said the American "immediately gave prepayment" of three Bibles, a book, a magazine of "provocative material" and the clothes.

Cause of Indignation

This act, Komsomalskaya Pravda went on, "caused indignation among honest people and he (Shultz) is being expelled. He forgot the elementary rules of decency and politeness.'"

Nevertheless, it added: "The doors of the Soviet Union are open and will remain open to everybody who wants to get acquainted with its life and culture."

Since Powers was shot down May 1 high over Russia, five Americans have been accused of spying or subversion. The number does not include two American airmen who survived the shooting down of an RB47 reconnaissance plane over the Barents Sea on July 1. The pilot was killed, three crewmen are missing and two were captured.

High Russian diplomat latest to get boot

The Birmingham News
Birmingham, Ala.
Sat. 8-13-60

WASHINGTON, Aug. 13—(AP)—The United States Saturday ordered a high ranking Soviet diplomat out of the country. It charged that he paid money to an American citizen to seek employment in the U. S. Government.

Soviet Ambassador Mikhail A. Menshikov was told at the State Department that 39-year-old Valentin I. Ivanov, an Embassy first secretary, had "grossly violated the established norms of diplomatic behavior."

Leaving the department after a brief meeting with Deputy Under-secretary Raymond A. Hare, Menshikov commented to reporters "the weather is not very pleasant." He did not say whether he referred to the dripping skies, the state of relations between Moscow and Washington or both.

Asked about the Ivanov case, reports concerning which had already been published, Menshikov said "whatever was mentioned in the newspapers is not correct." He did not explain precisely what he meant.

THE EXPULSION of Ivanov is the latest in a series of accusations and ouster orders involving Soviet and American officials or citizens which symbolize a steady deterioration of relations.

In Moscow in the course of a week the U. S. air attache, Col. Edwin M. Kirton, and two tourists, James Shultz and Robert Christner, have been accused of espionage activities and ordered to leave Russia.

Last month a Soviet Embassy third secretary here, Petr Y. Ezhov was expelled from the United States on the ground that he was working as a spy.

THE ACTION against Ivanov, officials said, was not retaliation for the expulsion of Americans from Russia but a step determined by Ivanov's own behavior.

The formal announcement declared:

"Ivanov's importuned an American citizen, Roger C. Foss, to obtain employment in a U. S. government agency and gave him substantial sums of money for this purpose."

The Washington Post quotes Foss as saying Ivanov wanted him to "infiltrate the government and society."

Foss, 32, is a self-styled member of the "American Nazi Party" who, in the published accounts, claimed to have received a total of $500 from Ivanov between the Fall of 1959 and June 14.

He said he had met Ivanov about once a month during this period and that Ivanov wanted him to get a government job. He said he never did, and Ivanov never asked anything of him.

Moscow Expels American For Bibles, Journal

Atlanta Daily World
Atlanta, Ga.
Sat. 8/13/60

MOSCOW — (UPI) — A Communist youth newspaper reported Friday that James Shultz, 21-year old divinity student from Hutchinson, Kan., has been expelled from Russia for alleged espionage activities.

Komsomolskaya Pravda complained that Shultz distributed three Bibles and an "American book with provocative contents and also a journal of the same nature."

Shultz, son of Rev. Carl D Shultz, pastor of the Otis, Kans., Methodist Church, was the second American tourist to be expelled in two days. Robert Christner, 27, Sparks, Nev., was ousted Thursday on similar charges.

A U. S. embassy air attache was expelled earlier this week on spy charges.

The ouster of American student tourists came as the Soviet press whipped up a big "anti-spy" campaign against the United States six days before U-2 pilot Francis Gary Powers goes on trial charged with espionage.

Shultz was a member of a 14-student travel group sponsored by the YMCA and the YWCA embassy officials said the group was in Leningrad Friday and they did not know if Shultz had left the country.

Izvestia, the official government newspaper, cited the Christner case as part of its continuing attack against tourist-spies and said this was not the first instance of American intelligence trying to recruit tourists as spies.

With the article it published a picture of Christner's money belt in which it said he carried his newspapers and photographs.

Jailed Russian Spy Loses Appeal to Supreme Court

Philadelphia Inquirer

WASHINGTON, May 16 (UPI).—Col. Rudolf Ivanovich Abel, the Soviet master spy nabbed in New York in 1957, lost the last round in the Supreme Court Monday in his fight to win freedom by invoking the Constitution of the United States.

Philadelphia

The court refused to reconsider its decision upholding Abel's conviction on espionage charges. He is serving a 30-year prison term in the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary.

In other major actions, the high court:

Pres. 5/17/60

1. Reinstated a lawsuit brought by the Justice Department in Montgomery, Ala., to protect Negro voting rights in Macon county. The case originally was dismissed by Federal Judge Frank M. Johnson, but his objection was met by recently enacted changes in the civil rights law.

2. Agreed to review a court ruling revoking the American citizenship of Frank Costello, onetime gambling kingpin now in prison for income tax evasion. It also agreed to examine the deportation case against the notorious Gaetano (Three Finger Brown) Lucchese.

The high court handled the Abel case in its usual manner, despite the current international furor over the Soviet capture of an American pilot downed in a U-2 plane while on an intelligence flight over Russian territory.

The high court made no reference to the incident in reaffirming its March decision. It acted solely on the legal arguments of Abel's lawyer, James B. Donovan, of Brooklyn, that the evidence used against Abel was obtained illegally in violation of his rights under the U. S. Constitution.

At the time of his arrest in 1957, Abel was called the highest-ranking Communist spy ever arrested in this country.

The court also:

1. Let stand a 1959 contempt of court conviction of the Teamsters Union and Hugh L. Rutledge, an officer of the Asheville, N. C., local, in a dispute over the handling of struck goods. Rutledge was sentenced to 18 months in prison and fined $5000.

2. Threw out the appeal of New York State from a lower court ruling against some of the procedures it used in its land dispute with the Tuscarora Indians. The court said the legal issue involved had become academic.

3. Agreed to decide next term whether Federal income taxes must be paid on embezzled funds. It acted in a case involving Eugene C. James, Chicago union official, who was convicted in Federal district court in Chicago of income tax evasion.

4. Rejected an appeal by the French Atomic Energy Commission from a Patent Court ruling denying it an American patent on some nuclear reactors.

5. Refused to review the convictions of 12 New Yorkers, including the well-known Vito Genovese, who were found guilty of conspiring to violate Federal narcotics laws.

Reds Plan Rocket Shot In Pacific

Montgomery Advertiser

Montgomery, Ala.

Wed. 6/29/60

MOSCOW (AP)—The Soviet Union announced Tuesday night it will start a new series of powerful rocket shoots into the central Pacific between July 5 and 31.

The target area of about 50,000 square miles slightly overlaps the zone the Russians used for firing their first rocket into the mid-Pacific last January. It is about 1,000 miles southwest of Hawaii.

The July target area will be about 150 miles farther to the southeast than the one in January, however.

Russia

On their first try the Russians said they came within a mile of the target from 7,000 miles away.

FIRED ATLAS

The United States has since fired an Atlas rocket 9,000 miles, or more than a third of the way around the world, from Cape Canaveral past the southern tip of South Africa.

The Soviet announcement by Tass, official news agency, said the July target practice will be with powerful multistage rockets, minus the final stage. Presumably this meant they will not be armed with warheads or similar payloads.

Soviet scientists have indicated that the purpose of using central Pacific testing grounds is to develop rockets that can reach Venus or Mars.

The announcement followed speeches in Moscow Tuesday night by Premier Nikita Khrushchev and Soviet Defense Minister Rodion Malinovsky asserting that Soviet military forces are being strengthened and their switch to rocket weapons is being accelerated.

'FURTHER RESEARCH'

The official Tass news agency said next month's firings will be part of a program "for further scientific research and experimental designing in the sphere of space problems."

The target area designated is slightly more than 1,000 miles southwest of Hawaii. Tass said Soviet ships will be sent there to make the "necessary measurements." It is within 600 miles of Christmas Island, where the British exploded their first hydrogen bomb.

The United States' Palmyra Island is only about 200 miles to the east of the zone.

The Soviet government asked all countries with vessels and planes in the area to keep them out of the target space, which was described carefully as to longitude and latitude.

Ike Warns Khrushchev: Keep Hands Off Cuba

Atlanta Daily World

Atlanta Ga.

BY STEWART HENSLEY

NEWPORT, R. I. (UP)—President Eisenhower Saturday night warned Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev to keep his hands off Cuba. The President declared that the United States will not "permit the establishment of a regime dominated by international Communism in the Western Hemisphere."

The President said in a statement issued by the summer White House that the United States would not be "deterred" by Khrushchev's rocket threats from standing by its treaty obligations to protect every nation in this hemisphere against domination by a foreign ideology or power.

Sun. 7-10-60

The President's statement came within hours after Khrushchev in a Kremlin speech said Russia might use rockets against the United States if the Americans "dare to begin an intervention against Cuba."

The President authorized issuance of the statement by news secretary James C. Hagerty after talking several times during the afternoon by telephone with Secretary of State Christian A. Herter in Washington. The President was on the phone most of the afternoon from the nearby farm of a friend where he had gone fishing.

CLOSE TIES NOTED

Eisenhower said Khrushchev's remarks underscored Russia's intentions to establish Cuba as a Soviet servant in the western hemisphere. He added that the Soviet Premier's remarks also revealed the "close ties that have developed between the Soviet and Cuban governments."

The presidential statement referred to the Rio Treaty of 1947 and other agreements under which the nations of the Western hemisphere are pledged to stand together against any effort by an outside power to interfere in the affairs of any of them. He said

"I affirm in the most emphatic terms that the United States will not be deterred from its responsibility by the threats Mr. Khrushchev is making, nor will the United States, in conformity with its treaty obligations permit the establishment of a regime dominated by international Communism in the Western Hemisphere."

Hagerty said, in response to a question, that no fleet or troop movements had yet been ordered as a resut of Khrushchev's rocket-rattling speech and the President's bristling rejoinder.

ATTACHE IS TOLD TO LEAVE RUSSIA

Accused of Organizing Spy Apparatus

By STANLEY JOHNSON

MOSCOW (AP)—The Soviet Union Wednesday accused U.S. air attache Col. Edwin M. Kirton of organizing a spy apparatus and conducting himself in a manner offensive to Soviet Citizens. They ordered him out of the Soviet Union.

"It's a surprise to me," said Kirton, a husky, 6-foot-5 career officer from Palo Alto, Calif. "I tried to conduct myself properly."

His assistant, Capt. Irving T. McDonald Jr., of Provincetown, Mass., drew a warning against similar activities, but was not ordered to leave.

The charges against both were rejected by the American charge d'affaires, Edward L. Freers.

McDonald, who was awarded the Legion of Merit in 1956 for outstanding duty, still has a year to go on his Moscow tour of duty. Kirton's two-year assignment would have ended in October.

RETURN HOME

Kirton plans to head home via Copenhagen Monday with his wife, Lira, who returned only Wednesday afternoon from a brief shopping trip to Western Europe.

"I never thought this was what I was coming back for," Mrs. Kirton said.

Kirton served two years in the Pentagon before coming here in September 1958. Before that he was in the Strategic Air Command. His mother is Frances M. Russell of Palo Alto.

A Foreign Ministry statement charged that Kirton organized intelligence apparatus shortly after he took up his post in Moscow, carried out a great number of intelligence trips throughout the Soviet Union, and photographed military and industrial objectives.

It said he was picked up by police in Odessa last winter for forbidden photography and again recently with McDonald on a trip to Kurgan.

Kurgan is a railway and manufacturing center 200 miles southeast of Sverdlovsk, where Francis Gary Powers came down on his May Day U2 flight.

The foreign ministry complained that Kirton's attitude was not sufficiently submissive while he was in custody.

U. S. Embassy officials had expected action to be taken against some staff member to counter the American expulsion of Petr Y. Ezhov July 22.

Ezhov, 39, third secretary at the Soviet Embassy in Washington, was ordered to leave the United States on the ground that he arranged for aerial photography of U. S. cities and military installations.

In Washington, state department press officer Lincoln White said the action against Kirton was "obviously taken in retaliation for the fully warranted expulsion" of Petr U. Ezhov.

Kirton, 50, and McDonald, 34, both are fluent in Russian.

Both had hoped to be observers at Powers' espionage trial, opening Aug. 17.

Kirton made an expert inspection of the U2 wreckage. He also arranged the ceremony for return to the United States of the body of Maj. Willard G. Palm, pilot of the RB47 shot down by the Soviet Union in arctic waters July 1.

NO SPECIFIC CHARGES

The colonel got news of the Soviet action against him upon returning with U. S. Ambassador Llewellyn E. Thompson as escort officer aboard the ambassador's U. S. Air Force plane from Frankfurt, Germany. The attache had flown to Frankfurt after an uneventful visit to the Baltic states.

He had planned to fly to Wiesbaden Thursday to greet the man previously assigned to succeed him as air attache, Col. Melvin Nielsen.

The embassy was notified of the Soviet decision when Freers was called to the Foreign Ministry.

Sergei R. Striganov, acting chief of the American section, told Freers the Soviet government considered Kirton's activities to have been "intelligence activities incompatible with his diplomatic status."

Kirton also was accused of having "conducted himself in a manner offensive to Soviet citizens." McDonald also was accused of engaging in such activities.

Freers reported: "I reject the Soviet assertions and asked if there were any specific charges, but Striganov made no comment."

The Kirton case developed at a time when the Soviet press and radio are playing up spy stories. The Soviet news agency Tass relayed an article in the magazine New Times declaring that American espionage activity jeopardizes the security of the whole world.

FRANCIS POWERS
. . . Reds claim confession

Russians say Powers has pleaded guilty

MOSCOW, Aug. 9—(AP)—Francis Gary Powers has "pleaded guilty to the substance of the charge" that he spied on the Soviet Union in his U2 plane, Tass said today.

The Soviet news agency said the guilt of the American flier, due to go on trial here Aug. 17, is confirmed by material and written evidence, the findings of experts and the testimony of witnesses.

THE INDICTMENT against Powers, who parachuted from his crippled plane in the Urals May 1, was reported to total about 4000 words.

Tass said the indictment was drawn up by the State Security Committee and was approved July 9 by Roman Rudenko, the USSR's prosecutor general.

It accuses Powers of "having been engaged in active espionage against the Soviet Union, which represents a manifestation of the aggressive policy followed by the U. S. government."

Powers' high-flying plane came down near Sverdlovsk, east of Moscow. The Soviet version is that it was felled by an anti-aircraft rocket.

ACCORDING to the indictment, Tass said, Powers "intruded into the airspace of the USSR for the purpose of collecting intelligence of strategic nature on the location of rocket bases, airfields, radar network and other highly important defense and industrial objectives of the USSR."

Tass said Powers is accused under Article 2 of the Soviet law "on criminal responsibilities for state crimes."

The crime of which the Pound, Va., flier is accused carries a penalty ranging from 7 years imprisonment to death by shooting.

"The indictment notes," said Tass, "that it has been established by the preliminary investigation that Powers' spy flight was organized with the knowledge of the American government by an intelligence detachment specially designed to conduct espionage against the USSR and based at the American-Turkish airbase of Incirlik."

Moscow has refused to let American diplomatic officials interview Powers, or to permit an American lawyer to defend him at his forthcoming trial. It has, however, granted his parents visas to attend the proceedings.

THE SOVIET news agency reported the intelligence detachment Powers was assigned to used the code name "10-10." This is Air Force talk for 100 per cent cloud coverage of a target.

"Powers testified during the investigation that before the May 1 flight he had flown reconnaissance missions in a special high-altitude Lockheed U2 aircraft along the Soviet Union's borders with Turkey, Iran and Afghanistan," Tass said.

SUMMIT TALKS OPEN TODAY; PRESIDENT IN PARIS TRADES SNUBS WITH KHRUSHCHEV

PESSIMISM RISES

Soviet Chief Shows Tough Attitude in Pre-Parley Talks

Texts of Eisenhower and Macmillan comments, Page 14.

By ROBERT C. DOTY

Special to The New York Times.

PARIS, May 15—President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Macmillan arrived in Paris today for the summit conference, which opens tomorrow, in an atmosphere dominated by sharp Soviet-United States antagonism.

One high diplomatic source characterized the situation on the eve of the crucial four-power session as "serious," but expressed hope that Premier Khrushchev might still yield to counsel not to press further attacks on the United States that could bring the conference to a crashing halt in a crisis.

An atmosphere of renewed pessimism, following yesterday's brief assertions of hope, was created by snubs administered to each other by President Eisenhower and Premier Khrushchev, and by the impression of toughness left by Mr. Khrushchev in his first diplomatic contacts here.

No U. S.-Soviet Meeting

These contacts were bilateral meetings with President de Gaulle and Mr. Macmillan. Mr. Khrushchev's snub was his lack of any effort to seek an advance meeting with General Eisenhower.

On his side, the President, in an arrival statement at Orly Airfield at 9:30 A. M., expressed pleasure at the opportunity to meet again with General de Gaulle, Mr. Macmillan and Chancellor Adenauer of West Germany. He pointedly omitted any reference to Mr. Khrushchev.

The actions of both men were indications of the high degree of strain in United States-Soviet relations following the downing of a United States reconnaissance plane inside the Soviet Union May 1 and of combative statements by both sides since then.

Aides Reticent on Meetings

Soviet, British and French officials were all reticent about the substance of the meeting between Mr. Khrushchev and General de Gaulle this morning and that between Mr. Khrushchev and Mr. Macmillan this afternoon.

Western leaders had expected that Mr. Khrushchev would seek intimate pre-summit meetings with only interpreters present.

Instead, he notified both General de Gaulle and Mr. Macmillan that he would bring with him Marshal Rodion Y. Malnovsky, Soviet Defense Minister; Andrei A. Gromyko, Foreign Minister, and his ambassador to the country concerned.

The impression in informed circles was that Mr. Khrushchev had continued speaking of the plane incident at these meetings in the same bellicose terms he has employed in several speeches in Moscow. But, at the same time, he was said to have continued professing a desire to reach agreements on major international problems in his meetings with the three other heads of government. Those meetings begin at 10 A. M. tomorrow at the Elysée Palace.

The presence of Marshal Malinovsky in the Soviet delegation has been a subject of much speculation. There have been intelligence reports of pressure from the Soviet Army for a tougher Soviet line in dealings with the West, and some observers saw Marshal Malinovsky's presence in this connection.

Others interpreted it as a sign, instead, of Mr. Khrushchev's desire to have his top military adviser present for discussions of disarmament and a nuclear test ban.

Eisenhower Stresses Peace

President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Macmillan, like Mr. Khrushchev, who preceded them here, made statements at the airfield emphasizing the vital necessity for measures to safeguard peace and avoid what General Eisenhower called "the horrible but universal" consequences of nuclear war.

Then, in a four-power meeting this afternoon of the Western Big Three and Chancellor Adenauer, and a three-power meeting held after Dr. Adenauer had departed, final approval was given to the positions that the West will take on disarmament, Germany and Berlin, and East-West relations. Those are the items for discussion with Mr. Khrushchev in the sessions that start tomorrow.

The Western objective in disarmament will be to continue to defend the thesis of phased arms reduction and progressive controls and to seek general directives in this scene to the ten-power disarmament conference being held in Geneva.

There will be Western resistance to any change of status in West Berlin, as demanded by Mr. Khrushchev, and agreement only to certain accommodations in the functioning of the four-power presence in the divided city.

More Cultural Contact Sought

The West will seek an expansion of contacts of a cultural and scientific nature between the two world blocs, but will advance only cautiously into such domains as joint aid programs to under-developed countries or embargoes on arms deliveries to Asian and African states.

These deliberations were carried on under the figurative shadow of a four-and-a-half-ton space satellite put into orbit around the earth early this morning by the Soviet Union. This was interpreted in Western diplomatic circles as a characteristic flexing of Soviet muscles on the eve of an important international encounter.

General de Gaulle and Mr. Macmillan both were reported to have urged Mr. Khrushchev to abandon his tough line on the spy-plane incident and to keep its repercussions out of the summit discussions.

Premier Khrushchev, however, continued to maintain an aggrieved and combative tone on the issue, probably foreshadowing an intent to repeat Soviet reproaches to President Eisenhower in person. United States diplomats predicted that such a course would inevitably provoke a strong answer from the President and further diminish the already minimal prospects for substantial progress here.

Envoys Present at Talks

Sergei A. Vinogradov, Soviet Ambassador to France, was with Premier Khrushchev, Marshal Malinovsky and Mr. Gromyko for the 11:30 A. M. call at the Elysée Palace. Aleksandr A. Soldatov, Ambassador to Britain, participated in the call on Mr. Macmillan at the British Embassy at 4:30 P. M.

The Western leaders assembled comparable teams to receive Mr. Khrushchev. With President de Gaulle were Premier Michel Debré, Foreign Minister Maurice Couve de Murville and Maurice Dejean, French Ambassador to Moscow. Mr. Macmillan received the Soviet leader with Foreign Secretary Selwyn Lloyd, Sir Patrick Reilly, the British Ambassador to the Soviet Union, and Sir Frederick Hoyer Millar, Permanent Under Secretary at the Foreign Office.

Mr. Khrushchev remained with President de Gaulle in the second-floor Cabinet room of the Elysée Palace from 11:30 until 12:40 P. M. His meeting with Mr. Macmillan lasted from 4:35 until 6:05 P. M.

The Soviet Premier and later the three Western heads of state, were greeted with pomp and ceremony in the white-gravel courtyard of the Elysée Palace. As long black Russian Zils, British Rolls-Royces and the United States "bubble-dome" Presidential Lincoln and an accompanying Cadillac drove in, a brightly uniformed company of the Garde Republicain drawn up on one side presented arms. Dismounted cavalrymen, forming a double line up the steps of the palace, bright their sabers up before the peaks of their gleaming helmets.

Ruffles and Flourishes

Bandsmen played the customary ruffles and flourishes as the guests arrived.

The Western four-power meeting, including Dr. Adenauer, lasted from 2:30 to 4:30 P. M. and was devoted entirely to discussion of Berlin and the German question. In each case, the head of government was accompained by his foreign minister and two other aides.

With President Eisenhower were Secretary of States Christian A. Herter, Livingston Merchant, Under Secretary for Political Affairs, and Col. Vernon Walters, Presidential interpreter.

Texts of Paris Statements

The New York

PARIS, May 15 (AP)—Following are the texts of statements made by President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Macmillian on their arrival here today for the summit conference opening tomorrow:

New York

Eisenhower Statement

I come here to join with leaders of France, Britain and the Soviet Union in discussions of historic importance.

The American Government's participation is undertaken not to seek any advantage at another's expense. Rather it hopes to prove, equally with any other, its sincere dedication to peace.

5-16-60

Mankind knows that the effects of nuclear war can be not only horrible but universal.

P-14-C

Mankind expects participants in this summit meeting to work honestly and intellfgently for progress toward a genuine peace.

The hopes of humanity call on the four of us to purge our minds of prejudice and our hearts of rancor.

Far too much is at stake to indulge in passions at the moment or to engage in profitless bickering.

The issues that divide the free world from the Soviet bloc are grave and not subject to easy solution. But if goodwill exists on both sides, at least a beginning can be made. The West, I am sure, will meet Mr. Khrushchev halfway in every honest effort in this direction.

America will go every foot that safety and honor permit.

It will be a pleasure to meet again with my old friends, President de Gaulle and Prime Minister Macmillan.

I am looking forward to meeting Chancellor Adenauer this afternoon. His resolution has aroused our admiration anew.

I have talked with all three of these leaders in the last few weeks and we have had opportunities to discuss the issues before us.

Unity on great principles and purposes strengthens the Western powers.

As the eyes of the world turn toward Paris, I pray that the grace of God be with us to direct our efforts so that progress toward a just peace may be achieved.

Macmillan Statement

I am always glad to visit Paris. It is here that some of the most eventful and stimulating pages in history have been written. Now we have the opportunity to write yet another.

There are compelling reasons why we should not fail.

Today, mankind cannot afford misunderstandings, suspicions, hostility. Errors of judgment based on ignorance or anger lead with dreadful speed to the extinction of civilization. All that man has strived to achieve through the centuries could be obliterated almost overnight.

That alone must compel us to do our work with care and thoroughness.

Yet at the same time as science offers us self-destruction she also offers opportunities for a life fulller and richer than we have known before. It would be madness indeed if we threw a future so rich wit hpromise.

Of course, the problems are difficult, immensely difficult. We cannot expect to solve them in one meeting.

What we have to do is to set in motion an orderly process of discussion and negotiation.

If that is done, and if we continue to meetandnegotiate in full recognition of the magnitude of the responsibility resting on us, then I think that over a period of time we may well find that the difficulties are less insuperable than perhaps they now seem to be.

The thin gto do is to make a good start here in Paris. If we do that, this meeting may be acclamed by history.

Ministers Vote Break In Relations, Embargo On Arms

Sun. 8-21-60

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica (AP)—Western hemisphere foreign ministers in an unprecedented action voted Saturday to break off diplomatic relations with the Dominican Republic and embargo all arms shipments to its strongman regime.

Dominican delegates walked out of the meeting as the ministers forwarded their resolution to the Organization of American States for its certain approval.

Dominican Foreign Minister Porfirio Herrera Baez refused to comment on the condemnation of his government. His departure does not necessarily mean Dominican withdrawal from the OAS, however, as all Latin-American states and the United States have automatic membership.

WITHOUT PRECEDENT

The strong action against the Dominican Republic was without precedent in Latin-American history and diplomatic sources said the mood of the ministers spelled trouble for leftist Cuba when its case comes up next week. Cuba's charges of U.S. aggression got a cool reception when first voiced earlier this week.

The foreign ministers convicted Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo's Dominican strongman regime of aggression against Venezuela. Venezuela accused Trujillo officials of backing a recent plot to assassinate President Romulo Betancourt and to overthrow his Venezuelan government. The Dominican Republic denied the charges.

In agreeing with Venezuela, the ministers passed over a U.S. suggestion that the OAS appoint a special committee to assure an orderly transition to a new regime in the Dominican Republic.

COMMUNIST THREATS

The foreign ministers decided to pass the question of a special committee over to a second meeting Monday on foreign threats to the hemisphere, where U.S. charges of Communist penetration in Cuba will be considered.

Some Latin-American delegates were said to feel that to give a special committee the powers outlined by the United States would be intervention in internal affairs. Latin-Americans are traditionally opposed to such intervention.

The application of sanctions, or penalties, comes under the 1947 Treaty of Rio de Janeiro and the Charter of the OAS, and hence is not considered intervention.

Key Is Sought to Unlock Riddle of Student Riots

By JOHN ABNEY

(The Copley News Service)

Latin American school boys have achieved a certain prominence. Student riots have become an expected procedure as well as a source of speculation.

Panamanian youngsters fought heated battles in an effort to plant their flag in the United States-controlled Canal Zone. In Bolivia, they stoned the US embassy. More recently, Mexican students staged riotous demonstrations and burned an American flag while suggesting that Uncle Sam leave Cuba alone. Students in Nicaragua also burned a US flag. These are only a few of many incidents.

They give rise to the inevitable question — Why?

The underlying reasons for these riots seldom can be found in a news report, although the report may be entirely honest. One of the handiest explanations and the one most generally accepted, is that trouble is being promoted by Communist agitators.

Red organizers do have a hand in much of the rioting. But even these professionals need an appropriate working climate: A situation of unrest.

Latin America is a frontier land. Expanding economies in recent years have brought better living and new automobiles to a minority.

But despite the hemisphere's tremendous potential, there is a growing concern for the future among the middle and lower classes. Progress has been made, but living costs have soared. Relatively few from the overwhelming modest-income class have seen any real benefits from the new economic growth.

They fear the control of this vast wealth may remain in the hands of small ruling groups which hold the political strings. The situation prevails in a number of Latin American nations. It is a hangover from the Spanish feudal system in which peasants were only spectators.

In most Latin nations, the students harbor a smouldering distrust of government authorities, especially where a ruling party has been in power for many years.

The students are clamoring for reforms that will bridge the gap between social classes.

They frequently try to break channels of influence with the US, which they feel enables their own ruling groups to maintain an almost permanent control.

Conservative Latins want to preserve existing systems and build on them. The liberals believe drastic changes are needed. In their opinion, commercial and diplomatic relations with the US, although effective several decades back, are outdated.

Among the most common charges against the US are complaints that we supply arms and military equipment to ruling parties who co-operate with us in the field of commerce, thus giving them the means to continue in power.

While virtually all Latin nations hold elections, ballot counting often is ridiculed as a farce by opposition parties. And when voting appears to be merely a ritual to cover what the public believes is a "fix," the basis for trouble is laid.

In these instances, US-backing of the recognized government often leads to criticism and anti-American riots. At the same time, Uncle Sam is placed on a spot. It is difficult to follow a definite policy with systems suffering from political instability.

Since the beginning of their history, the Latins have consistently fought off all nations that sought to colonize them. They would be no more willing to accept domination from Russia or Red China than they were from the Spanish, French and British.

They are determined to set their own course.

WASHINGTON, July 29.

THE Organization of American States voted unanimously Friday for the 21 American foreign ministers to convene in Costa Rica Aug. 16 to consider Russia's interference in Latin America.

Cuba joined in the action but its delegate later objected to the agenda as a political maneuver "covered with smoke and fog."

The American foreign ministers actually will hold two meetings at San Jose, conferring first on Venezuelan charges that the Dominican Republic was involved in an assassination attempt June 24 on Venezuelan President Romulto Betancourt and secondly on the determination of Cuban-U. S. relations.

Bolivia expressed regret for the burning of U. S. flags by followers of Fidel Castro in La Paz —and thus became the 19th Latin American country to rap the Cuban leader in one way or another.

NICARAGUA SEEKS REBELS' HOSTAGES

The N.Y. Times

Besieged Attackers Hold 200 Children in School and Demand Free Exit

New York

By PAUL P. KENNEDY

Special to The New York Times

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 13—Two hundred children were being held hostage today by rebel forces barricaded in a church boarding school in the town of Diriamba, just south of this capital city.

11-14-60

The rebels were driven to refuge in the Christian Brothers School after attempting an armed revolt Friday.

They had captured the towns of Jinotepe and Diriamba, both in Carazo Province, but were overwhelmed early yesterday morning by the National Guard.

One force fled from Jinotepe, according to a Government spokesman. The other, in Diriamba, retreated to the school.

In addition to the children, at least two officers and some civilians were being held. The rebels have demanded a guarantee of free exit from the country.

Church Offers Aid

Church officials, including the Rev. Dr. Carlos Borge y Castrillo, Bishop Coadjutor of Managua, volunteered to serve as intermediaries to gain the release of the children.

A Government spokesman said that Bishop Borge had been authorized by President Luis Somoza Debayle to offer the rebels a guarantee of fair trial if they would yield the hostages and surrender.

The Bishop remained in Managua, however, awaiting word from Brother Esteban, head of the Christian Brothers in Nicaragua, who left for the school this morning with a group of parents of the children being held hostage.

Reports from Diriamba indicated that the parents were becoming increasingly restive over the rebel refusal to release the children. There were no reports that any attempt had been made to storm the school.

Several persons have been permitted to enter the school in an attempt to deal with the rebels. It was not known if these included Brother Esteban.

Brother Esteban said that he was responsible for the safety of the children and would offer himself as a hostage to gain their release.

Earlier reports that the school lacked sufficient food and water for the children and the hostages were denied today by the Government. The spokesman said that the supplies were adequate and the sanitation facilities were serviceable.

The rebel forces were identified by the Government as a mixture of Cubans and members of the Nicaraguan Patriotic Youth, an organization opposed to President Somoza's regime.

They had managed to capture the National Guard garrisons at Jinotepe and Diriamba in khat was apparently a surprise attack. The rebels had been believed to be active only along the Costa Rican frontier to the south.

Managua was immediately sealed of and the Government decried a suspension of constitutional rights as the National Guard launched a counter-attack against the two towns.

The Government said that the revolt had been crushed and would be over as soon as the rebels were dislodged from the school.

Friends of the rebels approached the United States Ambassador, Thomas E. Whelan, yesterday with a suggestion that he act as a mediator. Mr. Whelan said he had rejected the request.

The Ambassador explained that such an action would constitute intervention in the internal affairs of Nicaragua.

Rebel Leaders Protest

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica, Nov. 13 (UPI)—The San José newspaper Prensa Libre published statements today from the guerrilla leaders whose troops clashed yesterday with the Costa Rican civil guard on the border of Nicaragua.

The paper said the statements had been obtained "by special envoy." The rebel leaders signed the statements, Leonel Cabezas, Commander in Chief, and Carlos Duque de Estrade, Captain and Chief of Staff.

PRIVATE AGENCIES AID U. S. ON AFRICA

The N.Y. Times

They Often Do Job Better Than Government Can, State Department Says

New York

By DANA ADAMS SCHMIDT

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 15—The United States Government is turning to private agencies and educational institutions as instruments of United States policy in the newly independent nations of Africa.

9-16-60

State Department officials said this week that private organizations often were able to act faster and more effectively than government agencies because of their specialized knowledge and personnel.

The emphasis thus far is in education and vocational training. Such status is attached to education among Africans, officials said, that every African leader places education at or near the top of his political platform.

Variety of Groups Serve

The State Department's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs is seeking to develop closer relations with organizations of the following types:

¶Those with substantial programs in Africa involving grants and publications. These include the African-American Institute, the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation, the Phelps-Stokes Fund, the Rockefeller Foundation and the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research.

¶Religious and missionary organizations with programs including scholarships and educational exchange. Of these there are nineteen with more than 6,000 representatives in Africa. One of the largest is the White Fathers with 577 mission stations in Africa.

¶Economic and research foundations, including the African Research Foundation, which is concerned with medicine.

¶Cultural and artistic organizations, including the American Soicety on African Culture, an organization of American Negro intellectuals and artists.

"Just the liaison job with these organizations is massive," one official observed.

Visits to U. S. Arranged

The State Department is using the American Council on Education to arrange visits to the United States by leaders in Education and religion from Africa and other parts of the world. The Governmental Affairs Institute handles visitors in journalism and government affairs.

Schools Help in Aid Program

The African-American Institute has been helping to make contact with leaders in education in the Congo. This organization is active also in assisting other private organizations in the United States that have offered scholarships to African students. It has a teacher placement division that has been supplying teachers to Ghana and Nigeria.

The International Cooperation Administration is developing a growing list of contracts with universities to help in its aid programs in Africa. Some of the programs are:

KENYA—Earlham College of Indiana, assisting in developing Kenya's educational system.

LIBERIA—Cornell University, working with the University of Liberia on future educational needs. Prairie View A. & M. College of Texas, working with the Booker Washington Institute on educational problems. Tuskegee Institute, helping Nigeria plan teacher education.

UGANDA—Delgado Teacher and Technical Institute of New Orleans, working on vocational education with the Kangsala Technical Institute.

NIGERIA—Michigan State University, developing a higher education system for the government of the Eastern region. Ohio University, working on general educational problems with the Eastern region's government, and planning teacher education with the government of the Western region. Western Michigan University, working with the Ibadan Technical Institute on technical education.

FEDERATION OF RHODESIA and NYASALAND—Delgado Teacher and Technical Institute, working on technical education with Hodgson Technical College.

Harlem Wraps Castro to Her Bosom

NEW YORK — With Fidel Castro wrapped securely in the middle of its bosom at Seventh Avenue and 125th Street, Harlem was a happy community last week.

The Pittsburgh

For the first time since the historic Joe Louis conflicts of years gone by up in the Bronx, this community had become the center of attention.

Pittsburgh, Pa.

Not only was the name of Harlem on everyone's lips in Gotham, the news of the Cuban delegation's decision to take quarters in the Hotel Theresa had been beamed via TV and the newspapers all over the nation and the world.

10-1-60

To say that Harlem was flattered was to put it mildly. She didn't give a continental as to whether or not the move of Castro "uptown" was a smashing propaganda victory for the Cubans. She was happy to know that Castro and his party were thinking of them.

CASTRO has undertaken to make friends with any and all members of the world's biggest Negro Urban Community.

He has met with prominent leaders of all segments of the Harlem community, wined and dined the employes of the Hotel Theresa, and maintained good relations with the masses of supporters he has found in the streets of this community.

Contrary to popular belief, Harlem has been for years one of the most dismal spots on earth when night falls. With her store fronts barred and chained and her streets practically deserted (for New York, that is), she presents a most uninviting appearance, particularly more so on a rainy night.

But with the arrival of Castro, all this has been changed. Perhaps one of the locals summed up Harlem's attitude toward Castro when he quipped: "Why shouldn't we like him? He ended racial discrimination in Cuba and that's more than the United States has done in this matter. We're for him and like him."

How Harlem Reacted To Castro; Cuban Leader's Move Focused Spotlight on Negro Community

The Black Dispatch

Cuban Leader Was Attempting to Escape Hostile White Public

Oklahoma City, Okla.

Dr. Bunche Helped Arrange Switch

Fri. 9-30-60

Special to Associated Negro Press

HARLEM, New York.—The world's spotlight last week was suddenly turned on this so-called "Negro Community" when Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro, in a grandiloquent gesture shortly after arriving in New York to attend the 15th United Nations General Asssembly, changed his official UN address to the Hotel Theresa here.

Castro brought his UN Cuban entourage of some 90 persons here after alleging that he had been mistreated at the downtown Shelbourne hotel, located near the assembly building. However, from Castro's allusion to being happy "to live among the humble people of Harlem," there were speculations that he wanted to escape the pressure of a hostile white public angry over his running feud with the U. S. State Department and his dealings with Russian Premier Nikita Krushchev.

How Harlem Reacted

Meanwhile, here in Harlem, Negroes seemed pleased that their community, often referred to with disfavor as a ghetto, was considered good enough for Castro and Khrushchev, who came to visit Fidel in another dramatic move.

While recognizing the Castro move as possible propaganda, Negroes here, many of whom joined with Latin residents in cheering the revolutionary leader's arrival, bore no animosity to Fidel. Some saw an opportunity to express themselves on the race issue, such as one bystander, who remarked: "He sure made a fool out of them white folks. Maybe they'll straighten up and fly right (treat Negroes fairly)."

Favorable Report Helped

Also contributing to the calm cordiality shown Castro here, are reports long preceding him alluding to the absence of segregation in his government. The chief of staff of his army is said to be a Negro. The business places in Cuba are reported to have been forbidden to practice discrimination.

Still, Negroes were cautious of Castro's ties with Khrushchev, the boss of the Comunist world, and were careful not to go on record as supporting Communism.

But it was also felt that Castro was bringing further light to bear on the race question.

Bunche Aids Shift

Meantime, the Associated Negro Press learned from a highly reliable source that Dr. Ralph Bunche, UN undersecretary, and one of the men who heard Castro's complaint of poor treatment at the Shelburne hotel, and the State Department, helped in arranging the switch to the Theresa.

Since he took up his abode here, Castro has been greeted by large crowds, including hundreds of curious people who wanted to glimpse the controversial Cuban leader. And Castro acknowledged their presence by appearing frequently and waving to the crowds.

Negro leaders, meanwhile, were watching the situation closely to see that the Communists do not exploit the color issue to the detriment of Negroes. One, Gloster E. Current, national director of NAACP branches, said in an address at the North Carolina State Conference of NAACP units at Charles, S. C., that Khrushchev's Harlem meeting with Castro was "an attempt to make it appear that Negroes of America are friendly to the communist conspirators."

Castro has never declared himself a Communist, although his government has dealings with the Reds. But since he led 80 revolutionaries into the Cuban hills and emerged with an army of peasants and other supporters to crush former dictator Fulgencia Batista, Fidel appeared to be either playing the East against the West or moving in the former direction.

He has nationalized a number of businesses in Cuba formerly owned or run by Americans, and even took over two American-owned banks—the First National of Cuba and the Chase National of Cubo—allegedly for the good of Cuba.

Castro Tough, Headstrong

On the other hand, he has openly invited Negro tourists to visit Cuba, assuring them fair, unbiased treatment.

Politically, he has met force with force. When the U. S. Department reduced the Cuban sugar quota as a result of his actions against Cuban-based American business, Castro retorted by grabbing more American firms.

Last Thursday, President Eisenhower, following his address to the UN, lunched with several world leaders, but carefully excluded both Khrushchev and Castro. When Fidel was asked how he felt about the snub, he replied that he did not care. He said he was happy living "with the humble people of Harlem."

Then he added: "We don't worry; we not sad. I wish them (those attending the Presidential luncheon) good appetite. I am going to take lunch at the Hotel Theresa with Cuban people. I belong to the poor people—to the Cuban people."

Rumors Spread

Meanwhile, all sorts of rumors about the effect of the Castro visit to Harlem circulated. Among other things it was believed that visitors from all over the world would be seeking lodgings at the Theresa and that the hotel, which had lost its popularity to other leading Negro hostelries such as the Gotham in Detroit and Sutherland in Chicago, may be headed toward a new period of prosperity. The Cubans have also taken a liking to it and one hotel in Havana reportedly changed its name to theresa.

Castro, meanwhile, was willing to pay more for the "friendly" confines of the Theresa. Whereas he was asked 400 a day at the Shelburne, he shelled out about $845 per day for his delegation at the Theresa. But Fidel claimed he was about to be robbed by the Shelburne management, whose owner, Edward Spatz, asked a $10,000 guarantee on the bill. A $5,000 advance was paid by the Cubans, but when the second bond was offered, Spatz turned it down, saying it looked phony. That apparently angered Castro.

At the Theresa, Love Woods, the owner, who is a Negro, was happy. He said a Castro representative had paid $700 in cash for the first day. His attitude contrasted sharply with that of Spatz, who admitted he was reluctant to welcome Castro and his party at the Shelburne.

No Color Bar In Cuba says Writer

By WILLIAM WORTHY

HAVANA, Cuba — On October 28, 1492, when Columbus discovered Cuba, he spoke of it as "the most beautiful land human eyes have ever seen."

Here are a few reflections of a North American reporter reluctantly leaving her soon for home.

If I were a colored parent, eager to raise my children free of racial complexes and ingrained subservience I would at any sacrifice treat them to at least one impressionable year in revolutionary, non-discriminatory Cuba where the free and unself-conscious mixing of races and complexions is startling to an outsider.

If I were a colored tourist eager to enjoy a holiday in a lovely, inexpensive vacation spot, this is the place.

Contrary to alarmist reports in our daily press, Castro's Cuba is and along has been peaceful, safe and restful.

* * *

IF I WERE a serious-minded college or university student of any race, eager to gain a sense of identity with the "third world" of Africa, Asia and Latin America, I would bone up on Spanish and spend a summer of a semester or a year at one of Cuba's politically vibrant and low-tuition universities.

If I were a colored technician or trained in a profession, but were frustrated by jim crow from fully utilizing my skills, I would check with the nearest Cuban consulate or the Cuban Embassy in Washington to see if I could be of service in the exciting construction of a new society where skin color is already irrelevant.

If white Americans had brainwashed me to accept "moderation and gradualsim" in the fight for civil rights. if I believed that revolutionary steps against job and housing discrimination weren't feasible, I would test my theories against Fidel Castro's bold measures that overnight established equality as the law of the land, as the rigid policy of his government and as the day-by-day habits of the citizenry.

* * *

JUST LAST month, Isolde Dreckmann, a West German residing three years in the States, spend her vacation here. She was struck, she told me, by the manner in which dark-skinned Cubans walk in freedom with heads erect — "without the hang-dog appearance of so many colored persons I have seen in the States."

I I wanted an advance peek into impending racial crisis at home, if I wanted to learn the high eventual price of breaking the economic and political strangle hold of our determined white majority, if I wanted to brace myself to withstand their pressures and slanders and throat-cutting, I would visit Havana and Santiago and Mataxas to learn how the brave, resourceful and unified Cubans have successfully thwarted Yankee efforts to bring them to their knees.

* * *

IF I resolved to understand the accumulated grievances of Latin Americans, I would carefully review the colonial records of first the Spaniards and then the Yankees. I would not rely solely on United States Textbooks. I would want to know why Latins today compare Fidel Castro to Simon Bolivar who broke the back of Spanish rule in this hemisphere.

Above all, I would want to know the outlines of our Caribbean policy even in the days of Bolivar. For it was more than a century ago when he prophetically declared:

"The United States seems destined by Providence to plague the Americas with miseries in the name of liberty."

20-story hotel in Cuba is now Habana Theresa

By WILLIAM WORTHY

HAVANA, Cuba — The twenty story Riviera, one of Cuba's luxuriously designed hotels, offering a magnificent view of the Gulf of Mexico, was rechristened the Hotel Habana Theresa by order of Premier Fidel Castro on Wednesday.

In last forty - eight hours practically every Cuban who has recognized me as a "Norte Americano" has asked with delight if I had heard that "Fidel is staying in Harlem at the Hotel Theresa." Among the Cubans there has been tremendous satisfaction that their Prime Minister found sanctuary, as it were among that part of the United States population with which they most readily identify.

Ever since the widely publicized pressures last spring on Joe Louis to quit advertising Cuba as the tourist paradise that it is, the revolutionary leaders here have wanted to strengthen cultural and political ties with colored citizens of the United States. Seen from here, Castro's dramatic stay at the Theresa is the kind of undreamed of breakthrough that could lead to a substantial increase in the flow of colored vacationers to this island.

The air conditioned Habana Theresa bears little physical or environmental resemblance to its Harlem namesake.

It is separated from the ocean by just the fifty - foot wide Malecon Boulevard. While strolling through the glassed-in lobby, guests enjoy the pleasant illusion of being at sea aboard a luxury steamer. Warm ocean water is piped into the outdoor swimming pool.

Before Castro came to power, dark-skinned Cubans or Americans could not rent a room in the Riviera. The old rates, prohibitive except to the wealthiest Yankees or the handful of Cuban beneficiaries of Batista dictatorship, were slashed by the revolutionary government in order to attract a less flamboyant class of tourists and to bring in much needed dollars.

U.S. Closing Up Big Cuba Plant

The Atlanta Constitution.

Atlanta Ga.

By JOHN M. HIGHTOWER

WASHINGTON (AP)—The United States announced Thursday night that it is closing down its big Nicaro nickel-processing plant in Cuba.

The action came some hours after announcement that American residents in Cuba have been advised to send home their wives and children.

Atl. Ga. 9-30-60

18e(4)

It was learned also that the United States is planning to impose new controls on exports to Cuba, probably covering some industrial machinery and supplies.

The $110-million Nicaro nickel plant in Oriente Province employed or contributed to the employment of 2,800 Cubans. The plant was built in 1942-43 to provide nickel, a strategically important metal, for U.S. operations in World War II. It also performed the same function in the Korean conflict. It now has a capacity of 50 million pounds per year.

Suspension of operation, effective almost immediately, appears to be a blow to the Cuban economy to which Nicaro has contributed 80 million dollars over 18 years in local wages and purchases.

HARASSMENT, TAXES

A formal announcement by the State Department, however, blamed the closing on "harassment" by the Castro regime and on the imminent imposition of "confiscatory" Cuban taxes.

Atlanta Ga.

The United States had negotiated with the Cubans in a series of three meetings since June 28 to sell the plant to Cuba. Castro representatives offered the "ridiculously low" price of $5,386,000.

Atl. Ga. 9-30-60

That offer brought the negotiations to a breakdown and Cuba then gave the United States "an ultimatum" that after next Saturday, Oct. 1, the Cuban taxes would either be paid on the nickel or no nickel would be shipped. The United States said it had offered to pay "a reasonable tax" but Cuba rejected that offer.

EARLIER ACTION

The action involving American dependents came earlier in the day.

The State department announced that dependents of U.S. Embassy personnel in Havana have been encouraged to leave and said other American residents there have been informed they should take similar action.

REPLACEMENT BLOCK

There has been speculation for days that new export controls would be aimed at blocking shipments to Cuba of any replacement parts for U.S.-built oil refineries which have been seized by the Castro regime as well as chemicals used in oil refining.

Indications Thursday night were that the action on export controls would be taken in the near future.

On Sept. 2 the Commerce department instituted a licensing system for exports of jeeps and trucks, together with repair parts, to Cuba and to the Dominican Republic. The prospective new step presumably would have the effect of broadening the export control in the case of Cuba.

The basic reason given for removal of Americans from Cuba is that, in view of the hostile attitude displayed by Castro's government, the United States cannot provide normal protection to U.S. citizens through regular diplomatic channels.

A State department press officer, Francis W. Tully, said that the advisory warning applies only to dependents of U.S. citizens, such as businessmen.

Bombs Disrupt Castro's Rally

Blames U. S., Raps Negro 'Oppression'

Jackson Daily News

Jackson, Miss.

HAVANA (UPI)—Two bomb explosions at a giant welcome home rally Wednesday night brought a storm of fury against the United States from Premier Fidel Castro and an announcement he was setting up a neighborhood spy system to catch "lackeys of imperialism."

Thursday, Sept. 22, 1960

The noisy blasts interrupted Castro's speech but did no damage. A panic was averted when Castro had his lieutenants lead the 150,000 massed Cubans in the national anthem.

Five persons, including a man wearing the garb of a priest, were reported arrested.

The bearded premier scoffed at the bombs, blamed them on the United States and said he was setting up big-brother vigilance committees in every block of Havana to root out what he called "lackeys of imperialism and tyranny."

He said civilian militia units would be enlarged throughout Cuba "zone by zone."

RUSSIANS PRESENT

The bombs exploded in Zayas Park, across the street from the palace where Castro, flanked by Soviet Ambassador Sergei Kudriatsev and other honored guests, spoke. Also on the stand were the Russian crewmen of the Soviet turbojet which flew Castro back to Havana from the United Nations General Assembly. Castro's Cubana Airlines plane was impounded in New York by a court order.

The blasts resounded throughout the nation over radio and television networks carrying Castro's speech. The bombs apparently were of the type known as "petardos"—small but noisy.

Following the first explosion, Castro told the crowd: "Everybody knows who paid for that bomb—those are the bombs of imperialism."

BULLETIN

WASHINGTON (UPI)—The State Department said today that it was urging all American nationals to leave Cuba. Press officer Francis W. Tully said that repeated Cuban police harassment of U. S. nationals made it advisable for them to get out of the country.

"I believe tomorrow they will go to charge your excellency," he said, in what was interpreted as a reference to U.S. Ambassador Philip Bonsal.

"Mark this well," he added, "the moment I was talking of imperialism, the bomb exploded."

The crowd responded with a thunderous chant of "To the wall, to the wall"—death by firing squad.

MORE CONFISCATION

Castro said the bombings would only spur his revolutionary program and promised that each bomb the "imperialists" paid for would mean the nationalization of another American-owned property.

The crowds carried anti-American and pro-Russian signs and chanted such slogans as "Viva Castro," "Viva Khrushchev," "Viva Lumumba," and the familiar "Cuba yes, Yankees no."

The United States, Castro told the crowd, was a "cold and hostile nation" where 20 million Negroes are "oppressed and exploited."

As for New York, where he had hotel difficulties and was restricted to the island of Manhattan on security grounds, he said it was a city of "persecutions and provocation" where the "club and truncheon . . . is an institution of terror."

18e(4)

Castro said "dozens and dozens of Cubans, both men and women, were beaten by the thungs of the New York police" during his 10-day stay.

America Maintains Patrol To Safeguard Guatemala And Nicaragua

By The Associated Press

Cuba and its big communist friends, the Soviet Union and Red China, denounced as a menace to world peace yesterday the United States warship shield thrown up to protect Guatemala and Nicaragua.

Cuban newspapers said deployment of United States warships in nearby waters could open the way for an attack on Cuba, thus shattering the peace of the world.

Radio Moscow said the movement of United States warships into the turbulent Caribbean is "fraught with the danger of a military conflict."

Premier Chou En-lai of Red China said the United States was threatening Cuba "by force of arms" and promised continued support for Prime Minister Fidel Castro's regime.

U. S. Brushes Clamor Aside

The clamor from Cuba and the world's two largest communist powers was brushed aside by the United States. The Navy in Washington reiterated that the carrier Shangri-La and four destroyers are in position to help repel any invasion of the two little Central American nations.

The State Department in Washington spiked a report published in London that the warships might halt suspected ships on the high seas. Washington said ships would be stopped only in the two nations' territorial waters, and then only on the request of Nicaragua and Guatemala.

Presidential Press Secretary James Hagerty said in Augusta, Ga., the Moscow broadsides were "communist type reaction" and added: "There's a very similar reaction — the words are almost the same — from Cuba."

President Eisenhower ordered the warships into the Caribbean at the request of Guatemala and Nicaragua after both nations stamped out uprisings they charged had support from Castro's Cuba.

In Havana, the semiofficial newspaper Revolucion called the United States action "Yankee military occupation of Central America," and asserted it was designed to intimidate Cuba.

"Guantanamo or Guatemala, the place for the self-provoked aggression is immaterial," said Revolucion.

Guantanamo Echoes

The Castro regime has charged repeatedly the United States was preparing an incident at its leased Guantanamo naval base in eastern Cuba as a pretext for military intervention.

Radio Peiping said the United States was helping "the reactionary dictatorial governments of Guatemala and Nicaragua in suppressing the people's revolutionary movements there."

The Cuban mission is in Peiping to seek expansion of trade ties. It is headed by Maj. Ernesto 'Che' Guevara, Castro's leftist economic boss who negotiated the recent trade treaty with Peiping.

Castro's Chief Judge Asks Haven

The Atlanta Constitution
Atlanta, Ga.
Wed. 11-16-60

HAVANA (AP)—The president of Cuba's Supreme Court, Dr. Emilio Menendez, took asylum Tuesday in the Argentine embassy, it was learned from authoritative sources.

It was reported another member of Cuba's highest court, Jose Morell Romero, fled to Mexico Saturday.

Neither report could be confirmed officially Tuesday night.

The reasons for defections of the high ranking magistrates were not known immediately. Since early this year, however, a number of attorneys and members of the bench have privately expressed dissatisfaction with the judicial processes under the Castro regime.

They have been especially critical of the treatment said to have been given another magistrate, Elio Alvarez, when he was in a local prison. Alvarez, now exiled in the United States, was reported brutally beaten by Castro guards. Prime Minister Fidel Castro appointed Menendez president of the Supreme Court last December. He and Romero both had held high positions in the judiciary under Bastista.

U. S. Fleet Sent To Halt 'Threats'

Atlanta Daily Record
Fri. 11-18-60

AUGUSTA, Ga. (UPI)—President Eisenhower Thursday ordered U.S. warships and planes to protect Guatemala and Nicaragua against any "Communist directed" invasion launched from Cuba.

Both Central American republics accused Cuban Premier Fidel Castro of aiding unsuccessful rebel attempts this week to topple their respective governments. Manuel Orellana, a major force in Guatemalan political affairs, said he and his supporters would call for declaration of war if it can be proved that Castro was behind the rebellion.

Eisenhower's announcement, reminiscent of his historic order of August 25, 1958, directing ships of the U. S. Seventh Fleet to saill into the Formosa Straits to defend Formosa and the Pescadores, pointed up the seriousness with which the White House regards the situation.

CARRIERS, DESTROYERS READY

Atlanta, Ga.

The Navy disclosed shortly after the President's announcement that the big aircraft carrier Shangrila and four destroyers were patroling an area off the southern tip of Cuba. A fifth destroyer, the K. D. Bailey, was reported refueling at Panama and was assigned to patrol along the East Coast. The four destroyers with the Shangrila all are equipped for radar picket duty. They are the Fisk, Hawkins, W R. Rush and M. C. Fox.

Fri. 11-18-60

In addition the Navy reported two P2W patrol planes, based in Panama, would help keep an aerial surveillance. The Shangrila normally carries 70 aircraft.

Eisenhower issued his carefully worded announcement after discussing the crisis with Secretary of State Christian A. Herter, Defense Secretary Thomas S. Gates Jr., and Chairman Lyman L. Lemnitzer of the Joint Chiefs of Staff at his vacation headquarters here.

The White House said that the subject did not come up at an earlier two-hours session of the top-level National Security Council attended by the diplomatic and military leaders.

ISSUES PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT

James C. Hagerty, press secretary to the President, issued the following statement on Eisenhower's action:

"In response to the requests of the governments of Guatemala and Nicaragua, surface and air units of the U. S. Navy are in a position in which they could assist these governments, should it become necessary, to seek out and precent intervention on the part of Communist-directed elements in the internal affairs of Guatemala through the landing of armed forces or supplies from abroad."

This was interpreted as a blunt warning to Castro that the United States would defend the two countries with force if necessary.

Eisenhower issued the orders on Wednesday after Nicaragua's request for help was received by the State Department. It trailed Guatemala's plea by several days.

Cubans Take Over U.S. Nickel Plant

The News and Courier
Charleston, S.C.

HAVANA (AP) — Cuban workers have taken over operation of the $110-million, U.S.-owned Nicaro nickel-processing plant in Oriente Province. The United States announced last Thursday it was closing down the plant because of harassment and confiscatory taxes imposed by Prime Minister Fidel Castro's regime.

The move by the workers was viewed as a preliminary to outright seizure of the big installation. A report from the plant said Cuban employes "are voluntarily continuing normal operations until the government determines what measures to take."

In the past, government seizure has followed what the Castro regime termed "abandonment" of an operation by the owners.

Remaining American residents in Cuba no longer ask if there will be a break in U.S.-Cuban relations. They now ask, "When will it come."

This hostility was dramatized last week when Carlos Olivares, strongman of the Cuban Foreign Ministry, heatedly rejected Bonsal's attempt to deliver a U.S. note protesting the nationalization of American banks. The note accused the Castro regime of echoing "the fraudulent propaganda of international communism."

A series of other developments served to widen the diplomatic gulf:

Castro returned from the United Nations, where he lashed out at the United States, and immediately spurred a propaganda campaign designed to depict the U.S. Embassy here as a front for a den of spies.

Another anti-American blast came from Jesus Soto, boss of Cuba's organized labor movement, who declared it would be an honor for Cuba not to have diplomatic relations with the United States.

U.S. WARNING

Citizens Told To Avoid Cuba

The Fla. Times-Union
Jacksonville, Fla.
Sept. 10-1-60

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 (AP)—The State Department tonight advised all U.S. citizens to stay away from Cuba "unless there are compelling reasons" for going there.

This action was taken to reduce the number of Americans who might be within the jurisdiction of the government of Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

Yesterday the State Department advised U.S. residents in Cuba, other than those at the Guantanamo naval base, to send their wives, children and other dependents back to this country.

The advisory warning issued tonight by the department's press office, officials said, will be sent by the passport service to travel agencies and other organizations which might be interested.

Candidates Assailed

HAVANA, Sept. 30 (AP)—No matter which candidate wins the U.S. presidential election, Prime Minister Fidel Castro made it a certainty today that he'll have no friend in the White House.

Castro used a television panel show as his stump for assailing Richard M. Nixon and John F. Kennedy. He called them "cowardly hypocrites."

If Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev spent six months in the United States he could draw more votes than Kennedy, Castro told the laughing panel.

Castro — who is 34 and sprouts a thick growth of chin whiskers—called Kennedy, 43, and Nixon 47, "two ignorant, beardless kids... puppets who are toys of the great interests."

The biting attack on both U.S. presidential candidates was a continuation of an earlier Castro blast in the United Nations in New York last Monday.

The first attack was cut off by a sharp reprimand from U.N. General Assembly President Frederick H. Boland of Ireland in front of the full 96-nation gathering.

Sees No Good

Castro found nothing good about either Nixon or Kennedy.

"They are incapable of standing before a tribune to utter a single truth," shouted Castro to his television audience.

But he had praise for Khrushchev—who is 66 and clean-shaven—as "a genial individual with great energy and peppy disposition." Above all, Castro found him to be "a great sympathizer of the Cuban revolution."

The original purpose of the panel show was for newsmen to discuss Castro's visit to the United States and the United Nations. Castro walked into the television studio unannounced and took over.

Move Viewed As Preliminary To Outright Seizure Of Nicaro Nickel

By The Associated Press

HAVANA, Oct. 2. — Cuban workers have taken over operation of the 110 million-dollar United States-owned Nicaro nickel processing plant in Oriente Province. The United States announced last Thursday it was closing down the plant because of harassment and confiscatory taxes imposed by the Fidel Castro regime.

The move by the workers was viewed as a preliminary to outright seizure of the big installation. A report from the plant said Cuban employes "are voluntarily continuing normal operations until the government determines what measures to take."

Seems Inevitable

In the past, government seizure has followed what the Castro regime termed "abandonment" of an operation by the owners.

Remaining American residents in Cuba no longer ask if there will be a break in United States-Cuban relations. They now ask, "when will it come?"

Although official United States thinking on the matter is not known, top American diplomats are convinced the Castro regime had undertaken an all-out campaign to force a break. In effect, there is an all but complete breakdown in normal diplomatic traffic between the two countries.

'Wall Of Hostility'

United States Ambassador Philip Bonsal has been unable to see the Prime Minister for months. Diplomatic sources said Bonsal's diplomatic approaches have run into "a wall of hostility."

This hostility was dramatized last week when Carlos Olivares, strongman of the Cuban Foregin Ministry, heatedly rejected Bonsal's attempt to deliver a United States note protesting nationalization of American banks. The note accused the Castro regime of echoing "the fraudulent propaganda of international communism."

Cuban Trouble Grows Worse

The Talladega Daily Home
Talladega, Ala.
Sept. 9-30-60

By JOHN M. HIGHTOWER

WASHINGTON — (AP) — The United States is considering the use of economic sanctions in its sharp differences with the Cuban government of Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

These plans, calling for export controls on a limited number of items, may follow up a U. S. decision Thursday night to close down the $110-million nickel processing plant it owns and operates in Cuba's oriente province.

The World War II plant, operated steadily since the Korean War, now employs or contributes to employment of 2,800 Cubans, whop resumably will lose their jobs.

The State Department said the operation has been harrassed by the Castro regime and subjected to what it called confiscatory taxes due to go into effect Saturday. The Cuban government rejected a U. S. offer to pay "a reasonable tax" on nickel shipments from thep lant, the department said:

There were these other developments indicative of the tightening of the Cuban situation:

1. The State Department said all-American men in Cuba are being advised to send their wives and children back to the United States to avoid harassment by Cuban authorities.

2. The Castro government, in a new diplomatic rebuff ,refused to accept a U. S. note protesting nationalization of American-owned banks in Cuba.

Although both the nickel plant closure and the proposed export controls would affect the Cuban economy, there was no direct relation between them.

While details have not been disclosed, indications are that machinery for oil refineries and chemicals used in the refining process will be brought under the export control system.

Such actions would hamper Cuba's operation of U. S. oil refineries it has seized and is using to refine crude oil obtained from the Soviet Union. Oil experts say the Soviet cannot provide replacement parts for the American-built machinery.

U.S. Urges Citizens To Get Out Of Cuba

Wives And Children Given Official Advice

WASHINGTON, Sept. 29. — (AP)—The United States Government has advised American residents in Cuba to send their wives and children back to the United States. Hundreds apparently are heeding the advice.

The State Department announced Thursday that dependants of United States Embassy personnel in Havana have been encouraged to leave and said other American residents have been informed they should take similar action.

The basic reason given is that, in view of the hostile attitude displayed by the Castro government, the State Department has decided it cannot provide normal protection to United States citizens through regular diplomatic channels.

The State Department estimated there are 3,500 to 4,000 United States citizens living in Cuba apart from embassy personnel and officers, men and civilian employes of the Naval base at Guantanamo Bay. One official estimated that perhaps 2,000 are dependents; that is, wives and children.

STAY OUT OF CUBA, U.S. CITIZENS ASKED

Advisory Warning Given by State Department

WASHINGTON (AP)—The state department Friday advised all United States citizens to stay away from Cuba "unless there are compelling reasons" for going there.

This action was taken to reduce the number of Americans who might be within the jurisdiction of the government of Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

Thursday the state department advised U.S. residents in Cuba, other than those at the Guantanamo Naval Base, to send their wives, children and other dependents back to this country.

The advisory warning issued Friday night by the department's press office, officials said, will be sent by the passport service to travel agencies and other organizations which might be interested.

'REFRAIN FROM TRAVEL'

The statement said:

"As the result of events in Cuba, the conditions prevailing there and recent advice given to United States dependents, the department of state has received inquiries from American citizens as to the advisability of tourist travel to and within Cuba.

"In view of the circumstances, it is believed prudent to advise US citizens to refrain from travel to and within Cuba unless there are compelling reasons for such travel."

Officials said the advice applies not only to tourists but to any other US citizens who might wish to go to Cuba.

The department recognized that some businessmen might have "compelling reasons" for going there.

The statement Thursday calling for the return of dependents from Cuba said in effect that American citizens had been mistreated by the Castro regime. The embassy at Havana said 57 had been detained since Jan. 1 either on no charges or on charges which were filed long after their seizure by police.

PROTEST MADE PUBLIC

Press officer Francis W. Tully said he was unable to give figures on present tourist volume for Cuba. He said it has fallen off tremendously during the past year as a result of Castro's bitter anti - American campaign marked not only by violent propaganda outbursts but also by extensive seizures of American property.

In this connection Tully made public here—long after it had been released to the press in Havana—the text of a note protesting the seizure of three American-owned banks.

The note was rejected by Cuban deputy foreign Minister Carlos Olivares when Ambassador Philip Bonsal sought to deliver it Thursday.

The note said that reasons given by the Castro regime for seizing the banks "recall only too vividly the statements which characterize the fraudulent propaganda of international communism."

In this connection Tully cited the Cuban government resolution on nationalizing the banks which was issued Sept. 17. This resolution assailed the United States, accusing it of "cowardly and criminal economic aggression" and denounced US banking in Cuba as a "typical expression" of US imperialism.

MENACE TO WORLD PEACE LAID TO U.S.

Castro, Reds Rap Guatemala, Nicaragua Help

(The Associated Press)

Cuba's Fidel Castro and his Communist pals—Red China and the Soviet Union—charged Friday that the United States warship shield protecting Guatemala and Nicaragua menaces world peace.

Castro-controlled newspapers in Havana shouted in black headlines that President Eisenhower's deployment of the warships in nearby waters could open a way for a direct attack on Cuba.

Radio Moscow chipped in a warning that the U.S. movement into the Caribbean is "fraught with the danger of a military conflict."

Red China's Premier Chou En-Lai said the United States is threatening Cuba by what he called force of arms, and he promised continued support to Castro's regime.

Other late Friday developments bearing on the Cuban-Central American-Caribbean situation included:

—Costa Rica said it found documents on a Nicaraguan opposition leader linking the unsuccessful Nicaraguan revolt with Castro and international communism.

—Guatemalan President Miguel Ydigoras said he favors a Korea-type police action against Cuba by the Organization of American States (OAS).

—Cuba formally protested to the United States over President Eisenhower's order dispatching warships to protect Guatemala and Nicaragua.

—President-elect John F. Kennedy at Palm Beach spent two hours and 40 minutes with Central Intelligence Agency director Allen W. Dulles getting a secret briefing on Caribbean developments.

—The state department in Washington reported Cuba has received at least 28,000 tons of arms — tanks, guns, planes— from the Soviet bloc and has the largest army in Latin America.

CLAMOR BRUSHED ASIDE

The clamor from Cuba and the world's two largest Communist powers was brushed aside by the United States. The Navy in Washington reiterated that the carrier Shangri La and four destroyers are in position to help repel any invasion of the two little Central American nations.

The State Department in Washington spiked a report published in London that the warships might halt suspected ships on the high seas. Washington said ships would be stopped only in the two nations' territorial waters, and then only on the request of Nicaragua and Guatemala.

Presidential press secretary James C. Hagerty said in Augusta, Ga., the Moscow broadsides were "Communist-type reaction" and added: "There's a very similar reaction — the words are almost the same—from Cuba."

CALLED 'OCCUPATION'

President Eisenhower ordered the warships into the Caribbean at the request of Guatemala and Nicaragua after both nations stamped out uprisings they charged had support from Castro's Cuba.

In Havana, the semiofficial newspaper Revolucion called the U.S. action "Yankee military occupation of Central America," and asserted it was designed to intimidate Cuba.

"Guantanamo or Guatemala, the place for the self-provoked aggression is immaterial," said Revolucion.

The Castro regime has charged repeatedly that the United States was preparing an incident at its leased Guantanamo naval base in eastern Cuba as a pretext for military intervention.

'SPECTER' OVER REGION

"We denounce the new crime that already is in execution against the peoples of Guatemala and Nicaragua, whose rebelliousness will now be punished with more repression than the barbarous repression already used by their tyrannical governments," said Revolucion.

Havana's El Mundo asserted the movement of the warships "could hide a maneuver against Cuba." The Communist newspaper Hoy said, "The specter of the hateful Marine Corps again hangs over Latin America."

The Havana correspondent of the Soviet government newspaper Izvestia said "the dictatorships in Guatemala and Nicaragua are wavering under the impact of the hatred of their peoples." The dispatch was distributed by Tass, the official Soviet news agency.

A Moscow broadcast declared "the rotten, antipopular regimes of these two countries can exist only with U.S. support."

RADIO PEIPING HITS U.S.

Radio Peiping said the United States was helping "the reactionary dictatorial governments of Guatemala and Nicaragua in suppressing the people's revolutionary movements there."

The radio said Chou told a reception for a visiting Cuban economic delegation: "The Cuban people have been waging a struggle directed squarely against U.S. imperialism which is close by—the most vicious imperialism. They are ready to repulse the armed provocation and attack the enemy at any moment."

The Cuban mission is in Peiping to seek expansion of trade ties. It is headed by Maj. Ernesto Guevara, Castro's leftist economic chief who negotiated the recent trade treaty with Peiping.

Negroes' Tour Of Cuba Is Sidetracked

By DALE WRIGHT
World-Telegram Staff Writer

A 10-day junket through Cuba which Fidel Castro offered to about 300 American Negroes—with everything paid by the government except $80 cut-rate plane fare—failed to get off the ground, the World-Telegram learned today.

Chartered airplanes loaded with representatives from fraternal, student and professional groups were to have taken off from New York, Chicago and Miami on Oct 21.

But Richard T. Gibson, a spokesman for the Fair Play for Cuba Committee which was sponsoring the trip, said airline companies couldn't or wouldn't provide the planes.

Sees Pressure.

"We ran into so much harassment," Mr. Gibson declared today, "that we had to postpone the trip until sometime around Christmas." A former WCBS newswriter, Mr. Gibson is now president of the New York chapter of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee.

He said he believed pressure was brought on charter airline companies not to carry the junketeers. "I assume the pressure came from the State Department or from anti-Castro groups," he added.

"The airline people told us that they were afraid for the safety of Americans going through Miami and also in Cuba," Mr. Gibson declared. He said that one airline official told him that no planes were available. "But the Civil Aeronautics Board told us otherwise."

He refused to identify the airline but added that the company is still holding $500 in deposit funds and that the matter may wind up in the courts.

Students Respond.

With the Cuban airlift now delayed until Christmas, the Fair Play group hopes to have "a couple of thousand" persons signed up.

"We have commitments from all over the country," Mr. Gibson said. He explained that the best response came from college students in New York, Illinois, Wisconsin and California.

"We have 120 persons signed up from Chicago alone," he said.

Mr. Gibson emphasized that officials in Castro's tourist bureau have now withdrawn the offer to pick up the tab for all of the American junketeers in Cuba and that most travelers will have to pay their own way —about $200 per person.

Castro Changes Mind.

Only those who signed up with the original group of 300, and who made $40 deposits, will be treated to on-the-cuff living at the expense of Castro's revolutionary government.

Mr. Gibson also pointed out that Castro had changed his mind about offering the trip only to American Negroes and now will throw open the doors to Cuba to all racial and ethnic groups.

As originally conceived, the offer was part of a major new effort on Premier Castro's part to win support of American Negroes.

Refuge For Free Cubans

Miami Has Become West Berlin Of The Americas

(Editor's Note: This is the first in a series of seven articles on the resistance to the Castro dictatorship in Cuba.)

Jul. 7-14-60

By ANTHONY HARRIGAN
Associate Editor
The News and Courier

MIAMI — This is the West Berlin of the Americas.

In this glittering resort city, long a gateway to Latin America, are 6,000 refugees from the Fidel Castro communist dictatorship.

The Cubans in exile include newspaper publishers who fought for freedom against both Batista and Castro, former professors at the University of Havana, non-political businessmen who have had their properties confiscated, wealthy supporters of the Batista regime who are held in contempt by their fellow citizens, ex-Batista officials who are personally clean of guilt and who are poverty-stricken today, former officers of the revolutionary army who have broken with Fidel, and ordinary Cubans who couldn't bear the brutal Red regime that has seized control of Cuba.

One of the most distinguished of the Cuban refugees is Sergio Carbo, independent publisher of Prensa Libre whose $4 million newspaper plant was confiscated because he dared to speak the truth about the Castro dictatorship in his editorial columns.

When Dr. Carbo speaks of his country today he refers to it as The Peoples Republic of Cuba. 'Don't speak of Castro,' he says, "as a Cuban government. Don't say Cubans are anti-American.'

Cuba today, said Dr. Carbo, is a captured land. Its "Occidental civilization" he declared, is overrun by the Asiatic civilization of Red China operating through "Che Guevara, the brains of the Castro regime Dr. Carbo refers to the great civic plaza in Havana where Fidel Castro orates as "the Red Square of the Americas."

Dr. Carbo doesn't speak English. His son Ulises, a former executive of Prensa Libre, translates for his father. He is an eloquent young man who seems destined to play an important role in the expulsion of Castro and the reconstruction of Cuba.

"What is happening in Cuba," Ulises Carbo told me, "isn't simply a Cuban issue. It is part of the World War III. The great war isn't being fought with atomic bombs; it is being fought in Cuba. Americans must understand that."

Sr. Carbo already has faced the communist enemy in this hemisphere. A roomful of newsmen listened with rapt attention the other evening as the younger Carbo told what it is like to have one's newspaper the target of the communists.

Prensa Libre, he told me later, had a new nine story office building. "It was one of the most modern plants in Latin America. We had a fine new German press, and air-conditioning and all the new electronic gimmicks. We were working with the Milwaukee Journal in the U. S. to develop color printing in Cuba for the first time.

Today that great newspaper which had a daily circulation of 105,000 copies, is in the hands of the reds.

"The first trouble came," he explained, "after the announcement of the INRA (agricultural reform) laws. We asked our readers for comment. About 80 per cent of them replied in ways critical of the laws. The government let us know that we should not publish the critical letters. They said that in this hour of Cuba's history we should not print opposition views. We did not heed them, of course. Soon, however, Revolucion, the Pravda of Cuba, began to call us traitors. We knew we were in for trouble because in Cuba today treason is punished by 30 years in jail or by execution.

"Finally, we decided that we would publish an editorial telling our readers that freedom no longer existed in Cuba and that we faced arrest. But communists in the press room of our plant would not print the editorial. Finally, a friend called us to say that Raul Castro's secret police were on the way to arrest us. We left and took refuge in the Panamanian Embassy. But the secret police went to the home of the manager of the paper, where they found his 15-year-old daughter and twisted her arms behind her back in an attempt to find out where her father had gone."

Today Ulises Carbo, his father and his brother-in-law, Humberto Medrano, a sub-director of Prensa Libre, are in Miami. They are supporting the Democratic Revolutionary Front, a junta of resistance groups whose object is to overthrow the Castro dictatorship. He said that this resistance movement is established in Cuba. The need now, he says, is for money and weapons with which to accomplish the task of driving communism out of Cuba.

"We are going back," said Ulises Carbo. This writer doesn't doubt that for a second. The Carbos and others like them plan to fight to recapture their country. But they need help.

Hands Off Latin Americans, Khrushchev Warned by U.S.

The Atlanta Constitution Atlanta, Ga

Jul. 7-15-60

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States denounced Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev in blistering language Thursday and warned him to stop trying to foist communism on the Western Hemisphere.

It accused Khrushchev of trying to supplant with a "Bolshevik doctrine" the historic Monroe Doctrine which guards Latin republics against outside intervention.

In solemn words, approved by President Eisenhower, the State Department reaffirmed U.S. determination to uphold the 173-year-old Monroe Declaration in the face of Khrushchev's rocket-rattling threats to intervene to help Cuba.

By JOHN SCALI

"This naked menace to world peace, brandished so callously by the Soviet leader, reveals the hypocrisy of his protestations in behalf of peace," the department said in a formal statement.

The State Department's reply to comments Khrushchev made at a Kremlin news conference Tuesday added up to one of the most biting indictments leveled at him since the blow-up of the Paris summit conference in mid-May.

To back up what appeared to be a new tough-talk policy, the State Department called off civil aviation talks with the Soviet Union which are due to begin here Monday.

Khrushchev's newest barrage of threats and distortions, the department said, has worsened the international atmosphere to the point where there is no chance for an aviation agreement. A department spokesman said "a suitable time" for rescheduling the talks would depend on Moscow's future conduct.

The surprise collapse of the discussion came just as a Soviet delegation was about to leave Moscow, hoping to negotiate for direct Moscow-New York commercial air service by planes of both countries.

The State Department concentrated its 500-word comment mainly on Khrushchev's attack on the Monroe Doctrine.

In pledging to back Cuba in its dispute with the United States, Khrushchev denounced the American naval base at Guantanamo Bay as "sheer iniquity."

"We consider that the Monroe Doctrine has outlived its time, has outlived itself, has died, so to say, a natural death. Now the remains of this doctrine should best be buried as every dead body is so that it should not poison the air by its decay," Khrushchev said.

Striking back at this, the department pictured Khrushchev as seeking to set himself up as a self-appointed judge of what international agreements are binding, even though the Soviet Union is not a party to them.

The right to establish and maintain a naval base in Cuba is spelled out by a treaty. The Monroe Doctrine likewise has been endorsed by the 21 American republics within the framework of the Organization of American States and the 1947 Rio defense pact.

The principles of the Monroe Doctrine are as valid today as they were in 1823 when the doctrine was proclaimed, the department said.

It recalled that President Monroe laid down his famous doctrine in a move to prevent European imperialist powers of that day from jeopardizing the independence of nations in the Western Hemisphere.

"The principles which the United States government enunciated in the face of the attempts of the old imperialism to intervene in the affairs of this hemisphere are as valid today for the attempts of the new imperialism," it added.

The focus on Cuba—Part 1—

Students trample tradition at University of Havana

EDITOR'S NOTE: News Staffer Robert E. Lee has covered events in Cuba since the days of former dictator Batista. In a series of articles, he is presenting present-day feelings of the island people that may topple Fidel Castro's regime.

BY ROBERT E. LEE
News staff writer

HAVANA, Cuba, July 23—The United States is flexing its muscle at Key West while students trample the traditions of the University of Havana by tossing respected educators out and laying the welcome mat for Communist organizers.

Personnel at the 18,000-man U. S. base 90 miles away have reported that 500 Marines were landed this past week-end, with additional men having been shipped in over the past month.

LEE

In a base alert all personnel were returned to the base during the past two weeks and the USS Bushnell was dispatched to cruise in the Gulf stream between the island and Cuba in case the match was lit to a powder-keg of violence.

The ship has since returned to the base, but the alert for action if necessary continues.

38 more teachers dismissed in Havana

HAVANA, July 23—(AP)—Thirty-eight more professors and an accountant have been fired at Havana University in a continuing purge of so-called nonrevolutionary elements.

The school's revolutionary ruling junta Friday night dismissed as obstructionists 18 law school professors and 20 from the school of commercial sciences.

The new student-professor governing council which took over the university last week said in a statement the fired professors had failed to recognize the council's authority and had acted to obstruct the normal functioning of their schools.

The new firings followed the dismissal of the engineering school faculty Thursday.

Most of the members of the law and commercial science faculties and the accountant, Pedro Riveiro, have charged that the take-over by the new council violated university statutes.

WHILE THE U. S. has dropped the blunt hint that they will protect their own at Guantanamo Bay in case Cuban forces move against naval personnel there, the Carribean pot continues to simmer with the latest invasion of the Reds being at the respected University of Havana.

The strife-torn school, long the fuse that has ignited revolutions in the country, has been taken over by the University Students Federation.

In the early days of Fidel Castro, he first came to the notice of the leaders of his country while leading student demonstrations, gaining his first knowledge of the Communist hammer.

The students with a small group of picked professors have assumed control of the school with the assistance and backing of the government, and some 200 educators stand to be replaced.

In futile fight

MAJ. ROLANDO CUBEIA, president of the students and a member of the 26th of July organization, has issued orders that "professors should not resign their university posts and leave the institution, but should remain to be replaced."

In a statement concerning the new policies of the school, it was announced that teachers would be sought from throughout South America and Europe, with particular emphasis placed on the Communist-dominated countries.

At the same time the veteran professors of the school are fighting to maintain control, but observers within the government have said their chances are small because the move is one that Fidel Castro himself suggested as far back as six months ago.

The Law School Students Assn., under its president, Maximino Gonzalez, has seized the control of their section.

Appeals for support

THE BODY VOTED to appeal to both the Havana and Cuban Bar Assn. and to the Ministry of Justice for support of its action.

In terms of the present, the move is only another in the topsy-turvy affairs of the Cuban isle drifting toward the Red homeland, but for the future the move points to new and powerful leaders in Cuban politics.

Like the young Castro, Cubeia and Gonzalez have sprouted their first wings toward ambition, an ambition that in the past has blossomed many times to overturn the Cuban government.

Already the workers of Cuba have shown their power in seizing hotels, newspapers and other businesses by simply bringing to the government charges against the rightful owners.

Forced to brink

OTHER MOVES IN freezing salaries as business dropped downward in rapid order, has forced businesses to the brink of bankruptcy and over.

The business trend in assuming control of foreign-owned companies, in particular those of the United States, will continue, an informed source said, until all the $800 million in U. S.-owned property is taken.

Under international law, the Castro government has every right to take the property of foreign firms, in much the same manner as a state can acquire property for roads.

But the illegal aspects of the taking of property must be considered in that the Cuban government is not responsible enough to pay for what is taken.

The Castro government has stated they will pay, but in long-range Cuban bonds with indefinite value, and have said they place the value at what the property was worth in years past.

Not a cent paid

AT PRESENT THE government of Fidel Castro has not paid one cent to American firms for what has been taken.

In the meantime, an uneasy peace exists in other areas of the touchy Caribbean.

Haiti, with a population of three million, and the Dominican Republic with slightly more than two million, appear to be the most likely points for trouble to brew next.

On assuming the rocky throne in Cuba, Castro made it plain that Dictator Hector Trujillo would be one of his major aims in bringing "freedom" to other areas.

Forces trained

AT VARIOUS TIMES, expeditionary forces have actually trained in Southern Cuba for invasions of strongman Trujillo's country.

"Fidel has not forgotten what he said," a source close to the prime minister said, "but is simply involved in a bigger squabble with the United States, and can't direct the effort right now."

Reliable figures report that the Castro government has spent in the neighborhood of $150 million for arms.

Also revealing is the fact that Trujillo, beset of late by economic woes, has spent some $50 million to arm his smaller but better-trained armed force.

In the other half of the crowded island that houses the Dominican Republic, Haiti is reported to be the subject of an intensive build-up by Communist-trained agents.

Seek race war

THE POINT THEY are trying to impress the Haitians with is to begin a racial war, with mulattoes as the so-called "capitalist" class.

So within the framework of the Castro victory there is breeding an increasing area of discontent within a two-hour flight of the Southern United States.

Efforts are being made at present to aid Haiti, beset by a staggering economy with great food deficits, but whether the aid on the part of the U. S. has come too late only time will tell.

Cuba is the spreahead, but the shaft contains several countries that we have tried to buy with millions of dollars in aid.

Father Vows Revenge

Cuba Won't Send Bodies Of 2 Executed Americans

From Wire Dispatches

The grief-stricken aunt and uncle of Allan Dale Thompson—executed by a Cuban firing squad—called on the International Red Cross yesterday for help in getting their nephew's body returned home for a "Christian burial."

But it may be two years before the elderly couple, Mr. and Mrs. O. C. Corn, get their wish.

Cuban authorities said Thompson was buried in a common grave. His body cannot be exhumed for two years.

Mrs. Corn, 76, was informed at Mooringsport, La., of the execution by The Associated Press. She and her 72-year-old husband reared Thompson after his mother died when he was 2.

MRS. O. C. CORN
Aunt of executed man

She said her nephew never mentioned anything about Cuba or Robert O. Fuller, the 24-year-old Miamian who died with him.

Thompson's father, John Thompson, is a commercial fisherman at St. Maurice in central Louisiana. He remarried after his wife's death, Mrs. Corn said.

"A Communist-dominated country is only afraid of one thing and that is a country that the hand of the Lord rests upon as it does this nation," Mrs. Corn said.

"I know that the United States that we live in will someday find the answers for such injustice that we as a family feel has been done."

"Men have died for centuries for what they felt was right. If our nephew died for what he felt was right, then he died with an American heritage.

"Our sympathy goes to the family of Robert Fuller. We know the grief they have."

At Miami, Fuller's father wept and made his own declaration of war on the regime of Fidel Castro.

"I'll go back with one of the expeditions myself," said William Otis Fuller, 56.

All the Fuller children were born in eastern Cuba on the family's 7,000-acre ranch. Both parents were born in the United States, Fuller in Portland, Me.

Mrs. Fuller has been in Cuba since she was 3 years old. When Fuller and others of the family came to the United States a year ago after Castro started seizing chunks of the ranch, she remained behind.

Castro Grabs 167 More U. S. Firms

The News and Courier

Charleston, S. C.

HAVANA (AP)—Prime Minister Fidel Castro took another quarter-billion dollar bite from the remaining American properties in Cuba Tuesday. He said he was retaliating against the U.S. embargo on most exports to this island nation.

10-26-60

A decree issued at dawn after a meeting of Castro's Cabinet announced the seizure of 167 American firms. With this seizure, Castro was almost down to the "nails in their shoes" he had promised to take from American investors here on the ground the United States was committing aggression against Cuba.

The preamble spelled out the decree's retaliatory nature, asserting that Washington's ban on shipping everything but food and medical supplies to Cuba is designed to "strangle our economy."

The Cabinet challenged the U.S. government itself by seizing the Nicaro nickel plant, owned by the U.S. General Services Administration. Washington had decided to shut the plant, located in eastern Cuba, after the Cuban government refused to make what U.S. officials considered a realistic offer to buy it. Its listed value is $110 million.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman denounced the seizures as a move "in full accord with international Communist dogma." He said it represents another step by Castro's government to exploit the Cuban people for foreign political purposes. The spokesman did not mention the Nicaro nickel plant.

The seizures ranged from 30 American insurance companies—some of them with assets up to $20 million—to the Capri Hotel's gambling casino and the Havana racetrack. Havana's only armored car company was confiscated.

American economists here estimated the total value of the newly seized properties at about $250 million. They said that properties worth more than $100 million are still left in U.S. hands, although the bulk of them are already being run by Cuban officials under the government's intervention procedure.

With the seizures, Castro now has taken over lands and properties estimated by the U. S. Embassy at a value of about $1.5 billion.

This is about $500 million more than the original rough estimate of all U.S. property in Cuba before Castro gained power almost two years ago.

Cuban daily lauds role of colored Americans

HAVANA — This weekend, Revolution semi - official daily with an island-wide circulation, devotes its regular forty - page literary - supplement, Lunes de Revolucion, to the life of colored North Americans. 7-23-60

But, barring a court fight by some organization such as the American Civil Liberties Union, the supplement seems destined not to circulate in any substantial quantity in the land of Cuba's giant neighbor.

UNITED STATES Customs Service already is barring its entry, just as it has increasingly blocked the admission of pamphlets and other literature in English telling Cuba's side of the two-nation dispute.

Featured in the supplement are hitherto unpublished contributions by Langston Hughes, Harold Cruse, Julian Mayfield and others.

Among numerous pictures are a selection from Little Rock, including one that shows white pickets in front of the Capitol building with signs exhorting Governor Faubus to block desegregation because "Race Mixing Is Communism."

THE SLOGAN has brought wry smiles to the faces of Revolution leaders. With dismay and growing disgust this Catholic country has watched Washington pin the communist label on many of Castro's social and economic measures.

These labor, land, rent, housing and medical-care reforms are popular with 93 per cent of the population, according to a Cuban public opinion poll that was taken in mid-June.

Cuba fears attack, Bill Worthy reports

Afro-American, Baltimore, Md. Sat. 7/23/60

By WILLIAM WORTHY

HAVANA, Cuba — In an atmosphere of deepening crisis between the North American colossus and highly nationalistic people of Cuba, Minister of Justice Alfredo Yabur Malfu today told me:

"The movements and apparent manuevers of the present administration in Washington, economic pressures and extraordinary press campaign all seem to point toward an intention of armed aggression."

Although fearing the worst, Minister Yabur still clings to the hope that no military intervention will be attended.

"I cannot believe the people of the United States could ever be persuaded to favor an armed attack on any Latin American nation," he said.

Only last week Castro's government, which is fed up with refuting unsubstantiated charges of communism, expelled two U.S. Embassy attaches on charges of counter-revolutionary rendezvous with several Cubans.

Similar episodes and sharp exchanges multiply daily as Washington shows signs of moving toward showdown with an "uncowed Havana."

I asked Senor Yabur if U.S. officials display contempt for Cuban efficiency in uncovering widespread intelligence activties that the whole world knows are going on here.

"Yes", he replied, "but it's a very mistaken idea, because in every conspiracy discovered so far, it's the Cuban people—the rank and file spporters of revolution—who have infiltrated.

"The Cuban Government has known all about these conspiracies from the start and just let them go on long enough to get evidence."

For example, the Justice Minister cited already published charges that U.S. Marines at Guantanamo Base in Southeast Cuba recently brought in mountain-fighting equipment although no explanation was provided why such was needed at naval installation supposedly designed to protect the Panama Canal.

I'm reminded of the steady flow of intelligence information to Martin Luther King during the Montgomery bus boycott from colored servants overhearing plans and plots of white folks who regarded maids and cooks as too stupid to understand or who swallowed their own propaganda that colored Montgomerians weren't behind their militant leaders.

Cuban Catholics Riot In Square Near Cathedral

Demonstration Against Reds Erupts After Mass —Hecklers Attacked

By ROBERT BERELLEZ
Associated Press Staff

HAVANA, July 17. — High Mass at the Roman Catholic Cathedral of Havana turned into a spectacular anti-communist demonstration here Sunday. Churchgoers poured into the ancient cathedral's square shouting "Cuba si, Russia no."

A handful of communist hecklers in the square had to be rescued by a police car. Men and women shouting "communism out" pounded on the sides of the car with fists and pocketbooks at is hurried away.

The Mass had been dedicated to "victims of communist persecution" in the world. Hundreds were jammed into the cathedral but many were unable to hear the sermon because the loudspeaker system broke down.

At the conclusion, the congregation suddenly erupted into a chorus of "Cuba si, Russia no." The din caused Bishop Eduardo Boza Masvidal to go back to the pulpit and wave the crowd to silence. He asked them to "go home and pray for our salvation."

Crowd Sings Anthem

As the bishop finished, the crowd broke into the national anthem and then spilled out into the square. There a handful of hecklers shouted the revolutionary chant: "Cuba si, Yankees no."

The hecklers were quickly surrounded by churchgoers, but the police car popped up just in time.

Still the crowd remained in the square, shouting "communism out" at each passing car. At one point, two uniformed but unarmed militiamen approached in a car and they got the treatment, too.

Meanwhile, ailing Fidel Castro continued to sit silently in the wings as the thorny dispute between his regime and the United States moved to center stages of world and regional organizations.

Others in official Havana also left the talking to Cuban representatives outside the country—Foreign Minister Raul Roa, who is presenting Cuba's case at the United Nations Monday, and Carlos Lechuga, ambassador to the Organization of American States.

Silence Puzzling

The silence of the talkative prime minister provoked some puzzlement here. Some expressed belief Castro was being hushed so as not to prejudice Cuba's case before world organizations.

In London, British informants said Sunday Communist China and Cuba are expected to exchange ambassadors soon, opening an intensive diplomatic drive in Latin America by the Red Chinese.

Informants here view the situation with less alarm than is likely in Washington. Britain already has diplomatic relations with Communist China.

But officials were watching developments closely in view of British interests caught up in the oil seizure by the Fidel Castro regime. Any strengthening of Cuba's ties with the East is unlikely to improve British chances of getting back the expropriated Shell Oil refinery at Havana.

SOVIETS WARN U. S. 'DON'T TOUCH CUBA'

Talladega Daily Home, Talladega, Ala.

Say Russia Will Defeat Efforts To Oust Castro

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y. —(AP)— The Soviet Union today gave the United States a blunt warning: "Don't touch Cuba."

Soviet Delegate Arkady A. Sobolev said his country was not threatening the United States with its rockets, but he added: "Don't threaten Cuba with your might, because other countries have might."

Sobolev also declared in a U. N. Security Council debate that the Soviet Union will defeat alleged U. S. efforts to overthrow the Cuban regime of Fidel Castro by an economic war.

He said the Socialist countries are prepared to give Cuba economic help to make sure the Castro government can withstand any U. S. restrictions.

Sobolev strongly opposed a move to transfer the complaint of the Castro government against the United States to the Organization of American States.

He said that organization was completely dominated by the United States and would handle the case as the United States wanted it to.

"The United States," he said, "is trying to organize an economic blockade to strangulate Cuba and prevent the government from exercising its sovereign rights over its natural resources."

Sobolev attacked U. S. policy generally, but charged specifically that the United States had a long record of interfering in the internal affairs of Latin American countries.

Sobolev spoke as the 11-nation Security Council prepared to vote on an Argentine-Eucadoren resolution to shift the Cuban-United States controversy to the Organization of American States. Nine members of the council spoke in favor of the resolution Monday.

Castro in a television appearance in Havana Monday night assailed the move to refer the dispute to the OAS, saying the United States had less influence in the United Nations than in the OAS.

But Cuban Foreign Minister Raul Roa, representing the Castro regime in the Security Council debate, privately accepted the resolution.

Because of Roa's acceptance some delegates believed the Soviet Union would either vote for the resolution or abstain on the vote.

But in case of a Soviet veto, Argentina and Ecuador were reported to substitute a procedural proposal that would have the same effect but would not be subject to the veto.

The original resolution noted that the Cuban-U.S. dipute is under consideration in the 21-nati OAS and called on the Counci

1. "To adjourn the consider tion of this question pending th receipt of a report from th OAS."

2. To invite the OAS member "to lend their asssitance towar the achievement of a peaceful so lution."

3. To urge "all other states t refrain from any action whic might increase the existing ten sions between Cuba and the Unit ed States." This was considere directed at the Soviet Union, Premier Nikita Khrushchev having threatened a rocket attack on th United States, if U.S. forces inte vene in Cuba.

Death Demanded For 2 More Yanks On Trial In Cuba

Plot Is Charged

Pair Accused Of Trying To Overthrow Castro—Another Faces Prison

The Commercial Appeal

By RICHARD VALERIANI

HAVANA, Oct. 15.—The prosecution demanded the death penalty Saturday for two more Americans being tried in Santiago on charges of invading Cuba with an armed band to overthrow the regime of Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

Another American on trial in Havana faced a 16-year sentence.

Defense counsel Jorge Pagleri identified the two men as Robert O. Fuller and Allan Thompson.

Paglieri told newsmen at Santiago he had been advised formally of the prosecution's demand before the start of the summary trial before a military court. A summary trial is the fastest type of trial under revolutionary law here.

One American Executed

Prosecutor David Diaz de la Rocha asked 30-year terms for two Cubans caught with Fuller and Thompson. The four were part of a 27-man force that landed in Oriente Province.

A third American member of the invasion force, Anthony Zarba, 27, of Somerville, Mass., was tried and executed by a firing squad Thursday along with seven Cuban companions.

In Miami, William O. Fuller said the two Americans being tried in Santiago are his son, Robert, 25, and Dale Thompson, about 30.

Swift Action Likely

The trial and sentencing of the two Americans at Santiago may be completed Saturday night if the proceedings follow the pattern set by military courts at Santa Clara and Santiago earlier this week when 195 persons were tried on counter-revolutionary charges in less than 24 hours. Thirteen defendants were executed in the two trials.

An army spokesman said civilian militiamen captured the two Americans and two Cuban companions in a hilly area of the province Friday.

In Havana, meanwhile, another American — pilot Leslie Bradley of Minneapoils—and 12 Cubans were on trial before a military tribunal at Lacabana fortress. They are accused of plotting a fake invasion of Nicaragua to embarrass the Castro regime. The government has charged United States State Department knew about the alleged plot. The prosecution Friday night asked 16-year prison sentences for all the defendants.

21 Cubans Win Daring Gamble For Freedom

The Commercial Appeal

KEY WEST, Fla., Oct. 15.—Twenty-one Cuban men, including 15 escapees from Havana's Morro Castle prison, crossed the Florida Straits in a small motorboat Saturday to seek political freedom in the United States.

They ran out of fuel right in the middle of a United States Navy bombing and rocket range near Marquesas Key, 60 miles west of here.

The Coast Guard managed to get a call through to the Navy just in time to halt a scheduled rocket firing practice on the range. A Coast Guard vessel then towed the drifting refugees to safety.

All Haggard And Dirty

All 21 Cubans—haggard, dirty and unshaven—requested political asylum when the Coast Guard landed them here and turned them over to immigration officers. They later were flown to Miami for questioning.

Several of the group talked to newsmen and confirmed that the band included the 15 former soldiers of Premier Fidel Castro who were thrown into Morro Castle prison on political charges. They broke out of prison before dawn on Oct. 7.

A Castro government spokesman said the break was aided by a non-commissioned officer and several enlisted men. The spokesman said the break was connected with Oct. 5 invasion of Oriente Province. He said the escaped prisoners were "counter-revolutionaries serving terms for (anti-government) crimes."

Members of the group refused to say how they had escaped from prison. But they said they had been living "among friends" in Havana for the week since the escape. They boarded a 21-foot cabin cruiser and set sail about 7 p.m. Friday, they said, leaving behind five civilians who were swimming toward the boat in hope of also escaping Cuba.

Evaded Dragnet Easily

One man said the fugitives had little trouble evading a police dragnet while they remained in Havana making arrangements for the boat.

"There are getting to be more and more people who do not like Castro and who will help anybody against him," he said.

Castro Fires Blast At U.S. As Warships, Planes Patrol

By RICHARD VALERIANI

HAVANA (AP) — The Fidel Castro regime charged today that U. S. Naval patrols in the Caribbean were an intervention in Latin-American affairs and a grave threat to world peace and a smokescreen for an attack on Cuba.

President Eisenhower Thursday ordered U. S. warships and planes to seek out and prevent Communist-led attacks from abroad on Guatemala and Nicaragua.

The President acted on the written request of the two governments, targets in the past week of unsuccessful uprisings which they charged were assisted by Cubans.

The action came as plots and possible uprisings were reported in two other countries Bolivia and El Salvador.

The U. S. State Department said warships, including at least four destroyers and the aircraft carrier Shangri-La, were already patrolling the high seas between Cuba and the Central American coast. The department said, however, that any action against invasion forces would be limited to the three-mile territorial waters of Guatemala and Nicaragua.

The reaction of Cuban officials and the government-controlled press and radio was indignant.

The newspaper LaCalle said the President's action was an intervention in Guatemala and Nicaragua and a grave threat to world peace.

Advance said the U. S. Navy was out to protect "U. S. colonies."

Pastoriata Nunez, a high ranking Cuban official as head of the government savings and housing institute, said in a television program that the uprisings in Central America, were a smokescreen to hide plans for an invasion of Cuba.

For weeks Castro officials have been charging that "mercenaries" were being assembled and drilled in Central America countries for a U.S.-financed invasion of Cuba "It's a coincidence," Miss Nunez said, "that these happenings are being produced in those countries where aggressions against Cuba have been denounced that is in Nicaragua, Guatemala and Costa Rica."

Castro predicted last August that his revolution would light a rebellion against "Yankee imperialism" throughout Latin America.

The United States later charged that thousands of tons of Soviet arms have been shipped to Castro.

Plots and uprisings were reported afoot in El Salvador and Bolivia Friday even as the last members of revolt appeared snuffed out in Guatemala and Nicaragua.

Troops were reported mobilized in La Paz, capital of Bolivia, as a precaution against a possible uprising.

Communications were cut between La Paz and Cochabamba the country's second largest city where peasants opposed to President Victor Paz Estenssoro clashed with police, troops and other peasants last Monday. About 100 persons were reported killed at that time.

Last Sunday U. S. Ambassador Carl Strom was stoned and jeered by a leftist mob at Cochabamba, 150 miles southeast of La Paz.

Terroristic activity continued in the Guatemalan capital. Three bombs exploded Thursday night but caused no casualties. A suspected bomber was caught. Ydigoras has threatened the execution of terrorists.

A member of Guatemala's Congress, Manuel Orellana Portilla, said he would introduce a move to declare war on Cuba if proof of Cuban meddling is presented.

The government of Costa Rica, southern neighbor of Nicaragua said it found documents linking the revolt in Nicaragua with Castro's Cuba and communism. Costa Rica expelled a Cuban and several Nicaraguans linked with the revolt.

Nicaragua's President Luis Somoza has declared the Cuban government responsible for the uprising in which insurgents succeeded in capturing the cities of Jinotepe and Diriamba last Friday. They were driven out by about 1,000 national guardsmen and took flight toward Costa Rica. The commander of the Costa Rican national guard was killed in a border clash with the rebels.

Fidel Cools Off; Orders From USSR?

Jackson Daily News

Failure To Rattle Rockets May Signal Policy Change

HAVANA (AP)—The muting of Fidel Castro's rocket-rattling warnings to the United States heightened speculation here today that Moscow has advised him to take a more moderate course in his dealings with Washington.

The Kremlin's hand may be behind the lessening of attacks in the government press against President-elect John F. Kennedy—in contrast with the increased tempo against President Eisenhower and Vice President Richard M. Nixon—possibly with a view to keeping a path open to later conciliatory approaches.

It was noted here that Prime Minister Castro's newspapers and radio made no mention of Soviet rocket support in their blasts at President Eisenhower for ordering U. S. Navy ships and planes to set up anti-invasion patrols off Guatemala and Nicaragua.

CHAIN REACTION

The Eisenhower order—the result of request from Guatemala and Nicaragua who charged unsuccessful revolts against their governments in the past week were aided by Cuba — set off a chain furore, including both critical and approving comment in Latin America on the naval action and a Cuban letter of protest to the United Nations.

Guatemalan President Miguel Ydigoras also said he favored a Korean-type police action against Cuba, and both Guatemala and Nicaragua were reported considering invoking the hemisphere's 1947 Rio de Janeiro treaty of mutual assistance.

Castro's boasting of Soviet rocket support ceased almost abrutly before the present blowup in the Caribbean, however. This kind of talk abated after Castro himself told Cuban son Nov. 9 not to depend too much on Soviet offers of assistance and to rely on their own strength.

This speech followed by three days another by Soviet Ambassador Sergei M. Kudryavtsev at a labor rally. Though almost every other Cuban speaker took glowing note of promises of Soviet rocket support in case of U. S. aggression, the Soviet diplomat stressed peaceful coexistence.

Well-informed sources said some of the Soviet diplomatic mission have dropped hints that the Kremlin, busy with its own problems with the United States, would like Castro to be a little less belligerent.

After harsh attacks on Kennedy after his election, some of the Castro papers appear to have dropped him.

A Cuban News Agency dispatch from Washington said some "optimistic diplomats" felt Kennedy might attempt "secret negotiations" looking toward a reconciliation with Cuba. It said, however, that the best informed sources considered he would do nothing to improve relations.

FAVORS OAS ACTION

Guatemalan President Ydigoras said he favored a police action by the Organization of American States against Cuba similar to the police action by the United Nations against a Communist invasion in Korea in 1950.

Diplomatic sources in Washington said both Guatemala and Nicaragua were preparing to invoke the 1947 Rio de Janeiro treaty and ask OAS to take up charges of Cuban aggression.

OAS could call for suspension of diplomatic relations with Cuba, economic sanctions or even military force against her if she is found guilty after an investigation.

Blast Points Up Struggle Between Catholics and Regime on Communism

HAVANA, Dec. 7—The explosion of a bomb in the church of Our Lady of Charity in midtown Havana late yesterday shocked the Catholics of Cuba. It also pointed up the growing struggle between the Catholic Church and the regime of Premier Fidel Castro over communism.

Whether this signifies "open warfare" between the church and the Castro regime is not yet predictable. However, up to the present the two antagonists have been approaching with caution what many believe

Most Cubans Still Support Premier—Defections Are Linked to Austerity

New York

By MAX FRANKEL

Special to The New York Times.

SANTIAGO DE CUBA, Dec. 1—"Tell me what you do and how much you used to earn and I will tell you whether you are for or against this revolution," a Santiago student remarked.

The student pointed to the gentle green mountains that ring this city's harbor—the mountains in which Fidel Castro's revolution was born.

Then he pointed below to the squalid ranks of battered and misformed plastered homes, whose tenants prayed for that revolution, and to the slickly groomed houses and lawns on the hill, whose owners cheered it. The student shook his head in dismay and said:

"We don't realize it yet but it was good against evil at first, then poor against rich, now the not-so-well-off against the fairly-well-off.

"And in the middle, it is father against son, husband against wife, and Fidel says you must be with or against."

The student did not know where he stood but he knew that his confusion was itself now a suspicious state. Here at the eastern end of Cuba, he testified to what a revolutionary had said in Havana 600 miles to the west: that the lines were being drawn and that the revolution's position was far better in the country at large than in the confused and quarrelsome urban student circles.

The lines of political allegiance across Cuba are as clear as the lines between the dusty, weary and ugly little villages and towns and the lush and vigorous countryside.

As Dr. Castro demands, people are in or out, for or against. They hang revolutionary slogans on their splintered doors and windowless huts; they strut proudly in the denim uniform of the People's Militia and they take their children for a Sunday stroll among the brilliantly pink, yellow and blue new apartment cities.

Or they commute sullenly between job and home, boast defiantly of their faith in the Roman Catholic Church and huddle uncomfortably as they whisper into beer glasses with eyes fixed on distant waiters.

Lines Are Not Fixed

The lines are clear but they are not fixed. As the uneven shuffling of the economic and social order proceeds and as the reality of austerity comes into view, there are defections almost daily from supporters to opponents.

"When did you fall?" is a favorite question. It is asked more often than "Why?" The man who has "fallen," people seem to assume, has been hurt. He has lost his land, business, income, profits, home, savings, reputation or confidence in the economic future.

A growing number of Cubans complain also of having lost the right to speak freely, or to acquire, move and dispose of property or employes. And there is a relatively new and uneasy concern about socialism and communism.

Majority Holds Hope

On the other side are those with little or nothing to lose besides hope and an enormous faith in Fidel—the majority.

They are the million or more jobless who would sit in their huts and on battered pavements, the high school youngsters in bright, starched blouses adorned "fatherland or death," the field hands in bamboo hats who point with machetes as they struggle to read a revolutionary Government notice warning against rabid dogs, and the clerks in still-foreign or still-prosperous stores and offices. They are for the revolution ardently or lukewarmly, realistically or fatalistically.

Some of these Cubans are demonstrative revolutionaries.

They cheer at rallies and sip drinks with emotional gusto in once-inaccessible bars. But most are also largely uncommunicative; at least with a foreigner.

"It is time something was done for our poor people, and Fidel will do it," is the kind of comment one hears most often in dank, narrow alleys of Havana, Camaguey and Santiago.

Relatively few Cubans today live better than they lived before Fidel Castro seized power twenty-three months ago.

But the majority lives with a hope nurtured by impassioned oratory, a tendency to blame "enemies" for what has gone wrong and a satisfaction with the limited but dramatic symbols of what might be done for them.

Some of the symbols are physical:

Startlingly incongruous and handsome modern new school buildings at the edges of towns of shacks; bright new little one-family suburbias and antiseptic new clinics and refurbished hospitals in some towns and cities; two sets of children's swings and a flag-bedecked radio in the grassy commons of a palm-enshrouded village of waterless shacks.

Some of the symbols are social: The destruction of gambling dives and blatant houses of prostitution, the opportunities for legitimizing marriages and grown children, the enthusiasm and concern of Government welfare workers who offer a few pesos or a clean bed for the night when needed, and the knowledge that few can bribe their way into luxurious privilege anymore.

Spiritual Symbols

Some of the symbols are spiritual:

The expansive chests and high heads of tens of thousands of militiamen, who receive no pay and even buy their own uniforms and are bivouacked in former cattle stalls, marched to exhaustion, drilled in the machinery of complex foreign mortars and machine guns and celebrated as the pride of the future, the saviors of Latin America, the personal charges of the "maximum leader" Fidel Castro.

Other such spiritual symbols are the dignity of a right to loll on once-exclusive beaches, the pride of black commanding white and of once-poor commanding once-rich, the fame of renown in the world and the heady security of a cause.

will be a long and bitter ideological battle.

The bomb damaged four pews in the front of the church and the wall of a side altar. Forty persons were in the church waiting for the 6:30 mass when the explosion occurred at 6:05 P. M. None was injured. The damage was estimated at $500.

Red Flag in Pew

A red flag and a note were left in a pew. The note read: "Viva Khrushchev." "Down With the Priests." "Viva Fidel Communist." It was signed "U. S. S. R." and bore a hammer and sickle. The police who arrived after the explosion seized the flag and the note.

Today the church was guarded by civilian militia. No photographers were permitted to take pictures of the damage within the church.

The official pastor of the Caridad Church is Bishop Eduardo Boza Masvidal, assistant Bishop of Havana and rector of Villanueva University. Bishop Boza Masvidal, who has signed various publications against Communism, and the university are targets for attacksk by Premier Castro and his Government.

During the Batista regime, pressure by Cuban Catholics caused the church to attempt "conciliation" between Batista and his opponents at various times. All of these gestures failed. At the same time priests throughout Cuba were personally aiding the Castro revolutionists.

For more than a year after the victory of Dr. Castro on Jan. 1, 1959, the Catholic Church watched the new regime. Most priests and organizations continued to be enthusiastic about the social and political reforms of the new Government.

Hierarchy Has Doubts

The hierarchy of the church, however, was reported to have started to have doubts about the regime following the execution of hundreds of members of the armed forces and collaborators of the Batista regime. The National Agrarian Reform Law, which stripped the upper and middle classes of their possessions, and other drastic measures as well as the sudden rise to power of the long-underground Communist party also caused concern among church officials.

Last May the Archbishop of Santiago de Cuba, Enrique Perez Serantes, who had saved the life of Dr. Castro in 1953, began to have doubts about the regime. He issued a pastoral letter calling on the Cuban Catholics to fight communism, the enemy, which he said, was "already within our gates."

In August, the first official pastoral letter of the church in Cuba deplored the "rise of communism" in Cuba and the regime's close relations with the Soviet Union." This was signed by Manuel Cardinal Arteaga and the Archbishops and Bishops of Cuba.

On Aug. 10 the church was reported to have warned the Government that unless there was "freedom of worship" the churches would have to close.

Circulars Issued Weekly

The church and various Catholic organizations have for the past several months been issuing almost weekly circulars and pamphlets attacking communism and calling on the people to be loyal to God and the church. These publications are distributed in the churches and Catholic educational centers throughout the island.

Meanwhile, the Cuban Government canceled the radio and television programs of Catholic organizations. This was done when the Government seized the CMQ radio and television chain.

Sharpened criticism of the church by Premier Castro was heard Nov. 27, when the Premier spoke at Havana University. He accused the Catholic clergy of being "counter-revolutionists." The Premier also accused the priests of having accepted money during the Batista regime from the sugar mill owners to defend the interests of this "privileged class."

The church reacted with an open letter to the Premier charging that the Government was carrying out a national anti-religious campaign.

U. S. Closing Nickel Plant In Cuba

Washington, Sept. 29 (AP)—The United States announced Thursday night that it is closing its big Nicaro nickel-processing plant in Cuba.

The action came some hours after an announcement that American residents in Cuba have been advised to send home their wives and children.

The Courier Journal

It was learned also that the United States is planning to impose new controls on exports to Cuba, covering some industrial machinery and supplies.

From Havana, meanwhile, came word that the Castro Government, in a new slap at the United States, has refused to accept a U.S. note protesting nationalization of American banks in Cuba. Ambassador Philip Bonsal was unable to deliver the protest to the Foreign Ministry in Havana.

The $110,000,000 Nicaro nickel plant in Oriente Province employed, or contributed to the employment of 2,800 Cubans.

Louisville, Ky.

The plant was built in 1942-43 to provide nickel, a strategically important metal, for U.S. operations in World War II. It also performed the same function in the Korean conflict. It now has a capacity of 50,000,000 pounds a year.

Tue 9-30-60

Suspension of operation, effective almost immediately, appears to be a below to the Cuban economy, to which Nicaro has contributed 80,000,000 over 18 years in local wages and purchases.

A formal announcement by the State Department, however, blamed the closing on "harassment" by the Castro regime and on the imminent imposition of "confiscatory" Cuban taxes.

Cuba Gave U. S. Ultimatum

The United States had negotiated with the Cubans in three meetings since June 28 to sell the plant to Cuba. Castro representatives offered the "ridiculously low" price of $5,386,000.

That offer brought the negotiations to a breakdown, and Cuba gave the United States "an ultimatum" that after Saturday, the Cuban taxes would either be paid on the nickel or no nickel would be shipped. The United States said it had offered to pay " reasonable tax," but Cuba rejected that offer.

The action involving American dependents came earlier in the day.

The State Department announced that dependents of U.S. Embassy personnel in Havana have been encouraged to leave and said other American residents there have been informed they should take similar action.

The basic reason given for removal of Americans from Cuba is that, in view of the hostile attitude displayed by Castro's Government, the United States cannot provide normal protection to U.S. citizens through regular diplomatic channels.

Hundreds of American families already have left because of the Castro regime's anti-Yankee campaign and many others are preparing to depart.

There has been speculation for days that new export controls would be aimed at blocking the shipment to Cuba of any replacement parts for U.S. built oil refineries seized by the Castro regime as well as chemicals used in oil refining.

Indications Thursday night were that the action on export controls would be taken soon.

CUBA RESTRICTS TRAVEL ABROAD

New Curb May Affect Returning Americans

Sun. 10-2-60

HAVANA (AP) — Prime Minister Fidel Castro's government has announced new financial restrictions that might affect the departure of American residents from Cuba.

The latest measure prohibits airlines and travel agencies from selling tickets for trips abroad without prior approval of the Cuban Currency Stabilization Fund.

U.S. Embassy officials said Saturday they are studying the measure to determine if it might be used to prevent the departure of any American national who desires to leave the island but lacks a valid ticket.

With the near rupture of U.S.-Cuban relations, departure procedures already have become an agonizing experience for Americans.

Despite Castro's assurances that U.S. citizens with clean consciences have nothing to fear from his regime, Americans usually approach their departure with considerable misgivings because of the frequent harassment of travelers. Neither they nor those who see them off breathe easily until the departing planes are well on their way to the United States.

But there has been nothing approaching panic in the exodus of Americans since a State Department announcement advising, that Cuba is an unsafe place for U.S. citizens.

In another development, the government-controlled Radio Voz announced that a firing squad executed Robert Cruz Alfonso for the attempted assassination of Jose Pardo Llada, anti-U.S. radio commentator and a close associate of Castro. Pardo escaped injury when his auto was sprayed with machine gun bullets last July 9. A companion suffered neck wounds. A secret military tribunal that ordered Cruz Alfonso shot handed out prison sentences ranging from 10 to 30 years to 11 persons charged with participating in the plot.

Harlem Hotel Slams Door On Castro

The Courier-Journal Louisville, Ky.

He's Not Welcome If He Comes Back

Fri. 9-30-60

By ALBIN KREBS
United Press Writer

New York, Sept. 29—There'll be no room at still another New York hotel when Cuban Premier Fidel Castro returns to address the U.N. General Assembly.

Owner - manager Love B. Woods of the Theresa Hotel in Harlem breathed a weary sigh of relief when Castro checked out yesterday and said the bearded revolutionary ought to look elsewhere for lodging when he returns here in about 10 days.

The Cuban Premier indicated he hadn't been able to fully express himself in his record 4 hour, 28 minute U. N. General Assembly address Monday and would return to talk some more.

Party Leaves

Castro and his party of 64 moved out of the Theresa with 300 pieces of luggage, part of a case of whisky, two containers of white mice, several three-foot-high teddy bears. Castro's personal refrigerator and hot plate, and some chickens he never got around to eating.

Left behind in the 40 rooms the Cubans rented at $900 a day were empty coffee cans, a bunch of wilted daisies, scores of cigar butts ground into the floors, rice, potatoes, onions, and part of a pumpkin.

Shortly before Castro left, a suspicious looking package arrived and the police bomb squad lifted it gingerly to a table to X-ray and examine it.

The package contained a big box of flea powder and a note that read "You can probably use this."

Spread Disinfectant

Outside in the street, anti-Castro Cubans jubilantly spread disinfectant around and swept the area clean.

"This is only the beginning," said a spokesman. "We expect to be back in Cuba . . . to clean up the country after Castro, the tyrant, is no longer there."

Woods, who has always bent over backwards to make all comers—even the national convention of the Communist Party—welcome at his 300-room hotel, said he wouldn't take Castro in again unless ordered by the U. S. State Department.

"Compulsorily, yes; voluntarily, no," said Woods. "This is the greatest country in the world and I don't agree with any guests who lambast our country."

Joins Another

Woods thus joined another hotelman, owner Edward Spatz of Manhattan's Shelburne Hotel, in slamming the door on the Castro party.

Spatz' brush with Castro at the start of the Cuban's 10-day New York stay was so harrowing the hotelier had to retire to a hospital for treatment of his ulcer. Woods fared better. He said he was just tired.

Castro became so incensed at Spatz' objections to the Cubans' cooking in their rooms and at the hotel owner's "unacceptable cash demands" for payment in advance, that he stormed out and moved up to Harlem.

He brought his two chefs along with him. Theresa employees said the cooks prepared Castro's meals—which consisted mainly of rice and potatoes sent from Cuba—on a two-burner hot plate on top of his dresser.

A cleaning man said Castro's room was not in "too bad" condition when the 34-year-old Premier left it, "but most of the other rooms were pretty dirty."

Cubans Allowed To Keep Assets

The Commercial Appeal

Castro Took U.S. Property But U.S. Refrained From Retaliation

Memphis, Tenn.

The Commercial Appeal-Chicago Daily News Service

WASHINGTON, Nov. 2. — While Fidel Castro has been seizing American-owned businesses in Cuba—from Coca-Cola plants to gambling casinos—the United States Government has kept hands off Cuban assets in the United States.

Chron. 11-3-60

It has now pursued that policy so long that the State Department doubts if there is much Cuban property left in this country to seize.

Cuban gold has disappeared rapidly.

The State Department says there is probably not an ounce of it left in the United States.

Cuban Finances

Federal Reserve Board figures show that Cuba had 366 million dollars in gold—or in a form that could be quickly converted to gold—in this country when Castro took power in early 1959.

The friend of Cuba in this situation, State Department officials say privately, has been Canada.

Although Castro seized all other banks in Cuba on Oct. 14, he left alone two Canadian banks — the Royal Bank of Canada and the Bank of Nova Scotia.

There is evidence that Cuban couriers have furtively slipped across the Canadian border in recent months carrying money from Cuban bank deposits in the United States in small amounts.

That money now rests in the two Canadian banks that Castro didn't take over.

As much as 60 million dollars is believed to have been lugged across the Canadian border.

In July of last year Cuban bank deposits in the United States totaled about 266 million dollars, according to Treasury Department figures.

By July of this year the figure had dropped to about 120 million dollars.

Treasury Department spokesmen emphasize that it is impossible to know what other Cuban assets remain in this country.

"If seizure of Cuban assets were ordered we would make a census of Cuban property here," said a Treasury official. "But no census has been made up to now so we really don't know what there is."

The value of American-owned property seized by Castro is now estimated at about 1.5 billion dollars.

The United States Government has never officially discussed the possibility that Cuban assets in this country might be seized.

Latin Support

But State Department officials are willing to discuss why no move along these lines has been made.

One explained, "It's all part of our official policy of forbearance toward Cuba."

The United States has been trying to line up other Latin American countries against Cuba—and hasn't wanted to alienate the rest of Latin America by getting too tough with Cuba too soon.

As it stands now, the spokesman said, seizing Cuban assets would simply "turn the screws a little tighter" on Castro's red-tinged government.

Its principal effect would be to make future business transactions between Cuba and the United States even more difficult.

The assets could be seized, by order of the President, under trading with the enemy legislation that grew out of World War I.

Morgan Faces Death

By Herald Wire Services

HAVANA — Expatriate American Soldier of Fortune Maj. William Morgan was arrested Friday night and held for immediate trial and a possible death sentence.

A government spokesman said Morgan would be tried by a revolutionary tribunal for plotting against the Castro government. Defense Minister Raul Castro has said "traitors will be executed kneeling with their backs to the firing squad."

Cuban firing squads have executed three other Americans this month for Anti-Castro activities. But unlike Morgan, the three, Anthony Zarba of Boston, Robert Fuller of Miami, and Allen Thompson of Queen City, Tex., had never supported the revolutionary government.

MORGAN

A Cuban military court Friday sentenced American Pilot Leslie Bradley to 10 years' imprisonment on charges of participating in a plot against the Castro regime. Bradley is a former resident of Minneapolis, Minn.

The same tribunal handed down a 16-year prison term to Chester Lacayo, a Nicaraguan exile accused of being the architect of the alleged plot.

They were accused of faking a plot to invade Nicaragua from Cuba to embarrass the Castro regime.

Morgan, of Toledo, Ohio, was seized with another army officer, Maj. Jesus Carreras. Both were accused of counter-revolutionary activities. Morgan was said to have been involved with anti-Castro forces in the interior and to have hidden arms and aided anti-government plotters to escape.

His last assignment for the Fidel Castro regime was the development of a frog-breeding farm outside of Havana.

Morgan served with rebel forces during the two-year revolutionary campaign which led to Fulgencio Batista's overthrow in Jan. 1, 1959. He campaigned in the Sierra de Escambray.

Meanwhile qualified observers said Friday that Russian and Czech technicians are assembling Soviet fighter aircraft at San Julian, a former U.S. Navy World War II base. Some 200 more "technicians" will arrive from Moscow next year, Argentine-born Ernesto (Che) Guevara, Cuban National Bank president, disclosed in a television address in which he spoke of receiving help from "volunteers."

(In Moscow, the government radio predicted that "15,000 counter-revolutionaries, armed with the latest American weapons and trained in the U.S.A." will invade Cuba soon. It said they would make simultaneous landings in several areas).

(In Washington, the Navy disclosed that U.S. Marine forces at the big Guantanamo Naval Base in Eastern Cuba have been strengthened. The normal complement there is under 200 men and a Navy spokesman said the increase was "not large").

Reports have circulated abroad that 3,000 Communist Czechoslovak troops are training to serve in Cuba.

Cuban Firing Squads Mow Down Two More Americans

The Talladega Daily Home

Talladega, Ala.

HAVANA (AP) — A Cuban firing squad Sunday executed two more Americans from the small invasion force that Fidel Castro charged was part of a U.S. plot to provoke an incident at Guantanamo Naval Base.

The prime minister directly linked the 27-man expeditionary force that landed on Cuba's northeast coast Oct. 15 with mounting tension over the big naval base the United States holds on the island by treaty.

Castro said on television that the small band intended to create the pretext for U.S. intervention in Cuba by trying to form a "zone of operations and zone of perturbation" near the base.

The United States formally charged before the United Nations last Friday that Castro himself apeared bent on provoking an incident over the base.

Firing squad bullets just before dawn cut down a Louisiana adventurer and a former U.S. Marine seeking to avenge the Castro government's seizure of his father's Cuban plantation.

The two Americans were: Allan Dale Thompson, 36, a native of Queen City, Tex., who grew up in Morringsport, La., and worked in fishing camps in that area.

Robert O. Fuller, 25, whose father moved to Miami, Fla., after confiscation of his property in Cuba.

Another American who landed with them, Anthony Zarba, 27, of Somerville, Mass., was executed with seven Cuban insurgents at the same firing range in San Juan Valley last Thursday.

"There'll be other expeditions," Fuller told newsmen. "Some may fail, but sooner or later the Castro regime may fall."

The younger Fuller, who served with the U. S. Marines in Korea, testified at his trial in Santiago that peasants had aided the invaders.

Cuba To Return Navy Base Rent

News + Courier, Charleston, S.C. Monday 7/11/60 P.1

HAVANA (AP)—President Osvaldo Dorticos said Sunday night Cuba would return to the United States the money paid recently for the annual rent on the U.S. Guantanamo naval base. He implied strongly that the United States would be asked to give up the base.

Dorticos spoke at a big Havana rally that Prime Minister Fidel Castro missed because of illness.

(The State Department in Washington declined immediate comment on the possibility that the United States might be asked to give up the big Guantanamo base.

(The Guantanamo naval base has a normal population of approximately 10,000 U.S. military personnel, their dependents and Cuban employes. The Cuban employes have been estimated to number between 3,000 and 4,000.)

Havana looked like an armed camp as the Castro government—bolstered by the Soviet Union's open support—rallied its followers. But instead of the 1½ millions that had been urged to turn out, the crowd was estimated at little more than 100,000 at its peak.

More than two hours after the scheduled start of the rally, education minister Armando Hart announced Castro would not attend because of a "slight illness." The crowd groaned and then hushed the shouting and laughter that had filled the plaza before the presidential palace.

Hart said Castro was suffering from a lung infection and had been ordered to rest.

The exact nature of Castro's illness was not entirely clear from the announcement. But it referred to a pulmonary infection and the use of antibiotics, suggesting some sort of pneumonia. Castro coughs frequently during his speeches.

The prime minister's absence appeared to preclude an announcement of what retaliatory action the government might take against the slash in Cuba's sugar sales to the United States. It had been generally expected that Castro would deal with that issue at the rally. He previously had threatened to confiscate the property of Americans here down to the "nails in their shoes."

The rally went on with other high government officials as speakers.

News + Courier

P. 2-A

Maj. Ernest (Che) Guevara referred to Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev's rocket warning to the United States and said "Cuba is no longer alone in its fight for survival."

Charleston, S.C.

The crowd cheered when Guevara said Khrushchev's statement "makes leaders of the north tremble . . . let the sons of the Pentagon be careful . . . let them think it over carefully. Cuba is no longer a lonely island in the Caribbean."

Because of the secrecy in which the Castro regime works it may be some time before Castro's exact condition is known.

The swarthy, bespectacled Dorticos brought up the subject of Guantanamo by declaring:

"Our fertile land is not payable in dollars. Our island and adjacent islands belong to the Cuban people and our land is not for rent or sale to foreigners."

He then said the annual rental check would be returned. The United States has a perpetual lease on the Guantanamo base. Under a treaty signed in 1934 the United States is obligated to pay an annual rental of 2,000 gold dollars, the equivalent of $3,386.25, for the 45 square miles of land at the eastern tip of Cuba.

The $3,386.25 check was presented to the Cuban government on June 23.

Cuba

The Prime Minister made a TV speech Friday night. He was examined by doctors Saturday morning and a "slight infection" of the left lung was disclosed, Hart said. The doctors recommended complete rest, he added.

The intense heat in the palace area had the crowd thinning out even before the announcement of Castro's illness.

The announcement itself cast a pall over the thousands of laughing peasants and workers, many of whom had waited hours to hear Castro.

The rally went on with substitute speakers.

The turnout was far less than the 1½ million urged by government leaders to demonstrate support of the revolutionary leader in his political and economic battles with the United States.

It could not be learned immediately whether Castro was in a hospital or was resting at one of his several residences in Havana

Cuba Seizes Large Printing Plant Used by Time and Reader's Digest

Washington, D.C.

Sun. 9-6-60

HAVANA, Sept. 5 (AP) The Castro regime today seized a multi-million dollar printing plant here that turned out the Latin American edition of Time magazine and the Spanish language edition of Reader's Digest.

P. 1

Workers' militia took control after plant employes raised complaints against the management, the usual process for seizure of property.

The block-long plant is owned by Pastor Legueruela, whose family is one of the best known in Latin America. Lagueruela was not immediately available for comment.

Time representatives said the magazine's Latin American edition probably will be published in another country.

The seized property includes special presses installed by Reader's Digest.

The government also took over the 10-million-dollar Bank of China in Havana after many depositors from the Chinese colony tried to withdraw their money.

The takeover was a foregone conclusion since Prime Minister Fidel Castro Friday announced his government is breaking off relations with Nationalist China and recognizing Red China. The Nationalist Chinese government is a major stockholder of the bank.

Chinese officials here said they were willing to hand over the bank to the Castro government, but under their orders they could not surrender the property to the Chinese Communists.

The takeover was made by four Cuban militiamen who are bank employes.

[Raymond S. D. Yoh, head of the bank, said that National Bank inspectors had been going through the books since the bank opened this morning. United Press International reported. He said that so far there had been no move to halt withdrawals].

Angry Castro Quits Hotel

NEW YORK (UPI)—Fiery Cuban Premier Fidel Castro stormed out of his hotel in a huff Monday night and after an emergency conference with U.N. Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold it was announced the entire Cuban U.N. delegation would move to a hotel in Harlem.

Announcing he was ready to sleep in Central Park if necessary, Castro led the vanguard of his party of some 80 Cubans out of the Hotel Shelburne, and drove eight blocks across Manhattan to the U.N.'s skyscraper headquarters.

The bearded Cuban charged the hotel had made "unacceptable cash demands" on him.

Hotel owner Edward Spatz immediately branded the entire move a propaganda stunt calculated to embarrass the United States and the United Nations.

DEMANDED BOND

Spatz said he had agreed to take in the Cubans in the first place only at the request of the State Department and the United Nations after other hotels refused Castro housing.

Castro told an impromptu news conference in the lobby of the hotel as he left that the final blow in a series of financial squabbles with the hotel had been Spatz' demand for $10,000 Monday.

P. 14

Spatz challenged Castro. He admitted he had asked the Cubans to produce Monday the second half of a $10,000 bond, the first half of which already had been put up. He said the Cubans attempted to give him a Cuban bond which he said "looked like a phony."

"I asked for a real bond or money," Spatz said, adding that he later relented, went to Castro's room, offered to return the $5,000 bond already posted and let the Cubans stay on free of charge.

Castro Lodges Complaints Of Overcharging, Security

The Montgomery Advertiser P. 1

Montgomery Ala. Tues. 9-20-60

NEW YORK (AP) — Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro talked angrily out of his New York hotel Monday night, complaining of the prices and his tight security guard.

After a conference with Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold of the United Nations, Castro announced that his party was moving to a hotel in the heart of Harlem, New York's Negro district.

Amid reports of growing discontent in Havana, Castro's brother Raul hastily scheduled a protest speech there. Radio stations broadcast appeals from Cuban labor leaders to a rally at the presidential palace.

Edward Spatz, owner of the Hotel Shelburne, where Castro had stayed for 24 hours, charged in a news conference that the departure was "a prearranged propaganda move" designed to embarrass the United States on the eve of the U.N. General Assembly meeting starting Tuesday.

As Castro left, he threatened to import tents from Cuba and live in Central Park or on the United Nations grounds.

Spatz was not available for some time after Castro left the hotel. A spokesman explained that he was at his doctor's office being treated for an ulcer. Spatz said Sunday he had agreed reluctantly to have Castro and his party as guests at the request of Hammarskjold and U.S. Secretary of State Christian A. Herter.

Spatz said Castro was overheard to say, as he letf that hotel, that he had lived in the Sierra Maestra for years — during the guerrilla war which preceded his victory over dictator Fulgencio Batista—and he was ready to live in the open again.

Castro checked into the hotel Sunday night after a flight from Havana, during which he met a generally favorable reception from supporters at the airport but some booing and catcalls en route to the hotel.

He had remained secluded in his room throughout the night and during the day, although some of his party visited the hotel dining room for meals. Castro's food was brought in from restaurants outside.

A force of more than 200 police was posted outside the hotel and at nearby intersections.

Spatz said Castro's walkout was preceded by a disagreement over a bond for $5,000 which the Cuban party was to put up as security against possible damage and their $400-a-day hotel bill.

He said he was given $5,000 in cash last Saturday, as an advance on a total deposit of $10,000. The remaining $5,000 was due Sunday he said.

BILL WORTHY:

Uncovers U. S. bias in Cuba

The Afro-Am Baltimore, Md Sat. 9-17-60

By WILLIAM WORTHY
(Special To AFRO)

HAVANA, Cuba — The Marines won't be around Guantanamo — and possible other bases in Latin America as well — by the time Dick Nixon or Jack Kennedy runs for re-election in 1964.

This prediction is made on the basis of a visit to the huge naval base and an examination of the attitudes of Americans stationed there and Cubans working there.

At Guantanamo Bay, I found the familiar pattern of separation of the races that characterizes most of Uncle Sam's ventures abroad.

* * *

A GOOD PROPORTION of the several thousand Cuban citizens who commute daily and work on the base are either tan or quite dark. In many cases, they or their parents immigrated here from Jamaica or elsewhere in the West Indies.

Repeatedly at the base gate, they told me that mess facilities for Americans on the base are separate from those provided for the so - called locals.

The "natives" who sleep at the Naval installation also have their separate quarters.

* * *

GUANTANAMO IS A potential danger spot in the conflict between the United States and this Island Republic.

Rising Cuban nationalism has merely reinforced the resentment always felt by a weak country on whom a military base has been imposed by a stronger neighbor.

Over half a century ago, the North American proponents of expansionism and "white man's burden" underscored Cuba's status as a "Banana Republic" by insisting on a naval base in perpetuity at an insulting annual rental of $3,000.

* * *

LAST SPRING, the Castro government returned uncashed to the Pentagon the 1960 rent check.

Just a week ago, Fidel Castro told a million Cubans at a rally that little Cuba would never physically launch an attack on Guantanamo, but that if Wasington continued its "economic aggression," his government would publicly denounce the 1903 treaty and order the Marines to clear out.

Meanwhile, in order to impress the natives, Sabrejets keep up a show of force with loud, nerve - shattering flights every 90 seconds directly over the base fence.

Castro put a stop to the jets flying beyond the fence over what the Fidelistas proudly call the Free Territory of Cuba. In answer to questions, the Marine guards and the base security officer assure all visitors that the Cubans favor the presence of foreign troops on their soil and that everything is peaceful.

* * *

When two television colleagues of mine set their cameras down on the Cuban side of the open gate and began shooting pictures of the day shift walking out, an order went out to the three Marine sentries to suspend the customary body search of the departing Cubans and to inspect only their identification badges.

Enough has been publicized here about the humiliating searches for the Navy to know how strongly the men and women workers fume at the indignity of head - to-foot pats and feels by Marines.

But the one-day suspension of the body searches didn't work out as planned. So accustomed were the Cubans to the daily patting routine that many of them automatically held their arms up over their heads as they lined up before the Marines.

AFTER STEPPING through the gate and spotting the cameras, at least a dozen of the Cubans came up to us and said:

"Do come back every day. Then they won't search us."

ALTHOUGH TODAY the people of Cuba hold their heads high and are extremely proud of their new position in the family of nations, I did notice a few of Guantanamo workers tipping their hats or even removing them as they approached the Marines.

Twenty months of national independence under Castro are not yet enough to erase fully the ingrained habits and servile reflexes of six decades of Yankee domination.

Yet the direction here clear — if I were a gambling man, I'd bet the Marines won't be around another four years.

Castro Lodges Complaints Of Overcharging, Security

NEW YORK (AP) — Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro stalked angrily out of his New York hotel Monday night, complaining of the prices and his tight security guard.

After a conference with Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold of the United Nations, Castro announced that his party was moving to a hotel in the heart of Harlem, New York's Negro district.

Amid reports of growing discontent in Havana, Castro's brother Raul hastily scheduled a pro-o test speech there. Radio stations broadcast appeals from Cuban labor leaders to a rally at the presidential palace.

Edward Spatz, owner of the Hotel Shelburne, where Castro had stayed for 24 hours, charged in a news conference that the departure was "a prearranged propaganda move" designed to embarrass the United States on the eve of the U.N. General Assembly meeting starting Tuesday.

As Castro left, he threatened to import tents from Cuba and live in Central Park or on the United Nations grounds.

Spatz was not available for some time after Castro left the hotel. A spokesman explained that he was at his doctor's office, being treated for an ulcer. Spatz said Sunday he had agreed reluctantly to have Castro and his party as guests at the request of Hammarskjold and U.S. Secretary of State Christian A. Herter.

Spatz said Castro was overheard to say, as he letf that hotel, that he had lived in the Sierra Maestra for years — during the guerrilla war which preceded his victory over dictator Fulgencio Batista—and he was ready to live in the open again.

Castro checked into the hotel Sunday night after a flight from Havana, during which he met a generally favorable reception from supporters at the airport but some booing and catcalls en route to the hotel.

He had remained secluded in his room throughout the night and during the day, although some of his party visited the hotel dining room for meals. Castro's food was brought in from restaurants outside.

A force of more than 200 police was posted outside the hotel and at nearby intersections.

Spatz said Castro's walkout was preceded by a disagreement over a bond for $5,000 which the Cuban party was to put up as security against possible damage and their $400-a-day hotel bill.

He said he was given $5,000 in cash last Saturday, as an advance on a total deposit of $10,000. The remaining $5,000 was due Sunday he said.

Uncovers U. S. bias in Cuba

HAVANA, Cuba — The Marines won't be around Guantanamo — and possible other bases in Latin America, as well — by the time Dick Nixon or Jack Kennedy runs for re-election in 1964.

This prediction is made on the basis of a visit to the huge naval base and an examination of the attitudes of Americans stationed there and Cubans working there.

At Guantanamo Bay, I found the familiar pattern of separation of the races that characterizes most of Uncle Sam's ventures abroad.

* * *

A GOOD PROPORTION of the several thousand Cuban citizens who commute daily and work on the base are either tan or quite dark. In many cases, they or their parents immigrated here from Jamaica or elsewhere in the West Indies.

Repeatedly at the base gate, they told me that mess facilities for Americans on the base are separate from those provided for the so - called locals.

The "natives" who sleep at the Naval installation also have their separate quarters.

* * *

GUANTANAMO IS A potential danger spot in the conflict between the United States and this Island Republic.

Rising Cuban nationalism has merely reinforced the resentment always felt by a weak country on whom a military base has been imposed by a stronger neighbor.

Over half a century ago, the North American proponents of expansionism and "white man's burden" underscored Cuba's status as a "Banana Republic" by insisting on a naval base in perpetuity at an insulting annual rental of $3,000.

* * *

Just a week ago, Fidel Castro told a million Cubans at a rally that little Cuba would never physically launch an attack on Guantanamo, but that if Wasington continued its "economic aggression," his government would publicly denounce the 1903 treaty and order the Marines to clear out.

Meanwhile, in order to impress the natives, Sabrejets keep up a show of force with loud, nerve - shattering flights every 90 seconds directly over the base fence.

Castro put a stop to the jets flying beyond the fence over what the Fidelistas proudly call the Free Territory of Cuba. In answer to questions, the Marine guards and the base security officer assure all visitors that the Cubans favor the presence of foreign troops on their soil and that everything is peaceful.

No Racial Discrimination In Cuba, NAACP Man Says

News & Observer, Raleigh, N.C.
Aug. 7, 1960

NEW YORK (AP) — A North Carolina official of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People returned home Saturday from a trip to Cuba and said:

"There is no racial discrimination in Cuba. Cuba is a type of democracy that I always hoped the United States would be. I think their revolution is the greatest revolution of liberation and democracy in modern history."

Robert F. Williams, president of the NAACP's Union County, N. C., chapter, returned on the same plane that brought Cuban Foreign Minister Raul Roa from Havana. Roa would say only that he was here to confer with New York members of the Cuban diplomatic corps.

Williams, who lives in Monroe, N.C., discounted worsening relations between America and the regime of Cuban Premier Fidel Castro. "I think the United States has not given Cuba any alternative," Williams told newsmen without elaborating.

Williams said he was convinced that the people of Cuba want only to be free, to determine their own destiny — and do not regard themselves as enemies of the United States.

"For the first time in my life," Williams said of his visit to Cuba, "even though I live in a so-called leader of the free world, did I really feel free as a Negro, as when I was in Cuba."

Dorticos Says Rent Money For Guantanamo Will Be Returned

By The Associated Press

HAVANA, July 10.—President Osvaldo Dorticos said Sunday night Cuba would return to the United States the money paid recently for the annual rent on the United States Guantanamo Naval Base. He implied strongly that the United States would be asked to give up the base.

Dorticos spoke at a big Havana rally that Prime Minister Fidel Castro missed because of illness, thought to be pneumonia.

Lung Infection

Havana looked like an armed camp as the Castro government—bolstered by the Soviet Union's open support—rallied its followers. But instead of the 1½ millions that had been urged to turn out, the crowd was estimated at little more than 100,000 at its peak.

More than two hours after the scheduled start of the rally, Education Minister Armando Hart announced Castro would not attend because of a "slight illness." The crowd groaned and then hushed the shouting and laughter that had filled the plaza before the Presidential Palace.

Hart said Castro was suffering from a lung infection and had been ordered to rest.

The exact nature of Castro's illness was not entirely clear from the announcement. But it referred to a pulmonary infection and the use of antibiotics, suggesting some sort of pneumonia. Castro coughs frequently during his speeches.

The rally went on with other high government officials as speakers.

Few Days' Rest

President Osvaldo Dorticos told the crowd that Castro would rest "only a few days."

Maj. Ernest 'Che' Guevara referred to Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's rocket warning to the United States and said "Cuba is no longer alone in its fight for survival."

CUBA HINTS PLAN TO SEIZE U.S. BASE; CASTRO TAKEN ILL

President Dorticos Indicates Action on Guantanamo—Premier Has Pneumonia

By R. HART PHILLIPS
Special to The New York Times.

HAVANA, July 10—The President of Cuba indicated today that the Government might attempt to wrest control of the naval base at Guantanamo Bay from the United States.

Speaking at a rally in front of the Presidential palace, President Osvaldo Dorticos Torrado said that "it must now be stated that the land of the United States Guantanamo naval base belongs to the Cuban people and it can neither be leased nor sold to foreigners."

Just before this remark, the President asserted that a check just received from the United States for the annual rental of the base on the south coast of Cuba in Oriente Province would be returned to Washington.

Premier Fails to Appear

President Dorticos' speech came after a surprise announcement to the crowd that Premier Fidel Castro, who had been scheduled to address the rally, was ill with pneumonia.

The failure of the 33-year-old revolutionary leader to appear at the rally delayed the expected announcement of specific retaliatory measures against the United States for ending the purchase of Cuban sugar last week. Dr. Castro's regime has already established legislative measures to nationalize property owned by United States companies.

A hundred thousand of Dr. Castro's followers had been waiting impatiently since 2 P. M. in the hot sun in front of the Presidential Palace for the appearance of the Premier. At 4:50 Dr. Armando Hart, Minister of Education, stepped to the microphone and said that Dr. Castro "cannot be with us this afternoon."

No Schedule Maintained

The crowd protested wildly. In vail Dr. Hart shouted assurances into the microphone that the Premier was ill but not dangerously so.

Dr. Hart pleaded for silence so he could read the bulletin issued by the physicians. "Let me read the bulletin," Dr. Hart cried, "so that our enemies, the counter-revolutionists, will not confuse you."

Despite the continued uproar, Dr. Hart read the bulletin which was signed by Dr. Maj. Raul Trigo and Dr. Manuel Fajardo. It said Dr. Castro had not felt well for some time. Early Friday morning he began sneezing and felt a pain in his chest.

Although he made his scheduled television-radio appearance Friday night, the pain increased and early this morning his physicians sent him to bed. According to the bulletin, he is suffering only a touch of pneumonia in the left lung.

The treatment ordered calls for complete rest and use of antibiotics. The physicians sent him to bed for twenty-four hours.

The youthful revolutionary leader, who has put on weight since his guerrilla days in the Sierra Maestra, maintains no work schedule. He appears unexpectedly at various places throughout the island to inspect cooperatives, speak to mass meetings and maintain contact with the masses.

He is reported to perform his duties as President of the National Agrarian Reform Institute and of the National Tourist Institute at odd hours during the day and night.

Following the announcement of Dr. Castro's illness the crowd began to melt away. Radio announcers pleaded with the demonstrators to remain. Finally the departures halted and the meeting continued.

The meeting had begun in an atmosphere of jubilation for the Cuban revolutionary Government and its fanatical supporters while a feeling of fear and uncertainty gripped the rest of the population.

Although the organizers had predicted that 1,000,000 would gather in front of the palace at 3 P. M., people were arriving slowly an hour after the scheduled time to start.

Most of those at the meeting wore the uniform of the civilian militia, which has been organized by Dr. Castro's regime throughout the island. The demonstrators carried small Cuban flags and banners expressing anger against the United States.

The most vociferous were the student militia groups, who repeatedly sang the march of Dr. Castro's 26th of July revolutionary movement. The student groups also kept up a chant of "Cuba yes, Yankees no" as they waited for the appearance of the Premier.

The pledge of rocket support by Premier Khrushchev has left no doubt in the minds of the Cuban people that the island is under the protection of the Soviet Union. Many Cubans to whom Soviet Union meant merely a far-away country unimportant in their daily lives are stunned by the revelation of close relations between the Communist bloc and Dr. Castro's regime.

The conservative classes regarded with satisfaction President Eisenhower's reply yesterday to Mr. Khruschev that the United States would not tolerate "the establishment of a regime dominated by international communism in the Western Hemisphere."

Informacion, the only newspaper outside of Government ownership or control, this morning printed the text of President Eisenhower's statement. The Government press ignored it.

The general public first heard of President Eisenhower's statement late last night when the Government radio stations began broadcasting the essential part of the statement. This was done by commentators in tones of heavy sarcasm. Some termed the words of the President insolent and of no importance.

However, many Cubans look askance at the Soviet vessels now unloading petroleum in Havana harbor to be refined in the American-owned Standard Oil and British-owned Shell Petroleum Company refineries, which were seized by the Government several days ago.

The ending of Cuban sugar purchases by the United States, leaving Cuba with about 860,000 tons of sugar that was to go to the United States, surprised and dismayed the greater part of the Cuban population. Although Premier Castro had told them for weeks that the United States would reduce the sugar quota in its "economic aggression" against Cuba, the people did not expect the purchases be cut off.

Most Cubans fear further economic sanctions by the United States, cutting off any hope of obtaining merchandise from that country. With only United State-made automobiles, television, radios and electrical household appliances in Cuba and having depended for years on the United States for the greater part of the food consumed here, the Cubans are highly uneasy. There are no spare parts for automobiles and other equipment and food is becoming scarce and rising in price.

In a visit to a public market this morning it was found there were no dried beans or imported rice available. There were bags of Cuban rice, which the Cubans say is of poor quality. These are major items in the Cuban diet.

United States canned goods are extremely scarce and all imported sauces, breakfast foods and other imported delicacies are nonexistent. There is no bacon to be purchased and ham is scarce. Premier Castro warned in a recent television speech that there soon would be little lard.

Monroe Doctrine Reaffirmed by U.S.

Khrushchev Warned on Cuba Moves

Thurs. 7-14-60

United Press International

WASHINGTON, July 14. —The United States today again bluntly told Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev to stay out of Latin-American affairs.

The State Department, in a major foreign policy pronouncement cleared by the White House, declared that the Monroe Doctrine against European intervention in this hemisphere is just as alive as it ever was.

The statement struck at Khrushchev's threat to hit the United States with rockets if this country tried armed aggression in Cuba.

"This naked menace to world peace brandished by the Soviet leader reveals the hypocrisy of his protestations in behalf of peace," it said.

Hemisphere-Wide.

Khrushchev, at a press conference in Moscow Tuesday, declared that the Monroe Doctrine has "died."

The U.S. statement said, "the principles of the Monroe Doctrine are as valid today as they were in 1823 when the doctrine was proclaimed."

But it said the doctrine, proclaimed by President James Monroe, has become a hemisphere-wide policy through the Organization of American States charter and the 1947 Rio pact in which hemisphere nations banded together against aggression.

President Monroe's statement, Dec. 2, 1823, was an answer to threats by Russia and the Holy Alliance to reconquer newly independent states in Latin America.

Today's statement, read to reporters by State Department press officer Lincoln White, said:

"The principles which the U.S. government enunciated in the face of the attempts of the old imperialism to intervent in the affairs of this hemisphere are as valid today for the attempts of the new imperialism."

Doctrine Reaffirmed.

It said the United States "reaffirms with vigor" the words of President Monroe—"We owe it to candor to declare that we should consider any attempt on their (European powers) part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as a danger to our peace and safety."

The statement charged that Khrushchev has "arrogated to himself the power to determine what international agreements should or should not be binding—even though the Soviet Union is not a party thereto."

It said Khrushchev has not only done this to the Rio pact but also to the treaty with Cuba giving the United States a permanent lease on the Guantanamo naval base.

HAVANA — (AP) — Cuba's highest active Roman Catholic authority declared Tuesday he will close all Catholic churches on the island unless the Castro regime averts anti-church demonstrations and guarantees freedom of worship.

He said the church would operate "in silence" — as it does in some places behind the Communist Iron Curtain.

The warning was angrily issued by the Rt. Rev. Msgr. Evelio Diaz, archbishop coadjutor of Havana. It came shortly after the top ranking priest in Castro's army had intervened to stop an impending clash between churchgoers and a gang of jeering youths outside Havana Cathedral.

The Rev. Eligio Sardinas, chaplain of the revolutionary army, sent most of the churchgoers and demonstrators home before any serious injuries could be inflicted.

A church source said Msgr. Diaz told government officials:

"If there are no guarantees of safety (for churchgoers), all churches will be closed tomorrow morning and the church will be declared in silence so that the whole world will know what is happening in Cuba."

Msgr. Diaz' warning—which brought no immediate official response — pointed up the seriousness of a growing church-government dispute centering on the leftward march of the Fidel Castro regime.

The island's Roman Catholic hierarchy warned in a pastoral letter read in churches Sunday against "the increasing advance of communism in Cuba."

The letter cited the close commercial, cultural and diplomatic ties the Castro government has established with Communists in recent months, "especially in the Soviet Union."

The church source said Msgr. Diaz made a telephone call to the Presidential Palace during the peak of the demonstration. He later drove to the palace and conferred 25 minutes with Luis Buch, secretary to President Osvaldo Dorticos.

He appeared angry after leaving the palace, and declined comment on the meeting. A subsequent palace communique said only that he had paid a visit.

The cathedral incident occurred after a high mass in honor of Cuban priests.

Eyewitnesses said a mob gathered outside during the service while about 30 youths stood inside, smoking and talking.

The eyewitnesses said the demonstrators outside — shouting "Down with the Pope" and "Down with priests" — struck several of the church-goers as they were leaving and banged on the monsignor's empty motor car.

At this point, Father Sardinas mounted the cathedral steps and talked the demonstrators into leaving.

The church source said four telephone calls were made to police before they appeared on the scene.

They added that officers detained at least two priests following the demonstration. They were identified as the Rev. Agnelio Blanco, coadjutor of the Havana Parish of Charity, and the Rev. Fernando Arango, chief advisor to the Catholic Youth Workers. The reason for their detention was not disclosed.

The demonstration was the latest in a series that have developed at Havana churches during the past month. Churchgoers have charged the mobs are organized by Communists.

Msgr. Diaz has taken over administration of the Roman Catholic church in Cuba as a result of the poor health of 80-year-old Manuel Cardinal Arteaga.

Is Khrushchev Putting Halter On Wild Cuba?

The News and Observer
Raleigh, N. C.
Sun. 11-20-60

By JOHN M. HIGHTOWER

WASHINGTON (AP) — Soviet Premier Khrushchev may be putting a loose halter on Prime Minister Fidel Castro of Cuba because Khrushchev wants to promote chances for a summit conference with President-elect John F. Kennedy next spring.

But there are undoubtedly other reasons for his reported effort to slow down Castro's anti-American campaign. And one of the reasons given considerable importance here is that Khrushchev does not want to be called upon to carry out his threat to back up Cuba in a war with the United States. He wants Castro to stop short of crowding the United States to the danger point.

See Coincidence.

State Department experts were interested Saturday in the coincidence of reports from Havana that Khrushchev had advised Castro to go more slowly in his conflict with the United States and reports from Moscow that the Communist summit conference there finally had ended.

Originally called in connection with the Soviet Union's national anniversary celebration earlier this month, the conference ran on several days longer than expected. Western experts said this probably meant Khrushchev and his Red Chinese critics were having trouble working out their row over peaceful coexistence to the point where they could show some degree of unity to the West.

This implies that Khrushchev is still fighting hard for a softer line than the Red Chinese favor. Apart from the long-range war or peace issue, however, is the question of the Soviet-Red Chinese bloc policy at the outset of the new administration in Washington next January.

Again the experts here believe that Khrushchev is doing everything he can to maintain a reasonably friendly and hopeful attitude toward Kennedy. They say this does not mean that he expects real settlements or is prepared to make concession to the West on major issues like disarmament and Germany.

Summit Idea.

More likely it means that he wants to recover the use of the summit conference idea as a pressure to force the West into negotiations and, he may hope, into eventual concessions. Krushchev lost this advantage last May when, after the U2 spy plane incident, he refused to negotiate with President Eisenhower and broke up the summit conference in Paris. Since Kennedy's election he has made clear that he wants to establish a different relationship with the incoming U.S. leader.

Should Castro provoke the United States into military action over the Guantanamo Naval Base — a danger almost wholly discounted here — the result might be to put Khrushchev in the position of having to make good on his rocket threat against the United States if it fought Cuba, or seriously lose face. Khrushchev tried to get off the hook several weeks ago by saying that his rocket threat was really just "symbolic" of Soviet support for Castro.

Cuba, however, is being built into an immensely valuable base for Communist exploitation of revolutionary movements which are usually boiling somewhere in the Caribbean area and frequently explode into violence.

Congo Angle.

In manipulating his drive for communism in the Congo, which would give him a base in the heart of Africa, Khrushchev also has to be careful that he does not become involved in direct military conflict with the Western powers or alienate the United States at a time when he hopes to operate in a renewed atmosphere of friendliness.

Khrushchev evidently feels that time is working on the side of communism in dealing with the underdeveloped areas of the world. He has put considerably into coming to grips with problems in the heart of Europe, notably the problems of the peace settlement and an East-West agreement on the future of Berlin. In these cases he has told Western leaders he wants decisions in 1961 and he wants negotiations under way by April—a little more than two months after Kennedy takes office Jan. 20.

Khrushchev probably considers all these elements related in his pattern of power politics, which may also extend to the Far East and embrace Red China's threat against the Formosa area and Southeast Asia. In this sense the Castro regime in Cuba must be seen by Khrushchev as a pawn in the power negotiations he would like to have with Kennedy.

Cuba and Her Red Allies Denounce Warship Move

The News & Observer

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Cuba's Fidel Castro and his Communist pals — Red China and the Soviet Union — charged Friday that the U.S. warship shield protecting Guatemala and Nicaragua menaces world peace.

Castro-controlled newspapers in Havana shouted in black headlines that President Eisenhower's deployment of the warships in nearby waters could open a way for a direct attack on Cuba.

Radio Moscow chipped in a warning that the U.S. movement into the Caribbean is "fraught with the danger of a military conflict."

Promises Support.

Red China's Premier Chou En-lai said the United States is threatening Cuba by what he called force of arms, and he promised continued support of Castro's regime.

Other late Friday developments bearing in the Cuban Central American - Caribbean situation included:

— Costa Rica said it found documents on a Nicaraguan opposition leader linking the unsuccessful Nicaraguan revolt with Castro and international communism.

— Guatemalan President Miguel Ydigoras said he favors a Korea-type police action against Cuba by the Organization of American States.

— Cuba formally protested to the United Nations over President Eisenhower's order dispatching warships to protect Guatemala and Nicaragua.

President - elect John F. Kennedy at Palm Beach spent 2 hours and 40 minutes with Central Intelligence Agency Director Allen W. Dulles getting a secret briefing on Caribbean developments.

Getting Arms.

— The State Department in Washington reported Cuba has received at least 28,000 tons of arms — tanks, guns, planes — from the Soviet bloc and has the largest army in Latin America.$ largest army in Latin America.

The clamor from Cuba and the world's two largest Communist powers was brushed aside by the United States. The Navy in Washington reiterated that the carrier Shangri La and four destroyers are in position to help repel any invasion of the two little Central American nations.

The State Department in Washington spiked a report published in London that the warships might halt suspected ships on the high seas. Washington said ships would be stopped only in the two nations' territorial waters, and then only on the request of Nicaragua and Guatemala.

Presidential press secretary James C. Hagerty said in Augusta Ga., the Moscow broadsides were "Communist-type reaction" and added: "There's a very similar reaction — the words are almost the same—from Cuba."

By Request.

President Eisenhower ordered the warships into the Caribbean at the request of Guatemala and Nicaragua after both nations stamped out uprisings they charged had support from Castro's Cuba.

In Havana, the semiofficial newspaper Revolucion called the U.S. action "Yankee military occupation of Central-America," and asserted it was designed to intimidate Cuba.

"Guantanamo or Guatemala, the place for the self-provoked aggression is immaterial," said Revolucion.

The Castro regime has charged repeatedly that the United States was preparing an incident at its leased Guantanamo naval base in eastern Cuba as a pretext for military intervention.

"We denounce the new crime that already is in execution against the peoples of Guatemala and Nicaragua, whose rebelliousness will now be punished with more repression than the barbarous repression already used by their tyrannical governments," said Revolucion.

Could Hide Maneuver.

Havana's El Mundo asserted the movement of the warships "could hide a maneuver against Cuba." The Communist newspaper Hoy said "the spectre of the hateful Marine Corps again hangs over Latin America."

The Havana correspondent of the Soviet government newspaper Izvestia said "the dictatorships in Guatemala and Nicaragua are wavering under the impact of the hatred of their peoples." The dispatch was distributed by Tass, the official Soviet news agency.

A Moscow broadcast declared "the rotten, antipopular regimes of these two countries can exist only with U.S. support."

Radio Peiping said the United States was helping "the reactionary dictatorial governments of Guatemala and Nicaragua in suppressing the people's revolutionary movements there."

The radio said Chou told a reception for a visiting Cuban economic delegation: "The Cuban people have been waging a struggle directed squarely against U.S. imperialism which is close by—the most vicious imperialism. They are ready to repulse the armed provocation and attack the enemy at any moment."

The Cuban mission is in Peiping to seek expansion of trade ties. It is headed by Maj. Ernesto Guevara, Castro's leftist economic chief who negotiated the recent trade treaty with Peiping.

On Guard

The New York Times

New York

In a move to keep the Castro regime of Cuba from stirring up Communist revolutions in Latin America United States warships and planes now patrol Central American waters with orders to shoot if necessary to prevent armed Communist-led aggression from abroad against two countries in that area—Guatemala and Nicaragua.

This action, which is in line with President Eisenhower's warning that we will fight to bar a Communist foothold in this hemisphere, was taken at the specific request of the Governments of the two countries. These Governments have just crushed revolts against them which they charge were instigated by the Castro regime, with direct Cuban participation in at least one of them. The United States Government not only accepts these charges as credible but also joins these Governments in the fear that Castro's fanatics might be planning further and stronger armed attacks, especially since the Castro regime has been stockpiling Communist-supplied arms far beyond Cuba's own needs.

Sat. 11-19-60

The action of the United States is being supplemented by Mexico, which has strengthened her air and sea patrols along her frontiers to prevent any attempt to stage an invasion of other Latin-American states from her own soil, from which Castro himself staged his invasion of Cuba. Mexico is also combing remote areas to keep them from being used as training grounds for Cuban guerrillas. Like action has been taken by Costa Rica.

p. 20

The American action is being denounced by both the Castro regime and Moscow as "Yankee intervention" and as an overture for an invasion of Cuba. But this action, which has not only been taken at the request of the threatened Governments but is also effective only in waters under their jurisdiction and against invasion from the outside, is wholly in keeping with the letter and spirit of all international law.

It is in keeping with the United Nations Charter, which specifically recognizes the "inherent right of individual or collective self-defense." It is in keeping with the Charter-authorized Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, which declares that "an armed attack by any state against an American state shall be considered as an attack against all American states." It is likewise in harmony with the Declaration of the Organization of American States, to which the United Nations has referred Cuban complaints, pledging the American states "to take the necessary measures to protect their political independence against the intervention of international communism, acting in the interest of an alien despotism."

Finally, it is in keeping with the Monroe Doctrine, which Premier Khrushchev pronounces dead but which President Eisenhower proclaims to be as valid as ever as part of the solemn agreements of the American community, and especially against a "Bolshevik doctrine" of Soviet support to any Communist movement anywhere.

This North American assistance to two American states is, of course, available to all American states at their request, and both Castro and Khrushchev should take notice.

Harlem Hotel Man Trying to Sell Fidel on U.S.

By DON OBERDORFER
Of Our Washington Bureau

NEW YORK — America's closest ambassador to Fidel Castro in this time of international peril is the aged Negro proprietor of the Hotel Theresa in Harlem.

Unhindered by any scrap of formal diplomatic training and unburdened by any presidential appointment, Love B. Woods may not conquer all — but he yet may find a way to get through to the mind of Cuba's frenetic dictator. At least, he is working at the job.

Until nightfall on Monday, Woods was living as quiet and obscure a life as is possible for the keeper of Harlem's largest hotel. He had tended it and help tame it in the years of its decline from the "swinging joint" of the old days of Joe Louis and Sugar Ray Robinson.

Fidel Castro's decision to descend changed his world in a twinkling. But Woods has seen too much of the world to be astonished or perturbed.

"We don't segregate at all here," the proprietor told Castro's advance agent. "We just expect people to be decent and honest and to pay their bills."

Now "over 65" (an obvious understatement) Woods went into the real estate business in Harlem and eventually owned the old Woodside Hotel. It was torn down in slum clearance and is survived now only by Count Basie's song, "Jumping at the Woodside." Then he took over the Theresa, which he may or may not own (he won't say.)

The first night Fidel was there Woods was summoned to the suite of the Cuban leader by one of the bearded lackeys. The two men sat on a bed in Castro's two-room suite and exchanged pleasantries and financial pledges for about 10 minutes.

Now Woods is planning to go back for a longer audience with his most unusual guest.

"I want to talk to him about his country and our country," he says in his direct but ingratiating way. "I'm not a diplomat and haven't been authorized to be a diplomat. But I want to ask him face-to-face if there is any great reason why we can't get together because they needs us and we needs them.

"We're not a selfish country like some say but most people are peaceful and kind and nice. I'd like to help see our young men aren't murdered in the army in this war foolishness," says Woods.

So far Fidel has been too busy with the likes of Khrushchev and Malcolm X, the leader of the "Hate-the-White" Negro Moslem movement here. Perhaps he'll get to Love B. Woods by and by.

Woods even does much of the cooking for Fidel and his party. While a Cuban henchman looks on to insure this gentle old man doesn't put cyanide in the soup, Woods meets the requirements of the handwritten menu order for Fidel — "Plenty of steaks, Spanish bread, chocolate ice cream, potatoes, different soup."

Castro, Khrushchev In Harlem Viewed As Anti-American Plot

Atlanta Daily World
Atlanta 3, Ga.

CHARLESTON, S. C. — Russian Premier Khrushchev's Harlem meeting with Cuban Premier Castro was termed as an attempt to make it appear that "Negroes of America are friendly to the communist conspirators." Sat. 9-24-60

In an address prepared for delivery before the North Carolina State Conference of NAACP Branches, Gloster B. Current, national director of NAACP branches, said "Negroes are not fooled by the communist."

Mr. Current added that "Negroes are known to be kind and gentle, long suffering and patient. They bear no malice toward democracy's enemies.

"Nor do they bear personal enmity to the foes of freedom such as Khrushchev and Castro." Mr. Current pointed out that the two foreign leaders are "merely using the color question to impugn democracy in the eyes of the world.

"They are attempting to call attention to the plight of Negroes in northern communities where housing is at a premium. That is why we continue to point out to Americans that the denying of civil rights in our nation, and especially in the south, harms our nation abroad. Two-thirds of the world is colored. "Many new nations are being admitted to the United Nations. They form a powerful voting bloc in that organization and will be convinced in the future, as we seek their support on world issues, by not only what they hear about America, but what they see happening in America," he concluded.

Castro Government Capitalizing On Reception In Harlem

By United Press International

HAVANA, Sept. 22.—Cuba made an all-out bid Thursday for American Negro support of the Fidel Castro revolutionary cause.

Plans for a "solidarity week with the Negro peoples of the United States" were cabled to Castro at his Harlem hotel in New York and the premier's sister-in-law denounced racial discrimination against the American Negro "imposed by United States financial oligarchies."

Vilma Espin, wife of Castro's brother, Raul, also cabled the thanks of the "Federation of Cuban Women" to the people of Harlem "for the warm reception" accorded Castro.

Mr. Roa

The government newspaper Revolucion gave prominent play to army chief Maj. Juan Almeida's trip to New York to join Castro's delegation to the United Nations and said Almeida, a Negro, "was given an ovation by thousands of Americans as he walked through Harlem."

The official news organ published a five-column photograph on the front page showing Foreign Minister Raul Roa eating breakfast at a Harlem cafeteria which, it said, "was reserved for colored people."

The government's campaign for a show of popular indignation over alleged shabby treatment of Castro in New York showed no signs of abating. Government offices said they are receiving hundreds of messages from union, student and other groups protesting Castro's treatment.

The government-controlled Cuban labor movement announced plans for a "mass rally without precedent" to welcome Castro on his return.

The official press generally ignored the fatal shooting of a Venezuelan child in a New York restaurant by pro-Castro followers Wednesday.

Propaganda, Say Some, while Others Approve

The Miami Herald Miami, Fla.

Harlemites' Feelings Mixed on Castro

NEW YORK — (UPI) — Some Harlem residents brushed off Cuban Premier Fidel Castro's move into their area as a propaganda stunt Thursday. Others praised it.

Sep 23-60

"He's a weak man and a damned big fool for moving up to Harlem," said Cab Driver Watson Roundtree.

A Negro member of New York's Board of Education, who asked that his name not be used, said that Castro's angry bolt from a midtown Manhattan hotel to Harlem's Hotel Theresa was an "excellent propaganda idea" but might react adversely on the Negro people living there.

"It's unfortunate as far as we're concerned because so many up here have been subjugated under economic pressures and this might influence them," he said.

Henry Brown, a jewelry salesman located around the corner from Castro's hotel, complained about business.

"It's hurt our business because the people who normally stop and look in our window have been kept moving by the [illegible] in the area," Brown said.

Joseph Rutherford, a barber, said that Castro's move was "one of the greatest things that has happened to Harlem."

Art Porter also praised the bearded Cuban leader.

"I felt he'd have more freedom and be better treated up here," Porter said.

R. Welch concurred in that opinion.

"I think he came up here to show that everyone has equal rights," Welch said.

Richard Hunter, who lives in Castro's hotel, said he thought the Cuban had made a big mistake.

"It's ridiculous that a big man like a premier would move to a lower-class hotel when he had something better downtown," Hunter said.

Reginald Moore dismissed the move as a "bit of propaganda."

"It's a propaganda move, I think," said John Barber. "He just wanted to see the reaction."

Another Negro who declined to give his name said that Castro's presence was a "good thing for the black people." A bystander added that Castro "probably thought he'd get a lot fewer boos up here."

Some Negroes appeared extremely sensitive to the situation. They turned away angrily when asked their opinion about Castro.

Girl, Shot By Pro-Castro Band, Dies Of Wounds

The Courier-Journal Louisville, Ky.

By The Associated Press

New York, Sept. 22.—A 9-year-old girl, a sight-seer from Venezuela, Thursday became the first victim of political terrorists who have scourged New York with the advent of the United Nations General Assembly. She died of a stray bullet's wound, inflicted during a restaurant brawl by pro-Castro Cuban hoodlums.

The child was Magdalina Urdaneto of Caracas, shot in the back as she lunched with her parents Wednesday in the El Prado Restaurant of Eighth Avenue in the 50's.

Castro Backers Invade Cafe

A gang of Castro sympathizers invaded the cafe to beat up a band of five demonstrators opposed to the Cuban regime of Prime Minister Fidel Castro, who is here for the U. N. meeting. Shots were fired by the pro-Castro group, who outnumbered their rivals 3 to 1.

Neither the Urdaneto girl nor her parents were in any way concerned in the melee. She was the innocent victim of a wild-shooting gunman. She died early Thursday in St. Clare's Hospital.

U. S. Expresses Regret

In Washington, the State Department expressed regret and deep sympathy to the girl's parents and to the Venezuelan Government.

Press officer Lincoln White called the child a victim of "an aggressive attack yesterday by adherents of the Fidel Castro regime in a public restaurant in New York City."

White added:

"This kind of criminal activity that resulted in the ruthless slaying of this innocent bystander will undobutedly shock people throughout the free world."

In Havana, Government-controlled newspapers claimed the restaurant invaders were anti-Castro members of the "White Rose" organization, rather than pro-Castro men.

Police Dispute Version

Police disputed this. Among the men attacked in the cafe were at least two exiles from Cuba, who came here from Miami to demonstrate against Castro.

MAGDALINA URDANETO
Was innocent victim

And a man arrested early Thursday and described as a member of the raiding party was quoted by police as admitting the invaders were pro-Castro. He is Santiago Larroque, who denied firing the gun.

A man with a hook in place of a missing hand was sought as the actual slayer of the Urdaneto girl.

After hurried trial—

American citizen is executed by Castro despite U. S. pleas

HAVANA, Oct. 13 —(AP)— A young American adventurer and 12 Cubans were executed today for plotting to overthrow Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

The American, first to be executed by the Castro regime, was Anthony Zarba of Somerville, Mass. He went before a firing squad in Santiago with seven Cuban companions. Havana radio stations reported five other Cubans were executed in Santa Clara.

Zarba and his companions had been convicted only hours before by a revolutionary military court of staging a Castro-style invasion to set up a guerilla front in Cuba.

The eight prisoners were led before four different firing squads near Santiago two at a time. The reports of the first rifles cracked down the San Juan Valley firing range at 4:50 a.m.

Havana radio stations said another firing squad in the provincial capital of Santa Clara, in Central Cuba, executed five insurgents captured in the Escambray Mountains. Two were reported to have been rebel leaders.

Radio Voz in Havana said the firing squads were composed of militiamen. The duty officer at Santa Clara military headquarters said he had no immediate information on executions there, but the government-controled stations usually are well informed.

The five executed at Santa Clara were identified in reports from there as Plinio Prieto and Sinesio Walsh, former officers under Castro and insurgent leaders; Porfirio Ramirez, ex-Batista army officer; Jose Palomino and Angel Rodriguez, accused of killing a Castro lieutenant in the mountains.

Today's executions brought to 574 the unofficial number cut down by firing squads since Castro took power in January, 1959.

THE U. S. EMBASSY said arrangements are being made to have Zarba's body sent to his sister, Mrs. Virginia McCrocklin, in Miami. The spokesmen said he did not know when arrangements for this would be completed.

ZARBA, a 27-year-old adventurer who landed on the Northeast coast of Cuba with a small party of invaders last week, was the first U. S. citizen to die before a Castro firing squad. Another American, Alan Robert Nye of Whiting, Ind., was given a death sentence last year for plotting to kill Castro, but the sentence was suspended and he was expelled from the country.

The U. S. Embassy appealed to Castro's government last night for a stay of execution and clemency for Zarba, but this apparently was ignored.

A five-man military tribunal sentenced Zarba and seven of his Cuban invasion companions to death last night after convicting them of landing with a 27-man group on the Northeast coast of Oriente Province last week. A military appeals court quickly rejected defense attorneys' appeals from the death penalty.

The execution site for Zarba and his companions was a firing range in San Juan Valley, in the shadow of San Juan Hill where Theodore Roosevelt and his Rough Riders made their historic charge.

ANOTHER AMERICAN, Richard Pecoraro of Staten Island, N. Y., was reported among 167 defendants in the Santa Clara mass trial sentenced to prison terms ranging from 20 to 30 years. The military tribunal sentenced two women in that trial to 15 years.

The 174 defendants in Santa Clara were captured during a week-end roundup of guerillas operating against Castro's forces in the Escambray Mountains.

Catholic youth organizations and women attempted to organize an anti-execution demonstration at one of Santa Clara's churches yesterday. But a mob of about 300, shouting "paredon" (to the execution wall), blocked the church entrance and dispersed the would-be demonstrators.

ANTHONY ZARBA
. . . Executed in Cuba

Two American newsmen, Robert Berrellez of the Associated Press and Wilson Hall of NBC, were detained by army intelligence agents as they watched the incident. They were held about three hours, then released without charges.

ZARBA TOLD the court during his one-day trial here that he was a member of the boat crew that landed the invaders. He said he was sorry he took part and that he tried to leave the expedition in the Bahamas. He said the party sailed from Miami, Fla., where he has a wife and child.

Altogether, 28 persons were tried here on charges of counter-revolutionary activity. Two were acquitted, 16 were sentenced to 30 years imprisonment, and two were given terms of 12 and 10 years.

All the defendants but seven were members of the invasion band. The government says that only five members of the band are still at large and that three of them are Americans. The leader was reported killed soon after the landing.

The trial at Santa Clara was the biggest since the Castro regime took over nearly two years ago.

Although the 174 defendants were supposed to have operated with the rebel bands roaming the Escambray Mountains, reliable sources said many of them were farmers and that not more than 15 actually bore arms against the Castro regime.

PECORARO, the American defendant, said he had come to Cuba just to see what was going on and got caught in the government roundup net.

He explained that a map of the Escambray Mountains was given to him by a travel agency, and that he had jotted down a list of insurgent leaders found on him out of "journalistic curiosity."

The government has not identified Pecoraro. But a New York City fireman by that name was fired from his job last month after overstaying a vacation in Cuba. He had been held for several weeks by Castro's forces, released without charges and told not to return to Cuba.

Five other U. S. citizens have been given jail sentences for anti-Castro activities. One of them, James Buchanan, a reporter for The Miami Herald, was given a suspended sentence and expelled from the country.

The others, still in prison, are Frank Austin Young, a Miami pilot; Peter John Lambton, a pilot of Philadelphia and Washington; John Martino, Miami and New York businessman, and Cuba-born Rafael Del Pino, who operated from Miami.

N.Y. ministers assail Castro's Harlem sortie

NEW YORK — The Baptist Ministers' Conference of Greater New York and Vicinity last week sent statements to national, United Nations, city and state officials deploring attempts of Fidel Castro to enroll the Harlem community in his "battle of ideologies."

In wires to President Eisenhower, Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold, Governor Rockefeller and Mayor Wagner, the conference said:

"The conference deplores and condemns any attempts by Fidel Castro to make the Harlem community a battleground for his ideologies and a cesspool for his doctrine of hate and greed."

Also attacked in the resolution unanimously adopted by the churchmen was Castro's alleged "importing of anti - U.S. agitators who have by their riotous actions brought discredit upon our community."

Signers of the statement include the Revs. S. B. Jourbert, president; Carl B. Taylor, chairman of the conference civic committee; David N. Licorish, A. A. Stanley, B. T. Mattox and Richard H. Dixon Jr.

The conference also sent a statement to President Eisenhower and Secretary Hammarskjold backing the Secretary's leadership of the UN and "deploring" the "Soviet tampering with the UN efforts for world peace."

Appeals To Higher Court Rejected In 15 Minutes; Fidel Blames 'Imperialists'

From Wire Dispatches

Havana, Oct. 16.—A Cuban Army firing squad executed two Americans Sunday after their speedy trial and conviction on charges of joining an armed revolt against Prime Minister Fidel Castro's regime.

One was a Texas-born adventurer, the other a former United States Marine who once fought in Castro's revolution.

They died before dawn on the San Juan firing range near the eastern city of Santiago, the second and third Americans executed by Cuba in three days.

Property Confiscated

The two condemned men were:

Allan Dale Thompson, 36, a native of Queen City, Tex., who recently worked in fishing camps around Mooringsport, La.

Robert O. Fuller, 25, whose father operated a big plantation in eastern Cuba for years and moved to Miami after Castro's Government confiscated the property.

After a swift trial, a five-man summary tribunal found them guilty and condemned them to die. Their appeals to a higher military court were rejected in 15 minutes.

Defends Executions

Fuller and Thompson were convicted Saturday of landing on Cuba's northeast coast with an invasion force of 27 men that set out from Miami, including Anthony Zarba, 27, Somerville, Mass., who was executed with seven Cuban insurgents at the same firing range Thursday.

The latest executions brought to 576 the unofficial total since Castro took power January 1, 1959.

As Thompson and Fuller stood before the court, Castro went on television to defend the revival of the firing squads, blaming it on "imperialists"—which means the United States in revolutionary lexicon.

Cubans' Lives Spared

Castro said the "imperialists" were sending mercenaries, and "if the revolution has to shoot criminals, the imperialists can be blamed."

The Cuban leader charged that all this fits into supposed imperialist plans because the executions are used as foreign propaganda against Cuba.

The Santiago court spared the lives of two Cuban members of the invading band, Juan Gonzalez and Angel Rivero. They were sentenced to 30 years in prison.

Jorge Pagliery, defense counsel for the Americans, made a futile appeal for their lives, based on the inequality of the sentences.

Declines To Testify

Thompson declined to testify in his own behalf.

Fuller, who said he served with the U. S. Marines in Korea for 11 months, told the court he joined the invaders because the Castro Government had taken over his father's ranch—"earned by the sweat of his brow and very honorably."

He testified that peasants aided the invaders after they landed, but he surrendered when he was surrounded by troops and civilian militiamen.

The condemned man's mother, Mrs. William O. Fuller, who remained in Cuba after the rest of the family went to Florida, attended the trial with an uncle and Harvey Summ, U. S. consul in Santiago.

Farewell Is Permitted

Mrs. Fuller, who was born in Massachusetts but has been in Cuba since childhood, lives in Holguin.

Mrs. Fuller was permitted a farewell meeting with her son at Puerto Bonia Prison around midnight Saturday.

A sister of Fuller, Frances, of Miami, had bad plane connections and reached Santiago too late for the trial and just an hour before the firing squad went into action. She was accompanied by another sister, Mrs. James Moss. The sisters were not allowed to bid their brother good-by.

Frances, discussing the last 5-minute meeting of mother and her doomed son, related:

"Bobby told mother not to cry, that he was calm and ready to take the last march to the grave. He said he was happy to die this way rather than to rot for 30 years in prison."

This was a reference to the terms given Gonzalez and Rivero.

A request by relatives and the consul for permission to take Fuller's body to Holguin for burial was turned down by Cuban authorities. Like Zarba, Fuller and Thompson were buried in a common grave and their bodies cannot be exhumed for two years.

Says Peasants Helped

Rivero also testified the invaders received help from peasants in an area where Castro's revolution flourished only two years ago. He told the court: "I came to combat communism in Cuba."

In his closing statement, Prosecutor David Diaz charged the United States was backing the invaders. He warned that future invaders "will bite the dust drenched in blood."

(The U. S. State Department has denied any connection with the invasion, which a spokesman in Washington said last week had "comic opera" aspects.)

Of the 27 men the Government said landed early this month, one was killed immediately, three Americans and seven Cubans have been executed, and 15 Cubans were jailed for 30 years.

Decision Due Tonight

Fuller testified that Paul Hughes, another American in the expedition, had returned to Florida aboard one of the invasion boats.

In Havana, the trial of Leslie Bradley, a pilot formerly of Minneapolis, and 12 others accused of fabricating a plot to invade Nicaragua to provoke charges against Castro, ended without a verdict. The court announced it will hand down a decision Monday night. The prosecution demanded 16 years in prison for Bradley.

Negro Sergeant Answers Castro

By FRANCIS L. McCARTHY
UPI Latin American News Editor

NEW YORK — (UPI) —This is a message to Fidel Castro from an American Negro serving in the Armed Forces of his country.

It is a message prompted by a Sept. 24 dispatch by a United Press International writer on Castro's campaign to wed the American Negro to his revolutionary cause.

The dispatch brought this reply from Sgt. John Lee Jackson of the 82nd Airborne Division (Headquarters Detachment, Signal Battalion), Ft. Bragg, N. C.:

'MY ARMY'

"I am a red-blooded American Negro serving in my country's—and I emphasize the word 'My'—Army . . .

"I can speak only as part of a racial group of which I am a minute part. . . .

"I think I speak for my people. . .

'FIRST HOME'

"This country is my first home for which I am prepared to give my life if need be. . .

"If Mr. Castro prefers communism he should limit it to his own people. . .if my country prefers not to accept this system, neither do I. . .

"Just because my (white) brothers and I fight does not mean we will welcome outside help to settle our internal problem. . .

'EFFORTS FRUITLESS'

"Let Mr. Castro understand his efforts are fruitless. . . If he thinks he can prevail upon the American Negro to accept his communistic ideas. . .

"Give Mr. Castro this message from an American Negro."

Cuba Seizes U. S. Oil Plant; Washington Files Protest, Flays Castro 'Half-Truths'

The Philadelphia Inquirer, Philadelphia, Pa., Thur. 6/30/60

HAVANA, June 29 (AP).—Prime Minister Fidel Castro seized one of the two American-owned oil refineries in Cuba Wednesday after bitterly telling a mass meeting he was ready to take over the property of all Americans in Cuba, "down to the nails in their shoes."

The seizure order against the Texaco Oil Co.'s $26,000,000 plant in Santiago followed refusal of three companies—two American and one Dutch-British—to process Russian crude oil bought from the Soviet Union with Cuban sugar.

BACKED BY WORKERS

Castro ordered his National Institute of Petroleum to intervene—a practice here equal to confiscation—the Texaco plant unless its operators accepted 25,000 barrels of Russian crude and processed it. Company officials had orders to refuse the Russian oil. Intervention, backed by armed workers-militiamen already in virtual control of the Santiago refinery, resulted.

SEIZE HAVANA OFFICE

Agents of Castro's Cuban Petroleum Institute took over the Havana headquarters of Texaco an hour later, it was reported. Presumably the seizure included Texaco's marketing organization in Cuba as well.

Castro, in his formal resolution, accused Texaco of violating a 1938 law which directs all refineries in Cuba to refine "state-owned oil at the orders of the Government."

SOVIET OIL 'CHEAPER'

The two other companies, Esso Standard of New Jersey and Shell Oil, said they had not been molested as yet.

The three companies have said they cannot process the Russian oil because they have obligations to their traditional suppliers, in this case Venezuela.

Castro contends he can buy Soviet crude oil for $1 a barrel under the Venezuelan price.

TANKS NEARLY EMPTY

The companies have a $75,000,000 investment in Cuba plus an estimated $60,000,000 in foreign exchange the Castro Government owes them for crude oil already imported and processed.

Petroleum sources here said Castro's seizure of the Texaco refinery may have resulted in part from the oil company's slowdown on imports of crude oil to the point where its storage tanks were virtually empty. This action resulted, officials said, from the Castro Government's refusal to release foreign exchange to pay for past oil imports.

U. S. EMBASSY SILENT

The U. S. Embassy had no comment on the seizure except to say the situation was being watched closely.

Castro called his ministers into an emergency session.

The seizure climaxed Castro's "considers the seizure of the Texaco facilities as another in the series of arbitrary and discriminatory actions" against U.S. firms in Cuba. Some 300 to 450 million dollars worth of U. S. property already has been seized.

FIRM'S EFFORTS NOTED

A department spokesman said the Texas Co. had made "great efforts" to adjust its operations to Cuban laws and also had poured millions of dollars into Cuba's economy.

"The Government of Cuba," he said, "has responded to efforts by the U. S. companies to serve that country by a naked seizure of property in contravention of the norms of conduct by responsible governments."

The document filed with the OAS committee said Cuban diplomats here and in Latin-America had spread "vicious" anti-U. S. propaganda in "an extraordinary extension of the diplomatic function."

NOT AN 'INDICTMENT'

The document was submitted for the "information" of the peace committee, which last year was instructed to make a long-range study of tension in the Caribbean.

The memorandum did not call for committee action, and officials said it was not an "indictment" in the formal sense of the word.

But it said Cuba, "far from seeking to ascertain facts, has preferred to exploit opportunities for exciting suspicion and hostility on the basis of unfounded charges, distortions and half-truths. A continuation of these attacks cannot fail . . . to contribute further to tensions in the Caribbean area."

Cuba Seizes U. S.-Owned Oil Refinery

WASHINGTON, June 29 (UPI). — The United States accused Cuba on Wednesday of trying to stir up hostility to Washington and denounced the regime of Premier Fidel Castro for seizing U. S.-owned oil properties.

The State Department first issued an 11-page document accusing the Castro Government of using "unfounded charges, distortions and half-truths" to raise anti-U. S. suspicion in the Americas.

The department later put out a separate statement calling Cuba's seizure of Texaco oil properties "arbitrary and discriminatory." It said Cuba's action was "in contravention of the norms of conduct by responsible governments."

SUGAR BILL SPEEDED

The statements came as Democratic Congressional leaders, responding to Administration pressure, put a "rush" label on legislation giving President Eisenhower authority to curtail imports of Cuban sugar.

Democratic Leader John W. McCormack (Mass.) announced that the sugar bill, drafted only last Monday by the House Agriculture Committee, would be called up for action Thursday. Passage seemed assured.

Castro has threatened that he would retaliate for any quota reduction by seizing U. S.-owned sugar mills and properties.

"Pound for pound, as they cut the quota, we will take their mills," Castro said.

'PROVOCATIVE' DRIVE SEEN

The first of the twin U. S. statements attacking Castro's regime was part of a memorandum filed Monday at a closed session of the Inter-American Peace Committee of the Organization of American States.

The document said that continuance of the Castro Government's "systematic and provocative" campaign would generate further tension in the Caribbean area and would undermine Latin-American friendship.

The State Department said Cuba's seizure of the Texaco properties would hurt "a sister American republic"—Venezuela. The Texas Co. has been importing oil from Venezuela and refining it in Cuba.

DEFIED HAVANA ORDER

The Texas Co. and two other firms which are threatened with seizure—Esso and British-Dutch Shell—have refused a Cuban Government order to refine Soviet oil imported into Cuba in exchange for sugar.

The State Department said most bitter attack on the United States yet. Americans who heard his 2¼-hour diatribe against the United States Tuesday night described it as "spiteful and deliberately insulting."

Hoarse with anger, Castro told his followers the United States was decadent and called the new sugar act now before Congress "immoral, stupid and criminal."

The bill would give President Eisenhower full authority to fix the amount of sugar Cuba may sell in the U. S. As Cuba receives two cents a pound above the world price for her quota, restriction would have economic repercussions.

Phila. Inq. 6/30/60

'WILL TAKE, TAKE, TAKE'

Meanwhile in Washington, the House Rules Committee Wednesday cleared the way for speedy action on the bill. Just when it will be put on the House calendar is to be determined by House leaders. Normally, a bill with approval of the leaders of both Houses can get through to passage in two days.

In his long and bitter anti-American attack Tuesday night, Castro warned that for every pound cut by the United States from Cuba's sugar quotas, his Government will take one of the 36 American-owned sugar mills here. The American mills, which produce a third of Cuba's sugar, are valued at from 100 to 200 million dollars.

'NOT UNSUSPECTED'

"We will take and take until not even the nails of their soles are left," Castro threatened to the thundering applause of an audience of sugar workers. "We will take penny by penny American investments until nothing is left."

As he spoke Castro already had signed the resolution directing the Cuban Institute of Petroleum to move the two barge loads of Russian oil to the Texaco refinery.

Texaco's general manager in Cuba, Clifford Drake, Jr., said Government interventors had taken over all company operations and resources on the island. One agent of the National Petroleum Institute was assigned to the refinery and another to the business and marketing headquarters here.

In New York, Augustus C. Long, Texaco board chairman, said business conditions in Cuba had become more and more intolerable and the seizure was not entirely unexpected.

He said no attempt had been made to determine the claim Texaco will have against the Cuban Government for the seizure but he estimated it at 50 million dollars.

DEMANDS 'ILLEGAL'

Much of the claim results, he said, from the failure of the Castro Government to provide the dollar exchange for Oil Texaco has imported into Cuba over the last 15 months.

Long denounced the Cuban request that Texaco purchase and refine Russian oil in Cuba as improper and illegal. He said Texaco never would have built the 20,000-barrel daily capacity refinery without assurance from the Cuban Government that it would continue to be permitted to refine its own oil. The Santiago refinery was built in 1955.

Pointing out that Texaco had operated in Cuba more than half a century, Long said, "During that time we have consistently tried to conform to all the laws of the country and to provide an ample supply of petroleum products to our many customers throughout the island."

Havana Students Seethe at Move To Nationalize the University

New York Herald Tribune N.Y., N.Y. P.1

Fri. 7/1/60

By Marguerite Higgins

WASHINGTON, June 30.—The first serious anti-Castro crisis has erupted among Cuba's student elite—a powerful political force—and reports reaching Washington warn of possible violence.

P.1

Despite the Cuban government's efforts to hush the situation, the State Department, it is learned, has reliable reports that classes have been suspended for three days in at least one branch of Havana University, that disorder is such that the suspension may have to be continued, and that rough tactics by Premier Fidel Castro's specially organized student-discipline squads have already resulted in a number of severe beatings.

The cause of the crisis, diplomate report, has been Dr. Castro's efforts to nationalize the university, thus depriving it of its traditional autonomy and self-government, which has heretofore permitted students in Cuba to proceed with their education despite dicatorships of Right or Left.

Present indications are, officials say, that up to 50 per cent of the student body and faculty of the University of Havana is opposed to Dr. Castro's efforts to destroy their traditional autonomy, authough, as in any rebellion the vocal anti-Castroites are few in number.

Since students at first were among Premier Castro's most enthusiastic supporters, the current disenchantment of a substantial number of young intellectuals is considered of great significance here, not only because of its impact within Cuba, where students are active politicians, but throughout Latin America. For it is in the universities that the Castro mystique has had the greatest penetration.

A trigger to anti-Castro feeling in Havana University was the appointment by the revolutionary government of a machine-gun-toting Cuban army major, Rolando Gubela, as "comandante of students."

His appointment was a sensation in itself, for by tradition no policeman or soldier may set foot on a university campus. Major Gubela added insult to injury when he began riding around the campus with a machine gun at the ready.

He managed to compound the resentment by requesting installation of a two-way radio in his car, explaining that re wanted to be able at all times to keep in touch with the police or army.

The anti-Castro student leaders have been labeled "bunchistas" (deriving from the English word "bunch"). Although many have gone underground, or abroad, the "bunchistas" have suffered casualties, so far minor, in pitcred battles with Dr. Castro's squads or in fist fights with pro-Castro comrades at the university.

The current suspension of classes affects the Havana University School of Engineering, where pro-Castro forces are trying to bring about the resignation of twenty-eight (out of a total faculty of thirty-seven) teachers who have opposed the current encroachments on university autonomy. The twenty-eight came under fire for publicly championing the cause of two other engineering teachers who resigned in protest against Dr. Castro's meddling in university affairs.

N.Y. Herald Tribune N.Y., N.Y.

Fri. 7/1/60

Informal sympathy boycotts of classes have been reported elsewhere in the university.

With the pro and anti-government units battling among themselves, there have already been a number of accompanying incidents such as the symbolic burning by Castro adherents of the Catholic newspaper "Trinchera." In predominantly Roman Catholic Cuba, this outraged not only students but their families.

The mystery here is why Premier Castro should alienate the very group of young students who were instinctively on his side. But unless he compromises and takes off the pressure in such places as the School of Engineering, it appears that trouble is ahead, trouble of his own making.

Seized Cuba Plant Using Red Oil

N.Y. Herald Tribune Fri. 7/1/60 P.5

Shell and Esso Expect To Be Taken Over Shortly

HAVANA, June 30 (AP).—The confiscated Texaco oil company refinery in Santiago began processing Russian crude oil today. The semi-offical newspaper "Revolucion" hailed the action as a sign the $25,000,000 plant is no longer foreign-owned.

N.Y. N.Y.

The probable next targets in Premier Fidel Castro's campaign against the United States and "foreign monopolies" are the $26,000,000 British-Dutch Shell Oil Co. refinery; the Esso Standard of New Jersey refinery; the Cuban Electric Co., the largest remaining American investment in Cuba, and the $125,000,000 Cuban Telephone Co., in which the American International Telephone and Telegraph Co owns 65 per cent of the stock.

Cuba Runs Phones

Castro officials have been in charge of Cuban Telephone since March, 1959, but have not officially taken over.

Executives of Esso and Shell, who followed Texaco's example in refusing to refine Russian crude, said it appeared a matter of days—perhaps hours—before their plants also would be seized by the Cuban Petroleum Institute.

Technically, the Cuban government "intervened" the Texaco properties yesterday for refusal to refine "state-owned oil." The government-controlled press made it clear intervention in this case meant confiscation.

Shell's parent holding company, Shell Oil of Canada, announced that a shipment of crude oil to Cuba had been suspended for non-payment and that Shell executives here had been ordered not to touch the Soviet oil Cuba obtained in a sugar-for-oil exchange.

Millions Owed

The Canadian firm said the Cuban government has not paid Shell for oil imports since May of last year and owes more than $17,000,000.

Esso Standard said it has an even larger backlog of payment claims for oil already processed and sold in Cuba.

The ousting last night, after a thirteen-hour Cabinet session, of Communications Minister Enrique Oltuski Osaqui and his replacement by a little-known but fiery revolutionist, Raul Curbelo Morales, appeared to signal a move against the $300,000,000 Cuban Electric Co., which furnishes 90 per cent of Cuba with electric power.

Company Explains

Mr. Oltuski had threatened Cuban Electric with intervention for failure to complete an expansion program. Company officials said the program had been curbed by a forced rate cut and poor collections from government agencies and communities served by the nrm, a subsidiary of the American Foreign Power Co. Sources here said the regime felt that Mr. Oltuski was not aggressive enough with Cuban Electric.

Premier Castro's sudden spurt of activity against the United States stems from his anger at the pending Congressional bill that would allow President Eisenhower to trim Cuba's quota of sugar sales to the United States. The United States now pays Cuba a premium above the world price of sugar of about $150,000,000 a year.

Dr. Castro has said he can purchase Soviet crude oil for a dollar a barrel less than the price for Venezuelan, the oil refined here by the American firms. American experts say the Russians lack the tankers to get their crude here.

Criticizes policy of U. S. press

MONROE, N.C. — Robert F. Williams, editor of the Crusader, a weekly newsletter published here, told of a verbal battle with an American reporter during his recent tour of Cuba. Williams wrote:

"I almost came to blows with an indignant racist white wire service reporter. He said I had no business talking about the race problem over here and that I should do my talking at home.

"He said that they had recorded my whole two hour television interview but they were not going to send any stories out on me because I attacked the Associated Press. . . ."

In an editorial written after he returned to the States, Williams said:

"One of the most tragic spectacles in America today is the farce of freedom of the press, America boasts to other countries that the its press is 'FREE' but the freedom only extends to facts that will glorify America in the eyes of the world.

"If someone dares speak the truth and that truth is not favorable to the capitalists, it is then labeled propaganda and immediately a 'black out' occurs. . . .

"The American racist dominated press is no more than a puppet in the hands of the "money lords of America."

* * *

IN A SPEECH before students and faculty members of the University of Orient in Santiago, Cuba, Williams said the struggle of Cuba is the same as that of peoples everywhere who desire to live in freedom and human dignity.

"The Cuban revolution has been repeatedly accused of being Communist-inspired, just as President Truman charged that the resistance to segregation in the South was Communist-inspired.

"However, neither he nor the State Department has been able to prove the ridiculous charge. White American officials really are incapable of believing that either the colored Americans or Cubans have enough human dignity to demand for themselves their own liberation."

Text of U. S. Protest to Cuba on Seizure of Plants

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 6—Following is the text of a note delivered today to the Cuban Ministry of Foreign Relations by the United States Ambassador, Philip W. Bonsal:

I have the honor to refer to the recent intervention and seizure by the Government of Cuba of the American-owned Texaco and Esso Standard Oil Company refineries in Cuba on the grounds that these companies, in refusing to refine crude oil not obtained from their own sources of supply, had violated Cuban law. The Government of the United States vigorously protests the actions of the Government of Cuba in issuing the orders to these companies to refine such crude oil and in intervening the companies thereafter.

The Government of the United States deems these actions to be arbitrary and inequitable, without authority under Cuban law, and contrary to commitments made to these companies. It is the earnest hope of the Government of the United States that the Government of Cuba will, in justice and equity, promptly reconsider and rescind the actions which it has taken against these American companies and permit them to continue to operate their businesses under fair and reasonable conditions.

As Your Excellency is aware, these two American-owned oil companies, in which thousands of investors have interests, have operated in Cuba for over fifty years as law-abiding entities and have made a valuable contribution to the growth and development of the Cuban economy. The modern refineries which have been seized represent the investment of many millions of dollars of new capital and reinvestment of earnings, and reflect responsible and careful planning for the future as well as the present fuel needs of Cuba. Moreover, despite the fact that the Government of Cuba has refused to release more than a small percentage of the dollars required to pay for the crude oil imported since the revolution, the companies, nevertheless, have continued voluntarily to provide crude oil by financing it on their own account, thus insuring normal supplies of petroleum products for the Cuban p...

$50,000,000 Owed

The backlog of dollar remittances due these companies is now in excess of $50,000,000 even though the Government of Cuba expressly undertook with these companies to provide payment on a more current basis. I must state to Your Excellency that, in viewing the history and record of these companies, and apart from legal considerations, my Government regards the actions taken against them as a violation of accepted standards of ethics and morality in the free world.

I have been informed of the assertion made to the companies by the president of the National Bank of Cuba, Dr. Ernesto Guevara, that the companies are legally obliged to refine petroleum from the U. S. S. R. as demanded by the Government of Cuba under the terms of the Mineral Fuel Law of 1938. I have also been informed of the threat made that these refineries would be seized if they failed to comply with the order to refine such petroleum. However, a careful reading of the whole of this law of 1938 and a review of experience in the years ensuing since its passage, make clearly evident that the article cited by Dr. Guevara was intended to apply solely to the refining of petroleum drawn from Cuban soil.

Refineries Held Exempt

The Government of the United States has noted, in any event, that the refineries which have been intervened and seized were constructed or enlarged under the provisions of the Law Decree No. 1758 of Nov. 2, 1954, which established a special, nonalterable twenty-year regime for the refineries qualifying under this law and expressly provided that such refineries were to be exclusively governed by its provisions. Your Excellency's attention is called to the fact that nowhere in these provisions or in the regulations issued thereunder is there any requirement that these refineries process Government crude oil of any kind.

Furthermore, events and circumstances leading to the passing of the law of 1954 and the construction of the Texaco refinery in 1957 and the enlargement of the re-fine... Esso Standard ...any in the same ... establish that such actions were undertaken with the understanding that the companies had the right to supply and refine their own crude oil. Otherwise, one of the principal purposes in the establishment and enlargement of their refineries would be defeated. In the view of the Government of the United States, therefore, the 1954 law constitutes a commitment to the companies binding on the Government of Cuba, and any order of the Government of Cuba such as was transmitted to them is inconsistent with the basic concept of the 1954 law and in breach of the Cuban Government's commitment to the companies.

Nor is there any legal basis in the Mineral Fuel Law of 1938 or in Law Decree No. 1758, or in any other Cuban law to our knowledge, for this act of intervention and seizure which has been perpetrated by officials of the Government of Cuba. Therefore, it is the opinion of the Government of the United States that this act is without sanction in Cuban law; that it constitutes a further breach of the Cuban Government's commitment to the refineries; and it is a violation of the operating rights of these companies as provided by Cuban law.

Even if the intervention were otherwise lawful, which the Government of the United States does not consider to be the case, it was clearly improper to use the intervention as a device to enforce compliance with an illegal order, and any subsequent intervention must be considered as tainted with illegality.

The Government of the United States cannot but feel, with profound regret, that the intervention and seizure of these refineries is further evidence and confirmation of a pattern of relentless economic aggression by the Government of Cuba against the United States and other countries designed to destroy Cuba's traditional investment and trade relations with the free world.

Cuba Will Return Rent On U. S. Base

Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky. Mon. 7/11/60, p1

Hints It May Seek Land Back: Castro Stricken, Misses Big Rally

From Wire Dispatches

Havana, July 10.—President Osvaldo Dorticos said Sunday night that Cuba would return to the United States the money paid recently for the annual rent on the U. S. Guantanamo Naval Base. He implied strongly that the United States would be asked to give up the base.

Dorticos spoke at a big Havana rally that Prime Minister Fidel Castro missed because of illness.

(The State Department in Washington declined immediate comment on the possibility that the United States might be asked to give up the big Guantanamo base.

10,000 At U. S. Base

(The Guantanamo Naval Base has a normal population of about 10,000 U. S. military personnel, their dependents, and Cuban employees. The Cuban employees have been estimated to number between 3,000 and 4,000.)

Dorticos brought up the subject of Guantanamo by declaring:

"Our fertile land is not payable in dollars. Our island and adjacent islands belong to the Cuban people and our land is not for rent or sale to foreigners."

He hen said the annual rental check would be returned. The United States has a perpetual lease on the Guantanamo base. Under a treaty signed in 1934 the United States is obligated to pay an annual rental of 2,000 gold dollars, the equivalent of $3,386.25, for the 45 square miles of land at the eastern tip of Cuba.

The $3,386.25 check was presented to the Cuban Government on June 23.

Aides Carried On

Castro is suffering from pneumonia and was forced to carried on for Castro with new hate-America attacks.

A dramatic announcement to the crowd milling around the plaza before the Presidential Palace that Castro was "slightly ill" with a "congested patch on the left lung" dampened the ardor of most of the people who were singing, dancing, and waving "Cuba yes, Yankee no" banners under the 90-degree sun.

The announcement said 33-year-old Fidel has been sick since Friday and would be under physicians' care for several weeks.

Havana looked like an armed camp as the Castro Government—bolstered by the Soviet Union's open support—rallied its followers. But instead of the 1,500,000 that had been urged to turn out, the crowd was estimated at little more than 100,000 at its peak.

Crowd Stops Laughter

More than 2 hours after the scheduled start of the rally, Education Minister Armando Hart announced that Castro would not attend because of a "slight illness."

"Let not the enemies of the revolution be inspired by this," Hart shouted. "It is only a slight illness."

Reading from a medical report he said was prepared by two army doctors, Hart said Castro first complained of chest pains Friday morning.

The Prime Minister made a television speech Friday night. He was examined by doctors Saturday morning and a "slight infection" of the left lung was disclosed, Hart said. The doctors recommended complete rest, he added.

It could not be learned immediately whether Castro was in a hospital or was resting at one of his several residences in Havana.

SUGAR IMPORTS HALTED

President's Move on Quota Is Awaited—Advisory Group Will Meet

Text of United States note is printed on Page 2.

By WILLIAM J. JORDEN

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 5—The United States filed a vigorous protest today with Cuba against her seizure of two United States-owned oil refineries.

The action was one of several during the day in the rising tension in relations between the two nations.

The Agriculture Department ordered a halt in any new imports of sugar from Cuba pending action by the President on a special bill that authorizes him to cut Cuba's quota in the United States market.

The State Department announced that the National Advisory Committee on Inter-American Affairs would meet tomorrow and Thursday. Informed sources said relations with Cuba would head the agenda.

A note delivered to the Ministry of Foreign Relations in Havana described the seizure of the refineries as illegal, arbitrary and unethical. It asked the Government of Premier Fidel Castro to rescind its action.

New Seizures Seen

There was litle hope in Washington that Cuban officials would reverse their action. The expectation was for more rather than less trouble with further seizures of property owned by foreigners.

The diplomatic protest resulted from the seizure last week of refineries owned by Texaco, Inc., and Esso (Cuba), Inc. Cuban authorities said they were taking control of the refineries because of the companies' refusal to process crude oil bought by Cuba from the Soviet Union.

A refinery owned by the Dutch-British Shell Oil Company was also taken over. Britain has protested this action.

The United Stataes note said Washington regarded the Cuban action as "arbitrary and inequitable, without authority under Cuban law, and contrary to commitments made to these companies."

Catholics In Havana Stage Rally

Cathedral Crowd Calls Out, 'Cuba Yes, Russia No'

By Robert Berrellez

HAVANA, July 17 (AP) High Mass at the Roman Catholic Cathedral of Havana turned into a spectacular anti-Comunist demonstration here today. Church goers poured into the ancient Cathedral's square shouting "Cuba yes, Russa, no."

A handful of Communist hecklers in the square had to be rescued by a police car. Men and women shouting "communism out" pounded on the sides of the car with fists and purses as it hurried away.

The Havana mass had been dedicated to "victims of Communist persecution" in the world. The sermon called on Roman Catholics to pray for deliverance from the evils of Communism. Hundreds were jammed into the Cathedral but many were unable to hear the sermon because the loud-speaker system broke down.

Cuba, in apparent policy shift, may take part in inter-American foreign ministers' meeting today to discuss Communist infiltration in Latin America. Page A8.

At the conclusion of the hymn, "Christ the King," the congregation erupted into a chorus of "Cuba si, Russia no." There was wild cheering and handclapping and many waved handkerchiefs. Some persons could be seen weeping.

The din caused Msgr. Eduardo Boza Masvidal, Bishop of Havana, to go back to the pulpit and wave the crowd to silence. He asked them to "go home and pray for our salvation."

As the Bishop finished, the crowd broke into the National Anthem and then spilled out into the square. There a handful of hecklers shouted the revolutionary chant: "Cuba si, Yankees no."

The hecklers were quickly surrounded by churchgoers but the police car popped up just in time.

Still the crowd remained in the square, shouting "communism out" at each passing car. The shouts were especially loud as buses passed, since the bus workers union is considered to have one of the heaviest Communist enrollments in Cuba.

(In Munich, Germany, it was reported that the Cuban Government is preventing Cuban Roman Catholics from attending the World Eucharistic Congress to be held in Munic July 31-Aug. 3. The Congress press office said that among the Catholics who wanted to attend was the Bishop Boza Masvidal, but the Cuban National Bank refused to exchange the Bishop's monew for foreign currency to cover costs of the trip.)

Cuban Fired From Job In Embassy

The Courier-Journal, Louisville, Ky.

U. S. Suspects Others In Havana Office

By TAD SZULC

© New York Times News Service

Miami, July 19.—At least one Cuban employee of the United States Embassy in Havana was fired last week on strong suspicion that she acted as an informer for the secret service of the regime of Premier Fidel Castro.

There are additional suspicious that several other Embassy employees may be in close contact with D.I.E.R.—Department of Investigation of the Rebel Army—the military intelligence service of Cuba.

None of these persons hold sensitive positions. They work as secretaries or clerks dealing with unclassified information.

The woman employee who was dismissed last week was in a position, however, to keep close track of visitors to the Embassy from a vantage spot on the ground floor where her desk was located.

Police Activity Increases

While Embassy officials are convinced that the overwhelming majority of its Cuban workers are completely loyal, they have reason to be believe that D.I.E.R. has succeeded in planting a few agents or informers in the building.

The discovery that at least one Embassy worker was passing on information to D.I.E.R. coincided with a visible increase in recent weeks of police activities, both in relation to Americans in Havana and to Cubans in general.

Embassy Officials Trailed

Since last week, a white-and-green revolutionary police squad car has been ostentatiously parked all day long at the curb in front of the Embassy o racross the parking lot. Its three occupants apparently are keeping an eye on visitors.

Simultaneously, several Embassy officials and most of the U. S. newsmen in Havana found out that they were being closely followed by D.I.E.R. cars whenever they were driving. The unmarked vehicles make no effort to be inconspicuous.

Arrest of newsmen by D.I.E.R. has become almost commonplace. Six of them were detained for periods of time varying from 45 minutes to three days within the past six weeks.

I was released about 1 a.m. Tuesday after being held for 12 hours, first at the D.I.E.R. airport office, then at the headquarters in a villa on Havana's fashionable Fifth Avenue.

I was arrested at the Havana airport while preparing to board a plane for Miami, searched, then driven to headquarters in a secret-service car escorted by a plain-clothes man with a submachine gun and another with side arms.

Had To Sign Document

The release came as unexpectedly as the arrest. I had to sign a document recognizing that "charges against me were not proven," and no further obstacles were placed in my way boarding a flight to Miami. The charges were never revealed.

Sitting first at the airport D.I.E.R. office and then in the waiting room at the headquarters building, I was given ample insight into the secret-service techniques.

Throughout the afternoon and the night, scores of agents—most of them in their late teens or early 20's—reported with prisoners or to receive instructions from the "officer of the guard." At times the small office was crowded with agents and prisoners.

Patrols Sent Out

In dealing with prisoners, the D.I.E.R. agents practiced ticy politeness. The prisoners were booked, deprived of belts, shoelaces, and contents of their pockets—these were placed in envelopes kept in a safe—and marched away to cells in the back section of the D.I.E.R. headquarters.

Monday night was a particularly active night at the headquarters villa. There had been anti-Communist demonstrations at churches at noon and again in the evening, and patrols of secret-service agents, sometimes reinforced by uniformed and heavily armed policemen, were being constantly sent out to round up the demonstrators.

In the raids earlier in the day, the military-intelligence agents were able to seize arms and military equipment. On the floor of the waiting room were cardboard containers full of dynamite blasting caps, rifle ammunition, and alongside, large paper bags filled with large daggers and revolvers.

At the airport D.I.E.R. office, the main concern seemed to be with pilots of Cuban airlines suspected of plans to hijack planes and take them to exile in Miami or Jamaica. The last incident of this kind took place Sunday.

At the tiny office, soldiers and plainclothes men were being assigned to domestic flights of the Cubana Airlines with orders to sit in the cabin and keep an eye on the pilots, in case they should attempt to fly out of Cuba.

It is understood that armed plain-clothes men are assigned to Cuban aircraft flying to the United States and elsewhere.

Causes Nervousness

The reports that most of Cubana pilots are foes of the regime and are awaiting an opportunity to hijack their planes have caused noticeable nervousness among the security forces.

The secret service employs a large number of young women and, apparently, the patrols are made up of young men and women who pose as simply young couples out for an evening stroll, then mixing with people at restaurants and elsewhere who may be engaged in subervise conversations or other activities.

The number of persons employed by D.I.E.R. is believed to range into thousands, supported by great numbers of people acting as volunteer informers.

Professor Seized By Cuban Police

Havana, July 19 (AP) —Cuban National Police announced Tuesday the arrest of Gaston Fernandez, 37, professor of economy at Havana's Villanueva University, for counter-revolutionary activities.

They said he was preparing pamphlets against the Government of Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

Text of the U. S. Protest Note to Cuba

The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 4—Following is the text of an aide memoire delivered to the Foreign Ministry of Cuba by the United States Ambassador Philip W. Bonsal:

In view of the campaign of slander being directed against the United States by representatives of the Government of Cuba, including the Prime Minister and the President during the latter's present visit to certain countries in Latin America, the United States desires to set the record straight with respect to its efforts to maintain its traditionally friendly relations with the people of Cuba and to make clear to everyone the nature of the response which has been received from the Government of Cuba.

1. President Dorticós, when recently in Montevideo, expressed a desire to end campaigns of "lie and deceit," yet at the same time announced that properties of United States citizens in Cuba had not been "confiscated" but had actually been "expropriated" and their owners reimbursed for such properties. In fact, however, to our knowledge not a single American property owner has been reimbursed for the lands taken from him.

Cooperation Is Cited

2. The United States has a long record of cooperation with countries seeking to carry out sound policies of agrarian reform and in various official communications to the Government of Cuba over the past year it has voiced its sympathy with the legitimate aspirations of the Cuban revolution. On Jan. 26, 1960, the President of the United States made special reference to this point in his statement on United States-Cuban relations. The United States Government, however, cannot but protest in the strongest way the utter disregard for international and Cuban law with which American property owners in Cuba have been treated since the enactment of the Agrarian Reform Law of June 3, 1959. Property has been confiscated, expropriated or intervened, frequently without receipt, and the owners, many of whom have made substantial contributions to Cuban national development, have physically been expelled from their lands. Individually owned properties as well as large corporations with thousands of small stockholders, both Cuban and American, have been subjected to arbitrary intervention and control by the Government of Cuba, which has resulted in a tremendous loss in capital values and the destruction of vital credit standings.

3. Payments due to American exporters for good shipped to Cuba in good faith over the past year have accumulated to over $100,000,000 although in the same period dollar exchange has been found by the Government of Cuba to purchase armament worth tens of millions of dollars and to increase total dollar reserves.

Gueuara Stand Questioned

4. On April 11, 1960, this Government asked the Government of Cuba if the views expressed by Dr. Ernest Guevara, president of the National Bank of Cuba, on March 2, 1960, with regard to United States-Cuban economic relations, represented the official position of that Government. Among other things, Dr. Guevara had asserted that the representatives of the (American) sugar companies are trying to show that by selling to another country (U. S. S. R.) we are enslaving ourselves, and they have never stopped to analyze what amount of slavery the 3,000,000 tons of our sugar which we customarily sell at preferential prices to the giant of the North has meant and means for the people of Cuba." To date no reply has been received from the Cuban Government.

5. The Prime Minister of Cuba recently charged the United States Government with a desire to cause serious harm to Cuba because of its decision to terminate in an orderly manner the United States program which has been providing technical assistance to Cuba for over eight years. With regret it must be stated that this absurd charge cannot be dismissed as an inadvertent or ill-considered remark which has no place in the reality of present Cuban policy toward the United States. For many months the United States Government has watched the development by the Government of Cuba of a calculated campaign to misrepresent and denigrate the special economic relationships between our two countries which have worked to the mutual benefit of both peoples for over fifty years.

The Government and people of the United States emphatically reject the theme often repeated by various high officials of the Government of Cuba that the close economic association between our two countries has worked to the detriment of the Cuban economy and well being. On the contrary, we believe that this association has made constructive ocntributions to the over-all developemnt of Cuba.

Flights Are Noted

7. With regard to the unauthorized flights over the territory of Cuba there is evidence that certain Cuban officials, far from cooperating with the United States to prevent them, have conspired and convied in the violation of United States laws and regulations designed to protect Cuba from such incursions.

8. The United States Government told the Cuban Government on March 7, 1960, that is vigorously rejected and protested the unfounded and irersponsible implication voiced by the Prime Minister, of United States responsibility for the unfortunate explosion of the ship, La Coubre, in Habana harbor on March 4, 1960. Notwithstanding this, and in the absence of any evidence to support this charge, the Cuban Government has recently distributed a pamphlet imputing the responsibility to the United States Government for this tragedy, an act which this Government finds to be offensive.

9. On May 14, after the Cuban Prime Minister had boasted that a Cuban patrol boat had fired upon a United States submarine and pursued it for thirty miles, the United States requested of the Cuban Government an explanation for this unprovoked attack on a United States vessel while on the high seas. At the same time our Government vigorously rejected the false allegation of the Cuban Prime Minister that the submarine had been within Cuban territorial waters. No reply to this representation has been received from the Cuban Government.

These are some illustrations of the unwarranted campaign against the United States with which the present Cuban regime seeks to sow distrust and animosity, despite its prostestations that it seeks friendship and understanding. An intense official campaign of slander like this does not promote the climate of economic cooperation and peaceful development which the people of the United States, like those of all this hemisphere certainly seek.

U. S. Negro Leader Praises Cuba Revolutionary Schools

Pittsburgh Courier, Pittsburgh, Pa, Sat. 7/2/60 p. 7

HAVANA, Cuba—An American Negro leader praised the schools of revolutionary Cuba and urged white Americans to follow Cuba's educational leadership in providing all children, no matter what their race, with "democratic, integrated education."

Robert F. Williams, a local leader of the NAACP, said he had sought in vain for more than three years to have his two children—Robert F. Jr., age 12, and John C., age 10—transferred from inferior desegregated schools in Monroe, N.C., to "what is now designated as a white school."

Williams, who is now touring Cuba, told newsmen in Havana that on June 9, he and his wife, Mabel, "asked the racist white school board of Monroe, N.C., to offer our sons the same American education offered white children."

He added, "However, we have very little hope that democracy and justice will be extended our children by the so-called white Christian gentlemen of the alleged free world."

"Since coming to Cuba," Williams said, "and having seen the astounding emphasis placed upon democratic, integrated education for all people, I cannot help but question the right of the American South to remain in the fellowship of civilized society.

"Because of my indoctrination by the American Jim Crow educational system, I had no concept of how much a government can do for the education of the poor until I saw the work of Cuba's Revolutionary Government in the public schools and at Ciudad Liberated," he said.

Cuba Processing Soviet Crude Oil In Texaco's Plant

Shell Retaliates

Other Foreign-Owned Power, Petroleum Facilities May Be Confiscated

By HAROLD K. MILKS
Associated Press Staff

HAVANA, June 30.—The confiscated Texaco Oil Co. refinery in Santiago de Cuba began processing Russian crude oil Thursday. The semiofficial newspaper Revolucion hailed the action as a sign the 25 million dollar plant is no longer foreign-owned.

Probable next targets of Prime Minister Fidel Castro's campaign against the United States and "foreign monopolies" are the 26 million dollar British-Dutch Shell Oil Co. refinery; the Esso Standard of New Jersey refinery; the Cuban Electric Co., largest remaining American investment in Cuba; and the 125 million dollar Cuban Telephone Co. in which the United States International Telephone and Telegraph Co. owns 65 per cent of the stock.

Castro officials have been in charge of Cuban Telephone since March, 1959, but have not officially taken over.

Other Seizures Imminent

Executives of Esso and Shell, who followed Texaco's example in refusing to refine Russian crude, said it appeared a matter of days—perhaps hours—before their plants also would be seized by the Cuban Petroleum Institute.

Technically, the Cuban government "intervened" the Texaco properties for refusal to refine "state-owned oil." The government-controlled press made it clear intervention in this case meant confiscation.

Shell's parent holding company, Shell Oil of Canada, announced that a shipment of crude oil to Cuba had been suspended for nonpayment and that Shell executives here had been ordered not to touch the Soviet oil Cuba obtained in a sugar-for-oil exchange.

The Canadian firm said the Cuban government has not paid Shell for oil imports since May of last year and owes more than 17 million dollars. Esso Standard said it has an even larger backlog of payment claims for oil already processed and sold in Cuba.

Wednesday night's ouster, after a 13-hour cabinet session, of Communication Minister Enrique Otulski Ozacki and his replacement by a little known but fiery revolutionist, Raul Curbelo Morales, appeared to signal a move against the 300 million dollar Cuban Electric Company.

Takeover Threatened

Otulski had threatened Cuban Electric with intervention for failure to complete an expansion program. Company officials said the program had been curbed by a forced rate cut and poor collections from government agencies and communities served by the firm, a subsidiary of the American Foreign Power Co. Sources here said the regime felt Otulski was not aggressive enough with Cuban Electric.

Castro's sudden spurt of activity against the United States stems from his anger at the pending United States congressional bill that would allow the President to trim Cuba's quota of sugar sales to the United States. The United States now pays Cuba a premium above the world price of sugar of about 150 million dollars per year.

Cuba Union Attacks U.S. Sugar Law

Atlanta, Ga.
Mon. 7/4/60

HAVANA (UPI — The half-million-member Sugarworkers Union dominated by Fidel Castro supporters Sunday took U. S. Senate passage of new "imperialist" sugar law as the signal for mass demonstrations against America.

Observers here said Premier Castro and his government aides would have been disappointed if the Senate had failed to pass the bill granting President Eisenhower power to curtail or stop marketing of Cuban sugar in the United States simply because the Castro-ites have made such an issue of the sugar bill.

THREATENED SEIZURE

Castro already has threatened economic retaliation by seizure of more American-owned property in Cuba.

Sunday, his government "intervened" and took over the independent Progreso Radio. The government charged the station had labor difficulties.

Conrado Becquer, head of the sugar workers, called for a mass meeting outside the presidential palace, but set no date. However, union officials said demonstrations would start next week.

'DAGGER LAW'

Castro supporters denounced the sugar bill as the work of "imperialists" and charged it was "dagger law" designed to bring Cuba to its knees.

"We know very well the next months will be decisive as the State Department files the blade on the dagger with which they plan to destroy us," said the government newspaper El Mundo Sunday.

"But we will take precautionary measures and the people will stand like a monolith, unmovable and serene, giving an example to the world of how a small nation aided by right and reason can resist the pressures of a colossus," the paper said.

As the U. S.-Cuban economic quarrel deepened, Castro turned more to the Red bloc for trade.

Radio Moscow reported Soviet tankers carrying thousands of tons of crude oil for Cuba have sailed from Odessa to supply the Esso, Shell and Texaco refineries seized by Castro last week.

HAVANA REJECTS SEIZURE PROTEST

Says U. S. Used Refineries in 'Economic Aggression' —Cultural Center Mobbed

By R. HART PHILLIPS
Special to The New York Times.

HAVANA, July 8 — Cuba categorically rejected today a United States protest against seizure of the Esso (Cuba), Inc. and Texaco, Inc., refineries in Cuba. Cuba accused the United States of using these companies in its plan of "economic aggression" against her.

The Texaco refinery was seized June 24 and the Esso plant, owned by a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company (New Jersey), together with a British-owned Royal Dutch-Shell Group. The plants had refused to refine Soviet crude oil. This oil is being bought under the Cuba-Soviet trade agreement last February.

The rejection of the United States protest was contained in a long note from Foreign Minister Ambassador, Philip W. Bonsal. It was made public this morning.

Provocation is Charged

Dr. Roa termed the refusal to refine Soviet oil a "coldly calculated international provocation" aimed at returning Cuba to colonial dependence on the United States.

He said the special powers to reduce the Cuban sugar quota obtained by President Eisenhower "through shameful pressure on the United States Congress" showed "the roots and the aims of that provocation."

The "accusation of implacable economic aggression," which the Cuban note said the United States had made in its protest, was "energetically rejected" as "false, hypocritical and malevolent."

Dr. Roa went on to charge that the United States protest came at a time when "justly indignant world opinion is mobilizing against the insolent economic aggression, plotted, organized and carried out against Cuba by the Government of the United States."

The note voiced particular indignation over the fact that the United States had questioned the legality of the legislation under which the refineries were seized.

"It is an opportune moment," Dr. Roa said, "if the Government of Your Excellency does not yet realize it, to reiterate that the legality of the acts of the free, independent and sovereign Government of Cuba can be judged only by the Government itself or the Cuban courts of justice and not by a foreign embassy."

Meanwhile, the first big demonstration against an official United States organization occurred in Santa Clara, capital of Las Villas Province, last evening. About 300 high school students staged a demonstration in front of the United States cultural center there.

John Rock, director of the center, said the demonstration started at 6:30 P. M. Students surrounded the center, which is two blocks from the central plaza of the city.

Sound trucks broadcast tirades against the United States. Many students carried banners bearing slogans against "Yankee imperialism." A large cloth sign reading "Cuba Yes, Yankees No," was put across the face of the building. There was no violence.

Cuba Is Not Red

The Omaha Sun
Sat. 7/23/60

The newest cold war is between the United States and Cuba.

We have grown accustomed to daily dispatches in which Khruschev insults Eisenhower.

As to whether Cuba is going Communist or not we shall need to take many of the daily press dispatches iwith a grain of salt.

Just because Cuba doesn't like us, doesn't warrant our attempt to paint them with a Communist brush.

Remember the White Citizen Councils and the Seggies charges that the NAACP is Communist, when it isn't.

* * *

CUBA IS undergoing a social revolution.

Heretofore, its economy has been dominated by big business in the United States. Our oil companies, banks, sugar and insurance companies alone have a billion dollars invested in Cuba, which they dislike losing.

The revolution in Cuba is designed to bring the big profits of U.S. firms in Cuba to Cubans.

So Cuba will likely take over its sugar plantations and its oil refineries in the same way Mexico gobbled up its oil fields from U.S. business men and Egypt reclaimed the Suez Canal from the British and French.

* * *

THE OPERATION may be painful for us, but William Worthy, who has looked at a dozen Communist countries reports in the AFRO Magazine section this week two things:

1. The Cuban people are with Castro 93 per cent;
2. If there is Communism in Cuba, it bears no resemblance whatsoever to the kind he found in Red China, Russia, Poland, Yugoslavia and Hungary.

Ike's Letter Hits Castro's Betrayal Of Equal Rights

Montgomery, Ala.

Sat. 4-9-60

WASHINGTON (AP)—President Eisenhower accused the Cuban government of Prime Minister Fidel Castrol Friday of betrayal of the ideals of freedom and equal rights under law.

"Unfortunately, recent incidents in Cuba make it quite clear that it is dangerous for anyone there to voice opinions which do not conform with government policy," he said.

Eisenhower expressed his view in a lengthy letter to Chilean students who criticized U. S. policies during his visit to Santiago March 1.

Eisenhower's letter will be conveyed by Ambassador Walter Howe to the president of the Federation of Chilean Students.

The 14-page document was made public at the State Department which said Eisenhower personally worked on drafting it.

The President reaffirmed the standing policy of not interfering in Cuban internal affairs, and he said no official in his administration has ever made public statements or committed acts unfriendly toward Cuba or its people.

"It is regretted that the same cannot be said for the leaders of the Cuban government who seem to have intentionally made derogatory and most hostile statements regarding the United States government and people, designed to disrupt our traditionally amicable relations," he added.

Developments in Cuba, he said, are causing concern throughout the American hemisphere.

"In all candor," the letter continued, "I must state that many long time friends of Cuba in the United States and elsewhere in the hemisphere who were heartened by the ideals expressed by the present leaders of Cuba when they assumed control of the government have been gravely disillusioned by what is coming to be considered a betrayal of these ideals in such matters as freedom of expression, equal protection of the laws, and the right freely to choose a representative government."

The document is a rather unusual one from a diplomatic standpoint, but the background is this:

While Eisenhower was in Chile, there were criticisms by the Chilean students of U. S. policy toward Cuba. Eisenhower replied in a speech to some of the criticism, saying much of it was based on misunderstanding of U. S. policy. He promised a fuller reply in writing.

The State Department in making public the letter said it in effect was Eisenhower's reply but would carry Ambassador Howe's signature as delivered to Patricio Fernandez, president of the Chilean Student Federation.

The Chilean students, among other things, charged the Eisenhower administration with paying lip service to many inter-American principles, holding back on economic aid, deliberately keeping down prices of Latin-American raw materials, and supporting dictatorshipa.

In reply, Eisenhower emphasized U.S. readiness to hel, Latin-American nations improve living standards, citing the record of government and private loans as well as moves to stabilize the price of raw materials.

As for dictators, Eisenhower said North Americans are so dedicated to freedom that they were repelled by the tyrannical abuse of power by governmental leaders whether Communit or right wing.

"We shall continue to favor any approach to the reduction and elimination of antidemocratic governmental practics which has a real prospect of success," he declared.

But, Eisenhower cautioned, it would be foolhardy "to become so obsessed with the destruction of undemocratic regimes" as to embark on actions which might lead to chaos, anarchy and a new but even more dangerous tyranny.

Cuba Arrests 16 Pilots in Its Air Force

The N.Y. Herald Tribune

Thurs. 6/2/60

Anti-Communist Plot Factor in Detentions

HAVANA, June 1 (AP).—At least sixteen Cuban Force pilots are under detention in a round-up of military personnel by officials loyal to Prime Minister Fidel Castro, informed sources said today.

These sources said the arrests began May 27 on the personal orders of Armed Forces Minister Raul Castro.

The arrests resulted from the discovery of an anti-Communist and counterrevolutionary plot among Air Force personnel. Detentions are continuing.

Report No Information

The armed forces press bureau said it had no information on such a roundup. It would practically ground Cuba's Air Force.

The sources gave the following account:

Among those detained were the commander of Cuba's main Cuban Air Force base, San Antonio de los Banos, his adjutant, his aid, his operations officer, and the commanding officer of Cuba's only jet squadron. Nine of the pilots detained are qualified to fly jets.

The prisoners were removed from Havana and taken either to Santiago de Cuba or to the old Minas del Frio military base in Oriente Province to avoid demonstrations by friends or relatives.

"General Unreliability"

One source said the pilots' position on communism and their "general unreliability" toward the Castro regime were factors in their detention.

There also were reports, which could not be confirmed, of numerous arrests among military personnel in Matanzas and Camaguey. Neither the Armed Forces press bureau nor ranking Castro officials would comment.

Military investigators announced the arrest of four men and a woman on a charge of shooting up the front of a building housing the semiofficial newspaper "Revolucion."

The five were described as members of the "Organizacion Occidental anti-Comunista"—organization of Western anti-communists—a splinter group opposing Prime Minister Fidel Castro.

Tighten Monetary Controls

HAVANA, June 1 (UPI).—Cuba tightened monetary controls today in an apparent effort to halt the galloping black market in United States dollars.

A 16,000-word decree issued by the Monetary Stabilization Fund justified the new controls. It stated the tourist trade is not complying with existing regulations "causing grave damage to the national economy."

As a result of this non-compliance with present regulations, the communique said, a new "vigilance and inspection" system is to be established to enforce currency controls as they apply to non-residents.

Pressure on Tourists

Net effect of the new regulations is to increase the pressure on tourists to convert their dollars into Cuban pesos immediately on arrival. The peso is on a par with the dollar within Cuba but sells at discounts ranging to as much as 50 per cent in outside money markets.

The new measure also will require hotels to force their guests to pay bills in Cuban currency and with pesos shown to be derived from dollar exchange with the Cuban National Bank. The peso must be kept at a par with the dollar in all transactions. The current black market exchange is said to be three pesos to every two dollars where small amounts are involved.

U.S. Expects Castro Move On Property

Thur. 7/7/60

Montgomery Ala.

HAVANA (AP)—Drastic retaliatory action by Prime Minister Fidel Castro's government was expected Wednesday night or Friday as a result of Washington's slash in Cuba's 1960 sugar quota.

All American property in Cuba is subject to expropriation under a new "law of national defense" approved early Wednesday by Castro's Cabinet.

The measure sent American businessmen flocking to the U.S. Embassy here denouncing the move to expropriate their property as blackmail and asking for help.

Just where among the vast American holdings here Castro might hit was a subject of conjecture. Most likely targets include the 300-million-dollar Cuban Electric Co., which is half American owned, and 26 American-owned sugar mills representing an investment of more than 100 million dollars.

WAIT FOR WORST

Hours after President Eisenhower's announcement in Washington of the quota cut there was still no reaction in government quarters here. There was no unusual activity around the presidential palace. Castro's whereabouts were not known.

But an air of expectancy hovered over the offices of American business firms and there was a stir in local sugar circles. One American company official asked for reaction, replied: "There is nothing, absoutely nothing to say now. All we can do is wait for the worst."

Door Shut On Sugar From Cuba

Eisenhower Strikes At Major Source Of Island Income

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Eisenhower Wednesday ordered an end to virtually all further U.S. buying of sugar from Cuba this year. He accused the Castro regime of deliberate hostility toward the United States.

Eisenhower's action, a switch from the unsuccessful U.S. policy of restraint followed toward Fidel Castro since the bearded anti-American revolutionary came to power one and a half years ago, could cost Cuban sugar growers an estimated 35 to 85 million dollars.

White House press secretary James C. Hagerty announced the President at 3:25 p.m. signed the new bill allowing a Cuban sugar cut. Immediately upon signing the bill into law, Eisenhower issued his order and also a public statement.

QUOTA CHOPPED

Eisenhower chopped 700,000 tons from Cuba's 1960 sugar quota of 3,119,655 tons. Since Cuba has already shipped most of her 1960 sugar to the United States, the Eisenhower order allows only 39,752 tons more to be brought in this year.

Also, the bill signed into law erases a potential additional amount of 156,000 tons which Cuba might have been able to send in this year under the previous sugar act, sugar authorities said. This tonnage may be supplied by mainland producers.

U.S. sugar purchases are a boon to foreign growers because Uncle Sam pays far above the world market price. On a total loss of 856,000 tons in sales to the United States, Cuban growers could suffer a possible 85-million-dollar setback if they cannot dispose of their produce elsewhere. The U.S. subsidy alone on the 700,000 tons would have been worth some 35 million dollars.

NEARLY ONE-THIRD

Eisenhower, in explaining his action, noted that nearly one-third of America's nine million tons annual consumption of sugar comes from Cuba, who sells half her sugar output to the United States.

"Despite every effort on our part to maintain traditionally friendly relations," Eisenhower said, "the government of Cuba is now following a course which raises serious question as to whether the United States can, in the long run, continue to rely upon that country for such large quantities of sugar.

"I believe that we would fail in our obligation to our people if we did not take steps to reduce our reliance for a major food product upon a nation which has embarked upon a deliberate policy of hostility toward the United States."

UNCERTAIN FUTURE

Eisenhower declared that Cuba's big sugar barter deals with Russia and other Communist countries make it even more uncertain that Cuba will be able to meet U.S. needs in the future.

"It has been with the most genuine regret that this government has been compelled to alter the heretofore mutually beneficial sugar trade between the United States and Cuba," he said.

Eisenhower noted that until now the Cuban people—especially those who work in cane fields and mills—have benefitted from the U.S. market. He looked forward to a better day when, as he put it, the Cuban government will once again allow friendship to prevail between the two countries.

Castro offers 'paradise'—

Cuba making pitch for U. S. Negro support

BY HAROLD K. MILKS

HAVANA, July 7—(AP)—The Fidel Castro regime is conducting a campaign for support among U. S. Negroes.

While deriding the American government, Castro's supporters are avidly seeking the favor and help of Negroes.

The government is bombarding American Negroes with massive doses of propaganda and inviting them to visit this "Negro paradise."

ALMOST WEEKLY delegations of Negroes from the United States are brought to Cuba to see for themselves what the Cuban government says is the "true picture" of revolutionary Cuba. Many travel at Cuban expense.

Last year Joe Louis and a public relations firm were given a contract to popularize Cuba among Negroes in the United States.

More recently Negro members of the U. S. national "Committee for Fair Play for Cuba" have picked up the ball.

Two active members of the committee, Robert F. Williams of Monroe, N. C., and Robert Gibson of New York, came to Cuba recently.

WILLIAMS SAID he was under bond in North Carolina in connection with a cmpaign for racial equality, and predicted he might be punished "for what I have said here" in praising Castro.

"If I am," he told The Associated Press, "I may seek political asylum in Cuba where a Negro can live as a free man."

Informed sources say mailing lists of Negro organiztions in the United States have been made available to Cuban propagandists for distribution of anti-American and pro-Castro material.

The Castro regime has established a pattern for the treatment of Negro delegations which in many ways resembles the Kremlin's in handling Negro visitors to Moscow.

THE VISITING NEGROES are put up in top-grade tourist hotels in Havana, given special tours and entertainments, and permitted to talk with Fidel Castro and other Cuban leaders.

The visiting Negroes make television appearances and attack the United States and praise Castro. They are interviewed by the Castro-controlled press or have articles published by the newspapers now controlled by the government.

The semi-official newspaper Revolucion published this week a supplement dedicated to "the Negroes in the United States."

The 40-page section was filled with reports and photographs portraying maltreatment of Negroes. One article signed jointly by Gibson and Williams was called "the constant struggle of the Negroes for their liberty." It was studded with references to Wall Street and big business—both under attack by Castro propagandists.

Thus far the campaign to attract Negro visitors and Negro support from the United States has shown few concrete results, according to the best available information.

Cuba Seizes Two More Refineries

Castro Action Ends All Normal Exports Of Western Oil

HAVANA (AP)—Prime Minister Fidel Castro Friday took over the last two foreign-owned oil refineries in Cuba and with them the problem of supplying his country with oil from distant fields in the Soviet Union.

He seized the Esso Standard Oil and the Shell Oil refineries under resolutions accusing both firms of violating a 1938 law by refusing to process state-owned crude he obtained in a sugar-for-oil deal with Moscow.

The action immediately ended all normal imports of Western oil—except for a trickle of finished products—and raised prospects of an oil famine unless means are found to expand by at least four times the flow of Soviet crude.

RODE ACROSS BAY

Duplicating a move made two days ago at Santiago in seizing the 26-million-dollar properties of the American-owned Texaco refinery, Castro sent his agents into the Esso and Shell refineries.

They rode across the bay in barges filled with Soviet oil. Once processing of this crude was formally rejected, agents of the Cuban Petroleum Institute took over the plants with the backing of armed workers.

Value of the two installations was placed at more than a hundred million dollars. Additionally, Castro's government owes the three seized refineries an estimated 60 million dollars in foreign exchange for oil already imported and processed. Normally all of Cuba's oil came from Venezuela.

3-DAY SUPPLY

The refineries had anticipated Castro's action. His agents found less than a three-day supply of crude in the Shell storage tanks and even less at Esso. They immediately began to transfer Soviet crude from emergency storage to the two refineries. Cuban workers promised to continue their normal operation. Existing reserves of gasoline and other oil products in Cuba were expected to last from 10 to 30 days.

The Soviet Union contracted to supply about one-fourth of Cuba's daily crude oil requirements, 60,000 barrels.

Castro spokesmen said the Kremlin already has promised all the oil Cuba needs at prices below those paid Western importers. Castro has repeatedly said he can buy Soviet crude "a dollar a barrel" cheaper than Venezuelan.

AVERAGE COST

Experts here said the average cost of Venezuelan crude processed in Cuba has been $2.80 per barrel, compared to a barter price of $2.10 a barrel for Soviet crude.

The experts expressed doubt that the Soviet Union can find or spare the 20 to 25 huge tankers required to shuttle large quantities of crude to Cuba.

Castro associates said Mexico is ready to sell Cuba oil. Some suggested that other U. S. firms are bidding to supply crude.

Whatever the source, Castro needs oil quickly.

As Castro faced these problems, American, British and Dutch personnel of the seized refineries prepared to leave Cuba. Most will go without household effects since the Cuban National Bank imposed a ban on their removal by employes of the oil companies and some other foreign firms.

AMERICAN PROPERTY

Seizure of the Esso and Shell refineries appeared spurred more by rejection of the Soviet crude than by Castro's promise to seize all American property in retaliation for the threatened slice in the Cuban sugar quota.

Firm 'Deeply Regrets' Seizure Of Refinery

NEW YORK (AP)—Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey said Friday it deeply regretted the Cuban seizure of its Havana refinery.

The company said a Cuban demand that Esso refine Soviet crude oil "appeared to us unreasonable."

"For well over a year," said Standard, "Essosa (its Cuban affilate) has experienced difficulty in obtaining the foreign exchange (bills or drafts against persons in foreign countries) necessary to pay for the crude oil it imported.

"In April of this year the Cuban government informed Essosa that foreign exchange for the payment of current shipments would be made available within 90 days after such a shipment arrived at a Cuban port.

"Exchange totaling more than 26 million dollars is now owed to Essosa's suppliers, over half of it for deliveries made last year. Moreover, ever since the government agreed to go on a 90-day basis for current shipments, nearly four million dollars has accrued and remains unsatisfied."

Thus, said Standard, on purely economic grounds Essosa was forced to suspend imports of crude oil with which to keep its refinery running.

Cutting off other crude oil sources "in order to make room for Russian crude would work hardship upon countries such as Venezuela, whose economies depend heavily upon their market for raw material," Standard said.

Castro Abolishes Race Bias In Cuba

By JOHN H. SENGSTACKE
Publisher-Editor, Chicago Defender

There is no racial discrimination in Cuba.

That is a resounding and important declaration. But it is the pattern Cuban Premier Fidel Castro is following as he goes into his second year as leader of his country.

Upon visiting Cuba, at the invitation of the Cuban Government along with other Negro journalists, I found that Castro has the full support of the majority of the Cuban people in this move.

Upon meeting colored newsmen, Castro stated:

"We wish everyone to know what a great effort we are making to carry our country forward to peace and dignity, with the maximum of generosity, with the maximum of goodwill to all people.

THE FUTURE

"We envision a future era of peace and happiness through the development of the wealth and natural resources of our country. We are happy that you have had the opportunity to see the progress that we are making toward these goals. We hope that your visit with us has been pleasant and we look forward to having you and your friends as our guests again in the near future."

To be honest, I saw nothing in Cuba which I do not like. I also talked with other newspapermen from the States.

Thomas J. Davis, Cleveland Call-Post editor stated:

"My opinion, my truthful opinion is that the Cuban people are shaping their democracy." Asked about the attacks of some American newspapers on the Cuban Government, Davis said:

'USED TO BATTLE CRY'

"Negroes in America are quite used to the battle cry of the big press of calling any movement that demands fairness for all people regardless of race, creed, color or financial position, Communists. To us this is a false bit of propaganda designed to defeat Democratic processes."

Joe Louis, former heavyweight boxing champion, commented also. He said:

"This is really good for Cuba to invite American Negroes to the country. Colored people in the US do not have any place to go in the winter except Cuba. And I think they are going to take advantage of that fact." Louis also said he found no signs of racial discrimination in Cuba.

WELCOME

On the heels of this statement, Baudilio Castellanos, chief of the Cuban Tourist Commission, told a press conference:

"We want colored people to know they will be well received here."

Negro newsmen as well as professors, artists, businessmen and sportsmen were all invited to spend New Year's in Cuba by Dr. Casto, who celebrated his first year as Cuba's leader New Year's eve night amid dancing, feasting and merry-making in the streets of Havana.

HISTORY-MAKING

Dr. Castro welcomed the guests with the following message:

"Your presence here is surely history in the making, for all of you as American citizens must certainly know by recent front page events which have occurred in your country that mendacity in history must give way to the truth.

"We sincerely hope your visit here will be one of pleasure, but in our hearts we are deeply concerned about what you carry away of truth concerning the rebirth of our Republic. Not only must your return home bear out what most of you know of Cuba by previous visits or exciting tales told by other visitors, but there must be a definite repudiation of your own press concerning events occurring in Cuba today.

NOTHING TO CONCEAL

"We have developed what we consider an interesting, entertaining and enjoyable program, however, if these plans hold no interest for you, the Cuban Government and the Tourist Commission (I.N.I.T.) extend to you the hospitality of our country, to see, do and go wherever you wish. With pride in the stride we are making towards freedom, we have nothing to conceal.

"It is our hope that by accepting our invitation, you will be favorably impressed and help us to perpetrate this effort that which to us, is as important as your esteemed President's history-making jaunt for peace.

"For, as deeply as we believe that there is to be a peace on earth — it can only survive where men know the freedom of equality.

EQUALITY OF MAN

"We extend to our neighbors and friends for the U.S.A. our most sincere welcome to Cuba with the desire that from this small, but representative group, we will make inroads toward seeking the equality of man throughout the world."

Dr. Castro's first anniversary was implemented by crowds in the streets that celebrated into the early hours of the morning. In Havana, Government offices were closed and banks and private companies closed at noon to permit employees to prepare for the festivities.

Streets were decorated, flood lights beamed on public buildings, and military installations were conspicuous with electric lights. Gunfire by the military was banned.

American tourists by the thousands filled the cafes and casinos of Havana.

EXCHANGE VIEWS

During a press conference, organized by the National Tourist Institute in association with the Cuban Government, American and Cuban journalists exchanged views.

Later, I visited the office of the Prensa Latina, a Latin American news agency, along with other editors. After visiting several departments, moving pictures of the Cuban revolution were shown.

EXPECTS TO RETURN

Although my visit was too short to give a thorough impression of Cuban realities, from what I learned through talking with taxi-drivers, store employees and other people of the working classes, I arrived at the conclusion that Dr. Castro indeed has the support of the Cuban people.

I expect to go back in a few months to make a thorough study of the Cuban situation, for I liked what I saw.

MILLS, RAILROAD SEIZED BY CUBA

Holdings Are Owned Partly by Americans — Regime Denies Moa Take-Over

By R. HART PHILLIPS
Special to The New York Times.

HAVANA, March 11—Three sugar mills and a railway in Oriente Province owned by Americans and Cubans were seized late yesterday by the Cuban Government.

The mills, Los Canos, Isabel and Soledad, owned by the Guantanamo Sugar Company. They are small mills, each producing 150,000 to 200,000 bags of sugar annually. According to the Government they are worth a total of $10,000,000.

The Guantanamo Railroad Company, which is largely owned by Guantanamo Sugar, serves the mills and is also a public carrier connecting Guantanamo with the rest of the island.

Revolucion, the voice of the Government, announced the seizure. The newspaper gave no reason except to state that "the workers have always been victims of the exploitation of the Yankee officials of these companies, who were closely allied with the Batista regime."

Minister of Agriculture Pedro Miret denied last night that the Government had seized the $75,000,000 plant of the Moa Bay Mining Company, a subsidiary of the Freeport Sulphur Company of New York, on the north coast of Oriente Province. This seizure was announced by Revolucion yesterday.

Moa Seizure Denied

In a television interview Major Miret said "there was no such seizure." He said that a resolution of the National Institute of Agrarian Reform had been misinterpreted and had given rise to the report of the seizure.

The minister said that the operation of the Moa Bay company was being discussed with its officials. The concern recently announced that the plant would suspend operations April 1.

However, Major Miret said there was "no intention on the part of the company or ourselves to suspend operations there."

The possibility of some financial arrangement between Moa Mining and the Cuban Government was seen when the minister said that the company needed funds to complete and operate the plant. He also said "we are trying to reach an agreement on the operation of the plant."

However, the minister said he did not approve of the tax advantages that had previously been granted to Moa Bay. He also objected to the fact that 65 per cent of the concentration process in nickel and cobalt production was carried out in Cuba and 35 per cent in the United States. The Government would prefer that all processing be done here, the minister said.

Company Reports Negotiations

A spokesman for the Freeport Nickel Company said here yesterday that Freeport representatives had met this week with Cuban oficials to discuss the tax situation.

He said that the representatives were on their way here to report to top executives of the Freeport Sulphur Company, of which Freeport Nickel is a subsidiary.

The company said it would have no comment on its earlier announcement that it would soon end operations at its Cuban facilities.

The controlling stock interest in Guantanamo Sugar is held by Cuban interests. The stock is traded on the New York Stock Exchange and a substantial amount is owned by United States interests.

NAACP's Henry Greene Lauds Castro In Cuba

HAVANA — "If I had the story-book personality of "Dr. Jekyll" instead of creating a woman, I would create a Fidel Castro to put him at the head of our struggle for racial integration," stated the eminent Washington doctor and outstanding member of the N. Dr. Greene arrived at Havana from Kingston, Jamaica, where he took part in the annual convention of the graduates. Howard university, and amongst other things said the racial conflict in Washington, D. C. "is almost over" although there are a few other things which will be eliminated with time.

"But we are going to have a big struggle in the Southern States very soon, as they resist obeying the laws of God and of the U. S. Supreme Court."

Questioned about the measures adopted by the U. S. government to protect Negro citizens from threats and insults to which they are frequently subjected, both morally and materially, he stated:

"The United States Government really passed a law in 1876 which became known as "the lost law" because no state governor ever bothered to put it in force.

"But, nonetheless, he added, that law came into effect really in 1952, when our organization (the NAACP which guided about 10 million Negroes) taking its cue from the services rendered by colored men in World War II and in Korea, vigorously demanded that the law be enforced."

With regard to the racial integration in Washington public schools, according to Dr. Green, — it did not create disorders "but segregationists fled from us as if we were infected."

He explained that the majority of the white families living in Washington took their children out of the Public schools and at great sacrifices put them in private schools outside the racial integration zone.

A minimum of 76 per cent of the children attending Washington Public schools are colored.

Living conditions in those States where the so-called "lost law" has been put in force, Dr. Greene explained as follows:

"If a Negro wants to rent a house in a district where white people live, he will always find it has just been rented. And if he wants to buy it — 'It has just been sold.' "

Speaking about Cuba, Dr. Greene expressed he noted a great change in the country, since his first visit in 1956, when he was discriminated against for being colored, in different public places.

But now, in the luxury suite which Dr. Greene and his wife occupied on the 22nd floor o fthe Havana-Hilton hotel, he spoke about how overcome he was by the attentions which had been shown him at the many places he had visited and he promised to recommend to his friends the "New Cuba of the Revolution."

Although Dr. Greene stated he is not interested in politics, during his conversation he had many expressions of praise for the Prime Minister of the Government of Dr. Fidel Castro and the measures taken by his Government in favor of the people and integration.

DR. HENRY GREENE (left) is interviewed in Havana, Cuba, by a Prensa Latina correspondent. Dr. Greene, a member of the NAACP, cited several changes in Cuba since his last visit to the country in 1956.

NINE INJURED IN N.Y. FIGHTING

Pro-, Anti-Castro Groups Battle at Consulate

Pittsburgh Courier
New Orleans, La.
Sun 5-15-60

NEW YORK (AP) — Violent street fighting between pro and anti-Castro symphatizers broke out Saturday in front of the Cuban Consulate. At least nine persons were injured, including three policemen. No one was hurt seriously.

More than 250 persons—some wielding clubs, pieces of board and umbrellas—were involved in the 10-minute clash on Madison Avenue in the heart of Manhattan.

Dr. Rogelio Guillot, the consul general, was pushed back into the building by police when he tried to rush into the street.

He called the anti-Castro force "murderers," and said they unsuccessfully tried to invade his office.

Dr. Guillot said he was pushed identified himself.

Ricardo Cespedes, 17, a Castro opponent, said:

FREE PRESS LAUDED

"We picketed to commemorate the freedom of press in Cuba. Eight of us stood against 200. We stood, we fell. Tomorrow, we rise again. We fought for freedom once with Fidel and we were betrayed. Now we fight again."

Cuban citizens living in New York have been asked to register for a Cuban census this month. All week they have been reporting. The consulate was open to register them this morning.

Officials said police will be stationed at the consulate on Saturdays until the census is completed.

CONSULATE PICKETED

The fracas started shortly after noon as a group of about 50 members of the Cuban Nationalist Assn., a group opposed to the regime of Premier Fidel Castro, picketed the consulate to demand press freedom in Cuba.

About 200 Castro adherents in the vicinity crowded around the picketers. An eyewitness, Ned Shreve, news director of Radio Station WGNY, Newburgh, N. Y., described what followed:

"Suddenly five or six men and women jumped on one boy, screaming in Spanish."

"They killed 20,000 Cubans," someone shouted. Then violence erupted.

COPS RESTORE PEACE

More than 40 policemen finally restored peace. About 20 demonstrators were jailed.

A starter's pistol, a knife and a piece of chain were confiscated.

Dr. Bertha Pla, cultural attache at the consulate, said she saw police pushing Dr. Guillot and tried to identify him to the officers.

"One uniformed patrolman called me a Communist," she said. "If he had been a Cuban, I would have killed him."

CASTRO REGIME ALSO HIRES 3 OTHERS TO DRAW AMERICANS

WASHINGTON — (UPI) — Fidel Castro's regime has hired Joe Louis and three associates to promote Cuba as a mecca for American tourists.

Louis new job came to light in a statement he and his business partners filed with the Justice Department registering as agents of a foreign government.

According to the statement, the firm of Louis, Rowe, Fisher, Lockhardt Enterprises, Inc., of New York City has signed a contract with the National Tourist Commission of Cuba to promote vacations and conventions by Americans in Cuba.

The firm also will do public relations work for Castro in the United States.

The contract calls for an annual payment to Louis and his associates of $287,000. A total of $30,250 already has been paid, the statement said, for services in inviting tourists to a New Year's celebration in Havana.

Louis listed himself as vice president of the firm. Other members are William Leon Rowe, president; Alvin Lockhardt, second vice president; and Charles Bennett Fisher, treasurer.

Louis, 46, has been a defender of Castro and has been quoted as saying Cuba is one place where an American Negro can vacation without encountering racial discrimination.

Press Ignores Castro Contracts With White Firms

The Pittsburgh Courier

Why Do Whites Rap Louis' Firm?

Pittsburgh Pa

By HAROLD KEITH
(Courier Managing Editor)

Sat. 6-11-60

With the eyes of the nation's top public relations firms focused upon the controversy involving a contract between Louis, Rowe, Lockhart and Fisher Enterprises and the Cuban Tourist Commisison, a lot of questions are being left unanswered.

Al Lockhart, in a bristling mood since the white press began its attack upon the situation, asked, "I'm wondering what's behind this series of attacks."

ED. NOTE: Read Courier editorials this week.

The PR expert declared, "I'm the man to get after, not Joe Louis, for I'm the one who negotiated the contract."

■

HE POINTED OUT that the white press waited for over four months to play up the story and then noted that this is the first time that a country had elected to spend as much as $282,000 in the Negro media.

He pointed out, "W've got to defend the Negro market and as public relations men we owe it to mass Negro media to defend them. This contract is being aimed at the Negro market through the use of Negro newspapers, radio stations and magazines.

"I would like to point out that the United States Government is still doing business with Cuba and that there is absolutely no pressure on this agency."

He pointed to these facts:

1.—The United States still maintains diplomatic relations with Cuba.

2.—The white press has said nothing about those contracts held by white public relations firms with the Cuban govern- Cuba has purchased full-page color ads in white publications in addition to other types of display materials.

THE PREMIER SPEAKS—Dr. Baudilio Castellanos Garcia, director of the Cuban Institute of Tourism; Brad Pye of Los Angeles; Dr. Castro. Charles Fisher, M. A. Lockhart and Enrique Benavides.

3.—This is the first time that a Negro concern has negotiated one of these contracts.

4.—The U. S. Congress has voted a one-year extension of the sugar agreement with the Cuban government.

"What could be behind this whole thing," Lockhart continued, "is the fact that a lot of people don't like the idea of Negroes living in first-class Cuban hotels and being treated as first-class citizens."

■

HE THEN went on to say that Joe Louis came into the picture as a partner of Billy Rowe and was never used to get the account.

"I have no intention of doing anything that would break up Billy and Joe's friendship. This is a partnership that has existed through the years."

Asked whether or not it was true that the firm had been dissolved, both Charles Fisher and Lockhart declared that they knew nothing of the story.

Mr. Rowe, at press time, was in Acapulco, Mexico, reportedly negotiating a contract similar to the agreement signed with Cuba. According to a report given the Courier ,Messrs. Rowe and Louis were reportedly pulling away from Lockhart and Fisher to set up their own firm.

■

BOTH LOCKHART and Fisher denied knowledge of this story.

But. Mr. Louis has already been quoted in the press as saying that he would quit the firm if the Cuban account was kept.

But, the question still remained unanswered as to why white public relations firms holding contracts with Cuba have not been revealed. Is the entire situation cooked up in order to combat the competition of Negro public relations men in this field?

Considering all factors, this is food for thought.

Cuba Says U. S. 'Pressure Boys' Got to Joe Louis

HAVANA (ANP) —A high official of the Cuban Government last week blamed pressure from the "pressure boys" in the United States as the season for former heavyweight champion Joe Louis' decision tc sever connection with the Cuban Tourist Commission.

The charge by Baudilio Castellanos, director of the Cuban National Tourist Commission, came after Louis, at a press conference in New York, announced that he didn't want to risk soiling his good name.

Louis also said that he was advising his partners in the public relations firm of Louis, Rowe, Fisher and Lockhart Enterprises to drop the Cuban Commission's account entirely or he would withdraw from the firm.

Joe Louis Hired by Castro With $287,000 Contract

N.Y. World Telegram & Sun., N.Y., N.Y.

Wed. 6/25/60

By JIM G. LUCAS,
Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

WASHINGTON, May 25.—Fidel Castro has hired former heavyweight champion Joe Louis and three associates as his American public relations agents for $287,000 a year.

Mr. Louis filed as a foreign agent with the Department of Justice April 19, listing himself as vice president of Louis, Rowe, Fisher, Lockhart Enterprises, Inc., of 200 W. 57th St., New York. He listed his duties as "public relations-tourist promotion" and his employer as the Institutio Nacional de la Turistica (INIT) of Havana, the Castro government's bureau for promotion of tourism.

Money Paid.

Mr. Louis' registration revealed his firm already had been paid $30,250 by INIT, $2000 on Jan. 1 "to invite tourists to a New Year's Eve celebration in Havana, Cuba," and $28,250 on Feb. 28, listed simply as "fee."

Filing with Mr. Louis were William Leon Rowe, known also as Billy Rowe, of 209 W. 139th St., New York, listed as the firm's president; Maurice Alvin Lockhart, known also as Al Lockhart, c/o 555 River Dr., New York, and Oak Bluffs, Mass., second vice president, and Charles Bennett Fisher, 11-18 174th St., St. Albans, N. Y., treasurer.

In New York, Mr. Fisher said Mr. Louis currently was with Floyd Patterson, another former heavyweight champion, in training camp at Grossinger, N. Y.

He said their foreign agents' registration was "self-explanatory."

Not Political.

"We're not interested in politics," Mr. Fisher said.

Mr. Fisher said it was too early to say whether the firm had boosted Cuba's tourist trade, but added "we feel we are responsible for whatever Negroes are going down there."

At Grossinger, Mr. Louis said "we have nothing to do with politics and nothing to do with Castro." "We are concerned solely in developing tourism in Cuba," he added.

Mr. Louis filed under his real name, Joseph Louis Barrow, but said he also was known as Joe Louis, born May 13, 1914, in Lexington, Ala.

Mr. Rowe listed himself as an associate member of the New York State Chiefs of Police and a life member of the Guardian Assn. of the Police Department of New York City. Mr. Lockhart listed himself as "assistant mayor of Harlem," and a member of the Citizens Committee to Beautify New York City.

In a contract signed with Dr. Baudilio Castellano, INIT director, on Feb. 4 the four agreed to "execute the terms of this presentation and the monthly plan in accordance with the wishes of the Cuban revolutionary government, to work closely with INIT-designated officials, to extend the facilities of our office to this representative and to use all the personnel of our firm and our contacts to promote tourism and goodwill for Cuba."

In a letter to Dr. Castellano Mr. Rowe said the firm's public relations program was geared to give maximum results."

$287,000 Fee.

The contract calls for an annual fee of $287,000, less $25,000 already advanced. It is to be paid in 11 monthly installments of $22,000 and one of $20,000. However, the contract also provides that "these figures may change from month to month depending on the situation at hand and the needs of INIT." Somewhat ambiguously, it also provides that special things will be paid for by INIT."

Mr. Louis' registration lists his residence at 2950 W. Sixth St., Los Angeles. He said he had made two trips to Cuba in the three months preceding registration. As additional businesses, he listed "public relations, promotion, recording company, milk company."

250 Press Releases.

The firm reported it had prepared 250 press releases to date, all for Negro publications—it said in a separate corporate filing that its job is to publicize and promote tourism through publicity, public relations and advertising in newspapers, magazines and on radio and television . . . to promite this activity on a national basis among organizations and individuals interested in vacationing or having conventions in Latin America."

For several months, Mr. Louis has been one of Castro's defenders, and has been quoted as saying Havana is the only place an American Negro can vacation on terms of complete equality.

Although Mr. Louis earned better than $4 million as heavyweight champion, he now owes $1.5 million in back income taxes and interest.

$287,000 Account.

Mr. Louis announced this week he was withdrawing from a $287,000 account with the Cuban Tourist Bureau held by the New York firm of Louis, Rowe, Fisher & Lockhart. The former champ, a vice president, said he would resign from the firm if it retains the account.

Mr. Louis said he severed his association with Fidel Castro's regime "because my wife wanted me to, and because of public opinion . . . and not because what we did was wrong."

Mrs. Louis said her husband had received only $1000 from the $287,000 pledged by the Cuban Tourist Bureau.

She said she accompanied her husband to Havana for a New Year's Eve celebration and they were "out several hundred dollars" which she doesn't expect to get back.

"I didn't want to go and I didn't want him to go," Mrs. Louis said.

"I said, 'Joe, tell them you're sick.' I didn't want his good name connected with that Castro. He said Billy Rowe wanted him to. (William Rowe is president of the firm.)

"I called Billy Rowe and told him: 'You're just making a fool of Joe.' I asked him, if he wanted the account so bad, why he didn't use his own name.

2 More From U.S. Captured in Cuba

By Richard Valeriani

HAVANA, Oct. 15 (AP)—Three more United States citizens faced Fidel Castro's military courts today on charges of counterrevolutionary activities. Two of them could get the death sentence.

One of the trials is in Oriente Province, where the Government earlier today announced the capture of Allan D. Thompson and Paul Hughes. They are accused of landing on Cuba's northeast coast last week with a small anti-Castro incasion force.

Eight others, including Anthony Zarba, 27, of Somerville, Mass., already have been executed by firing squads for allegedly participating in the invasion plot.

One Still at Large

Army headquarters at Santiago in Oriente Province said only one member of the invasion force still is at large. He was identified as Robert Fuller.

(In Miami however, William O. Fuller said the two Americans coming up for trial in Oriente are his son, Robert, 25, and Dale Thompson, about 30. Fuller said Hughes visited him yesterday. "Bobby may have given his name as Hughes because he didn't want his mother to worry," said the elder Fuller, who formerly operated a plantation in Cuba.)

An Army spokesman said civilian militiamen captured the two United States residents and two Cuban companions in a hilly area yesterday. They were charged with armed revolt against the state.

Harvey Summ, a United States consular agent in Santiago, announced he hoped to see the two before the trial and arrange for defense counsel.

In Havana, meanwhile, pilot Leslie Bradley of Minneapolis, Minn., and 12 Cubans were on trial before a military tribunal at La Cabana Fortress. They are accused of plotting a fake invasion of Nicaraugua to embarass the Castro regime. The Government has charged the United States State Department knew about the alleged plot.

The prosecution last night asked 16-year prison sentences for all the defendants, including Crester Lacayo, an exiled Nicaraguan who once served as Central American representative for Castro's July revolutionary movement. Castro charged in a recent TV address that Lacayo had contacts with Secretary of State Christian A. Herter.

[United Press International reported that Bradley, Lacayo, who is leader of the Nicaraguan revolutionary movement, and exiled former Dominican army Gen. Miguel Angel Ramirez Alcantara, another dependent, all denied the charge, but admitted they were preparing to launch "an expedition . . . from the coast of some Central American country." They did not name which one.]

Urban Reform Adopted

Castro's Cabinet today announced the adoption of an urban reform law designed to give every Cuban opportunity to own his own home. The law in effect makes the government the sole real estate operator in the country.

It stipulates that Cubans may apply their rent for apartments or homes toward the purchase of the dwellings over a period ranging from 5 to 20 years. Urban reform councils will be set up to administer the program and collect the rents, passing them on to landlords after certain deductions.

The decree comes as a followup to Cuba's agrarian reform laws and the nationalization of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of commercial and industrial enterprises.

The urban reform law limits landlords to a maximum monthly rental income of 600 pesos and will force those with extensive holdings to dispose of them.

The purchasing of dwellings through rentals represent the first step of a three-stage housing program contained in the law. The Government also promised a massive building program with rentals pegged to 10 per cent of a person's monthly income. Free housing for every family is listed as the final stage.

The Castro regime last year reduced most rents 50 per cent.

Castro Warns: 'He Who Lives by the Sword . . .'

OVERTHROW HELD AIM

Castro Claims U.S. Backing His Foes

HAVANA, Oct. 10 (UPI)—Premier Fidel Castro accused the United States today of backing his political enemies in a "direct offensive" aimed at the overthrow of his government.

He angrily accused the State Department, the Pentagon and Central Intelligence Agency of supporting the counterrevolution, and warned that he plans an immediate and energetic counterattack.

"We have better arms than Yankee arms and we have better rifles than Yankee rifles," Castro boasted. He said that anyone who takes up arms against his regime "should die."

He said "special combat units" are in training to face expected new invasions and warned "we are saving our planes and our heavy arms for when the big ones (invasions) come."

"Yankee imperialism" and "international reactionaries in Latin America" have teamed up to attack the Cuban revolution, Castro said. His audience chanted "paredon, paredon" (to the firing wall) as he spoke.

Weak Spots Sought

Reporting to a teachers conference on government progress in field campaigns against armed guerrilla bands, Castro said his enemies were probing for a weak spot in Cuban defenses.

He admitted that the armed forces combatting his regime "are now more powerful than was the (Batista) tyranny."

This is because all of the elements opposed to the revolution have now joined forces to overthrow him, Castro said.

He labeled his enemies as "corrupt, immoral, selfish, shameless turncoats . . . murderers, torturers and exploiters."

If it was not for "Yankee imperialism," the counterrevolution would mean nothing, Castro said. "It is the fundamental force of the counterrevolution."

Castro warned his audience that the offensive against his regime will continue. "The fight will become more intense daily," he said. He voiced confidence in ultimate victory, however.

The bearded leader said the Cuban army now is equipped with heavy artillery "of all calibres", including mortars "and the finest in war equipment." As a result, he said, his government is prepared to beat off any further invasion attempts.

Castro charged that invasion troops are being readied for new assaults on Cuba in Guatemala and the Swan Islands.

Castro did not say where he was getting his new equipment but it was evident he referred to recent heavy shipments from Iron Curtain countries. These reportedly have included heavy tanks and cannon as well as jet fighter aircraft and modern Czech small arms.

Castro's speech came only a few hours after the army announced that 102 rebels, including at least one American, and 32 sympathizers had been rounded up by the government to date.

The American was identified only as a "Tony Salvard." He was one of a group of 15 guerrilla fighters who landed in Orlente last week. The government newspaper Revolucion said, however, another American named "Thompson" also was fighting in the hills.

HAVANA, Cuba— If one duty of interpretive journalism is to puncture fraud, hypocrisy and double - talk, then this reporter is morally obligated to say to his government in Washington the following:

"You have everything upside down and topsy - turvy. Not now, in 1960, but rather back during the seven years of President Batista's dictatorship, you should have advised United States citizens in Cuba to send home their wives and children.

"The island is quiet and orderly now. But nightly, under Batista, the police killed people at random and dumped their bullet - riddled and tortured bodies on street corners as an object - lesson in terror for anyone inclined to oppose the government.

"Twenty - thousand men, women and adolescents — yes, twenty thousand — met their fate in this manner while our ambassador here looked the other way and publicly hugged Batista functionaries.

* * *

"ON JUST one morning a couple of years ago, the people of Havana found 94 multilated bodies on the city streets.

"During that long stretch of medieval horror, no one here went out after dark except when absolutely necessary.

Concerts, plays and all other forms of culture and entertainment came to a halt because the potential audiences were all at home, trembling behind locked doors and praying that the police would not knock.

"Yet, you officials in Washington did not discourage tourists or business men from coming to Cuba then. Our great, free daily press issued no warnings to the traveling public."

* * *

THIS REPORTER knows an unsafe country when he sees one. In 1953, I was in Malaya and Indo China when guerrillas would regularly tos bombs or fire into street cafes from speeding cars.

They would halt buses, burn them and rob and sometimes kidnap passengers.

I was in Korea during the fighting there and everyone knew the risks on the eerie, blacked - out streets of Seoul after curfew.

In 1956, I was in Algeria where daily acts of terrorism by both sides made cities and countryside hazardous for all.

In 1957, I joined the Congress of Racial Equality test group that challenged racially - segregated seating on southern buses. All 16 of us developed upset, nervous stomachs because deep down inside, we were scared and with good reason.

* * *

CUBA PRESENTS an entirely different situation. There is nothing going on here to scare anyone except those Yankees and wealthy Cubans whose ill - gotten profits are being taken away. The State Department knows this as well as I do.

The correspondents here for the wire services and the big United States newspapers also know it.

Unless Washington is preparing to land a military expedition to reverse the Cuban revolution and turn back the clock of his ory there is no valid reason to advise any Americans to leave this island or not to come.

One excuse being offered is that a few Americans are in jail here awaiting trial.

Two weeks ago, two were arrested after the Cuban police discovered in their apartment an enormous amount of latest - model wiretapping equipment that Embassy officials had provided them with. From their "dance studio" ran a concealed wire that led downstairs to the Havana Bureau of the Hsinhua Chinese News Agency.

Would not our major daily newspapers have found space on their front pages to splash such a story?

Upon leaving New York a few days ago, Premier Fidel Castro invited several hundred Americans to visit Cuba and see for themselves what is going on there.

Cubans are now asking me: Is this latest State Department advice to women and children a desperate effort to scare them into not coming?

Joe Louis Still With Public Relations Firm

Pittsburgh Pa.

NEW YORK—Joe Louis is still very much a member of the public relations firm of Louis, Rowe, Lockhart, Fisher Enterprises, despite the fact that he had said last week that he would quit the firm if it did not relinquish a $287,000 contract with the Cuban Tourist Commission.

• Louis was put on the griddle when the firm registered with the State Department as representing a foreign government. Sat. 6/18/60

This registration is required by law. Rapped by nearly every daily paper in the country, Louis, after consultation with his wife, called a press conference and announced that he would withdraw from the firm.

During the same time, Negro publications editorially questioned the wisdom of his retreat.

■

LOUIS ADMITTED that he had not "resigned" from the firm and referred all other questions to the president, William L. Rowe.

• Mr. Rowe emphasized that there was no split in the outfit and that Louis was still a member until such time as the four partners had "fully explored the whole issue and re-evaluated the situation."

Mr. Rowe was in Mexico at the time the story broke. He returned last Wednesday. He said he and the others were still having a series of conferences. They were in agreement, however, that the Cuban contract would remain in full force.

"After all," Mr. Rowe said, "you don't just resign an account because someone asks you to. Even if we wanted to, there would have to be many, many technical preliminaries—like giving the client notice—before we could make such a move."

INCREASING INTEREST in the whole problem of Cuban tourism was evidenced by a story in the June 9 Journal-American, buried on the financial pages, under the by-line of Doris Willens.

• The story revealed that the Harris Advertising Agency of Miami and New York had signed a contract last September with the Cuba Tourist Commission for $1,600,000. The agency had placed 2-page ads in most of the major American magazines.

Only one magazine—the New Yorker—turned the ad down when Castro started to "sound off." The article pointed out that this was a long-time policy of the New Yorker which previously had refused an ad for Israel when border incidents had occurred.

■

MISS WILLENS wrote that the Harris company was planning a big fall campaign, following a visit to Cuba last week by the firm's officials.

Asked how such a campaign would be possible in view of the shaky situation in Cuba, a Harris representative said, "We believe it will improve."

Louis denied that efforts of his public relations firm would encourage Fidel Castro's hostility to the United States by bolstering the Cuban dictator's economy.

The ex-champion stressed that his firm had been hired by the Cuban Tourist Commission and not by Castro, just as another agency had been hired by the Cuban commission to stimulate white tourist trade. And his outfit had no connection with Cuban politics he stressed.

Publicity Concern Promotes Tourism by U. S. Negroes Under $287,000 Contract

Thur. 5/26/60

A public relations concern of which Joe Louis is vice president has signed a $287,000 contract to promote tourist travel in Cuba among U. S. Negroes.

William L. Rowe, president of Louis, Rowe, Fisher, Lockhart Enterprises, Inc., 200 West Fifty-seventh Street, said yesterday that the contract was negotiated last February in Havana. He said it had been signed by Maurice Alvin Lockhart, second vice president of his company, adn Dr. Baudilio Castellanos, director general of Cuba's National Institute of Tourism.

Mr. Rowe said his corporation registered with the Department of Justice as a foreign agent, as required.

The fourth member of the concern is Charles Bennett Fisher, treasurer. All are Negroes.

Louis Held Not Involved

Mr. Rowe denied a published report that Mr. Louis, former heavyweight boxing champion, had filed as a foreign agent.

"Mr. Louis is dissociated from this account and Mr. Lockhart is the account supervisor," he said. "Certainly there is nothing political about it. Any implication that there is is completely orroneous. We have no feelings about Cuba's political life and were not hired to do that."

A spokesman for Mr. Louis quoted him as having said he had no political connection with Premier Fidel Castro.

"It's just another publicity account," Mr. Louis commented.

Mr. Rowe remarked that Mr. Louis, while visiting in Havana last January, had met Dr. Castro but that they had not discussed business. He said negotiations had been opened previously between Mr. Lockhart and Enrique Benavides, head of a special markets department of the tourist bureau.

Mr. Rowe commented that Señor Benavides also is a Negro.

"There was no question of using Mr. Louis to get the contract," he said. "The deal was never discussed with Dr. Castro on our part, nor did he discuss it with us."

Special Appeal to Negroes

He explained that the contract stressed "special markets," emphasizing Cuba's appeal to Negroes as an "unbiased, openhearted section of Latin-America."

Under the contract, he said, the concern's annual fee is fixed at $25,000. The remaining $262,000 is budgeted for advertising and promotion, as follows: newspapers, $80,000; magazines, $50,000; radio, $40,000; special material, including convention speakers, and miscellaneous, $52,000; direct mail, $25,000; posters, window cards, etc., $10,000, and contests, $5,000.

In addition to the annual fee the concern will receive 15 per cent on all advertising plus 2 per cent for cash. Mr. Rowe reported that his concern had received $52,934 since Feb. 28. This included, he said, a quarterly payment of the fee, of $6,250.

Mr. Rowe is a former deputy police commissioner of New York City.

Joe Louis Drops Cuba Job, Cites Criticism From Press

Joe Louis announced yesterday that because of newspaper criticism he is ending his connection with a project to publicize Cuba as a vacation resort for American Negroes.

The former heavyweight boxing champion is vice-president and a partner in the public relations firm of Louis, Rowe, Fisher and Lockhart, 200 W. 57th St., which was hired by the Cuban Tourist Commission last February to promote tourist travel to Cuba.

Mr. Louis said yesterday at a press conference in the Hotel Commodore that he also will leave the firm "if it does not drop this account with the Cuban Tourist Commission immediately."

The firm's decision on whether to keep the $287,000 account with Cuba will be made as soon as all the partners can be gathered together, Charles B. Fisher, secretary of the company, said. Mr. Fisher said he thought the firm would like to hold on to the account but he implied it might not be able to because of Mr. Louis' withdrawal.

Mr. Louis said he reached the decision to cut his ties with Cuba after discussing the matter with his wife, Mrs. Martha Malone Louis, a Los Angeles criminal lawyer who sat in on the press conference yesterday. Mr. Louis said he took the step "only because the papers make it seem like I done something wrong."

Joe Louis, former heavyweight champion revealed at a New York press conference that he has severed all connections with the Cuban Tourist Bureau. Louis also stated that he has warned the public relations agency in which he is a partner that he will withdraw from the firm unless the Cuban account is dropped. Stressing that the contact was non-political, the former champion said that adverse press and public reaction to words of the deal had "depressed and confused me. There is only one decision I can make . . . my record as an American is as well-known as anyone's, and I mean to keep it that way."

Brown Bomber Says Record As Loyal American Is Test

NEW YORK (UPI)—Former heavyweight champion Joe Louis severed his connection with Cuban Tourist Commission rather than risk being considered un-American.

At the same time Louis warned his partners in a public relations agency that they must drop the Cuban commission's account entirely or he would withdraw from the firm.

Joe's decision to break off with the Cuban commission was made after a discussion with his wife, Martha, a Los Angeles criminal attorney who flew in from California.

He and the public relations firm of Louis, Rowe, Fisher and Lockhart Enterprises had been criticized recently by some polticians and newspaper men for stimulating American Negro tourist trade to Cuba and thereby indirectly helping the government of Fidel Castro.

"My break-off will cost me about $6,200 a year," the ex-champion explained. "That was my one fourth share of the fee our firm received each year for handling the Cuban commission's account. But it isn't a question of money. My record as an American is as well known as anyone's and I mean to keep it that way."

Last February 4, Louis firm signed a $287,000 annual agreement with the Cuban Tourist Commission to stimulate tourism among American Negroes. Of the $287,000 total, $262,000 was budgeted for advertising and promotion in Negro publications and radio.

The fact that Joe's firm merely publicized tourism for Cuba, as does another much larger United States agency, did not prevent Louis from being criticized.

"I have been accused of working for Castro," his statement said. "I have been accused of selling out my country. Never in my career as public figure, in or out of the ring, has anything grieved me more than the conclusions many people have drawn from my association with the Cuban government."

Will Also Resign From Publicity Firm If It Retains Tie

Former heavyweight champion Joe Louis disclosed today that he had ended his public relations connections with the Cuban Tourist Bureau.

At a press conference at the Hotel Commodore, he also revealed that he would withdraw as a partner in the public relations firm that obtained the $287,000 contract from Fidel Castro unless it drops the Cuban account.

Mr. Louis' decision to bow out of the controversial public relations account came just a week after Jim G. Lucas, Scripps-Howard staff writer, revealed in the World-Telegram that the Cuban government had retained his firm to attract Negro tourists.

He is a one-fourth partner and vice president of the firm Louis, Rowe, Fisher, Lockhart Enterprises, Inc., of 200 W. 57th St.

At his press conference, the former champion described himself as "depressed and confused" over the public reaction to his association with the Cuban government. "I have been accused of working for Castro," he said. "I have been accused of selling out my country."

"My record as an American is as well known as anyone's and I mean to keep it that way," he declared. "Therefore, I am severing whatever connections I had with the Cuban government as a representative of this account."

Mr. Louis said that his wife, Martha, a Los Angeles attorney, flew to New York over the weekend to confer with him about the situation. She told reporters that she had advised him to withdraw from the account as a "matter if principle."

Joe Louis 'Crucified' Lawyer-Wife Declares

Birmingham Post-Herald

BY JIM LUCAS
Scripps-Howard Staff Writer

WASHINGTON, June 5 — The wife of former world heavyweight champion Joe Louis has accused his partners in a Cuban public relations venture of "crucifying" her husband.

"The sooner people quit using Joe Louis, the better he'll be," Martha Louis said bitterly.

Mrs. Louis is a Los Angeles criminal lawyer.

Louis announced last week he was withdrawing from a $287,000 account with the Cuban Tourist Bureau held by the New York firm of Louis, Rowe, Fisher and Lockhart. Louis is vice president. He said he would resign from the firm if it retains the account.

In a press conference here, Louis said he severed his association with Fidel Castro's regime "because my wife wanted me to, and because of public opinion . . . and not what we did was wrong."

Mrs. Louis said her husband has received only $1000 from the $287,000 pledged by the Cuban Tourist Bureau.

"That's a high price to pay for all this adverse publicity," she said. "It's high when people in whose judgment you have confidence lose respect for you."

She said her husband was supposed to get $6250 as his share of the fee. Of the $287,000, she said, $25,000 was to be split four ways and the rest spent for promotion.

"We haven't got the remaining $5250 and we probably won't," she said. "But what is $500 a month, anyhow, when you alienate the people who have made you what you are?"

JOE LOUIS DENIES TIE WITH CASTRO

The New York Times

Says He Will Give Up Share in Publicity Company if Cuba Account is Kept

New York, N.Y.

Joe Louis announced yesterday that upon the advice of counsel—his wife's—he might drop his one-quarter interest in a public relations concern here.

The former heavyweight boxing champion said that his wife, Martha, a Los Angeles criminal lawyer, had advised him to quit unless the company canceled its $287,000-a-year contract with Cuba's National Institute of Tourism.

He issued a statement at an interview in the Commodore Hotel in which he disavowed any connection with Premier Fidel Castro's regime and cited his own "record as an American."

"I have been accused of working for Castro," he said. "I have been accused of selling out my country."

He stressed that the reaction of the press and public to his association with the deal had so "depressed and confused me" that "there is only one decision I can make."

On May 25 it was disclosed that Louis, Rowe, Fisher, Lockhart Enterprises, Inc., 200 West Fifty-seventh Street, had registered with the Department of Justice as a foreign agent, as required. The concern, of which Mr. Louis is vice president, negotiated a contract last February in Havana to publicize tourism in Cuba among United States Negroes.

Mr. Louis' role in negotiations was minimized then by William L. Rowe, president of the concern. He explained that the contract had been signed by Maurice Alvin Lockhart, executive vice president of his company, and Dr. Baudilio Castellanos, director general of Cuba's National Institute of Tourism.

Mr. Rowe denied published reports connecting Mr. Louis with the account. The former champion commented at the time that it was "just another publicity account." The fourth member of the all-Negro concern is Charles Bennett Fisher, treasurer.

Mrs. Louis Present

Mr. Fisher attended yesterday's news conference, as did Mrs. Louis, who said she had counseled her husband to drop the account as a "matter of principle."

Mr. Fisher said a decision on the account awaited the return from Mexico next week of Mr. Rowe, who is a former city deputy police commissioner.

"I think that Joe has no alternative," Mr. Fisher commented. "He's been pressured by the press."

Mr. Louis declared that nothing had "grieved" him more than "the conclusions many people have drawn from my association with the Cuban Government." He explained that the account was cleared with the United States Embassy in Havana and "had its sanction."

"The job was completely nonpolitical and in no may was I or my friends personally connected with Castro," he said.

He said he had read some articles "that said I sold out for a price" and that this was "a low blow." He declared that most of the money he earned went toward the adjustment of his tax debt.

"My record as an American is as well known as anyone's," he said, "and I mean to keep it that way. Therefore, am severing whatever connections I had with the Cuban Government as a representative of this account. I have also informed my agency that if it does not drop this account with the Cuban Tourist Commission immediately, I am pulling out of the company."

The concern's annual fee is $25,000 and the remaining $262,000 is budgeted for advertising and promotion.

U. S. Pressure Is Charged

Special to The New York Times.

HAVANA, June 1—A Government radio commentator said today the United States Government had put pressure on Joe Louis to force him to withdraw from acting as a publicity agent for the Cuban Tourist Commission.

José Pardo Llada said in a broadcast that the United States had acted to "prevent the Negro middle class of the United States from coming to Cuba to enjoy good hotels and beaches from which they are barred by discrimination in Florida."

Señor Pardo Llada said the action, which he attributed to the State Department, constituted a "new aggression," against Cuba.

Dollar Purchases Ordered

American and other tourists coming to Cuba must pay for all services and purchases in United States dollars, under an order issued today by the National Bank of Cuba. The Government has created a corps of inspectors to see that thtis order is enforced.

Since Cuba had tight restrictions on foreign exchange, the new measure was regarded here as showing the desperate need of the Government for United States dollars. It also was considered to mark an attempt to prevent any dollars brought into Cuba by tourists from going into black market where they are said to bring a high premium despite the official exchange rate of 1 peso for $1.

Victim of Popularity

The Pittsburgh Courier

EX-HEAVYWEIGHT champion Joe Louis has become a victim of his prominence and popularity, as shown by the uproar over his connection with a public relations firm promoting tourism for the Cuban Government.

Pittsburgh Pa

The daily press has been quick to insinuate that this connection constitutes an endorsement of the policies of the Castro government and that Louis should give up his interest in the company because of this inference, and Joe has said he will do so.

We think this is most unfortunate and unfair, and goes to show how a man can be hurt by virtue of the position he holds in the nation's esteem, even though the nation hasn't done anything for him recently.

Scores of American firms and individuals are registered as agents of foreign governments and do not suffer in the esteem of their country or their associates, quite the contrary.

When Generalissimo Trujillo of the Dominican Republic wanted to get off the hook in the Galindez case, he hired a respected liberal New York lawyer and public relations man to do the job for him, and the reputation of neither has suffered from receiving $500,000.

There are other firms and individuals in the United States who are doing public relations work for the Cuban National Insitute of Tourism, but they are unmentioned in the daily press, perhaps because they are not colored.

One thing is certain—no white-owned resorts and vacation spots in the United States are soliciting the patronage of American Negroes as the Cuban Government is doing.

FORMER HEAVYWEIGHT boxing champion, Joe Louis, shown during a recent press conference in Washington, repeated that he was giving up a one-fourth partnership in a New York public relations firm for refusing to drop its acount to promote tourism in Cuba. The controversy began when Louis was attacked as "an agent of Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro." (UPI Telephoto)

Joe Partners Split Over Cuba

Two of Joe Louis' three partners in a public relations firm, which holds a contract with Cuba worth almost a half million dollars, have turned down the former heavyweight boxing champion's request to sever connections with the controversial government of Premier Fidel Castro, a spokesman told the Defender Thursday.

Cat. 6-11-62

Al Lockhart, a partner in the New York firm of Louis, Rowe, Fisher and Lockhart, said whatever Joe does is "his personal business." But the firm has "no intention" of giving up the Cuban account, Lockhart said.

Baudilio Castellanos, director of the Cuban National Tourist Commission, said Wednesday that the decision of Louis to back out as a paid booster for Cuban tourism was the result of "low blows" thrown at him by the "pressure boys."

Lockhart, reached by telephone in New York, substantiated reports that heavy pressure had been exerted on Louis. "We don't understand where all the pressure is coming from," Lockhart added.

"As long as America continues diplomatic relations with Cuba and other American firms do business with that country, our firm will continue to represent the Cuban National Tourist Commission," Lockhart, a former newsman, explained.

The firm plans to spend $80,000 on advertising and promotion in Negro newspapers, $50,000 in magazines and a considerable amount in other communications media, the spokesman explained.

P.1

Lockhart, who was the only Negro newspaperman to accompany Castro on his visit to Venezuela shortly after the Cuban government of Batista fell, pointed out that Congress has just extended the Cuban sugar quotas for another year.

"Politics change but we must maintain good relationships with the Cuban people," Lockhart declared.

Lockhart gave up his job with a New York newspaper to join the firm of Louis and Rowe over a year ago. He was accompanied into the organization by Charles Fisher, a friend of some 25 years.

Joe Louis and William (Billy) Rowe have been business associates for several years.

Meanwhile, Enrique Benavides, of the Cuban National Institute for Touristic Industry, said the special market promotion department will maintain its program to invite "all of the people of the United States to come to Cuba to enjoy our democracy and tourist attractions without discrimination."

In a telegram to Lockhart, Benavides pointed out that the revolutionary government had abolished discrimination in Cuba and that a special invitation had been extended to American Negroes to come to Cuba as tourists with the same rights of human equality. "We will continue this plan with you and others," Benavides continued.

Unconfirmed reports were circulating last weekend that Billy Rowe had joined Louis in bowing out of the Cuban account and that the two had set up a new company and signed a contract with the Mexican government to promote tourism.

The reports stated also that Lockhart and Fisher are maintaining the Cuban account.

U.S. WILL CONTINUE HIGH SUGAR PRICE

The New York Times

Cut in Cuban Quota Won't Lead to Buying at Low World Market Rate

New York Fri 7-8-60

By TOM WICKER

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 7—The United States apparently will pay its customary premium price for sugar to replace the 700,000 tons cut from Cuba's quota, despite a suggestion by Agriculture Secretary Ezra Taft Benson that the lower world price might be paid.

Confusion on the issue developed late today when an Agriculture Department source said there would be no effort to "buy sugar at the world price." An official statement confirming this is expected tomorrow.

Mr. Benson's remarks were made at a news conference. The secretary emphasized that no detailed plans had been worked out for replacing the sugar cut from Cuba's share of the tightly controlled United States market.

"I would hope," he said, "that whatever is done might be done through the private trade" rather than through Government purchases.

U. S. Price is Higher

Recently averaged 2.1 cents less a pound than Cuba and other foreign and domestic producers have been receiving for sugar sold in the United States.

Mr. Benson offered the opinion that the sugar situation would have no noticeable effect on United States consumers, either in supply or price.

Then he said purchase of sugar from foreign countries not now sharing in the United States market might be made at the world price "because we have no commitments with them." He indicated also that over-quota purchases from countries already allotted part of the United States market might be made at the lower price.

The Secretary conceded this policy might lead to "windfall profits" if private importers were to buy sugar at the world price and sell it at the prevailing United States price.

In any case, no change in the sugar price paid by United States consumers appears in prospect. This price is maintained at a stable level by controling the amount permitted on the market. The controlled supply will not be changed by the Cuban quota reduction.

This and other developments, in addition to Premier Fidel Castro's threats to expropriate all United States property in Cuba, made it apparent that yesterday's drastic reduction of Cuba's quota had raised many problems for the United States too. Among these developments were the following:

¶A representative of the domestic beet sugar industry put in a claim for an increased share of the United States market. He said it was "pretty clear" that Cuba would not again be able "to do what she has done in the past." For some years Cuba has supplied about a third of the United States' sugar.

¶Under the Sugar Act amendments passed last week, and President Eisenhower's proclamation yesterday, Premier Castro's arch-enemy, Generalissimo Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina of the Dominican Republic, will be allowed to export to the United States about 200,000 tons of the 700,000 cut from Cuba's quota.

¶President Eisenhower held a long conference with the National Security Council, with the Cuban situation high on the agenda, before leaving Washington at 1:49 P. M. for a vacation at Newport, R. I.

¶The National Advisory Committee on Inter-American affairs met for the second day. A State Department spokesman said the members were "filled in" on the Cuban situation but that their meeting, scheduled several months ago, dealt primarily with continuing Latin-American problems.

End of an Era Seen

Meanwhile, Robert Shields of the United States Beet Sugar Association said the President's cutback of the Cuban quota had marked "the end of an era." He said "Cuba has the right to come back and play her old role" if circumstances change. But, he declared, "As far as you can see ahead, I don't see how Cuba will be able in terms of sugar on in terms of exchange to do what she has done in the past even if she were willing."

Therefore, he said it was his opinion that "you would increase your reliance on domestic suppliers." If Cuba is no longer to be the major supplier of United States sugar, he contended, "it's only fair that the domestic areas should have an accelerated growth."

Mr. Shields would not say whether this growth should be increased acreage to present growers or through the development of new beet-growing areas. The latter course, he said, is not simple since new areas would need new processing plants, costing about $15,000,000 each.

A study of Agriculture Department quota figures disclosed the 200,000-ton windfall to the Dominican Republic. Amendments to the Sugar Act, passed last week, virtually write this amount into law.

The amendments provide that, in replacing amounts cut from Cuba's quota, the President first must raise 1960 imports from five small-quota nations to 10,000 tons each. That will require 27,491 tons.

Of the remaining 672,509 tons, 15 per cent, or 100,876 tons, must be purchased from the Philippines. That leaves 571,633 tons to be bought from other quota nations in amounts prorated according to their present quotas.

By this reckoning, the Dominican Republic would get approximately 200,000 of the remaining 571,633 tons. Only Peru would get more. The Dominican Republic's normal 1960 quota is 81,457 tons.

None of these figures includes the 156,000 tons denied to Cuba in addition to the 700,000-ton cut. The smaller amount would have been the Cuban share of deficits in the Hawaiian and Puerto Rican quotas. This amount will be replaced by purchases from domestic producers, as provided by the Sugar Act amendments.

In the event that all of these sources are unable to replace the amounts lost to the United States market through the action against Cuba, the amendments authorize the President and the Secretary of Agriculture to seek sugar in the world market. Several countries, notably Brazil, are anxious to supply this.

CASTRO ATTACKS SUGAR QUOTA CUT AS 'IMPERIALISM'

Defies U. S. in Bitter Speech at Labor Rally—Economic Aggression Charged

Fri. 7-8-60

By R. HART PHILLIPS

Special to The New York Times.

HAVANA, July 7—Premier Fidel Castro today pictured Cuba as a small, valiant country standing firm under a staggering blow to its economy by an imperialistic United States.

The Premier spoke on television less than a day after President Eisenhower had reduced Cuba's 1960 sugar export to the United States by 856,000 tons. The President had accused the Castro regime of hostility toward the United States.

To compensate in part for the lost sales in the United States, the government pegged the sugar price at 3.25 cents a pound. However, experts here doubted that the measure would provide more than temporary relief from the economic blow dealt by Washington.

[The Cuban crisis had repercussions in widely different fields. In Washington, there were indications that the premium price paid the Cubans would prevail for sugar purchased under the quota that had been taken from Cuba. In the baseball world, Frank Shaughnessy, president of the International League, said the Havana Franchise would be shifted elsewhere.]

Crowd Display Anger

Addressing a mass labor meeting in the Workers Palace, Dr. Castro, the Premier, whipped the crowd of several thousand into displays of frenzied anger against the United States. He said Washington was attempting to "destroy the Cuban revolution."

Again and again during the two-and-a-half-hour speech the crowd exploded into shouts of "Cuba yes, Yankees no!"

Before the Premier spoke, the Minister of Labor, Maj. Augusto Martinez Sanchez, and various labor leaders called on the people to mass in front of the Presidential Palace Sunday to show their support of the regime. The Premier is scheduled to speak over television and radio again tomorrow night.

Dr. Castro put full blame for the deterioration of relations between Cuba and the United States on Washington. He declared the problems of Cuba were due to the fact that "powerful North American interests wish to exploit our people."

"The United States wishes to rule Cuba," he shouted as the crowd responded.

United States policy toward Cuba will boomerang, the Premier declared. The only thing the United States will achieve, Dr. Castro said, is the "antipathy of the entire world" while the world's admiration for the Cuban revolution will increase.

"Economic Aggression" Scored

Referrin to the cutting off of Cuban sugar imports by the United Statese, Dr. Castro said Cuba "cannot be brought to its knees" by economic aggression.

Turning to another subject, the Premier spoke bitterly of "traitors" and "deserters" of the revolution. He denounced those who were firm supporters of the revolutionary regime when it took power in January, 1959, and have since defected.

He mentioned no names, but a major part of his tirade was directed at Dr. José Miro Cardona, the first Premier of the revolutionary regime. Dr. Miro Cardona sought asylum in the Argentine Embassy last Tuesday because of "ideological divergencies" with the Government.

The Premier linked these "traitors" with the "war criminals" of the Batista regime under the "same boss—the United States State Department."

Dr. Castro declared it would avail the United States nothing to try to gain greater friendship with Mexico by buying there sugar barred from Cuba. He said Mexico remembered that the United States took half her territory and assassinated many of her people.

Dr. Castro made no reference to his recent threats to confiscate all United States property in Cuba. A law making this possible has been approved.

Today various labor groups, including electrical workers, asked the Government to nationalize the Cuban Electric Company, a subsidiary of the American and Foreign Power Company of New York.

Meanwhile, José Pardo Llada, radio commentator who is said to speak for the Government, said thousands of Cubans were demanding the removal of the busts of Presidents McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt and Gen. Leonard Wood from the main part on Havana's Malecon Sea Drive. These "enemies of Cuba" should be replaced by Cuban patriots, Senor Pardo Llada shouted.

Radio Mambi, a Government station, heaped insults on President Eisenhower today. The station condemned President Eisenhower's expression of friendship for the Cuban people.

"Does the cynical Public enemy No. 1, murderer and gangster of the United States dare to imply that the Cuban people are not supporting Fidel Castro," the commentator shouted.

The broadcast ended with a call to the people to go to the Presidential Palace Sunday "to confront the monstrous burglar of Yankee imperialism."

It was learned today that the Castro revolutionary movement had sought political asylum in the Honduras Embassy. He was an employe of the National Institute of Agrarian Reform.

Crowd Display Anger

Addressing a mass labor meeting in the Workers Palace, Dr. Castro, the Premier, whipped the crowd of several thousand into displays of frenzied anger against the United States. He said Washington was attempting to "destroy the Cuban revolution."

Again and again during the two-and-a-half-hour speech the crowd exploded into shouts of "Cuba yes, Yankees no!"

Before the Premier spoke, the Minister of Labor, Maj. Augusto Martinez Sanchez, and various labor leaders called on the people to mass in front of the Presidential Palace Sunday to show their support of the regime. The Premier is scheduled to speak over television and radio again tomorrow night.

Dr. Castro put full blame for the deterioration of relations between Cuba and the United States on Washington. He declared the problems of Cuba were due to the fact that "powerful North American interests wish to exploit our people."

"The United States wishes to rule Cuba," he shouted as the crowd responded.

United States policy toward Cuba will boomerang, the Premier declared. The only thing the United States will achieve, Dr. Castro said, is the "antipathy of the entire world" while the world's admiration for the Cuban revolution will increase.

"Economic Aggression" Scored

Referrin to the cutting off of Cuban sugar imports by the United Statese, Dr. Castro said Cuba "cannot be brought to its knees" by economic aggression.

Turning to another subject, the Premier spoke bitterly of "traitors" and "deserters" of the revolution. He denounced those who were firm supporters of the revolutionary regime when it took power in January, 1959, and have since defected.

He mentioned no names, but a major part of his tirade was directed at Dr. José Miro Cardona, the first Premier of the revolutionary regime. Dr. Miro Cardona sought asylum in the Argentine Embassy last Tuesday because of "ideological divergencies" with the Government.

The Premier linked these "traitors" with the "war criminals" of the Batista regime under the "same boss—the United States State Department."

Dr. Castro declared it would avail the United States nothing to try to gain greater friendship with Mexico by buying there sugar barred from Cuba. He said Mexico remembered that the United States took half her territory and assassinated many of her people.

Dr. Castro made no reference to his recent threats to confiscate all United States property in Cuba. A law making this possible has been approved.

Today various labor groups, including electrical workers, asked the Government to nationalize the Cuban Electric Company, a subsidiary of the American and Foreign Power Company of New York.

Meanwhile, José Pardo Llada, radio commentator who is said to speak for the Government, said thousands of Cubans were demanding the removal of the busts of Presidents McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt and Gen. Leonard Wood from the main part on Havana's Malecon Sea Drive. These "enemies of Cuba" should be replaced by Cuban patriots, Senor Pardo Llada shouted.

Premier Fidel Castro

Radio Mambi, a Government station, heaped insults on President Eisenhower today. The station condemned President Eisenhower's expression of friendship for the Cuban people.

"Does the cynical Public enemy No. 1, murderer and gangster of the United States dare to imply that the Cuban people are not supporting Fidel Castro," the commentator shouted.

The broadcast ended with a call to the people to go to the Presidential Palace Sunday "to confront the monstrous burglary of Yankee imperialism."

It was learned today that Pelayo Cuerdo, a member of the Castro revolutionary movement had sought political asylum in the Honduras Embassy. He was an employe of the National Institute of Agrarian Reform.

Khrushchev Offers Cuba All-Out Help

Washington, D.C.

Premier's Promise Also Warns U. S. Not to Intervene

Sun. 7-10-60

By Stanley Johnson

MOSCOW, July 9 (AP) Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev pledged all-out suport for Cuba today in its struggle with the United States. He declared that the U.S.S.R. now has rocket power capable of hitting America's heartland if the "Pentagon dare start an intervention" in Cuba.

He said the time of American dictation in Latin American affairs is over and the Soviet Union is "raising its voice and extending a helpful hand to the people of Cuba fighting for their independence.""

"We must serve a warning that today is not the time when the imperialists robbed and shared the world at their discretion." Khrushchev declared. "We shall do everything to support Cuba in her struggle.

'Not So Unreachable'

"Now the United States is not so unreachable as it once was. Speaking figuratively, in case of necessity, Soviet artillery can support with their rocket fire the Cuban people if aggressive forces in the Pentagon dare to start intervention against Cuba."

Khrushchev charged American policy seeks to strangle Cuba with an economic blockade. "We will help our Cuban brothers fight an economic blockade and the blockade will be a failure," he said.

The warning was made in a bristling speech to a meeting of schoolteachers in the Kremlin and was the boldest and most direct challenge to the Monroe Doctrine since that cornerstone of United States foreign policy was issued Dec. 2, 1823. The Doctrine lays down the policy that the United States will not tolerate any interference from powers outside the Western Hemisphere in the affairs of North and South America.

It was last challenged by Britain in 1893 over intervention in Venezuela but London backed away when the United States threatened war.

Khrushchev's warning of a rocket attack on the continental United States appeared to diplomats here to be an almost scornful demand that the United States follow Soviet wishes in its relations with Cuba.

Sun. 7-10-60

Suez Threat Recalled

The warning was strikingly similar to rocket threats against Britain and France in 1956 during the Suez incident. The Soviet Union has always claimed this warning forced those countries to back away, leaving the Canal in Egyptian hands.

To diplomats here it appeared inevitable a claim would now be made of having intimidated the United States and prevented intervention in Cuba.

Amid the cheers of the teachers, Khrushchev said the recent Soviet rocket tests in the Pacific showed Russia can hit with pinpoint accuracy targets some 8000 miles distant from her launching pads and thus can strike the United States.

"The men in the Pentagon should not forget," he said, "as the latest test showed, we now have rockets which are able to hit a given target at a distance of 30,000 kilometers (18,640 miles)." Challenged on this figure, he said: "I want to correct this. The distance is 13,000 (8077 miles)." He said he wanted the correct information to go to the Pentagon and "13,000 is far enough."

(The United States on May 20 launched an Atlas ballistic missile that traveled 9000 miles from Cape Canaveral, Fla., into the Indian Ocean.)

The speech was Khrushchev's first since his return yesterday from a visit to Austria where his attacks against the West prompted the United States and West Germany to protest he had violated Austrian neutrality. The Soviet Premier reversed the charge:

"If somebody is interfering in the internal affairs of another country, then it is the United States in Cuba.

"The United States is now, evidently, scheming perfidious criminal measures against the Cuban people. It is clear to everyone, that the economic blockade by the American monopolists might mark the beginning of preparations for intervention against Cuba.

"The Socialist (Communist) states and all peoples who are for peace will support the Cuban people in their just struggle and no one will succeed in enslaving the Cubans.

"If you want, this is a warning to those who would like to solve international problems by force and not by reason."

Khrushchev assailed Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York on the ground he suggested economic reprisals against Cuba. This, the Soviet Premier described as a flagrant example of "monopolist mentality."

"The people of Latin American countries are living in poverty because American monopolists are living in richness," he declared.

Touching on the question of American military bases aboard, Khrushchev said the example of Austria shows that the peoples of uncommitted countries are more confident in their security than the states which have "foreign war abses" in their territories.

Trujillo Given Dominican U.N. Post

CIUDAD TRUJILLO, Dominican Republic (AP) — Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo, ruler of the Dominican Republic for 30 years, was appointed Thursday to head its delegation to the 1960 U.N. General Assembly.

The appointment was made by the President Joaquin Balaguer. Balaguer, who had been vice president, moved up Wednesday after Rafael's brother, Hector, president since 1952, quit the office on grounds he was ill.

Balaguer immediately deposed Trujillo relatives from the command of the armed forces and the secretaryship of the presidential office. He told Congress his main job will be "continuing the process of democratization."

He said his government sought to bring about an atmosphere "that will guarantee the Dominican people the opportunity to elect officials of their choice."

He repeated a Trujillo pledge of free city and provincial elections next Dec. 15 and a fair presidential election in August 1962, when his own term runs out. He promised to push agrarian reform started by the generalissimo.

Rafael Trujillo only this week announced he was leaving his office in the National Palace and withdrawing to his country estate. He had previously given up the jobs of head of the Dominican party and chief of the armed forces.

Government sources said he will go to New York before the Assembly begins its three-month 15th annual session Sept. 20. They said he is to head the Dominican delegation because the Assembly will deal with questions of vital importance to Latin America's future. He headed it once before, in early 1953, after turning over the presidency to his brother.

There were unofficial reports that Hector Trujillo would become the ambassador to some country in Europe.

Speculation was that the Trujillos had been moved from center stage to quiet criticism abroad and lessen the likelihood of inter American action on Venezuela's charges that the Trujillos planned

Big Reception in Washington

The Pittsburgh Courier

156th Anniversary for Haiti

Pittsburgh, Jan 8, 1960

WASHINGTON—Haiti, the second country in the New World to receive its independence, celebrated its 156th anniversary.

The anniversary reception was held in the Congressional Room of the Statler Hotel.

The last group of French troops surrendered on the island of Haiti late in December, 1803, and the little nation of colored people declared its independence on Jan. 1, 1804. Their freedom came a little less than a quarter of a century after the United States had won its freedom.

■

THE CELEBRATION was held Jan. 2, one day late, because of the several receptions held by African countries on New Year's Day.

In commenting on this reception, Haitian Ambassador Ernest Bonhomme said, "We are the third Negro country which has won its independence on the first day of the year." The others are the Sudan, which became independent three years ago, and the French Cameroon, which received its independence this year.

■

GUESTS WERE received by Ambassador and Mrs. Bonhomme, Haiti's Ambassador to the Organization of American States and Mrs. Lucien Hibbert, and OAS Secretary to the Delegation of Haiti and Mrs. Fern Baguidy.

Among the diplomats in attendance were the Ambassadors of Chile, Austria, Italy, Venezuela, Dominican Republic, Saudi Arabia and Ethiopia, the Cuban Prime Minister and the Charge D'Affaires of Uruguay.

Haiti Opposition Leaders Join to Overthrow Regime

18e(4)

The Pittsburgh Courier

By LYNN GROSSBERG

Pittsburgh, Pa.

NEW YORK—In a prepared statement that was to have gone out to some 40,000,000 Americans over a TV network, three of Haiti's most popular leaders, defeated as presidential candidates in what they brand as an Army-rigged election, proclaimed their solidarity against the increasingly hated and bankrupt Duvalier regime.

They promised to use the influence of their parties, which have the largest followings in all classes of the nation, to overthrow the present dictatorship by democratic means. With the aid of the Army this could be effectuated as Louis Dejoie commands the business community, Daniel Fignole the masses of Port-au Prince and Dr. Gaston Jumelle, in the name of his deceased brothers who died in the underground fight against Francois Duvalier, an important intellectual segment.

■

THE HAITIAN leaders in exile went a long way in resolving their country's fracticidal political internal warfare in making known their willingness to work together in a permanent government. They proclaim their lessons learned from past mistakes which necessitated six provisional governments within six months after their overthrow of President Magloire in 1956.

Hitherto, attempts to work together have failed. They are now meeting regularly three times a week with other Haitian leaders including Dr. Emile St. Lot, who resigned as ambassador to Ethiopia where he was put out of the way by the Duvalier clique and Sen. Luc Stephen, one of six senators crushed by the actual government.

This new development in the turbulent Caribbean area is of special significance in that the American government has backed up the present ruthless group in power for lack of something better to take its place and in fear of a recurrence of past bloody politiacl feuds among the other candidates.

■

EX-PRESIDENT Daniel Fignole, ex- Minister of Interior Max Bolte, representing Louis Dejoie and Dr. Gaston Jumelle, standard bearer for his brother Clement who died in embassy asylum, appeared together for the ABC-TV documentary "Paradise in Chains", to make the joint statement.

This concluding portion of the film, however, the part given the most advance publicity, was cut out at the last minute, giving the appearance of lack of solution to the Haitian problem while this enlightening tape sat in the drawer.

Bolte, Jumelle and Emile St. Lot are slated to go over the airwaves in a one hour forum moderated by Don Lewis in his well rated Sunday night "Controversy" in New York. The leaders have also received a requests to appear on another New York radio forum.

■

AGREED ON THE conducting of a free election, with assistance from the OAS, the candidates are discussing their differences in the form this election should take and the degree of international control. Fignole and Bolte are very adamant on direct elections, St. Lot leans towards local councils and Jumelle a National Assembly decision.

They have no question on their desire for the speedy overthrow of the detested Duvalier reign that has been responsible for many killings and suppresion of the normally gay spirits of the colorful Haitian people. Thousands of Haitians in exile await the day that the U. S. government withdraws all support of the men in power and they fall of their own weight.

Disliked U.S. Supplies 25% Haitian Budget

Chicago Defender P.10

Chicago Ill.

By ANTONY ROUSE

PORT AU PRINCE, HAITI — (UPI) — The Haitian Economy is just barely alive, nourished by endless life-saving injections of aid from the United States.

Ninety per cent of the 3.4-million population of this Negro republic does not know this, or is not interested. Of the educated and half-educated 10 per cent, some are aware of American aid, and a few are grateful —and almost all feel that the United States should do more for them.

18e(4)

12-(17-23)-60

Visitors find the beauty of green hills and blue water, the warmth of the sun and people, the cock-fighting of Medieval Europe and voodoo from the Haitian's ancestral Africa.

But for the Haitian Government there is an ailing economy which has been getting steadily sicker since the Republic's Negroes and Mulattos combined, in a rare moment of unity, to drive out their French rulers 150 years ago.

HIGH MORTALITY P.10

Disease, particularly tuberculosis, is widespread. And "there is a limit," a nurse said bitterly, "to the amount you can do with aspirin."

In its laconic "deaths today" column, a newspaper lists seven names. One is an adult. One is a child of nine. The remainder are under two years of age.

But in spite of this high mortality rate, the population increases and Haiti already has a population density of 312 persons per square mile—equal to that of India.

To ease the chronic economic crisis here, the United States has given Haiti over $40 million in the past 10 years. Last year, apart from loans and technical assistance, it contributed $6.8 million to the Haitian economy —equivalent to about 25 per cent of the national annual budget.

DEVELOPING RURAL AREAS

The United States has given Haiti food and medicine. It is developing Haiti's rural areas and has financed, among other things, a large flood control and irrigation project.

In time, this should give Haiti a much-needed hydroelectric system.

To the Haitian who has had some education (only one child in six receives even the vestige of a formal education) American means the color problem.

HATE U. S. COLOR BAR

"I dislike them (Americans) because they dislike me," one Haitian said. The integration problems in New Orleans received ample press coverage here, an the deduction is that Americans look down on colored people and fight to prevent their receiving an education.

The rare Haitian who has money frequently has some strange ideas about the effects of the United States on his personal income.

To the boy carrying the tourist's suitcase to an $18-a-day hotel room, the tourist is a millionaire. The boy probably is earning the minimum wage of 70 U. S. cents a day.

Ask a Haitian who has money what he thinks of Americans, and he probably says that he likes and appreciates them. Press him and he complains "they have no manners." Press him further and you hear the stock criticism that American tourists wear shorts in Haiti's capital city.

"RICH UNCLE" NEVER

The complaints, the misunderstandings, the petty criticisms of the United States are probably inevitable. They were much the same in Europe when that continent was receiving Marshall Plan aid, a European diplomat pointed out.

But there is occasional gratitude voiced for American aid in the past. For example, when Hurricane Hazel devastated parts of Haiti in 1954.

Fortunately, there is something more important than all this.

Your knowledge of it comes as you walk along a dusty road in the blazing afternoon, wiping perspiration from your face. It comes with the sudden brilliant smile of sympathy on the face of the man passing you.

You are perhaps an American wearing shorts in his capital city. He is a Haitian. Neither fact matters. What matters to the Haitian is that you are a human being who is clearly damnably hot.

Haiti Split by Its Color Prejudices While Facing Collapse From Within

By Tom Wolfe
Staff Reporter

The way an eligible, ebony-hued Haitian bachelor and a proper peaches-and-cream Memphis (Tenn.) debutante can go into a hip-wrenching merengue on the dance floor of a Port-au-Prince resort—without anybody forming a committee either to put a stop to this or give them a brotherhood medal—makes Haiti look like an Eden for race relations.

Many Americans give their racial inhibitions a two-week vacation in Haiti. By and large, blacks and whites get along smoothly in this Negro nation all year long.

Yet among the Haitians themselves the color barrier is a major national problem—more serious than in the United States and probably further from a solution.

The friction in Haiti is not white against black. The white Americans and Europeans, or blancs as they are called in Creole, comprise a little caste off to one side.

In race-troubled Haiti the spectrum runs from the blacks, or noirs, to the mulattoes, or mulattes, who make up an elite caste comprising probably not more than 5 per cent of the nation.

Staff reporter Wolfe recently returned from a tour of the Caribbean nations. This is the last of three articles on Haiti.

Few Haitian mulattes would dream of spending a day out in the sun on one of Haiti's dazzling white sand beaches. One occasionally sees mulatte women whose faces have taken on a striking pallor—from staying so conscientiously in the shade.

In Haiti, the world's first Negro republic, light skin is a passport not only to wealth and position but to culture, art and all the intangible enrichments of life.

In a curiously revealing twist of the tongue, lower class Haitians will tend to call a rich and successful noir a "big mulatte" and a down-and-out mulatte a "little Neg."

Color prejudices dating back a century and a half to French colonial days still split Haiti in the very hour in which the nation could collapse from within unless all elements pull together with something approaching pioneer zeal.

Noirs in Control

Politically the noirs have risen up and taken over in the past 10 years. Francois Duvalier's government is a "black" government.

Propaganda links Haiti with the "emerging nations" of Africa. Government ethnologists—"high priests," sneer Haitian cynics—are exalting the Voodoo religion, apparently because of its African origins.

When an American firm in Port-au-Prince picked a coffee-colored employe as queen of its float in a beauty pageant, the government stepped in. "Pick a darker girl," came the adviso.

Yet, if anything, the political triumph of the noirs" has intensified racial trouble. The mulatte caste still has the lion's share of both this world's goods and social status.

A young noir intellectual remarked dourly: "Some of our people talk about a 'black renaissance'—and keep an eye out for a nice mulatte girl to marry."

Mulatte Elite Entrenching

The mulatte elite is tending to entrench even further in the face of the noir threat to its status. Mulattes are typically more contemptuous of the poverty-stricken black masses than compassionate.

In Haiti, where a very few dollars and a very few milligrams of pigment can make all the difference, it is apparently felt to be risky to fritter away one's advantages in largesse.

In an abstract way all Haitians have the same pride in their nation as the world's first independent Negro nation. Yet just as the noirs are now being urged to identify themselves with Africa, so the mulattes have always identified themselves with Europe.

It is not unusual to hear a mulatte remark to a white, without any very clear explanation: "I'm really French, you know."

The intense status striving of the mulattes is repeated in subtle forms within the ranks of the noirs. The fact that almost everyone is in the same fix—poverty—only seems to make minute status distinctions more important.

Ability to speak, read or write French, like the mulattes, automatically sets a noir above the predominantly Creole-speaking masses around him as well as giving him a shot at better jobs.

A blanc educator who tried to teach Haitian peasants systematic Creole—since, by any statistical standard, that is the nation's language—found them opposed to the idea and concluded:

"As bad off as most of those people were, they were worried because they considered Creole socially inferior to French and so they wanted to learn French."

Hard Work Frowned Upon

Similarly, in the countryside where everybody's muscles are needed to eke out an existence, Haitians have evolved a complex system of work roles—all based on nothing more than the fact that the less manual labor a man has to do, the higher his status.

A 35-year-old blanc missionary working among the peasantry told this reporter she had had countless experiences like the following:

"I asked a 14-year-old boy to please bring me the broom. He just sat there, pouting. I couldn't figure out what was wrong. Then he told me, 'Carrying brooms is for ti mouns'—little boys. I had insulted him.

"I asked an 18-year-old boy to move some benches for me, and that turned out to be work for 14-year-olds. I had to move the benches myself. By the time they're 25—still as poor as can be—they don't want to lift a thing."

Education Has Drawbacks

Education, another potent giver of status, can have sad side effects, too.

A Haitian doctor said, "I'm afraid many of our nurses here have a different attitude from yours in the United States. When a poor, illiterate peasant is waiting for the nurse, he may have to wait a long time and she may look down her nose at him.

"For the average Haitian girl, becoming a nurse is a greater step up in life than you can probably imagine, and her first impulse may not be 'noblesse oblige', but 'Look, I have risen above you.'"

What to do about such picayune status striving—in a land that can't afford it—has Haiti's most selfless and dedicated people stumped.

Much of it—like much of the noir-mulatte color prejudice—would fade away if only the people had more money and education.

Which, in Haiti, brings us wearily back to where we started.

New Revolution Try Reported in Haiti

Pittsburgh, Pa. 18e (4)

Sat 6-25-60

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti —New evolutionay attempts, directed at the Duvalier government, were reported from Port-Au-Prince, where security forces uncovered a depot of arms, machine guns and grenades recently.

● According to well-informed sources, the July 28, 1958 palace-besieging incident was "child's play," compared to the latest plot.

Security forces, following the smallest movements and meetings of the insurgents, uncovered the plot which sought to direct government forces out of the capital by creating serious disorders in different parts of the country.

■

ONCE THE CAPITAL was without protection, an expeditionary force backed by foreign arms and ammunition, intended to attempt seizure of Port-au-Prince.

Government interception of a coded letter to Dejoie, asking for planes, revealed the plan.

● LeJour, a semi-official French newspaper, claimed that recent government arrests of some state employes was tied in with the Dejoie plot.

By first reports, 120 employes were dismissed at Customs by [illegible] guards with 60 arre[illegible] for thievery. The arrests followed revelations by a special investigating committee, last month, that the payroll was being padded with government supporters, who supplied jobs to many unemployed persons.

■

THE ARRESTS created unrest in the city, and that afternoon a bomb was exploded in the customs house.

With a reform inevitable in ither state and communal services, additional arrests of other employes and public functionaries who are holding their jobs because of politics, looms certain.

EN GARDE!—The Prefecture of Port au Prince, Lucien Chauvet, top leader of the security forces which broke up an anti-government plot in Haiti, seems ready for action as he sits on top of a parked car during a demonstration.

FORMER HAITI ENVOY ACQUITTED IN KILLING

The New York Times 1960

Special to The New York Times.

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, June 26—André Toussaint, former first secretary of the Haitian Embassy in Washington, was acquited Sunday of murder in the killing of the embassy's minister counselor, Samuel Devieux.

M. Toussaint, a former coast guard officer, who shot M. Devieux to death in the embassy office April 14, 1958, was freed after a two-day trial. The trial aroused so much public interest that armed soldiers were brought in on the second day to hold back hundreds of persons who were trying to crowd into the Palace of Justice.

A long list of witnesses, including Fern Baguidy, present minister counselor at the embassy in Washington, testified. The testimony established the fact that M. Devieux had been instrumental in having M. Toussaint dismissed from his position after having falsely accused him of serving as an agent of Daniel Fignole, exiled political leader.

M. Toussaint, 41 years old, spent more than two years in prison awaiting trial. He was defended by six of Haiti's leading lawyers.

HAITI'S AID NEEDS DECLARED URGENT

Eisenhower Project Could Meet State's Worsening Condition, Officials Say

By DANA ADAMS SCHMIDT

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 17—Growing political tensions in Haiti, a slowly deteriorating economy and a resentful President, Dr. François Duvalier, in that Caribbean country are worrying the United States Government.

Some officials see Haiti as one of the most urgent candidates for the kind of aid President Eisenhower suggested last Monday for Latin America.

The central feature of General Eisenhower's program, these officials said, will probably be t he provision of funds with which Latin-American governments could set up agricultural credit facilities. Farmers for the first time would be able to get credit to develop new land and crops and to buy homes.

In Haiti, adjacent to the Dominican Republic and flanked by Cuba, the arrest on Friday of Clement Barbot, chief of the secret police and private secretary to President Duvalier, added an unexplained element to a long period of political violence and recrimination.

A year ago during the illness of Dr. Duvalier, M. Barbot was considered the unofficial chief executive of the country.

New Plotting Accusations

The arrest followed the assassination last March of Dr. Roger Rousseau, general director of the Public Health Service, and the expulsion ten days ago of two frenchmen, Marcel Vive and Emile Weber de Fourcault, on charges of anti-Government plotting.

The tone of Government-inspired press comment of Port-au-Prince was set by a speech by Dr. Duvalier June 23 in which he expressed chagrin at what he called the inadequacy of United States aid and implied that Haiti must choose between "two great poles of attraction in the world today to concretize her needs."

The press made it clear that the illusion was to the United States and the Communist bloc and that the Duvalier regime was saying that the slowness and insufficiency of United States aid abetted communism.

Haiti's population density is almost as great as that of India and the Haitian standard of living is low. In Haiti, 3,750,000 Negroes and mulattos are crowded 308 to the square mile, the densest population rate in the Western Hemisphere. The figure for India is 301. Haiti's average yearly income is $65 to $70, compared with about $60 in India.

President Duvalier said in his June 23 speech that his country was "exhausted." Haiti, he said, is "rotting in misery, hunger, nudity, sickness and illiteracy with a Government fighting unprecedented economic and financial difficulties." His country, he said, needs a "massive injection of money."

Obstacles to Current Aid

But application of the current United States aid program, which has pumped about $70,000,000 into Haiti since 1950, is lagging because of disputes over personnel policies. In addition, the Haitians have found it hard to understand United States insistence on "feasibility studies" and engineering surveys before actually starting work.

Norman Ward, assistant chief for the International Cooperation Administration in the Artibonite Valley irrigation project, was recalled to Washington six weeks ago because the Haitian Government took exception to his outspoken views.

He had complained that a political appointee had replaced a qualified senior technician on the project in spite of a United States-Haitian agreement governing hiring.

As a result of this dispute, the Development Loan Fund has suspended a $4,300,000 loan to enlarge irrigated areas in the valley, this would have extended work already done with $27,000,000 in Export-Import Bank loans.

Development Loan Fund projects for a $3,000,000 sugar mill and a $300,000 road survey have also been held up by differences over hiring.

'We Belong To Africa,' Says Haiti

By HAROLD L. KEITH
(Courier Managing Editor)

Sat 10-8-60

Lost amid the torrent of words hurled by representatives of the world's great powers in the current UN General Assembly was the revealing statement that Haiti considers herself "a rightful member of the Organization of African States."

• Notwithstanding the power and influence of the western and soviet blocs, the fact remains that each nation has just one vote in the UN body.

The declaration of Dr. Aurele Joseph, head of the Haitian UN delegation could be taken to mean that his country might cast its votes in favor of African proposals if called upon to do so.

DR. JOSEPH asserted, "Haiti, an extension of Black Africa in the Caribbean Basin, and the second independent state of the American continent, is very conscious of her ethnic origin, and for more than 150 years, has been vigorously defending the originality of her deeply African culture.

• "Since she fought alongside Simon Bolivar, the immortal Liberatador, in the emancipation of Latin America, and since her sons died at Savannah in the cause of American independence, Haiti's interest is deepening in the cause of Black Africa which has answered the call of freedom.

"American by her geographic position, active member of the Organization of American States, still African by race and culture and rightful member of the future Organization of African States, Haiti will not fail in her historic mission as a bridge between two worlds which are inspired by the same ideals of freedom, brotherhood and human solidarity."

THE POLITICAL significance of Dr. Joseph's proclamation cannot be underestimated.

• It is true that Haiti has more than a perfunctory interest in Africa. Not only has she ties to the vast French-speaking areas of the mother Continent, but she too, has deep rooted cultural ties as Dr. Joseph pointed out.

In the deliberations which will come before the UN in the future, Haiti's vote could be decisive if she chooses to vote along African lines of "positive neutrality" rather than in league with her fellow Latin American states.

And the attitude of the other Latin-American states will also be colored somewhat in the future by the fact that many of them, including Brazil, the Guianas, Colombia, and Venezuela, have heavy Negro populations.

Haiti Would Welcome Negro Ambassadors

HOUSTON — Ambassador Ernest Justin Bonhomme to the United States from Haiti, in Houston to be the main speaker Wednesday night for the annual YMCA dinner said at a press conference that his country would welcome a Negro ambassador.

Mr Bonhomme said, at one time there were two Negroes who had been mentioned as men who could ably serve as an envoy to his country. Those in the know believe the United States is going to have to up its number of Negro ambassadors from the two who are serving in Roumania and Guinea because of the diplomacy need to be demonstrated in sending them to certain countries.

The Haitian statesman said there have been a number of Negro officials who have worked for the Haitian government.

"Most Haitians have the wrong idea of the racial problem in the United States. It takes time to realize what is and what is not," Mr Bonhomme related and he said on the other hand there are misconceptions about racial prejudices in Haiti as in other countries.

"The picture on the other side of the iron curtain, would want it believed that lynching in the United States was an everyday affair," the ambassador pointed up.

One Out Of Twenty

There are some 200 students participating in the governmental student exchange program, but it was learned only about one out of 20 American students going to Haiti were Negro students.

Mr Bonhomme said the launching of the first Russian satellite did not have an impact on the science program in his country. He also said the revenues in Haiti could not support strong public school systems, but the private schools did fairly well in training for those who are able to pay for it on the elementary and secondary levels.

The ambassador admitted that he had been in the United States for 14 months and had spent only a short time in Haiti since Dr Fidel Castro's rise to power in Cuba, but he had observed that the new prime minister had "a lot of appeal for a lot of people in all walks of life." "I have met him and find him to be a likeable person," stated Mr Bonhomme, but he added, "so many of the things he has done and is doing is hard to understand. He is not helping freedom in the things he is doing."

Mr Bonhomme related things are quite quiet in Haiti today, which means the government is able to direct more of its efforts toward security. He said those who might have hoped to overthrow the government through violent means have less hope of such an uprising at this time.

The ambassador spoke in friendly praise of the US, he said through America, some 70,000 Haitians were saved from starvation during the drought last year. He was high in United States praise for a $6 Million grant extended to Haiti.

He said it was difficult to answer the question concerning Dr Castro and Communism," but when I see a man that walks like a duck and makes noises the same as a duck, I am inclined to think he is a duck."

Mr Bonhemme indicated there is fear in a communist infiltration because a communist infiltration could cause trouble which might mean almost life or death even in the United States.

DUVALIER ASSAILS HAITI CORRUPTION

President Warns Officials of Crackdown—Justice Department a Target

By EDWARD C. BURKS

Special to The New York Times.

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, March 11—President François Duvalier assailed today what he called the arrogant, dishonest and grasping tactics of some public servants in his Government.

In a letter addressed to the Secretary of State for Justice and to bureau heads, the President criticized "detestable practices."

He threatened a cracktown on the "adventurers" unless they creased dishonest practices immediately. The wrongdoes were not specified but the tone of the President's statement was such as to indicate that dishonest practices among Justice Department personnel were widesdread.

The President said that each time he looked into details of the administration he found not only a weakness of the structure but also practices that undercut what his regime was trying to achieve.

"I was not elected by the population of the back country in orde rto distribute favors to some pseudo-citizens whose only ambition is to look for, collect and multiply advantages of all sorts," he said.

Many functionaries consider that their job is only an instrument to serve dishonest practices, he continued.

He accused dishonest employes of using their poisitons to serve their personal hate and to sow terror. The President described these employes as saboteurs of his policy of reconciliation and of raising professional standards.

He said he possessed a voluminous file of information on the wrongdoers and announced that he had decided to continue his "purification" program.

Today's statement is one of the most forceful President Duvalier has made since coming to power in 1957. It has not been published here yet but it is understood that the statement will appear in tomorrow's newspapers.

BIGGEST AID PLAN TO HAITI HALTED

Irrigation Funds Suspended by U.S. in Dispute Over Summary Dismissals

By EDWARD C. BURKS

Special to The New York Times.

Port-au-Prince, Haiti, March 16—The largest United States aid program in Haiti, a $4,300,000 irrigation project, has been suspended.

At issue is the question of whether the Haitian Government can summarily dismiss Haitian engineers and officials on the jointly controlled project ad hire replacements without the agreement of U. S. officials.

Harry W. Yoe, chief of the American economic aid program here, ordered the suspension of loan fund disbursements to the irrigation project. He acted after the Haitian Government's recent summary dismissal of a key Haitian engineer on the project.

The engineer, Nicolas St. Laurent, was highly regarded by Americans working on the project designed to irrigate 20,000 to 25,000 acres of the Artibonite Valley in central Haiti.

After M. St. Laurent had been dismissed without the filing of charges, the Haitian board of directors for the project hired two men without the agreement of United States officials.

One of the new men, who received a top executive post, was Antonio Rimpel, former public works director who had been seized while in ofice in 1958 and held in custody for about four months. No charges were filed against M. Rimpel, but his successor in the public works post accused him of irregularities.

M. Rimpel was named to a new post created by the Haitians. United States officials fear an unrestricted Haitian policy of creating new executive jobs and to discuss officials without charges could make a political plaything out of the project.

Mr. Yoe has been told by the Haitians, who had been hired March 3, that M. Rimpel has since resigned. The situation remains unresolved, however, because M. St. Laurent has not been reinstated and because the basic disagreement over personnel policies continues.

So far nothing has been published here about the suspension o fthe irrigation project loan. A touchy question of national sovereignty is in the background of the dispute, which is still being debated in friendly fashion.

The nUited States stand is that the loan was authorized with the written condition that United States economic aid officials would share in the supervision of the work, including personal policies.

U. S. TO SEND ARMS TO HAITI'S FORCES

Rifles and Transport Items to Be Shipped—Irrigation Project Is Halted

By JOHN W. FINNEY

Special to The New York Times

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Aug. 24—The United States will begin supplying military equipment to Haiti soon to help modernize her small, obsolete army. United States officials here disclosed that the United States had recently agreed to a request from Haiti for military assistance to re-equip her 5,000-man army.

In another phase of United States aid to Haiti, an ambitious and expensive United States assistance program to revitalize the faltering agricultural economy of Haiti through irrigation of the valley has come to a standstill because of differences between the Haitian and United States Governments.

The nature and amount of the military aid was not disclosed, but it was understood that transportation and communication equipment and modern infantry arms would be provided.

The Haitian army is now equipped with an odd assortment of rifles, some dating back to surplus stocks from the Spanish-American War that it received from the United States in 1915. With only a handful of jeeps and trucks, the army also is short of equipment to move troops through the small but mountainous country.

Shake-up rocks island regime

Baltimore, Md

By LYNN GROSSBERG

PORT - AU - PRINCE, Haiti —Within a week, the two most powerful and most feared leaders in Port-Au-Prince, Clement Barbot, the president's private secretary, and Lucien Chauvet the prefect, were arrested by the man they kept in power.

Barbot was transferred to Fort Dimanche, a detention camp for political prisoners outside the capital. His detention came after a period of surveillance in his home after his arrest ten days ago. He was suspected of planning a coup d'etat.

When Chauvet was arrested, he was taken before President Duvalier who told him: "It is only I who orders arrests for political crimes; the police are charged with suppressing civil crimes."

* * *

CHAUVET THEN was sent home under house arrest and surveillance. The two arrests caused a sensation here. The two men were considered the backbone of Duvalier's strength and the key to his power.

With their arrest, their private army grows thinner; the regular army again looms as a force to be reckoned with. The regular army is headed by young officers promoted from captains to colonels by the president.

One source said the President is building new homes for them Gen. Antony Kebreau, credited with seeing that Duvalier was made president, was the first to go when the ranks of senior officers were thinned.

It was Chauvet who rallied his forces to the Palace in July, 1958 when he received a midnight call from the besieged President that invading forces in control of the palace barracks were demanding surrender.

* * *

IT WAS iron - nerved Chauvet who ran to the President's side and, with Barbot, took command of the soldiers, then crawled on his belly across the firing line to ferret out the Miami, Fla. deputy sheriffs and the exiled Magloire lieutenants who brewed the plot.

Chauvet and Barbot crushed one plot after another. Now, they are under arrest.

Meanwhile, the ministers proposed construction of a jet airport, a new wharf and other projects to cost a total of $10 million. The Erwin Engineering Corp. of Miami is making plans and studies. John C. Peterson Co. of New York will handle construction.

Barbot's Terrorist Gang Disarmed

The Pittsburgh Courier

Haiti Secret Police Chief Arrested

Pittsburgh, Pa.

Oct. 7-3-60

PORT AU PRINCE, Haiti — The arrest of Secret Police Chief Clement Barbot and the disarming of his gang of terrorists mark a gigantic upset on the Haitian scene. This is the man who has done the most to keep D.r Francois Duvalier in power while at the same time costing him the most: lives, honor, reputation, following.

As whispers run through Port-au-Prince that the small, wiry man who had been seen so often at Duvalier's side with sub machine gun in hand, clad simply in civilian clothes or army khaki without insignia, had escaped to Europe via Kingston, Barbot's Syrian friends were being rounded up.

■

THOSE INCLUDED the young and handsome Syrian shop keepers Fusy Laham and Fred Attie who were among Barbot's closest friends.

These young men did not find the friendship unprofitable, it appears, as in the latest change of ownership of Haiti's one gambling casino they became business manager and supervisor, respectively. Anyone who wanted in on the casino had to go through Barbot.

Perhaps Duvalier's move had something to do with the murder last Mardi Gras of his friend Dr. Roger Rousseau, deposed public health director.

This is the word going strong around Port-au-Prince. At the time that high public official was machine-gunned down in front of his home, people believed the Palace itself was responsible.

Rumor was that Barbot was actually called in by the regular police for questioning but no one ever learned of any arrests made in connection with the grotesque killing.

■

NEXT TO the president, Barbot was considered the most powerful man in Haiti, and the most feared. Haiti was not run by law—but by a band of men who were the law.

This private civilian police was a counter-balance to the army as such undoubtedly resented by them.

The present young officers who run the Army were trained in the 40's by the U.S.Army, even as the Haitian soldiers are now being trained by a U.S. Marine Mission.

■

THEY ARE learning discipline and efficiency. The U.S. must certainly have brought pressure to bear to make it the only legal force in Haiti, the regular police are a part of the Army.

The resignation several weeks ago of the unpopular U.S. Ambassador to Haiti, Gerald Drew, may have signified this turning point.

Since the break down of the U.S. Point IV program and the expulsion of one of their key men from supervision of an important U.S. backed project, with a background of mounting complaints against terror tactics in the land, the U.S. has undoubtedly taken a firm stand.

Negro Minister Accused Of Revolt Plot in Jamaica

New York Herald Tribune

KINGSTON, Jamaica, Apr. 11 (UPI).—Police raids swept throughout Jamaica today in the wake of the arrest of a fifty-seven-year-old minister accused of conspiring to overthrow the government of this island.

The Rev. Claudius Henry, head of the African Reform Church in Jamaica, and ten of his followers were held for trial on treason charges. Police said they found an exchange of correspondence between the minister and the Fidel Castro government in Cuba, but refused to make known its contents.

Attacks Planned

On the basis of other correspondence found in Mr. Henry's files, cabinet members were alerted by police against possible assassination attempts. Police said the minister and his followers planned attacks on the House of Representatives, government buildings, police headquarters and even the King's House where the governor of Jamaica, Sir Kenneth Blackburn, and his family reside.

Police seized thousands of detonators, sticks of dynamite and guns and hundreds of sharpened machetes, swords and knives in raids on African Reform Church centers throughout Jamaica.

Police Official in N. Y.

Police Superintendent George Mullen, a former Scotland Yard official, returned late last night from a trip to New York believed to have been caused by information which came to him from files seized from the Negro minister's headquarters. It was reported a letter from a relative of Henry at New York was seized and that it asked the time for the revolutionary outbreak.

It was reported privately that Mr. Mullen sought the aid of the State Department at Washington and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to have certain Jamaicans now in the United States returned to Jamaica, where they are wanted in connection with the Henry investigation.

Bustamante quits party; wants out of federation

KINGSTON, Jamaica (ANP) —Evidently smarting over the fact that Jamaica will be subject to higher taxes for its share in the West Indian federation Sir Alexander Bustamante has resigned as leader of the West Indies Democratic Labor party.

Observers say Bustamante took the step in order to devote his energy to demanding that Jamaica withdraw from the West Indian federation.

U.S. Negroes Involved in Plot

The Pittsburgh Courier Pittsburgh, Pa. Sat. 7-23-60 P.3

N.Y. Police, Jamaica Hold Talks on Treason Suspects

NEW YORK — Secret exchanges are still going on between police authorities here and the Government in Jamaica, West Indies, concerning the background of a number of Negro American citizens who recently took part in an abortive attempt to overthrow the government of the Caribbean island.

Members of a bearded cult called "Rastafarian" and some of the Americans are now under arrest in the island charged with murder; others are being sought.

● Those arrested are Reynold Henry, Al Thomas, William Jeters, Leroy Malachi and Howard Rollins, who also claims the name Qasim Abdullah.

The other American citizens being sought are, David Ambrister, otherwise called David Kenyatta, and Lawrence Richburg (Titus Damons).

THE MEN WERE involved along with bearded Jamaican members of the cult in the murder of two white soldiers from England who were engaged in a manhunt of them, and also for the "execution" of three Jamaican Negro members of the cult.

The men were found shot in the head and buried one on top of the other in a common grave.

The Jamaican Government informed the local American Consulate-General of the position of the men and their need for legal representation.

REPORTS indicate that the American authorities will watch the case in order to report to the State Department but will not furnish attorneys for the men.

American citizens are expressly forbidden to take up arms in a foreign country or engage in treasonable activities. That was the reason given for the attitude of the American authorities there.

● Involvement of Americans in treasonable activities in the island has led to a tightening up of the entry of Negro American citizens into the island.

This is being done as a security measure despite the complete bias-free atmosphere of which the island had boasted so long.

POINTS OF EXIT from the island are also being closely watched to prevent the escape of cultists involved in the murders and other terrorist activities.

The Jamaican police are endeavoring to get a complete tabulation of all the Americans involved. They are in touch with police authorities here in New York in order to get filled in on their background and the activities of their cult.

Aim of the torrorists had been to establish a "Negro paradise" in the island. Papers found on some of them indicated that they had been in touch with the Castro Government in Cuba. They had also smuggled in such arms as automatic weapons and explosives.

Mr. K's Shadow Over Korea

By Edward Neilan

Seoul, Korea

Reports that Soviet Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev will visit North Korea early in October have contributed to the general air of sobriety that followed the election Aug. 12 by a joint session of the National Assembly of Yoon Bo Sun as South Korea's second President.

The only other Korean President was Syngman Rhee, whose 12-year reign collapsed following April 19 and subsequent student uprisings.

select a Cabinet to administer the government.

Mr. Yoon succeeded Chough Pyung Ok as leader of the Democrats' old faction upon the latter's passing on in Washington in February of this year, one month prior to the March 15 elections in which he was to oppose Mr. Rhee for the presidency. Mr. Yoon is expected to name "new faction" leader John M. Chang as Premier. Dr. Chang was Mr. Chough's running mate and was defeated by Lee Ki Poong in the rigged March 15 elections that set off violence.

Dr. Chang had defeated Mr. Lee by 200,000 votes in 1956 to support Mr. Yoon to "demonstrate unity of the party." Some observers here still believe, however, Mr. Yoon will name another "old faction" representative, Kim Do Yun, as Premier.

"Now that I am elected I am no longer a man of any specific party or faction," said Mr. Yoon. "I will take an impartial stand." Mr. Yoon told an informal press meeting following his election Aug. 12 that he meant what he said.

Mr. Yoon immediately submitted his resignation as a member of the Democratic Party Supreme Committee and also as member of the House of Representatives. He said he would consult representatives of all groups in the legislature before announcing his choice for Premier.

Considerable significance is attached here to the Khrushchev-visit announcement, which served as a reminder of grim days ahead for the republic. The visit comes roughly 15 years after the Soviet occupation of North Korea following World War II. It reaffirms the dominance of Soviet influence in North Korea vis-à-vis that of Communist China.

This was also stated last week by 2d Lt. Nak Hyun Chung, who flew his MIG-15 jet fighter to South Korea Aug. 3. He said there are many Soviet advisers in North Korea.

Most observers here say Mr. Khrushchev and North Korean leaders will discuss prospects for taking advantage of the weakened situation in South Korea before the new government can consolidate itself in the face of a harsh winter.

It was the Korean war which firmed South Korean's resistance to Communism in a period when suspicion of American intentions had been strong. The Communists are not likely to repeat the 1950 mistake.

Korea was a crucial issue in the 1952 campaign, when Republicans promised to end the war. Mr. Khrushchev's presence so close to the election could cause Korea and United States policies here to become an issue once again.

17-Year-Old Boys of Italian Descent Praise Their Slum Neighbors After Return

Sunt 3-60

By MURRAY ILLSON

Seven teen-age youths of Italian descent returned from a five-day trip to Puerto Rico yesterday with praise for the commonwealth and its people.

The 17-year-old boys live in an East Harlem slum area where Italian and Puerto Rican gangs sometimes engage in bloody rumbles. The boys were guests of the commonwealth as part of a program to create better understanding between the two groups.

They had been chosen to make the trip by the East Harlem Puerto Rican-Italian Good Neighbor Committee. The committee is headed by City Magistrate Manuel A. Gomez, who is of Puerto Rican parentage, and Edward Corsi of the State Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board. Mr. Corsi is of Italian descent.

Youths Meet Here

Six of the youths met at LaGuardia House, a community center at 311 East 116th Street, to discuss plans for forming a junior committee to lessen or eliminate neighborhood tensions. It was their first meeting since their return by air from Puerto Rico Friday night.

Joseph Proto of 424 East 116th Street said his group had had "a wonderful time" and that everyone from Puerto Rican officials to strangers had gone out of their way to make his group feel welcome.

He said that Puerto Ricans "are a people who love to help each other" and he thought it would be "a good idea to take Puerto Rican boys born here to Puerto Rico to see how wonderful their people are there."

Teenagers, he said, have to express themselves and sometimes they do so by fighting. "But," he added, 'if you don't walk around with a chip on your shoulder no one will bother you."

Louis De Rosa of 217 East 120th Street said he had left 'part of my heart in Puerto Rico." He said his group had been "treated like celebrities instead of just ordinary boys from New York." He expressed surprise as having found in Puarto Rico that 'the poorest homes were kept so clean—even the streets are clean there."

Lawrence Totaro of 332 East 119th Street declared that "most Puerto Ricans who come here come for jobs and more than 80 per cent of them are not on home relief." They are hard working industrious people," he declared.

Anthony Bencivenga of 322 East 119th Street said reports of neighborhood tensions between the youth gangs were often exaggerated. "Maybe I shouldn't say this," he added, "but I think the newspapers play it up too much."

His opinion was shared by John Munafo of 151 East 110th Street, who said that he and his friends "associate with Puerto Rican kids and we don't have serious trouble."

All seemed to agree with James Senescalchi of 525 East 120th Street that cultural exchanges with the commonwealth would promote better understanding. As an example of a step in the right direction he cited a dance that had been arranged for his group during its trip to Puerto Rico.

"We taught their girls rock 'n' roll," he said, "and they taught us Spanish dances."

Powell urges statehood for Puerto Rico

The Afro-American (Baltimore)

SAN JUAN, P.R. — Congressman Adam Clayton Powell told an audience at San Juan's Caribe Hilton Hotel Sunday that commonwealth status for Puerto Rico at its best is a form of colonialism and that the territory should seek either statehood or independence.

Powell, guest speaker at a gathering of "Citizens for 51," an organization devoted to making Puerto Rico the 51st state of the Union, declared that "Any Puerto Rican who thinks Puerto Rico under any form of Commonwealth status is free or proclaims that it is free is practicing self-deception."

"The idea of the commonwealth was a crutch upon which the people of Puerto Rico could limp out the days of colonalism towards what — further colonialism or freedom?

"I believe that every right-thinking Puerto Rican, regardless of party or philosophy, would choose freedom.

"The longer a people limp on a crutch, the longer they postpone the day of freedom. The natural strength of man grows progressively weaker when artificially aided. This is what is now happening to Puerto Rico."

Expressing his "philosophy of freedom," Mr. Powell declared:

"...Freedom under the Stars and Stripes consists solely of one thing...Statehood! Otherwise—independence!"

Puerto Rico: The 51st State?

The Montgomery Advertiser
Montgomery, Ala.
18e (4)

By RAY JENKINS
City Editor, Alabama Journal

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico—The recent entry of Alaska and Hawaii into the Union has stirred much speculation here and in the States over statehood for Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rico presently is self-governing, holding a commonwealth status. The island's popular governor, Luis Munoz Marin, maintains that Puerto Rico is nowhere near being ready for statehood. He believes it will be 35 or 40 years before statehood is feasible.

JENKINS

Munoz holds the view that Puerto Rico's economic legs are too weak to support statehood. The island's fledgling government operates on U. S. customs kickbacks and an insular tax on incomes and purchases. The residents are exempt from all federal taxation. With statehood, of course would come all forms of federal taxes, and customs revenues, which now amount to around $26 million annually, would be lost.

Furthermore, Puerto Rico is offering lavish tax exemptions to industries and corporations in a drive to create new jobs for the island's two and a half million inhabitants. If she gained statehood, however, she could ill afford to write off taxes from anyone. Also, the industries which are now flocking to Pureto Rico would be no longer be exempt from federal income taxes.

The Argument For Statehood

THE SUPPORTERS of statehood—mainly Republicans—believe loss of revenue from customs and other sources would be more than offset by federal aid in such areas as public health, highways, education, and housing. The federal aid programs are geared to favor the less developed states, so Puerto Rico could count on a lions' share.

Countering the industries argument, the supporters of statehood say industries which take advantage of the tax write-offs are mostly short-term undesirables which Puerto Rico doesn't need anyway. They believe that stable heavy industry would come if statehood removed all doubt as to the island's political future.

And finally, the statehooders say, entry into the Union would provide a tremendous boost in public morale on the island.

Probably around 60 per cent of the islanders are behind Munoz and are therefore commited to retaining the commonwealth set-up for the foreseeable future. An estimated 35 per cent want statehood. A small, but vocal minority of perhaps five per cent would sever all connections with the United States to become an independent state. Most responsible persons, especially Americans, fiercely oppose independence. Many feel Puerto Rico is not even as capable as Cuba of making a go of independence. They believe independence would be nothing but a fast ride to political and economic chaos. While many are willing to entrust Puerto Rico with statehood, few are willing to give up federal constitutional guarantees.

And lastly, there is a lunatic element — numbering only a few thousand — who want independence by revolution. It was this group who supplied the fanatics who fired shots onto the floor of congress and who made the abortive attempt to assassinate President Truman.

The Language Problem

PUERTO RICO was ceded to the United States in 1899 by Spain following the Spanish-American War. Old-timers who were there when the Americans took over the Puerto Ricans welcomed the occupying troops with open arms.

Nevertheless the islanders have maintained their cultural heritage of Spain. Even the governor seems to prefer the retention of the Spanish language.

This of course cuts off Puerto Rico from America's cultural facilities. Many speak no English at all, and few speak it well. But this picture is bound to change in time; industrialization, television, and increased travel will all promote the use of English in Puerto Rico.

Stealing Cuba's Tourists

LATELY THE island has been getting a lion's share of the tourist trade which formerly went to Cuba. Puerto Rico isn't much further away, and tourists can go there without exeperiencing anti-American hostility. Though some resident of the southern areas of the island are anti-American, Puerto Ricans on the whole are friendly and courteous.

Another Florida?

MOST VISITORS find Puerto Rico much like Florida. Some say San Jaun is just another Miami. At first glance, San Jaun does appear somewhat like, Miami, each flaunting lavish multi-million dollar beach hotels.

But a closer look reveals San Juan has much greater depth than Miami. For one thing, the Puerto Rican capital is one of the oldest cities on the Western Hemisphere. Columbus walked upon its beaches on his second trip to America in 1493. Its rich heritage is reflected in centuries old forts, in quaint narrow streets, and in ancient cathedrals. Moreover, tourist who come to San Jaun are far removed from the outrageously-attired sybarites who cover the beaches of Miami.

The Land Of Sugar And Rum

SUGAR CANE is the principal agricultural product, being the raw material for Puerto Rico's two leading industries, sugar and rum.

Fruit also grows in abundance, but the agricultural potential is still relatively untapped. Likewise, there is a tremendous opportunity in fishing and lumber.

A Racial Melting Pot

THE INHABITANTS are a racial hodge-podge, as is the case with most Western Hemisphere countries colonized by the Spanish.

About 20 per cent of the people are Negroes, descendants of slaves. Most of the remaining people (continental Americans excepted) have some Negro blood. A few show the Aztec Indian features commonly found in Mexico.

The average Puerto Rican, if such a thing exists, is a handsome person. Their hair is wavy, either gleaming jet black or reddish. Men generally wear thin brush mustaches. The women, who are inclined to plumpness, mature early, but like many Latins, they also lose their figures early because of their carefree diet.

An early riser will find Puerto Ricans scurrying to their jobs dressed in plain, but neat and fashionable clothing.

No Discrimination

THERE IS no racial discrimination, either legally or socially. Negroes occupy high positions in industry and government. The Speaker of the House, for instance, is a black.

Since Puerto Ricans are American citizens, another name must be given to the non-Latin white mainlanders. They are called "continentals." The somewhat derogatory term, "Gringo," is also used, as in Cuba.

These continentals get along quite well with the Puerto Ricans. They are completely integrated into the community, although virtually all "continentals" are in the higher income brackets.

Their children generally attend private schools, however, because of the language problem. About 90 per cent of the Puerto Rican children attend public schools, which are mediocre and where Spanish is the medium of instruction. The remaining 10 per cent attend parochial schools where boys and girsl alike wear attractive unifroms.

The Puerto Rican Cuisine

THE STABLE diet is dried beans, rice, and salt codfish, none of which is grown on the island. Americans are surprised to find that such drab food can be made so tasty.

The rice is cooked in a small amount of water and at exactly the right moment, a spoonful of lard is thrown into the pot to prevent the rice from being gummy. Beans, kidneys as a rule, are soaked and boiled and again, at just the right moment. the water is drained off and a spicy tomato and onion suace is added. The beans are spooned upon the rice. The fish, which must be boiled to remove the salt, is prepared in many appetizing forms.

Some Religious Aspects

PUERTO RICO is one of those countries which is called "nominally" Catholic, like France. Probably 95 per cent of the inhabitants, if asked to specify their religion, would say Catholic. But this is a largely spontaneous answer, because many thousands are apathetic toward religion. Masses are largely attended by older women and parochial school children. As in other Latin countries there is a shortage of native clergy. Many priests are Irish-American.

There is a good deal of Protestant missionary activity on the island, but the major denominations, in deference to the Catholic church, do not actively proselytize

VIRGIN ISLANDS ENJOYING BOOM

Tourist Traffic Increases Many Newcomers Are Settling Permanently

WASHINGTON — The Virgin Islands are no longer sleepy eastern outposts of the United States. The climate-blessed Caribbean isles have awakened to a boom that is bringing in new visitors, settlers, and revenue, the National Geographic Society reports.

The 30,000 islanders expect 185,000 vacationers to arrive in jet planes and cruise ships in 1960, compared with 15,000 travelers ten years ago. Many newcomers are settling permanently.

The American Virgin Islands lie just east of Puerto Rico. They include St. John, St. Croix, St, Thomas, and fifty smaller islands.

Columbus discovered the islands in 1493. They were visited by Dutch, English, Spanish, and French adventurers, but Denmark ultimately took possession in the eighteenth century. The United States bought the chain in 1917.

St. John Plays Vital Role

Though St. John covers only nineteen square miles and is in the smallest of the main Virgin Islands, it plays an important role in the growing economy of the territory.

In 1956, a national park was established on almost three-fourths of St. John's land area. Laurence S. Rockefeller, president of the Jackson Hole Preserve and a National Geographic Society trustee, presented 5,000 of the park's 9,500 acres on behalf of the Preserve.

St. John has no newspaper, theatres, signboards, or paved roads. The 749 permanent inhabitants lead a peaceful life in an atmosphere of year-round summer. The average annual temperature is 79. Rain usually falls in ten-minute showers.

Scenic mountain trails thread through tropical vegetation and trees which cover 85 per cent of the island. Hibiscus, bougainvillaea, orchids, ferns, bay plants from which bay rum is made, coconut-laden palms, breadfruit trees, and cacti 20 feet tall flourish.

Sugar Mainstay on St. Croix

Ruins of plantations and mills recall colonial days when St. John was an important sugar island. Sugar cane still is a major crop on St. Croix, 40 miles to the south.

St. Croix, largest of the three main islands, once was one of the wealthiest islands in the West Indies. More than 200 mills crushed cane from its rich fields. In 1812, it shipped 46,000,000 pounds of sugar and countless gallons of rum. The emancipation of slaves changed the island's plantation economy which entered a decline.

Now a Department of Agriculture experiment station on St. Croix is promoting diversified farming. Herds of a special strain of sleek, chesnut-coated cattle developed on the island are increasing.

About 16,000 people live on St. Thomas, most of them in Charlotte Amalie, a picturesque port of steep streets, flower-bordered lanes and modern hotels. St. Thomas has been a major shipping center since colonial days when residents boasted it was "the place on the way to every other place." Today, it is the most important tourist stop in the islands.

Charlotte Amalie is the capital of the territory, which is administered by the Department of the Interior. The governor is appointed by the President. Islanders elect their own eleven-member legislature.

VIRGIN ISLANDS SEEK FLOOD RELIEF FUNDS

Special to The New York Times.

CHARLOTTE AMALIE, Virgin Islands, May 9—An emergency bill to provide $100,000 for immediate relief and $100,000 for immediate general repairs was introduced into the legislature today as this city began recovery from the worst deluge in its history.

Preliminary estimates of damage ran as high as $1,000,000. Bridges, roads and retaining walls were wrecked by torrents that gushed down the hillsides when more than eleven inches of rain fell in the twenty-four hours ended at 2 P. M. yesterday. Nine inches of rain were recorded in the four hours from 10 A. M. to 2 P. M.

Half of the main street, Dronnigensgade, was closed today as a bulldozers worked to clear it of mud banks. The airport resumed operations. Hangars and part of the airfield were still flooded.

There were no casualties but some houses were unusable. Inmates of the Corneiro Home for the Aged were evacuated to the Anglican School.

Some cars were swept as much as 300 yards by the flood waters.

Jim Crow Holds No Power There

(Editor's Note: Sterling Sorenson of Pine River, Wis., spent three years in the Virgin Islands and got a first-hand picture of the racial practices there. During his stay he was a reporter for the Daily News in Charlotte Amalie.)

By STERLING SORENSEN

CHARLOTTE AMALIE, V. I. — Negroes and whites buried in the same cemetery; church pews occupied by representatives of both races; colored and Caucasians dining and dancing together; mixed classes and faculty and a police and judicial system manned entirely by Negroes!

Mixed sea bathing and public buses aren't restrictive as to seating!

It's all the accepted pattern in this capital city and — Orval Faubus and his ilk, note — the skies have yet to fall in!

Jim Crow holds no sway in an arena predominately Negro. They make up a whopping 85 per cent of the population and if they elected, could discriminate against the white residents or use retaliatory legislation to keep the "minority" in its place.

Here, indeed, there could be a turning of tables.

But this is the United States, too, and such measures would be unthinkable.

Demagogic white supremacists and ignoramuses who prate a fearsome race "mongrelization" have in the Virgin Islands an example of total integration that could purge their fears — real or assumed.

Here, under the Stars and Stripes, in a geographically "southern" setting, Negroes and whites live together in what might be termed a near-Utopian racial accord.

The aquamarine waters of the Caribbean, it appears, have washed away bigotry, interracial frictions and divisiveness.

Here, school segregation, poll taxes, voters' literacy tests, white and colored toilets and other implements of white supremacists could be imposed, in reverse, since the Negroes are in control of the insular legislature.

It could happen here, in an about-face, but Virgin Island Negroes want no truck with such abortive shenanigans.

To be sure, there's great pride of race and ancestry by both Negroes and whites — but sit-ins are entirely unnecessary and you can bet that nary a white vote would be cast for a Senator Eastland or Ellender hereabouts.

And these resident Caucasians are in a good position to know the way of life all-out integration, which is such a bugaboo to Mississippi, the Carolinas, Alabama and other southern states.

And on the basis of many statistics, the Virgin Islands is far and above on the credit side of these states. Examples are the almost wholly absence of juvenile delinquency; there's been but two major crimes in the past quarter-century; unemployment isn't a problem at all, and the "mixed" free hospital facilities are superior to that provided in many a Dixie metropolitan center.

Perhaps a reason for the good record and racial accord is that the Negroes were freed here back in 1848, and no war was necessary to insure emancipation. All it required was an edict of the Danish crown.

Emancipation Park, surrounding a statute of King Christian IX, stands on the waterfront as a testimony to continued employment and enjoyment of this freedom by the Negroes.

Long owned by Denmark and profitable as a sugar cane producing West Indies holding, the Virgin Islands were sold to the United States in 1917 for $25,000,000.

The Danes were free of the deadly virus of race intolerance and discriminatory practices, and set the pattern for today's happy white-Negro rapprochement.

And here's a few additional statistics to instruct or to refute the contentions of the Jim-Crow crowd:

While there are no miscegenation laws on the statute books, intermarriage of the races isn't practiced, indeed it is the rare exception. Consequently, there in lies a direct contradiction to those who claim to fear "mongrelization."

The Negroes have just cause to be proud of their heritage, their background and their physical birthright which makes them tall and sturdy men and graceful, comely women.

In grade and high schools of the insular territory, mixed alike are the classes and faculty, and no one, but no one, has been harmed by the act of sitting alongside a white or a Negro, and sex problems are not on the books.

The record is good on many fronts, and Charlotte Amalie invites all-out inspection of those who want to get an on-the-spot view of integration in operation.

Virgin Islands Bills

Upholding of Veto Is Protested as Discriminatory

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

President Eisenhower recently upheld Governor Merwin of the Virgin Islands in his veto of two bills which would have given to Government employes in this American territory the right to appeal dismissals, suspensions and classifications to the Government Employes Service Commission, whose decisions would have been final. The President said that the measure would not be in accord with orderly processes of the Administration.

No reference was made to the fact that many states of the Union and near-by Puerto Rico have identical laws in effect. In this case, "orderly process" means denial of democracy, the institution of one-man control.

The right of a Governor of a territory to fire a Government employe in the civil service and then to sit as judge to make the final decision as to whether or not the firing was fair and just is a farce and a mockery of our democratic system. There is no place in the democratic world where a precedent may be found for this abhorrent policy.

Why must everything be different in the Virgin Islands? Why must American citizens in this offshore possession be denied rights and privileges which American citizens elsewhere take for granted?

The people are given the power to elect members of the Legislature. But when that Legislature, obeying a mandate from the people, proceeds to adopt unanimously a bill, an officer not elected by the people, but hand-picked by another official, has the power to thwart the will of the Legislature and the people. If the Governor of the islands were elected, it would not be so reprehensible, for he would be answerable to the people for his acts.

Washington officials need to be told again and again that the people of the Virgin Islands are not soft-brained adolescents who, after forty-odd years of American tutelage, must still remain in kindergarten school. Virgin Islanders are mature, intelligent Americans, with the same mental capacity, moral fiber and pride of Americans anywhere else. We will never be satisfied with second-class treatment.

Says West Indies 'In Birth Pains'

Chicago Defender

Sept 3-1-60

Lowenthal, a Geographer and Historian, compared the people of the four-year-old federation of 10 Caribbean islands to those of the United States in the 1780's when individualism was at a high peak.

He said the people "are feeling their way to nationhood. They are as yet, hardly West Indian at all."

Despite 20 years of progress, Dr. Lowenthal said, ignorance, illegitimacy and poverty are still widespread in the islands. Recently pay in one typical job was raised to 76 cents a day on the island of Montserrat Lowenthal said.

"There are a lot of babies in the West Indies — 125,000 a year in a population of 3,250,000," he said. This situation is a problem in a country in which one in five has no work, one in five has too little work and where the death rate will soon drop below the U. S. rate, while the birth rate is double the American rate, Lowenthal said.

Dr. Lowenthal spent a year at Jamaica's University of the West Indies and much of his study has been on the Caribbean area. He is now a research associate in the American Geographical Society in New York.

Indonesians Break Off With Dutch

Washington Post

Thurs. 8/18/60

Reuters

DJAKARTA, Indonesia, Aug. 17—President Sukarno broke off diplomatic relations with the Netherlands today—the 15th anniversary of Indonesia's independence from Dutch colonial rule. G, A 10

Relations between the two countries had been strained by their dispute over Dutch-administered West New Guinea, claimed by Indonesia.

Sukarno, making an Independence Day broadcast from his "Freedom Palace" here, said the immediate reason for the breakoff was the recent dispatch of a Dutch aircraft carrier and two destroyers on a "show-the-flag" trip to West New Guinea.

"In such a situation, it is not possible to maintain diplomatic relations with the Dutch any longer," the President said, adding that he had given the order to cut relations this morning.

Announcement Cheered

The announcement was not in the prepared text of his speech. Independence Day crowds in the palace grounds cheered when Sukarno unexpectedly made the announcement.

Mentioning Indonesia's claim to West New Guinea, which this country calls West Irian, Sukarno said it was no use begging.

"One does not beg for one's rights," he added, "one only fights for them."

The diplomatic break had been widely rumored here. Indonesia had called the dispatch of the three Dutch warships an "act of war," saying they would infringe on Indonesia's claimed territorial waters.

2 Parties Dissolved

Sukarno; now wielding virtual dictatorship powers, also called for ending "liberal democracy" in favor of his own system of "guided democracy." He announced that he had ordered the dissolution of two political parties—the Western-inclined Moslem Masjumi Party and the Socialist Party.

He also announced a land-reform program that would mean the abolition of all foreign rights and remaining colonial concessions over land, and the extension of land ownership for the people.

Sukarno, the revolutionary chief who led this 3000-island nation and its 90 million people to independence, said the Dutch were becoming "increasingly stubborn." He added that it was no longer possible to maintain relations with them.

The President tagged The Netherlands "a country of small creditors that has fallen already."

In demanding the end of "liberal democracy," Sukarno urged an intensification of the "revolutionary spirit," the union of Communists, Moslems and a "policy of strength" against the Dutch in West New Guinea.

In announcing the dissolution of the two parties, Sukarno said "this is not a dictatorship." He claimed the authorities must eliminate every force that "endangers safety or the march of the revolution."

Masjumi and Socialist leaders were involved in the 1958 revolt against Sukarno's regime. Under a new law the President may ban a party that has not condemned rebellion.

From now on, Sukarno said, all property will be controlled.

"The land is for those who till the soil, not for those who sit at ease and become fat through exploiting the sweat of the people."

U. S. WILL EXPAND AID TO INDONESIA

The New York Times

Quick Assistance Is Pledged to Sukarno and Nasution

New York, N.Y.

Special to The New York Times.

UNITED NATIONS, N. Y., Oct. 5—The United States has agreed to expand and accelerate its program of military aid to Indonesia, authoritative sources said today. Times 10-6-60

Assurances of continued and increased aid were given to Lieut. Gen. Aboul Haris Nasution, Indonesian Defense Minister, during his visit to Washington last week. General Nasution, who is also chief of his country's army, conferred with Secretary of Defense Thomas S. Gates jr., and members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

It was understood that these assurances were repeated today when Secretary of State Christian A. Herter, who received a courtsey call from General Nasution in the capital last week, paid his respects to President Sukarno at the Waldorf-Astoria.

The Indonesian President is preparing to leave tomorrow night for his homeland.

Secretary Herter and President Sukarno were reported to have discussed the problem of Netherlands New Guinea, which the Indonesians claim. Trade and economic relations of the United States and Indonesia also were discussed.

Indonesia sells rubber, tin and some oil to the United States. The country buys various industrial goods from the United States.

The Indonesian Foreign Minister, Dr. Subandrio, who took part in the conversation arranged to stay on after the departure of President Sukarno to continue political and economic conversations with Secretary Herter and other State Department officials.

The United States assurance of expanded military aid and the progressing trade talks appeared to represent a basic United States policy decision that Indonesia is not in danger of Communist domination.

There were known to be doubts in Washington on that score in the past. The existing military aid program was begun with great hesitation on a modest pasis in 1958, following rebel strife in Indonesia. It was felt at the time that it would be better to satisfy the Indonesian Government's requirements of arms to quell internal fighting, lest the Soviet Union be asked for a massive assistance program that would mean certain Soviet domination of the Jakarta regime.

At the same time, the Indonesian Government, as well as the United States Government, did not desire the usual type of military assistance programs that have been carried out in other countries.

Thus no United States military assistance group was set up. The arms were not provided as grants, but were sold for local currency. The total program in the last two years has cost a little more than $20,000,000.

The Indonesians have obtained light weapons, such as rifles and machine guns, small behicles and trucks, thirty-five old-fashioned, surplus bombers and fighters of World War II vintage and about ten transport planes. The Indonesians also ordered a few of the latest jet-prop C-130 transports, of which one already has been delivered.

GGeneral Nasution's Washington talks, including a discussion with John Irwin, Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, emphasized the Indonesian desire to increase the number of United States military experts to help with officer training as well as the country's desire to build up its navy.

The United States already has made available for purchase by the Indonesians in their own currency a certain number of landing ships and small craft. United States officials were said to have listened with sympathy to General Nasution's proposals that the Indonesian navy be built up.

Apparently, the United States officials were impressed with General Nasution's report on his fight against the rebels. When he took charge last year he promised that within three years he could wipe out the rebels, who were estimated to number 100,000 scattered in pockets throughout central and Northern Sumatra and the Northern Celebes.

The rebels, whose Arsenal was estimated to number 20,000 small weapons, proclaimed they were fighting a struggle against Communist influence in the Jakarta regime. These proclamations won considerable sympathy in the United States, with the result that charges of United States support to the rebels gained widespread attention.

INDONESIA HELD DECLINING FAST

The Times

Speaker at Tulane Says Nation Near Brink

Times

Indonesia is declining rapidly and can be saved from internal destruction only by a miracle, a Southeast Asian expert said Monday at Tulane University.

The ills suffered by this Southeast Asian island group also furnish a classic example of the problems associated with an emerging state, according to Willard A. Hanna, a correspondent for the American Universities Field Staff. p. 13

He listed the ills as political instability, inflation and economic deterioration, lax internal security and inconsistent foreign relations. New Orleans, La.

Hanna said the root of the problems stems from Indonesia's lack of preparedness when it claimed its independence immediately after World War II.

ENORMOUS PROBLEM

"Indonesia shed Dutch colonial rule during a period of economic depression and a time of swiftly mounting international tension," he said.

"When these factors are added to a shattered communication system, no tradition of centralized self-government, and a new government beset with insurrection, there is an enormous problem." Times 10-18-60

Since that time, Indonesia under President Sukarno has not been able to pull itself together, Hanna said. There is no workable plan for economic development, which is hampered by a dangerous inflation, and regional insurrection has developed during the last three years.

A key to Indonesia's problem is Sukarno, whom Hanna described as a revolutioary nationlst.

REDS FAVOR SUKARNO

"He is not a Communist, Hanna said, "but Sukarno is losing the support of other political parties and gaining support from the Communist party."

Whatever happens in Indonesia, it will have an important influence on all Southeast Asia, he pointed out.

Indonesia is the largest nation in Southeast Asia and its population of 90,000,000 is almost half of the population of that total area.

In addition, its geographical situation in an arc around the mainland is of strategic importance, he said. Indonesia also has important natural resources —rubber, oil and tin, in particular.

MALAYA DIFFERENT

In direct contrast to Indonesia, the three-year-old Malaya nation has a high prosperity, internal order, and economic development, and shows signs of significant progress, Hanna said

Malaya succeeded because it became independent in a period of economic prosperity, it enjoys a large core of well-trained administrators and there is no bitterness as a result of revolutionary fighting, Hanna said.

It, too, is strategically important because it is the natural crossroads between the Far East and Europe, and is the world's largest producer of raw rubber, he said. Malaya is still part of the British Commonwealth.

Hanna Monday began 10 days of reporting to graduate and undergraduate seminars and classes in social sciences.

Says Most Hotel Bias Has Ended In Bermuda

Chicago Defender 1/8/60

Chicago Ill

NEW YORK — (UPI) — The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith said Saturday most anti-semitic discrimination in hotels and resorts in Bermuda has ended.

Sat 8/13/60

The league, in a special report based on an on-the-spot investigation, said that hotel men in the British Island were anxious to get rid of the reputation that the Bermuda resorts spots do not want Jewish customers.

In fact, the league said, the resort managers blame U. S. travel agencies for starting the anti-semitic practices and reports that have plagued the island.

WANT NO BIGOTRY

The league said that "many forces—including morality, business and law—have combined to bring about this salutary change."

"The league found out that today Bermuda and its principal industry—tourism—want no part of religious bigotry," the report said. "The island seeks American tourists who will conform to local mores, but it clearly recognizes that this has no relationship to religious beliefs."

The league said that reports of anti-semitism had been so frequent and well-circulated since the end of World War II that prostests were voiced in the British parliament when the island was chosen as a meeting site for the U. S.

HAVE CODES

Some tourist agencies were reported to have developed codes to identify Jewish, Negro and Gentile patrons who applied for accommodations.

Thet league indicated that most discriminatior in Bermuda is based not on religion but race. It pointed out that two thirds of the island's 45,000 person population are Negroes and that schools are racially segregated.

Restaurants began accepting Negro patrons a year ago, but Negroes cannot get rooms in most of the hotels, the report said.
